The rapid growth of this article into favor, and the many testimonials and praises we have received from those who have used it, induce us to call the attention of the public to it as an invaluable remedy for the speedy cure of diseases, defects, and irritations of the skin, and all cutaneous eruptions, such as Tetter, Ringworm, Barber's Itch, Blotches, Pimples, Flesh Worms, or Grubs, Chafings, Sunburn, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Redness, Roughness, Chapping, Scurf, Dandruff, Dryness, Baldness, Premature Decay of the Hair, &c. &c. The Balsam and Oil are combined in such a manner that the medicine has been introduced into the hair in a perfect state of preservation, and the Oil is considered the most wonderfully successful discovery ever made for the hair, as it is the only one that has ever been introduced to the public that will penetrate to the roots of the hair, and restore it to its natural color, or any other color desired, and prevent it from falling off. It is also a most delightful perfume for the handkerchief, and for the toilet and bath. Sold by all Druggists. Depot, 83 Maiden Lane, New York. Sold also by Caterns Brothers, 308 and 310 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J. Price 50 cents per bottle. Sold by all Druggists in New York and Brooklyn.

Get the Best.

TEN FOR ONE DOLLAR.

Card Photographs

(5000 Different Subjects)

OF ALL

Prominent and Noted Persons,

LIVING AND DEAD.

All the Major-Generals, the President and Cabinet,

AND ALL THE

Prominent Officers of the Army and Navy.

ACTORS, ACTRESSES, FANCY AND MISCELLANEOUS PICTURES, &c. &c.

☞ 10 for One Dollar, or 15 Cts. Single Picture. Sent free to any address. Enclose Stamp, and send for List of Albums and Card Photographs.

To insure prompt and honorable dealing, SEND YOUR ORDERS TO

G. G. EVANS, Publisher,

439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Penn.

N. B. A Classified Catalogue of over 10,000 different books in every department of literature sent to any address on receipt of 6 Cents. Premium Certificates of new Watch and Jewelry Enterprise sent on receipt of 10 cents.

Steinway & Sons,

Manufacturers of Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos, have removed their Warerooms to their new and splendid Marble Buildings, Nos. 82 and 84 Fourth Street, North Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

Dyspepsia Tablets.

For Indigestion, Heartburn, &c., manufactured only by S. G. WELLING, and sold by druggists generally. 50 cents per box. Depot No. 507 Centre St., New York, second floor. Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

The Graefenberg Company's

UTERINE CATHOLICON (Marshall's).

An infallible cure for "Female Weakness," and all Uterine complaints of women.

Price $1.50 per bottle. Five bottles for Six Dollars.

Shults' Ongunet. warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. ADDRESS C. F SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$50 AMERICAN $50

LEVER WATCHES.

THAYER MASK, P. S. BARTLETT, WALTHAM, MASS., FINE JEWELERS, WARRANTED, IN 4 OZ. COIN SILVER HUNTING-CASE, GOLD JOINTS, FANCY FINE TUB, FOR $50.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on delivery.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches, 208 Broadway New York.

$15 Per Day, $20

And a Gold Hunting-Case Watch given free to all agents who sell our Original and "only Genuine" Extra Large Size Stationery Prize Packages. One of our Wonderful Packages contains more really valuable articles than any half dozen others ever sold. Among the surprising contents of "each package" will be found large quantities of "Fine Stationery," Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, "Engravings," Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needle-work, Cologne Keepsakes, Household Conveniences, Tatter-Writer's Instructor, Parlor Amusements, Game Chess, Checkers for 1864, Union & Parlor Games, Rare Recipes, Many Ways to get Rich, Fancy Notions, Fancy Articles, Rich and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, &c., &c., all together worth many dollars, for only 25c. Agents make money fast. Every one hundred packages, with presents of jewelry and gift, or a superb watch, shewskin, and one right for a town or county, sent anywhere on receipt of $15. Smart agents can sell 100 Packages in a few hours. Agents wanted in every town. Send for our Great New Circular for 1864, containing Extra Premium Inducements, free. Address the Great AMERICA PRIZE PACKAGE CO., 21 Nassau and 160 Fulton St., New York. Only Original, and Largest and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

BENNETT'S RUPTURE CURE TRUSS challenges the world to equal it in retaining and perfect comfort to the wearer. Call and examine. Office, 1 Barclay Street, opposite the Astor House.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order for any service.

COLORED STONE CHINA DINING SETS.

$7 ARMY $7

WATCH.

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, enameled dial, cut hands, Patent Time Regulator, and Warranted for 3 years.

A single one sent free by mail in neat case, with a beautiful chain, for only $7.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the Army. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$15 European Timekeeper. $15

OR, COMPASS WATCH.

A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Gouchet English Lever of Nicht Movements," "Full Jewelled" Independent Action, Self Balance, and has a NEAT REPEATER COMPASS which is the cap attached to the movements, making it a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier on the Prairie, Forest, Mountain, or Battle Field. "WILL STAND RACES, and is an EXACT IMITATION of $100 Watch, Used by the British Army Officers.

Sent free by mail, in elegant Morocco Case, for only $15. A friend Louis's Illustrated Journeyer of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Another friend says, "Correct timepieces; and for beauty and fine finish they are equal to timepieces at $100 watches."

Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 28 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

WARDS SHIRTS

SENT EVERYWHERE BY MAIL OR EXPRESS

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and choice of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.

Price 75 cts. each; sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 78 cents.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

E. W. H. WARD, 427 Broadway, N. Y.

Soldiers Discharged

For Wounds, $100 Bounty paid by applying at once. Blanks and information sent by mail.

SOMES, BROWN & CO, 7 Park Place, N. Y. City.

AMERICAN

METALLIC COIL CORSET

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metal. Sent all for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Chicago," to C. H. WELLING, 94 Pine Street, N. Y., and receive it by return mail.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums.

Purifies and Sweetens the Breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.

Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,

218 Greenwich St., New York.

Don't buy your Gaiters or Shoes without Fogg's Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the straps. Dealers or manufacturers can explain The Lever Buckle, and will make arrangements with you. FREDERICK STEVENS, 215 Pearl Street, New York, and 68 Kirby Street, Boston, Mass.

A Chinese Preparation.

Warranted to force the hair on the smoothest face, or money refunded. Sent by mail on the receipt of $1. Address, L. L. STONE, Albany, N. Y.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.

Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 25 CENTS, or FOUR for $1.00.

Address P. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Just Published.—AGENTS WANTED to sell a PORTRAIT of LIEUT.-GEN. U. S. GRANT. Address the Publisher, WILLIAM SARTAIN, 728 Sansom St., Philadelphia.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the

SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.

Send for a prospectus to

VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOVEREIGN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 75 cts. per bottle. ARCADIA, FOR THE HAIR, ELIXIRAD, CERTAIN, but only harmless restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HEBE TOOTH-CORE, THE DELIGHTFUL, 50 cts. MAGNOLIA PERFUMERY, THE EXQUISITE PERFUME, 75 cts. One cloth off by the dozen.

If your druggist has not these articles, take no other, but remit with your order to VICTOR J. MAURIE, 218 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have Just Published:

SPEKE'S AFRICA, JOURNAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE. By JOHN HANNING SPEKE, Captain H. M. Indian Army, Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Geographical Society, Honorary Member and Gold Medalist of the Scottish Geographical Society, &c. &c. With Maps and Portraits, and numerous Illustrations, chiefly from Sketches by the Author. 8vo, Cloth, uniform with LIVINGSTONE, BARTH, BURTON, &c. Price $1 50 per vol.

THE MOORLAND HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Rachel Ray," "Orley Farm," "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "The Three Clerks," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," &c. Illustrated by MILLAIS, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

BARBARA'S HISTORY. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of " Up the River's Wife," "Hand and Glove," "The Story of Cervantes," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

ANNIE WHARTON'S FORTUNES. A Novel. By HESBA LEE, Author of "Sylvan Holt's Daughter," "Ruthie Bender," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THACKERAY'S ROUNDABOUT PAPERS. Roundabout Papers. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "The Four Georges," "The Virginians," "Pendennis," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "Adventures of Philip," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25; Half Morocco, $2 50.

☞ Sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For June, 1864.

CONTENTS:

A CHAPTER ON THE COOLIE TRADE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Coolie Soldiers.—Engaged Coolie.—Buttocking at Macao.—The Interpreter.—A Sanpan.—Ferrying the Creek.—Portuguese Colonial Husbands.—Closing the Main Hatch.—Firing down and Hatchways.—Interior of the Hatch.—A vain Attempt.—The Writhing in Blood.—On the Lower Deck.
NORTH BY ARTHUR.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Finding Excalibur.—The Death of King Arthur.
THE HEIR OF RAYMOND HILL.
WINE-MAKING IN CALIFORNIA.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Buena Vista Rancho and Vineyard.
Interior of the Bonpa Vista Wine-House and Accessories.—Planting the Vine.—Training the Vine.—The Tasks.—The Cellars.
THREE LIVES
MY OLD SONG.
THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. (Concluded.)
CHAPTER LVIII. The Fate of the Small House.
CHAPTER LIX. Can chance become a Man.
CHAPTER LX. Conclusion.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Lucy in the Garden.
A MILITARY DESPOTISM.
YOUR PROPHETS FROM THE WAR.
OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS.
CHAPTER II. On the Look-out.
CHAPTER III. The Man from Somewhere.
CHAPTER IV. Another Man.
CHAPTER V. The Boy. Mr. Wilfer Family.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Portrait of Charles Dickens.—Only Twelve Left.
THE LETTER G.
A DEAD LOVE.
WHY I WROTE IT.
HOMEOPATHY.
TOWARD SUNSET.
NORTHWARD.
THE POOR WHITES OF THE SOUTH.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Blustering Prospect.—Hard Indeed.—Rather Doubtful.
FASHIONS FOR JUNE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Breakfast Robe.—Out-Door Dress.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 75 each, or 11 Copies for $30.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 75 each, or 11 Copies for $30.

Payment (invariably in advance).

TERMS FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.—Fifteen Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements for each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 387.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—MAJOR-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK.—[SEE PAGE 339.]

THE SONG OF GRANT'S SOLDIERS.

Pile on the rails! Come, comrades, all,
We'll sing a song to-night;
To-morrow, when the bugles call,
Be ready for the fight.
Be ready then with loud hurrah
To battle or to die;
When Grant shall yield, the Northern star
Will fade from out the sky,
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

Before us lies the rebel host,
Their watch-fires we can see;
We laugh to hear the traitor boast
Of Southern victory.
Three cheers for Grant, and one more cheer,
Until the woods ring back!
Ah, well the rebel chief may fear
The blackened on his track.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

In Freedom's cause our blades were drawn;
The traitor yet shall feel
Before the day of Peace shall dawn
How strong is Northern steel.
Three cheers for Grant, my gallant men,
Give three loud, roaring cheers!
Until the foe within his den
Shall tremble while he hears.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

Thus far we've come through fire and flood,
Still further on we'll press,
Although the way be red with blood
As through the wilderness.
Then cheer, brave comrades, let the night
Ring with your loud hurrahs,
For Grant, who knows so well to fight,
And for the Stripes and Stars.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

Our longing eyes shall yet behold
Proud Richmond's slender spires;
Our children's children will be told
How fought their valiant sires.
Look well to cap and cartridge, too;
And as we onward press
We'll cheer for Grant, who brought us through
The bloody wilderness.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

Brave soldiers of the Lord are we,
In solid ranks we come!
The Southern traitors yet shall see
How fight the "Northern scum."
Be ready, then, with loud hurrah,
To battle or to die;
When Grant shall yield, the Northern star
Will drop from out the sky.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1864.

OUR ARMIES.

THE history of the last fortnight is the story of a tremendous battle between the armies of the Union and of the rebellion. No man will complain that we are not now making war in earnest. The rebels fight with valor and tenacity, and their own papers no longer deride the loyal army as the scum of creation, but confess that it fights with nerve and desperation. The face of General GRANT, of whom we published a portrait to-day, is itself a victory. It is fixed resolution in terrible. And his career is the commentary upon it. At the West, and conspicuously Vicksburg, where GRANT began, he fried another. He did every thing but doubt or despond, and always carried his point at last.

At the end of May, last year, GRANT made his brilliant march inland from the Mississippi. At once our papers announced the fall of Vicksburg. It was a premature exultation, and was followed by a corresponding depression and despondency. But on the 4th of July he finished his work, and Vicksburg fell. There has been the same experience now, and the same impatient hurrah. If the morning papers did not record a new victory there was a general inclination toward the same doubt. Yet every body knew that GRANT had entered upon a campaign which would be long and must be bloody. Every body knew that LEE had expected the assault and had prepared himself for it, and would contest the ground inch by inch. At the end of ten days the advantage unquestionably remained with us. But he has not taken Richmond!" whispered the despondent. No, for he aimed at LEE. LEE was Richmond. When LEE is driven, Richmond totters. When LEE is overcome, Richmond falls.

And what blows he has dealt! How grand the spectacle of the Potomac army, officers and men, inspired by one sublime purpose, and all worthy of each other! "Turn my face to the enemy," said the dying General REICE, and every living soldier said the same thing in his heart, and kept and keeps his face turned there. Every soldier trusts his commander, and every commander the General-in-Chief. There is a unity which that army has never known, a confidence which is unprecedented. It is based not merely upon the prestige of success which surrounds the Lieutenant-General, but upon the result of his operations. If at the end of ten days GRANT had not outfought LEE, certainly LEE had not outgenerated GRANT. The rebel was forced by arts as well as arms from two chosen positions. The strong hand of the Union army obeys irresistibly its clear head, and whatever the immediate result of this campaign may be, the army of LEE has been terribly shattered and its prestige is destroyed forever.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

ALTHOUGH so much nearer to Virginia than to Georgia that we have daily more copious details of military movements from MEADE than from SHERMAN, our friends of the Western army must not suppose that their course has not been followed with a sympathy and interest proportioned to the importance of their struggle. The crowds which have gathered at morning and evening around the bulletin-boards have beheld with the same joy and pride the big black letters which announced Sherman's successful progress; the withdrawal from Dalton; the evacuation of Resaca; the capture of prisoners, guns, and trains. The public confidence in the quality of the ARMY OF THE WEST has never been shaken by any events; and it will be disturbed by any result. The names of SHERMAN, of THOMAS, of M'PHERSON, and the rest, are names of heroes and soldiers. Incorporated in the same prayers with their brethren of the Potomac, the same national confidence in the final triumph of liberty and the speedy fulfilment of the hope to day the men of the Cumberland. Upon the green hills through which they press the roses already bloom, and beautiful upon those mountains will be their feet of victory!

THE DEAD HEROES.

THE friends of the heroes who have fallen in the late battles in the East and West need no assurance of the universal sympathy with which the whole nation mourns with them for they see and hear every where the tokens of a common sorrow. Death for the country makes the citizen especially the country's child, and it is not a private but a public grief which hangs over the enmizes the land. Every one of those brave men, officers and soldiers, died that all our homes may be happy and all our liberties secure. Smitten by a foe who took arms not because any right or liberty of his had been endangered, but only that he might endanger the rights and liberties of others, the dead of the late battles of ours have a sweet and holy memory; for they have saved more than their country, they have befriended humanity. "Consider, therefore," says PERICLES in his discourse over the Peloponnesian dead, "to the parents of the dead, as many of them as are here among you, I will not offer condolence so much as consolation.....For while collectively they gave the country their lives, individually they received that renown which never grows old, and the most distinguished tomb they could have; not so much that in which they are laid as that in which their glory is for ever preserved, and is unreservedly recorded on every occasion for doing so, either by word or deed, that may from time to time present itself."

But this universal public and private grief sees something else than blood and suffering in the great field of national glory. It will leave to those who have not the boldness and the victoriously slaughter the most innocent men, women, and children; who have no tear for the living or death of suffering, and who call for the awful massacres of Pillow and Wagner, to call themselves "peace" men, and to affect regret at the horrors of war. Why they should deplore the loss of life, when the opportunity of all that makes life honorable, will be always a question. Vultures and snakes will take one view of a field on which the fruits of a great generation has been fought; God and good men another.

On the 17th of June, 1775, JOSEPH WARREN, a young man who had every thing to live for, who might have had ease and quiet and "peace," if he had only consented submission and compromise with the great Empire, empire instead of advising a silly struggle of Yankee farmers with the trained troops of Great Britain, "after discharging the duties of a good citizen" at home, resolved to take part in the battle. He was entreated by ELDRIDGE GERRY," says BANCROFT, "not thus to expose his life which is pleasant and becoming to die for one's country" was his answer." At two o'clock he crossed Bunker Hill alone with a musket in his hand. The British fleurs were in possession of all central commissioners to the enemy to propose compromise. They fought until they had spent all their ammunition. They fought until they were forced back. They lost 145 killed and 304 wounded; and "just at the moment of the retreat fell JOSEPH WARREN, the last in the trenches." Did he die as the fool dieth? No, no; he died as all our brave and dear ones in the late battles, East and West, and in all the battles of this war, have died. Their memory now no more come nigh him, and he went to dwell in men's memories with HAMPDEN." Is it true of WARREN. It is true of every faithful brother of his who has fellen; and it is not his wounds, his blood, his suffering, that we see, but his immortal heroism and the cause which it helps to secure.

What the President said upon the field of Gettysburg in that speech, whose rare felicity not PERICLES nor any orator ever equaled, is said by every faithful American heart as it contemplates the battle-fields of the last fortnight in Virginia and Georgia: "It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

THE EARLY HOPES OF THE REBELS.

DURING our present occupation of Fredericksburg one of our correspondents discovered in the office of the Richmond Enquirer News in the large number of letters written during the maturing of the great conspiracy against the Union. From these we select for present publication the two following, written by that infinite charlatan, M. F. MAURY, who, finding his efforts to "stir up" the British Government against us futile, has now returned to the head-quarters of rebellion at Richmond for further orders. The letters were addressed to ALEXANDER LITTLE, who was at that time the editor and proprietor of the News. They show three things: first, that the rebellion was long and carefully plotted; second, that its object was to create the necessity of slavery; and third, that it counted upon Northern assistance, especially from New Jersey. How the MAURY and his fellow-conspirators were justified in their hopes of seducing New Jersey into the rebellion, may be gathered from the correspondence that took place in the spring of 1861 between Ex-Governor PRICE of New Jersey, who was one of the representatives from that State in the Peace Congress, and J. W. BURNET, Esq., of Newark. Mr. PRICE, in answering the question what ought New Jersey to do, says: "I believe the Southern Confederation permanent. The proceeding has been taken with forethought and deliberation—it is no hurried impulse, but an irrevocable act, based upon the secret, if not supposed, 'equality of the States;' and in my opinion every Slave State will in a short period of time be found united in one Confederacy.....Before that event happens we can not do, and should we not suffer in our material interests. It is in that contingency, then, that I answer the second part of the question, 'What position for New Jersey will best accord with her interests, honor, and the patriotic instincts of her people?' I say emphatically, should go with her South, from every wise, prudential, and patriotic reason." EX-GOVERNOR PRICE proceeds to say that he is confident the State of Pennsylvania and New York will "choose also to cast their lot with the South," and after them the Western and Northwestern States.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

"OBSERVATORY, WASHINGTON, 21st Dec., 1860.

"DEAR SANDY,—FRANK MIDES tells me that the RHODE ORYE have been published. Of course you will see it, and there is no occasion for my sending you my copy. See the inclosed from Brooklyn. Do you know—please do—please make him understand—that these meetings at the North who are sending Commissioners down South are the most encouraging signs, like Moab's thorn in the air; that what we want is to get into communication with the people of the South in their own corps organisé; and there is no way of doing this except by getting the State of New Jersey and her people to go down there in their sovereign capacity, and in the person of their Commissioners ask them for their proposition? I have written to Dr. Cabell to see you, and request you to take a drive if on your own hook, and get a town-meeting to encourage New Jersey to act. She has got clean grit, and will welcome her.

"In haste, yours truly, M. F. MAURY.

"ALEXANDER LITTLE, Esq., Fredericksburg, Va."

[PRIVATE.]

"OBSERVATORY, Jan. 18, 1861.

"DEAR SANDY,—THE ORYE letter is out of date, and the New Jersey plan is 'no go,' I reckon. You much politician.

"But we must change plans as circumstances change. See my Tennessee letter, and do with it any thing you please.

"If Virginia accept the CRITTENDEN proposition, without any power of veto against sectional subjects, you and she will be in honor bound, if the North say so, to shoulder your musket and go down South to fight South Carolina and other seceding States back into the Union. Does not the North claim the power to coerce under the Constitution? Will not the North have the power to make the laws, and to make you help execute them?

"Where is the 'courageous wisdom' of Virginia now? With the CRITTENDEN proposition adoption alone the South is at the mercy of the North; and such a settlement can't stand.

"Don't you see, SANDY?—Suppose you make all south of 86° 30' a Slave State, won't the North have an entire neutral, through Congress, of all Middle lands there? Won't the North give them away to poor white settlers from Europe? and then you'll have a Slave State in name only. She will send to Congress worse men than Missouri and Maryland have sent.

"No, Sir. We can have, and ought to have, no settlement that is not based on the fact that the country is divided, and the Union is to be made up of two sections—two peoples—as antagonistic as two nations; and if you put one section at the mercy of the other, we are shitzed to have another Mexico.

"Yours, M. F. MAURY.

"A. LITTLE, Esq., Fredericksburg, Virginia."

A FRIENDLY ACT OF DENMARK.

DURING the absorbing interest in the domestic events of the last two or three months a piece of friendly regard from Denmark to this country may have been overlooked. Struggling like ourselves for national existence, and between two Austria and Prussia because of her declared policy of a free constitutional government, the ancient and valiant little Denmark, at the request of our Government, has purchased the Bremen and Hamburg steamers plying to New York to pass free of seizure by her cruisers, although they are the ships and the property of an enemy. This is a most unusual act of amity, and is done by Denmark, as her Government informally states, from her friendship for this country. Nor is it likely to be soon forgotten.

The exigency of our own affairs has prevented that general attention to the Danish question, and clear apprehension of it, which in a time of peace it would certainly have received from us. But it is a pleasant thing to have our sympathy to know that liberal Denmark is attacked by reactionary and despotic Austria and Prussia. The cry of "nationality" is one by which the absolutist rulers of Germany lead the German people to a war upon free institutions; and we have now the melancholy and absurd spectacle of Austria and Prussia cheering a destructive army in destroying the hope of constitutional government upon the Continent. Doubly contemptible, then, is the grasp of the hand of friendship which Denmark stretches to us out of her cloud of war. Her fate is almost sure. The impending execution of that old Kingdom can hardly be averted. But, in some form, the spirit of Danish constitutionalism will survive and be felt in European affairs. Meanwhile the people of the United States will remember, with a gratitude which may one day be serviceable, an act so friendly in the midst of their great struggle.

AUTOGRAPH LEAVES.

We mentioned a few weeks since the beautiful book of fac-simile autographs of Mr. and Mrs. F. KENNEDY and Lieutenant-Colonel ALEXANDER BIDDLE for the Baltimore Fair. Since then it has been published, and certainly contains most curious and interesting collections possible. Every noted American author is represented by some perfectly faithful specimen of his writing, and in almost every instance by some poem, a page or pages from a familiar work. It is not above the promise of such a book is so fully and faithfully kept, and the six dollars for which it is sold goes straight to help the Sanitary Fair. Besides the copy sent to each member, for the benefit of our great national charity, the Sanitary Commission, and copies may yet be had by application to CUSHING & BAILEY, Baltimore.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.—May 11. The Rev. Mr. BOYNTON, Methodist, of Washington, offered a resolution, which was agreed to, Mr. LANE calling for an investigation, by the Committee on Military Affairs, of the fact, that the rebels had in their service on the Red River. Amended so as to comprehend all the rebel forces in the Southwest. Bill passed, appropriating $50,000 for the relief of the commander, officers, and crew of the Mississippi River gunboat Essex, which destroyed the rebel ram Arkansas, sun which was blown up by the fire of the Essex. Nominations confirmed. D. Porter.—The bill to equalize the grades of naval officers was discussed for the rest of the day, the making an appropriation for the relief of the friendly SIOUX; allowing Surgeon GENERAL to the Marine Army, to receive an additional from the English Government; providing for the better organization of the Quartermaster's department of the army; and granting lands in Iowa for railroad purposes. The Joint Resolution relative to the Capitol was further considered.

HOUSE.—May 11. Mr. WILSON reported in favor of the bill to facilitate communication between the several States.—Mr. WILSON submitted the joint resolution calling for extensive tion as to the general officers commissioned since the war, and otherwise, their birth, etc.—The bill regulating the purity of elections in the District of Columbia was called up, and discussion ensued on the amendment of Mr. Powell, to insert the word "white" before the word "male," as a qualification for an elector. No vote was taken. Adjourned to Monday, May 16.——May 16. A joint resolution was introduced requesting the Secretary of the Interior to make the necessary provision for the taking of the national census in June of next year.—Bills were introduced making grants of land to Nebraska and Idaho for the construction of railroads, and for the relief of citizens of Denver, Colorado.—A resolution was adopted instructing the Administrator on Commerce to inquire if further legislation is necessary to prevent passengers and emigrants from steamers.—The resolution of Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, condemning the Executive proceedings in connection with the murderous bushwood on General Bissell and others, was taken up. Various amendments were passed for defeat by the Judiciary Committee.—Mr. Edmunds, for the relief of the widows of General Sykes.—The request of Mr. Wright, of Pennsylvania, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from its consideration of the Mexican question was seconded to.—The House then took up the bill to confiscate the property of the rebels, but still granting pre-emptions to settlers.—The bill for the referred to the Public Lands Committee.—The bill to incorporate the Washington Monument Association was passed.—The bill to amend the Act of March 3, 1863, to provide for the efficiency of the naval officers, was passed.—The bill regulating the enrollment of vessels, was passed.—A message from the President, communicating the correspondence in the misunderstanding between Chile and Bolivia, was received and ordered to be printed.—The bill to amend the Act of 1855 relative to claims against Mexico was taken up, and some amendments to it were adopted; but the session adjourned without final action on it.——May 17. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the return of attachment or other process property claimed by the United States in connection with enforcement of the laws, submitted the report of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California.—Mr. Conness called up the Pacific bill, authorizing a grant to the State of California of the mines embracing the Mariposa or Big Tree Grove.—The bill passed emulating the pay of soldiers in the United States army.—The bill relative to the title to copyright was made public printing, and for other purposes. The amendment that it shall be the duty of the Heads of Departments to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with copies of their reports on or before the third Monday in December was adopted.

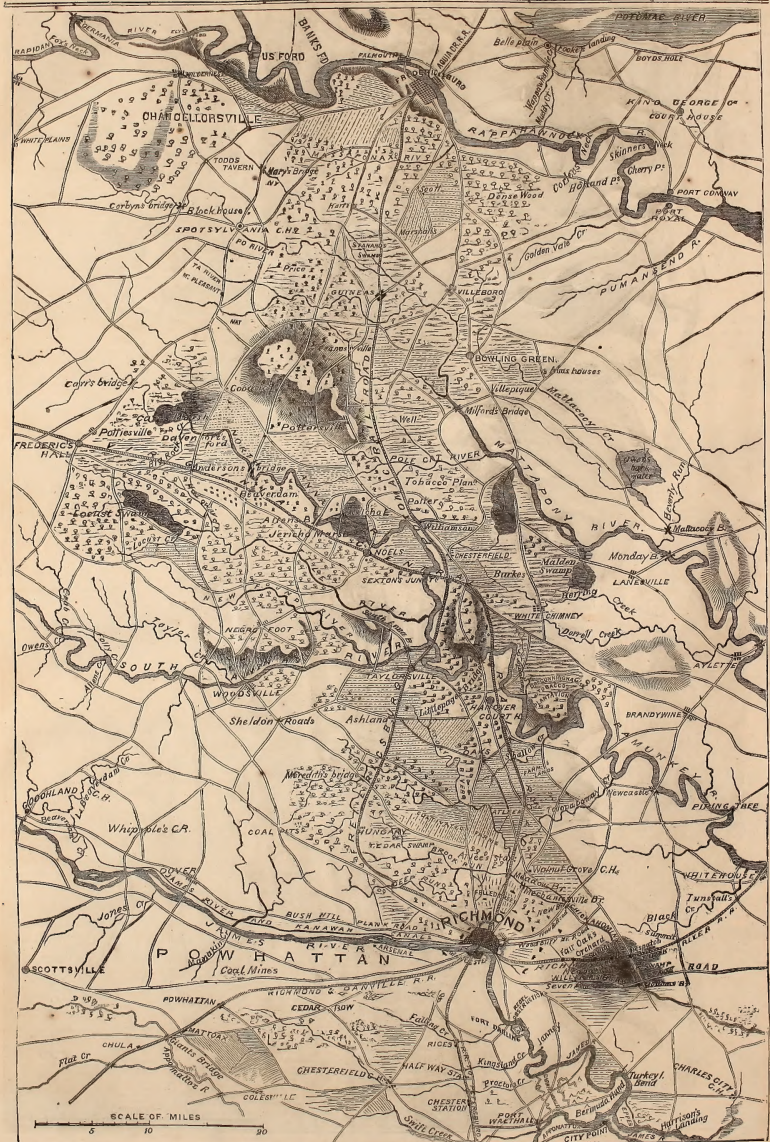
House.—May 11. The Senate amendments to the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill were resumed. That relative to the Consul-General to Constantinople and Smyrna consular pupils was agreed to; and that authorizing the raising of the salary of our representative at Rome to that of a full minister was non-concurred in.—The joint resolution to pay from the army rifle fund to volunteer general officers was taken up, and after some discussion, and the offering and rejection of a few amendments, was adopted.—The Senate's amendments to the Postal Money Order Bill were concurred in.—Adjourned to 12. The Speaker presented the resolution of the New York Chamber of Commerce, communicating Mr. Cisco's scheme for a line of telegraph between Europe and America, through the Shetlands and Iceland.—Bills were filed to give soldiers and sailors homesteads on the confiscated estates.—A bill was taken up which the House then resumed the consideration of the bill declaring the Cumberland, Illinois and the Kentucky and Tennessee Bay railroads national post and military routes. After an extended discussion a substitute for the bill was offered. This substitute provides, in effect, that every railway company in the United States whose road is completed, or may be authorized to carry over said road all freight, mails, passengers, troops, munitions, supplies, and mail for the State to another, and receive compensation therefor.—May 12. The Speaker announced the appointment of the Committee of Ways and Means, to consist of the Chairman and Messrs. Morrill, Stevens, Hooper, Allen, and Dawes.—Mr. Ashley, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill to create a General Land-office to be known as the Surveyor-General's office.—Mr. Kasson, from the Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads, reported a bill to amend the Act of 1863, to provide for the establishment of mail routes.—Mr. Dawes, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend the Act of June 30, 1864, to provide internal revenue, and for other purposes.—Mr. Stevens, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes.—Mr. Stevens, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865

"WE HAVE NOW ENDED THE SIXTH DAY OF VERY HARD FIGHTING. I PROPOSE TO FIGHT IT OUT ON THIS LINE, IF IT TAKES ALL SUMMER."—U. S. GRANT.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—BARTLETT'S BRIGADE OF WARREN'S CORPS CHARGING THE ENEMY.—[SEE PAGE 336.]



GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—TOPOGRAPHICAL MAP OF VIRGINIA.

THE BATTLE OF THE WILDERNESS.

"The wilderness shall bloom."—Bible.

VICTORY! shout for victory
On the battle-field again;
For the bloom of the Wilderness
Glory to God! Amen!

Victory! shout for victory,
Though tears for such bloom may flow;
Only by Death's dark reaping
The lilies of peace shall grow.

Victory! shout for victory
With a million-throated voice;
For the bloom of the Wilderness
Let a nation's heart rejoice.

Victory! shout for victory,
And the men who bade it draw,
From the bloom of the Wilderness
The fruitage of the Po.

Victory! shout for victory
To Freedom, for in the flowers
That have so purpled the Wilderness
Has blossomed its hope and ours.

Victory! shout for victory,
That flashes a morning light
From the bloom of the Wilderness
Far into the years of right.

Victory! shout for victory
On the battle-field again;
For the bloom of the Wilderness
Glory to God! Amen!

MAY FLOWERS.

A SOLITARY little figure climbing up a long hill in the gray morning mist. A New England country girl, with all the faults which sprout in New England air. Too much soul and too little body: thoughtful, questioning, skeptical possibly, nervous, and shy—yet a true woman at heart, full of latent courage and heroism, the possibilities of good and great things. This was Ruth Hanson.

She had come out in the early morning, goaded by some restless impulse of dissatisfaction that would not let her be quiet. She was the only child, sole darling of Deacon John Hanson and Hannah his wife. She had known little enough of poverty, or hard work, or any of the real trials of life, and yet she suffered keenly. You have seen such natures—ones that thro' who live with them day after day and year after; never understand their secret—so pure, that the high cloud-spoken for nothing is then to do right, laboring patiently at little daily tasks and yet wild with secret pain and elation, tired; and yearning, and frenzied thirst to drink of other fountains.

She walking up the hill without thought, though she panted for breath, and a sharp pain came in her side. When she reached the top she stood still. She took off her hood, and the spring morning air caressed her. She was no beauty, and yet she looked more than pretty, with the faint color, pure and pink as dawnlight, breaking into her cheek; her features full of meaning, and the whole longing of her soul speaking through her gray, tearful eyes. You would have said she had a dangerous nature, looking at her in this moment of revelation—dangerous as much in its capacity to enjoy as to suffer, and yet capable of grand developments. A pure, delicate, dainty soul, that somehow always made one think of the faint pink blooms and subtle fragrance of the trailing arbutus. She looked afar over field and hill, and drew a long breath before she spoke—talking to herself, as she had learned to do in default of other companionship—

"What a great, wide world! There must be stir and life enough somewhere. I am sure to be all like the days here. Breakfast, dinner, and supper, and dishes to wash three times a day. Oh if I were a man! If I could fight or die! Any thing that was struggle and aspiration—that took me higher!"

You will perceive that she had known little about love. That would have taught her contentment with her lot—duties done for the sake of another would have seemed no longer trifling or ignoble. Nor yet had her experience of life been deep enough to learn that true glory lies not in the act itself, but in the spirit of its doing. This is no easy lesson, and yet it is the one Heaven is teaching us all our lives, often sooner as we may turn away from it. It is quality, not quantity, by which God judges us. Is it worther to have labored all one's day in the flame of immortal truth than to have discovered the far-off shining of many planets?

But Ruth Hanson was only seventeen.

She grew happier as she looked, for the growing spring morning stole tenderly into her heart. She caught the scent of opening buds. She heard the song of a few early birds, sweet new-comers. She saw the gray mist, touched by sun-rays keen as arrow-points, roll goldenly away, and give to view fields and hills green with the springing grass. After all she was glittered with the silvery morning sheen, and blent its low, deep-toned bass in the morning anthem. Her young pulses thrilled to the young year and day, and her face wore a look of natural, healthful joy, as she turned it at the sound of a coming footstep.

A young man had come up the hill from the other side, and now stepped to speak to her. His hands were full of the trailing arbutus blossoms, and he reached them out toward her.

"Oh, May flowers! the first I have seen this year."

"Will you have them? I think they belong to you."

"my ought—I love them so;" and she took the flowers tenderly, as she would have touched a child or a bird. Robert Crandall looked at her, filled with pleasure. It was plain enough to see where his heart was—and to him that little New England girl, with her gray, tender eyes and her thoughtful face, was the one woman elect out of the universe. He never said much to her. Really enough to talk elsewhere, with her he was shy. If he was ever awkward and diffident it was in her presence. She liked him thoroughly. He was her best friend—good, generous, warm-hearted, always ready to pleasure her. It was not strange if she was somewhat enough to tyrannize over him a little. He was cool and self-possessed as she fastened her flowers in her bosom, while he stood beside her, half-trembling with bashful satisfaction.

Perhaps she cared more about him than she had ever guessed; but his goodness of heart, his patience with her wayward ways, were so much a part of her wonted life that she forgot to value them, as we forget to value sunshine. She talked to him, however, more freely than to almost any one else. She saw a paper just peeping out of his pocket, and that turned her thoughts from her flowers and the radiant new morning in quite another direction.

"Any news, Robert, any good news?" with an anxious, questioning face.

"Not yet—not to-day."

"And the war has lasted a year already. It will be a hard struggle. If I were only a man!"

"Would you go?"

"Oh, would I not? It would give me just what I long for—a career, a work. It is such miserable weariness to sit here and bark to the martial music from afar, and listen to the cry of a great nation's need, bound down by womanhood, tied hand and foot by custom—"

And want of strength," interrupted Robert, dryly. "I think the first twenty miles' march would cool down your enthusiasm considerably."

He smiled as he spoke and blushed afterward. He, a man, had not done what even this girl longed to do. Perhaps if he had been braver he would have gone away sooner; but he had been waiting with some vague, blind hope that she would care more about him than she did. He was now facing instead of winning her by this waiting? She, meantime, had been going on with her own thoughts.

"Yes," she said, slowly, "I suppose I could not do it—but if I could!"

She walked down the hill then, silently. Perhaps she scarcely noticed that he walked beside her, for she spoke to him no more. At the gate she paused, however, and made him rich by a smile as she touched her flowers:

"You were good to bring them; they will be company to me all day."

She did not see him again for a week, nor did she think much about him. Hers was a nature over which love, when first it comes, could rule with absolute sovereignty; but its time had not come yet. So she dreamed, and went to and fro, doing her light tasks with half unconscious fingers. It was the eighth morning that she saw Robert Crandall waiting at the gate as she went out, as she did so often, to meet the day upon the hill-top. After a few words of greeting he walked on by her side. He was very quiet, and she did until they had reached the brow of the hill. Then something in his face, a look in his eyes, startled her.

"What is it, Robert?" she asked, with quick sympathy.

"Nothing, Ruth, only I am going, and I wish I could think you would miss me a little."

"Going!"

"Yes, to do what you would do in my place—what you wished you could do even now. I suppose I learned to envy you like a pitiful coward for not going before."

Then when she began to praise him he uttered a quick disclaimer:

"It is your doing. I am your soldier. I go today."

He did not tell her even then that he loved her. Yet, if her eyes were not blind, she must have read it in the unspoken pain which filled his face and then in the tender good-by. When he walked away she stood watching him. Turning, after a few steps, to see her, he waved his hand to her.

"Do you care? Oh, Ruth, do you care?"

"How could I help caring? You have been my best friend always."

Perhaps the answer lacked something he had hoped for. He walked on again, with the heavy shadow of pain settling but more deep upon him, and she went into the house, saddened by his loss, and touched all the more because he had not let her bidding.

As day after day passed these feelings grew on her. Unconsciously he began to be in all her thoughts. Where was he? What was he doing? Had come one in her eyes; and her cheek flushed with pride at the thought that she had sent him forth to the fray. If she had not yet owned him darker, or if she had loved him and never known it, a vague, sweet consciousness of what it would be possible to feel for him began to spring up in her heart. Before she was aware of it her prayers for him had grown to be the most fervent language of her soul. In name the most intimate and tender. Before God no one knew it. She scarcely knew it herself. She read more intently than ever the Holy Book. Her old faith in his courage that she scarcely feared harm would touch him; and she was no longer disconcerted with life, now that she was doing her share of work for her. Battles and rumors of battles scarcely disturbed her. She had a sort of faith that he would come out of them unscathed, and that she should die, she remembered the glory of a soldier's death, "and his only daughter" would as yet how empty the world would be without him.

She began to understand this last better, one wild March day, when her father came home and told her that Neighbor Crandall's Robert had come back from the war sick, and the village doctor thought he was going to have typhus fever.

"It will go hard with him, I'm fearful," the Deacon added, thoughtfully. "Those fevers they bring back from the camps ain't the common kind. Nine times out o' ten they're fatal."

A pang keen as a sword-thrust pierced Ruth's heart. She knew instantly what those words meant for her—how fatal indeed would be such a loss. With the thought of his danger came the remembrance that he had no one to care for him as she would care. His own mother was dead. His step-mother would give him the tending of duty, not love. Perhaps they would let him die, when she could save his life. She took her resolution instantly. Standing before her father and mother, where they sat side by side, she said, very calmly,

"He would care more to live were but for me. I sent him. He called himself my soldier. I am going, therefore, to take care of him through this sickness. It is right."

"Daughter, it is impossible." The Deacon's voice was stern, but his face was pale. Do you think we could risk your taking the fever, and leaving us, your mother and me, alone in our old age?"

Her face grew pale, but her voice did not tremble. She knelt before them, as she had done so often to say her prayers when she was a little child, and they looked at them with eyes full of tears.

"I am sorry, but I must do it. All my life I have been a very faithful daughter. I think, since I was old enough to know right from wrong, I have never disobeyed either of you before: but whether you give me leave or not I must take my own course now. Pity me, mother—I love Robert Crandall, and he loves me. If he is going to die I do not want to live. You and father have still each other."

Mrs. Hanson looked in her child's eyes, then at her husband.

"Let her go, father," she said, gently. "We have no right to hold her back. If it had been you, thirty years ago, do you think I could have staid away?"

Deacon Hanson bowed his head on his hands with a bitter groan.

"Do as you will," he cried, "as you will; but her brother and his father will be grey-headed under the hill, and she is my one ewe lamb."

When Ruth Hanson entered the house where Robert Crandall lay sick, the doctor met her compassionately for her. Pausing in the entry, she heard his words:

"I went for your sake, little Ruth. You sent me, and now you won't cone nigh me."

He is out of his head," his step-mother said, meeting her as she passed through the kitchen. "He's pretty sick. It's a chance, I tell 'em, if he ever gets out of bed."

"I have come to help you nurse him, Mrs. Crandall. He and I were old friends, you know."

Mrs. Crandall's face twinkled. She was glad of her honest anxiety for her step-son, with the pleasurable excitement of having discovered a secret. She nodded her head.

"Yes, I know. He's been calling for you. Chance, though, you can do any good."

Ruth went in. The eyes, fierce with fever, turned on her inquiringly for a moment, then roved vacantly away again. She spoke to him quietly.

"Why don't Ruth come? It was easy enough to send me off, but now I'm in trouble, and where's she?"

"Here, Robert," and she touched his hot brow with her little cool hands. "Here I am—come to help you. You must take care of your friends, you know Ruth."

She succeeded in arousing his attention for a moment, but there was no recognition in his eyes.

"You're very good," he said; "but you are not Ruth—not my Ruth."

Three weeks came after that, weeks of incessant anxiety and little hope. Without even the reward of a moment of gratitude Ruth labored day and night and day. If ever he got well again, Dr. Miles said, she would have saved his life. But oh what weary, weary days of watching and waiting!

At last the suspense was over. Sleep came, a long, quiet sleep, and after it the awakening to consciousness, to life. Ruth's life, that was Ruth bending over his bedside and knew her.

"My love, my darling!" whispered his faint, weak tones. "I should have been happy now—you are my Ruth—is it not so?"

She kissed him and answered him with the thrilling tenderness of her kiss. Then she slid to the floor weak and helpless, fainting, they thought, from utter exhaustion.

But when her eyes opened again they were wild and bright with fever. She had struggled, during those weeks of watching for him, against every symptom of disease—kept under every indication of suffering, scarcely herself recognizing their presence. Now, when overwhelmed with joy and relief, anxiety was over the repressed malady took full possession of her. The attack was one of great force and terrible for the force which had kept it back so long.

She could not even be moved home, so her father and mother came there and tended her. It was pitiful to see their anguish all they bent over their darling. At last they left Robert Crandall grew strong enough to steal like a wan ghost into the room where his little Ruth lay, and wait beside those two old people for the slow hours when he was to live or lose his life. Night and day, through the April sun and shower, there those three lingered. Ruth was never to regain consciousness in this state of birds. Scarcely they knew, save by the lighting of the lamps, whether it were night or day—those white-haired parents watching over their only child, that young man over his bride.

How shall I tell the sad story? For her, indeed, came also a waking from sleep, from the delirium of fever; but the light of reason shone from dying eyes. She had been slight and delicate always, and she had no strength to sustain her through a crisis so terrible. She knew herself, as soon as any one else, that her time had come. There was one sore pang at her heart at her eyes fell on Robert Crandall's face, and she said, with a quiver of pain in her low voice,

"I should have liked to live to make you happy. Do not forget me when I am gone. Remember that I loved you. It is hard to part, but the life to come will be long—surely we shall meet again there! It will be hardest for you. But you must do my duty for me. Father, mother, you must never call yourselves childless. Love Robert."

She had tender parting words, fond lingering caresses for all three; but it was on Robert's heart that her head lay last, his lips which received the last kiss from lips already growing cold. She had died for him.

The spring morning dawned bright and clear on the day of her burial. Robert Crandall stole out of doors for a little while, to the spot on which his very passion of pain lent strength and endurance, sought the lonely haunts where the trailing arbutus spreads its tangled net-work of fragrance. He went back laden with the white odorous blossoms, and strewed them round her, who looked more like them than ever in the pure whiteness of her dead loveliness. Beside her pale cheeks, on her still breast in her no heart-beat fluttered, in the slender fingers never to wear wedding-ring of his, he laid them.—"I wanted to die," he said, very bitterly, but I must do it. All my life I have been a very faithful daughter. I think, since I was old enough to know right from wrong, I have never disobeyed either of you before: but whether you give me leave or not I must take my own course now. Pity me, mother—I love Robert Crandall, and he loves me. If he is going to die I do not want to live. You and father have still each other."

Mrs. Hanson looked in her child's eyes, then at her husband.

"Let her go, father," she said, gently. "We have no right to hold her back. If it had been you, thirty years ago, do you think I could have staid away?"

Deacon Hanson bowed his head on his hands with a bitter groan.

"Do as you will," he cried, "as you will; but her brother and his father will be grey-headed under the hill, and she is my one ewe lamb."

When Ruth Hanson entered the house where Robert Crandall lay sick, the doctor met her compassionately for her. Pausing in the entry, she heard his words:

"I went for your sake, little Ruth. You sent me, and now you won't come nigh me."

He is out of his head," his step-mother said, meeting her as she passed through the kitchen. "He's pretty sick. It's a chance, I tell 'em, if he ever gets out of bed."

"I have come to help you nurse him, Mrs. Crandall. He and I were old friends, you know."

Mrs. Crandall's face twinkled. She was glad of her honest anxiety for her step-son, with the pleasurable excitement of having discovered a secret. She nodded her head.

"Yes, I know. He's been calling for you. Chance, though, you can do any good."

Ruth went in. The eyes, fierce with fever, turned on her inquiringly for a moment, then roved vacantly away again. She spoke to him quietly.

"Why don't Ruth come? It was easy enough to send me off, but now I'm in trouble, and where's she?"

"Here, Robert," and she touched his hot brow with her little cool hands. "Here I am—come to help you. You must take care of your friends, you know Ruth."

She succeeded in arousing his attention for a moment, but there was no recognition in his eyes.

"You're very good," he said; "but you are not Ruth—not my Ruth."

Three weeks came after that, weeks of incessant anxiety and little hope. Without even the reward of a moment of gratitude Ruth labored day and night and day. If ever he got well again, Dr. Miles said, she would have saved his life. But oh what weary, weary days of watching and waiting!

At last the suspense was over. Sleep came, a long, quiet sleep, and after it the awakening to consciousness, to life. Ruth's life, that was Ruth bending over his bedside and knew her.

"My love, my darling!" whispered his faint, weak tones. "I should have been happy now—you are my Ruth—is it not so?"

She kissed him and answered him with the thrilling tenderness of her kiss. Then she slid to the floor weak and helpless, fainting, they thought, from utter exhaustion.

But when her eyes opened again they were wild and bright with fever. She had struggled, during those weeks of watching for him, against every symptom of disease—kept under every indication of suffering, scarcely herself recognizing their presence. Now, when overwhelmed with joy and relief, anxiety was over the repressed malady took full possession of her. The attack was one of great force and terrible for the force which had kept it back so long.

She could not even be moved home, so her father and mother came there and tended her. It was pitiful to see their anguish all they bent over their darling. At last they left Robert Crandall grew strong enough to steal like a wan ghost into the room where his little Ruth lay, and wait beside those two old people for the slow hours when he was to live or lose his life. Night and day, through the April sun and shower, there those three lingered. Ruth was never to regain consciousness in this state of birds. Scarcely they knew, save by the lighting of the lamps, whether it were night or day—those white-haired parents watching over their only child, that young man over his bride.

How shall I tell the sad story? For her, indeed, came also a waking from sleep, from the delirium of fever; but the light of reason shone from dying eyes. She had been slight and delicate always, and she had no strength to sustain her through a crisis so terrible. She knew herself, as soon as any one else, that her time had come. There was one sore pang at her heart at her eyes fell on Robert Crandall's face, and she said, with a quiver of pain in her low voice,

"I should have liked to live to make you happy. Do not forget me when I am gone. Remember that I loved you. It is hard to part, but the life to come will be long—surely we shall meet again

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"IS the sense of smelling more pleasing than the sense of tasting?" was the subject up before a debating club. Skilton was the last to speak upon the negative, and all were anxious to hear him. Skilton, ringing the bell, ordered up a glass of hot whisky punch, and drank it off with great apparent relish. Then, turning to his opponent, he handed the empty glass to the leading disputant, and remarked coolly, "Now, Sir, smell of it." It is needless to add that Skilton "brought down the house," and carried the decision by acclamation.

A conceited coxcomb, with a very patronizing air, called out to an Irish laborer, "Here, you big-nutter, come and fix the pump for me, and be you sure and don't try and to a glass of Irish whisky." "By my word," said Pat, "an yer Honor's a gentleman."

Thackeray being told that an acquaintance of his, who was solicitor for his love of beer, had sailed for India, replied, "I am glad to hear it. I hope he'll take to East-India ale, we shall not look upon his like again!"

The other day a town-crier took in charge a lost child, and proceeded to cry about in the street. The father met a lady what the matter was, he replied. "Here's an orphan child, you know, and he tryin' to bring it to its parents."

"Well, my good woman," said a clergyman, who was sent for in the middle of the night by one of his congregation, "to put the matter in a few words, I will speak to a glass of Irish whisky." "By my word," said Pat, "an yer Honor's a gentleman."

Thackeray being told that an acquaintance of his, who was solicitor for his love of beer, had sailed for India, replied, "I am glad to hear it. I hope he'll take to East-Indian ale, we shall not look upon his like again!"

The other day a town-crier took in charge a lost child, and proceeded to cry about in the street. The father met a lady what the matter was, he replied. "Here's an orphan child, you know, and he tryin' to bring it to its parents."

"Well, my good woman," said a clergyman, who was sent for in the middle of the night by one of his congregation, "to put the matter in a few words, I will speak to you as plain as I can. What can I do for you?" "No," replied the old woman, "you can't do nothing for me, Sir, but I'll tell you I help that?" asked the minister. "Oh, Sir," said she, "you is always to be sent for to bury or marry, and I thought that I thought if you would only preach a little for me!"

"That's a very hard case," as the Irishman said when he bit his thumb instead of his bread.

"You have been the making of me," as the mustard said to the cook.

What is a loan society?—A society which it would be prudent to leave alone.

In the company of the present Emperor of Austria, once upon a time, the conversation ran upon the absurd questions which some of the body ran to the strangest. The Prince was appealed to, when he said that, for his part, he gave each voice in favor of the man who was high at the odd idea of the Prince had ceased, he Highness was asked for an explanation, when he said, "Why, Prince Metternich has let my father by the nose for the last twenty years, and if he got hold of a nose or ever, and not a bit the worse for the exercise."

Some men's minds are never half blown. With their tongues it is all the other way.

Ladies should never put glass in their mouths. Their lips should be roses without thorns.

"Tell your mistress I have torn the curtain," said a gentleman to the domestic of a lodging-house. "Very well, Sir; mistress will put it down as rent."

A conjecture it has brought his business to such perfection, that he is now offering to the public his candid opinion.

"Those dear eyes of thine!" as the old gentleman said when he bought his wife a handsome pair of gold spectacles.

Money is the metal wheel-work of human activity, the dial-plate of our value.

Why is one fashion over by another is undoubtedly the tip of fashion.

Marriage is designated by some people as a "bridle," because it generally puts a curb upon some.

BEAUTY.

"What a frail thing is beauty!" said Baron de Grass, When he found that his true love had one eye of glass.

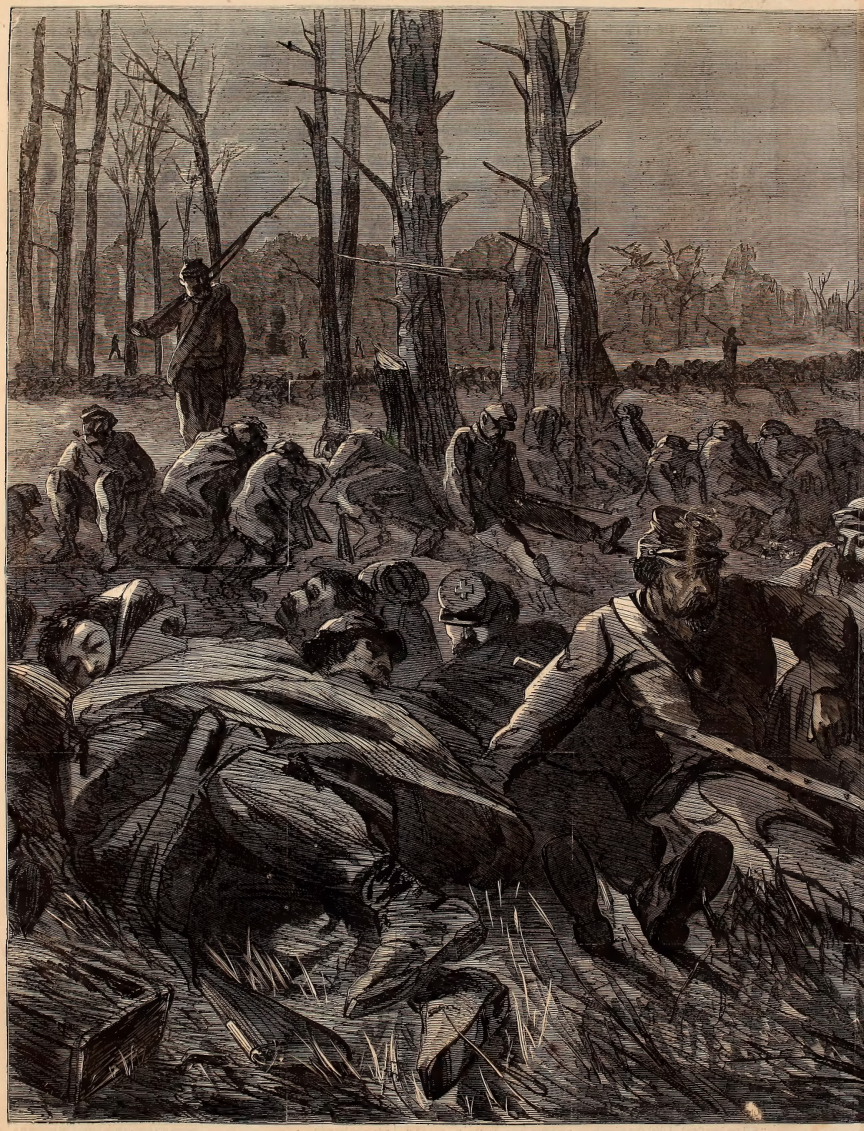
HORRIDLY.—An illiterate carpenter was arrested upon the very serious charge of forgery. In a letter of his he had said that, "he'd been to the Houston Counties Statehon to catch a stein, when he had seen his friend Forge there."

"Dear me!" exclaimed a lady, as she looked at the bus-conscience in a show; "why, the skin of the creature is of the most curious pattern." "It is, my dear," replied her husband, "and that is what Shakspeare alluded to when he talked about a snake being 'seeming.'"

MEDICAL.—Miss Ursula writes to know if the best writer upon corn threats was Dr Quincy? All we can say is, as corns consult a Solicitor.

A woman will cling to the chosen object of her heart like a "possum to a gum-tree, and you can't separate her without snapping strings no art can mend, leaving a portion of her soul on the upper leather of your affections. She will sometimes see something to love where others can see nothing to admire; and when her fondness is once fastened on a fellow, it sticks like glue and molasses in a baby bead of hair.

Why is a man charged with a crime like types?—Because he should not be locked up till the matter is said proved.



ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SL

EEPING ON THEIR ARMS.

SHERMAN'S ADVANCE INTO NORTHERN GEORGIA.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXIII.

LILY IS IN A STRANGE COUNTRY.

It was three o'clock on the following morning before the steam-packet Harlequin entered the harbor of Boulogne. Lily had had a fearful time of it. She was very comfortable, and almost happy during the passage of the vessel down the river; for the weather was fine, the water was smooth, and her peacefulness, betaking herself to the perusal of sundry volumes bound in yellow paper, left her at peace. Then a gentleman in a braided surtout, with very large whiskers and a cigar-case, asked her if she would go to it, and who continually smoked a pipe with a very richly-colored brown bowl, a silver top, and a green tassel depending from it, and who were, besides, a leathern bag slung by a strap over his shoulder, was very kind to her, and showed her a variety of interesting objects on both banks of the river. He was a good-humored gentleman, but his English was, to Lily, well-nigh incomprehensible.

"Did you ligue joggolate?" he asked, in a hoarse voice and a grin that set his black whiskers very far apart indeed. "Joggolate is good for de liddle kinder. Yez, it is moldo grazioso. Dence, ma bedide, here is some joggolate."

He produced from the leathern bag as he spoke a stick of chocolate wrapped in some metal tin-foil. This covering he partially stripped off, broke off a piece of the sweetmeat, and popped it, with a jovial grin, between Lily's lips. The child had never tasted chocolate before. Then he began to fill his pipe from a yellow pouch produced from the leathern bag, and as he shut the latter Lily seemed to hear the chinking of money.

"Mein good little friend, ma bonne amie, gif me de book," he continued. "It is moldo grazious. He gif them to me, and I gif him her. I lof de bipes and de tobacko. De bipes is not good for de liddle kinder. He make romfozzle in der amiguchs zo."

Then, from a pocket in his braided surtout, he took a little bottle, uncorked the top, and applied it to his lips.

"De brandies is goods," he remarked, throwing his head back. "De brandies is moldo zo de real de mer. By-and-by your mamma, when de sea shall romfozzle your stomjacks, shall give you some brandies in your tea, and vere liddle, zo. Vill you ave some joggolate?"

But here the lady looked up from the French novel she was reading, and implored the child come and sit beside her. "You are not to associate with servants and low people. Quefont ces gens là, cette partie de la cuisine?"

Lily thought that if the braided and whiskered gentleman was a servant, he was a very fine one and a very good-natured one. He walked away, grumbling.

"Dowdy!" he murmured. "Quelle mégère. She needn't be so tam proud for what I am a gourier. Franz Stimm il vaut bien cette sauvage sur les arcaux."

It would be, perhaps, more correct, as the braided gentleman was talking to himself, to inscribe in their native tongue the thoughts which he gave utterance, but the gentleman hadn't any native tongue or native country either, to speak of; Franz Stimm was a courier, and knew all tongues, and all countries—a little.

He began to be busy because about the time the study of her French novels, and Lily stole softly away from her side, and went and sat on the little raised part of the deck above the rudder chains, and studied the weather-beaten man in the pea-jacket who was at the helm. Byand-by she totally ignored all printed conjunction of prohibition, she had the audacity to speak to him, and as the wheel and the man himself—it being a quiet afternoon, and the captain being in his cabin refreshing himself with his after-dinner grog—spoke to her, no word or harm resulted from this contravention of maritime discipline. He told her all about the Dreadnought, and the wind-mills on the Essex dykes, and the great guns at Woolwich Arsenal; also, that a many had been hung at Execution Dock, and that when he was a lad in a square rig he had been pressed and kept four days and nights aboard a tender, and that the Nore was nothing to hang his being a 'prentice, and having a 'stifficate from Waterman's Hall in his pocket.

But this confiding mariner was not in time removed, and the hairy man in the striped guernsey who succeeded him was not so communicative. He was shabbed with his spoke, and at the same time he had to spare was devoted to dextrously ejecting the juice from the quid he was chewing over the leeward bulwark. So Lily soon left he missed his aim, and then he swore monosyllabically. Lily couldn't make friends with him, and presently stole away.

In those days rich people were not quite so proud as here are now. At least they did not appear quite so genteel, quite so exclusive, quite so shut up, as I learn they are at present. In these days a member of the "upper orders" would faint at the bare idea of traveling to Boulogne by the common packet from London Bridge: but when Lily was young a great many wealthy and high-born people were content to take that route as the pleasantest though not the shortest. And more than that, they took their servants and their carriages with them.

There was a handsome private carriage—a berline painted green, with a rumble, heavy wheels, and a big ornament on the roof—aboard the Harlequin, nearly amidships, but slightly forward. Lily was wandering about the deck, and occasionally tripping herself up over the stiff protrusions of tarpaulin when she came to this carriage. She was admiring the pretty manner in which the wheels were lashed to bolts in the deck, when she heard a voice she recognized, and looking up saw that the carriage door was open. Standing therest was the bearded gentleman with the braided surtout who spoke such very funny English.

"Ach Himmel!" he cried, pleased to see her. "Here is de liddle cal vat eat de joggolate. Ach Sir, your Excellency, de liddle maid!" This to the dordor of de handsome dame dat loog like de tiger."

There was a gentleman in the carriage reclining at full length on a mattress. He was covered to the chin with rugs and shawls and furs, and had a yellow face, and looked very ill. He shrugged his shoulders peevishly at the courier's remarks, and spoke in a very querulous very tired of itself and all the world, bade Stimm not bother him, but bring him some orangeflower water.

"Bedder ave som brandies, my lord generale," observed Mr. Stimm, in respectful explanation. "Ve gave de Nore, and de eau de fe. r d'orange, he play de teufels vid your stomjac. Bedder brandies, my lord."

"Hang your brandy!" cried the yellow-faced invalid, peevishly. "One would think I was a grenadier, Stimm. Orange-flower water, I said what I've got left of it. Get me the orangeflower water, do you hear me, hey?"

The courier turned to the hamper, and Lily, frightened, was moving out of his way, when her eyes met those of the sallow gentleman. His eyes were very languid and heavy, but they were very black.

He started up eagerly on his invalid couch. "Mercelle Heavens!" he cried, "where have I seen that face before? Stimm, bring that child here."

But before Mr. Stimm could approach Lily a harsh hand was laid on the child's shoulder. It was the handsome lady.

"You little plague! You little demon!" she cried, furiously. "Here have I been a la chase for you this half hour. Where in the name of you? Shall I throw you into the water to be eaten by the black sharks that are always in packs, I mean? Come away this moment;" and she dragged Lily aft.

The sallow gentleman was not quite so great an invalid as he seemed to be. He descended, grumbling and moaning, however, from his carriage, and followed the lady and Lily at a very quarter-deck; but they hastily descended the companion-ladder, and then the lady shut herself with the child in the ladies' cabin.

Lily underwent many hours of the direst agony. It grew dark, and the stewardess brought her supper, and bread-and-butter, but she could scarcely swallow a mouthful. The washings clattered on the table horribly. A lamp was kindled, and it swung to and fro. They put Lily to bed on a shelf in a cupboard, and the shelf on which she lay was pushed backward, and then it seemed to be sliding away from Lily, and then she herself was dashed against the cupboard door. Then she was described, into the cabin, and lo! the ceiling was where the floor should have been. And all this while there was a dreadful noise, as though a giant were being stretched on the rack, and a dreadful throbbing sensation, which shook the very pillow beneath her head, as though the giant's heart was bursting under the torture.

She was very ill indeed. Many ladies joined in the cabin, and they were all sick. There was a little girl of timid aspect, a year or so older than Lily, who appeared to have a certain keenness as a kind of penal chastisement ordained for her sins, and who, in the intervals of nausea, screamed, "Oh, don't die, mamma dear, for I will be good!" and the like deprecatory ejaculations. There was one lady, tall and thin, with cadaverous lineaments, who occasionally uttered a request to be thrown overboard; there was another, stout, of a florid complexion, who had been exceedingly jolly all the afternoon, and who now, with a ghastly visage, and rolled up into a ball in a corner, moaned for her observable, "It's coming, it's coming! I hear it, I hear it! I hear it! Lawks ha mercy upon us!" probably anticipating the Day of Judgment for the ship, or the end of the world. And there was a poor little baby, who, in the course of seven hours, assumed the appearance, derived from Indian yellow to bistre, and from neutral tint to grey-green, which was given to her for many times. It was an awful night. The stewardess bore it unmoved. She was a hardy young woman, paid to do it, I should say, but to keep a sharp look-out after her dues; and although on shore I dare say she was as truthful a young woman as ever was born, yet, possessed of ordinary life, she was, on board the Harlequin, a prodigy of cool mendacity, declaring when the Harlequin was off Boulogne that it was a "splendid night in," and when tossing about Deal, that her young man remaining the steward—had just seen "Belong light."

There was somebody else who was not sick; the handsome young lady. Lily observed that. She lay down on a sofa, covered herself with a great shawl, and went resolutely to sleep. Once or twice in the course of the night, Lily noticed she apostrophized the Harlequin, the company that owned it, and the captain and crew who navigated it, in bitterly opprobrious terms. The stewardess also she was mercilessly hard upon, for the offense of wearing thick shoes; and more than once she child Lily for making a noise. She tended the suffering child, however, with a kind of stern tenderness, and then went to sleep again.

At last this night of torment came to a close. The Harlequin escaped at break of day from the buffeting boiling waters of the Channel into the smooth waters of the port, and Lily was carried in the arms of a seaman, who in his outward guise looked very like a grisly bear, but in his manners was as gentle as a lamb, up a ladder to a quay. There the seaman set her down on the shore of France.

A little man, not so very much taller than Lily, but with a big mustache, and a huge cutlass, and a broad sword-belt, and a very tall glazed shako, immediately seized on the Noah's ark which the seaman had deposited by Lily's side. The little man was close by her, but she forbore to scream the little man by the throat or to claim him over the quay into the water. She spoke him very fair, and called him "Monsieur." Lily noticed that on this new ground her protectress was quite polite. The little soldier, however (he had red epaulets and braided red swords on his shoulders), was as fierce as she was mild, and called out in a formidable voice, "A droite, à la Banane. Marche!" Those were the days when Waterloo was still remembered, when international alliances and treaties of commerce were not thought of, and when the little sisters of King Louis Philippe the First were very apt to be made to dance over when they had authority.

Half stupefied, trembling and dizzy with the soonest acquired, worst borne, and easiest cured of human misfortunes—bored with the novelty of the scene, the glimmering lanterns contending with the gray dawn, the clash of arms, the hoarse voices of soldiers and porters vociferating to each other in a strange language—the child followed her conductors to the custom-house. But ar- rived there, Lily's inquisitive could not refrain from asking her companion why all the soldiers had red legs and why they seemed so very angry with the porters.

Soon a stranger sight absorbed her attention. In the long, low, dusky, leaden room, twenty trunks were arranged wide open, and as many men all with mustaches, or looking like soldiers, and all in a great hurry, were examining packing beds. At least they tossed and tumbled the contents of all the trunks about as though they were shaking out beds: an operation which Lily had often watched with intense interest in Mrs. Bunnycastle's sleeping apartment at Rhododendron Villa. Then the braided gentleman who had given her the chocolate was in the very darkest of the corners, and had at least a dozen trunks to be tossed and tumbled over. He brandished a huge bunch of keys, and seemed quite as angry as the men who looked like soldiers.

At length it came to the turn of Lily and her protectress. As the soldiers seized the lady's portmanteau, she turned to declare;" whereupon she looked as though she would have very much liked to declare that it was bad, and she was in her behavior now, and observed that she had nothing liable to duty. Lily's little outfit was arranged with such lordliness that even Lily was driven to fury even the placable Mr. Ruans at Bowwig & Co.'s. The lady's store of purple and fine linen was recklessly rumpled, and then crammed back again into her portmanteau, as though it were mere rags.

Even when the trunks were re-locked, and their lids inscribed with cabalistic flourishes in chalk, their examination was not at an end; for they were conducted into a naked, whitewashed apartment, over the door of which the word "Octroi" was painted, and there were subjected, at the hands of perhaps the ugliest and snuffiest old woman who ever wore gold rings in her ears and a male coat, to a search, to the minutest of personal search. It is scarcely needful to say that there was no such ceremony performed upon Lily. There was very little outside her, and nothing at all inside her but nausea. The lady was passed over as though as an unconsidered ordeal which has happily become a thing of the past; but she contrived to lose her temper, and gave the old woman a piece of her mind—for which assumed such formidable dimensions, that the female searcher began to yell for "la garde," and the little soldiers led her with a five-foot piece. There were some other ladies, however, who gave vent to screams, and one or two hysterics, another vowed she would write to the Times, and a third made reiterated and passionate appeals to the Deity (meaning her absent husband), who was himself being searched in an adjoining apartment, strewing flowers of elocurses of the most romantic and malignant donnurs. I think all the ladies who screamed contrived to smuggle something; and the lady passed out she was the one—the lady who had been so very anxious to be thrown overboard in the passage—of innumerable strips of contraband textile fabrics as though she had been a bad leg.

Outside the custom-house there was much crowding and shouting; and a mob of shabby men, whose hair looked dreadfully in want of cutting, entered the douane, thrusting themselves into their hands, and bawling out the names of different hotels. And, staggering before her, Lily saw an old, wizened, dingy, swarthy personage, ugly of the one who had half dragged her inclosed child out of the custom-house—with short petticoats of linsey-woolsey, and very stout legs, and very thick shoes, and a very round back, on which were perched the lady's large portmanteau, and Cutwig & Co.'s outfit. The old lady wore a mob-cap too, but she wore a man's hat over that, and a pea-jacket over her gown body, and presented a hybrid maritime appearance.

They found at last a carriage, and were taken to a hotel. And there Lily was put to bed. Quite exhausted and tired, she fell into a blessed balmy sleep, and did not wake up till late in the afternoon, when she found herself ravenously hungry, and as well as a little girl of eight years of age, with whom there had been nothing the matter but a bad fit of sea-sickness on the previous day, could be.

The lady was writing letters at a little table by the bedside.

"You lazy little thing," she said, but not very harshly. "I'm sholld have been on our road to Paris hours ago. You have made me miss the diligence, and now we shall have to wait until to-morrow morning."

Some dinner was ordered, and it was brought by a waiter who looked quite like a gentleman and had beautiful whiskers—but not so beautiful as those of the gentleman with the chocolate—and a clean white apron that reached down to his slippered feet. "Very well, he said quietly," and," thought Lily to herself, "whatever Mrs. Bunnycastle think if a man with whiskers were to come into the kitchen!"

Lily had a little cutlet for dinner, and some potatoes fried in delicate brown. The thin wine was very much like to have a dress for a doll of that hue.

"I like dining here better than at the large house without a bit of fun in," she said, emboldened by the not unfavorable glance the lady had cast upon her while she was eating. "It is almost as good as dinner at school."

The lady frowned. "Petite bavarde," she retorted. "Always wants to hear no comparisons. You are to forget Greenwich; you are to forget the school where you were spoilt and petted by those foolish old women. You are going to a school where you will be treated properly, and have very different dinners."

Lily sighed and relapsed into silence.

Toward sunset the lady took her for a walk about the streets, which seemed very strange to Lily, but pleased her mightily. The houses were very white, and most of the windows had bright green blinds. The shops were full of the most delightful toys that Lily had ever seen, and among them she recognized with delight numerous little dolls the exact counter-fe old woman in the pea-jacket and the short petticoat, who had carried the lady's portmanteau and Cutwig & Co.'s trunk from the custom-house to the carriage. Only these dolls hadn't any short pipes in their mouths as the real woman had.

If Lily had been with Miss Barbara Bunnycastle she would have dragged her to the window and kept her there for ten minutes admiring the merits of these dolls. If she had been with the tall gentleman who had given her chocolate—she seemed to feel the impress of his lips on her forehead now—she would have asked him boldly to buy her one. But she felt that she would have told him that she would pay for it when she grew up. But she was afraid to say such things to the lady, who walked on briskly with the fascinating images by casting furtive glances over her shoulder. She could not help, however—or at least some invisible power whose wisdom was positively bursting with bile—saying the lady with the old women at the customhouse were, and why some of them were red petticoats and some blue? They had met more women than one of the same stamp in the course that afternoon; but they were barefoot, and wore yellow kirkles, and carried great nets slung on sticks over their shoulders.

The lady told her, tartly, that the old women were sailors' widows. "It is good to be a widow," she continued, "when your husband is a robber, and a villain, and a fâche. Now ask me no more questions. Tu m'agaces."

Lily went to bed for a walk on the pier, where it blew very hard, and a brave color came into Lily's cheeks, which the lady of the house thought had rendered wan. They met a good many gentlemen who seemed on speaking terms with the lady. Some of them patted Lily on the head, but she did not like them. They seemed coarse and rude to her.

"They are not so nice as the gentlemen at Greenwich," she remarked, timidly. "Ah! what a nice gentleman that was who said he was wicked!" But the lady believe he was wicked. He had such beautiful eyes, and he was so kind to me. He don't like nasty children."

Her companion angrily bade her, for a little fool, hold her tongue, and they resumed their promenade. They passed a great many fine ladies who were on speaking terms with the countries, but were on starving terms with their countrymen, and Lily noticed that the female searcher began to yell for "la garde," and the little soldiers led her with a five-foot piece. There were some other ladies, however, who gave vent to screams, and one or two hysterics, another vowed she would write to the Times, and a third made reiterated and passionate appeals to the Deity (meaning her absent husband), who was himself being searched in an adjoining apartment, strewing flowers of elocurses of the most romantic and malignant donnurs. I think all the ladies who screamed contrived to smuggle something; and the lady passed out she was the one—the lady who had been so very anxious to be thrown overboard in the passage—of innumerable strips of contraband textile fabrics as though she had been a bad leg.

Outside the custom-house there was much crowding and shouting; and a mob of shabby men, whose hair looked dreadfully in want of cutting, entered the douane, thrusting themselves into their hands, and bawling out the names of different hotels. And, staggering before her, Lily saw an old, wizened, dingy, swarthy personage, ugly of the one who had half dragged her inclosed child out of the custom-house—with short petticoats of linsey-woolsey, and very stout legs, and very thick shoes, and a very round back, on which were perched the lady's large portmanteau, and Cutwig & Co.'s outfit. The old lady wore a mob-cap too, but she wore a man's hat over that, and a pea-jacket over her gown body, and presented a hybrid maritime appearance.

They found at last a carriage, and were taken to a hotel. And there Lily was put to bed. Quite exhausted and tired, she fell into a blessed balmy sleep, and did not wake up till late in the afternoon, when she found herself ravenously hungry, and as well as a little girl of eight years of age, with whom there had been nothing the matter but a bad fit of sea-sickness on the previous day, could be.

The lady was writing letters at a little table by the bedside.

"You lazy little thing," she said, but not very harshly. "I'm sholld have been on our road to Paris hours ago. You have made me miss the diligence, and now we shall have to wait until to-morrow morning."

Some dinner was ordered, and it was brought by a waiter who looked quite like a gentleman and had beautiful whiskers—but not so beautiful as those of the gentleman with the chocolate—and a clean white apron that reached down to his slippered feet. "Very well, he said quietly," and," thought Lily to herself, "whatever Mrs. Bunnycastle think if a man with whiskers were to come into the kitchen!"

Lily had a little cutlet for dinner, and some potatoes fried in delicate brown. The thin wine was very much like to have a dress for a doll of that hue.

"I like dining here better than at the large house without a bit of fun in," she said, emboldened by the not unfavorable glance the lady had cast upon her while she was eating. "It is almost as good as dinner at school."

The lady frowned. "Petite bavarde," she retorted. "Always wants to hear no comparisons. You are to forget Greenwich; you are to forget the school where you were spoilt and petted by those foolish old women. You are going to a school where you will be treated properly, and have very different dinners."

Lily sighed and relapsed into silence.

Toward sunset the lady took her for a walk about the streets, which seemed very strange to Lily, but pleased her mightily. The houses were very white, and most of the windows had bright green blinds. The shops were full of the most delightful toys that Lily had ever seen, and among them she recognized with delight numerous little dolls the exact counter-fe old woman in the pea-jacket and the short petticoat, who had carried the lady's portmanteau and Cutwig & Co.'s trunk from the custom-house to the carriage. Only these dolls hadn't any short pipes in their mouths as the real woman had.

If Lily had been with Miss Barbara Bunnycastle she would have dragged her to the window and kept her there for ten minutes admiring the merits of these dolls. If she had been with the tall gentleman who had given her chocolate—she seemed to feel the impress of his lips on her forehead now—she would have asked him boldly to buy her one. But she felt that she would have told him that she would pay for it when she grew up. But she was afraid to say such things to the lady, who walked on briskly with the fascinating images by casting furtive glances over her shoulder. She could not help, however—or at least some invisible power whose wisdom was positively bursting with bile—saying the lady with the old women at the customhouse were, and why some of them were red petticoats and some blue? They had met more women than one of the same stamp in the course that afternoon; but they were barefoot, and wore yellow kirkles, and carried great nets slung on sticks over their shoulders.

The lady told her, tartly, that the old women were sailors' widows. "It is good to be a widow," she continued, "when your husband is a robber, and a villain, and a fâche. Now ask me no more questions. Tu m'agaces."

Lily went to bed for a walk on the pier, where it blew very hard, and a brave color came into Lily's cheeks, which the lady of the house thought had rendered wan. They met a good many gentlemen who seemed on speaking terms with the lady. Some of them patted Lily on the head, but she did not like them. They seemed coarse and rude to her.

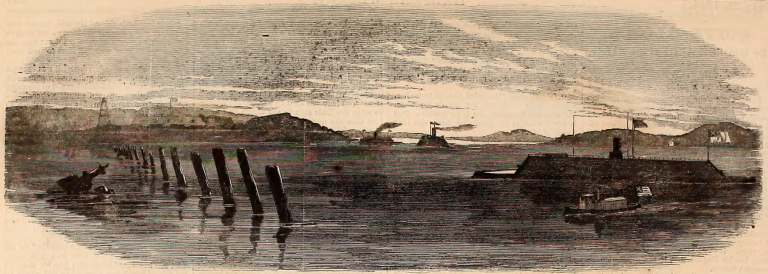
"They are not so nice as the gentlemen at Greenwich," she remarked, timidly. "Ah! what a nice gentleman that was who said he was wicked! But I don't believe he was wicked. He had such beautiful eyes, and he was so kind to me. I don't like nasty children."

Her companion angrily bade her, for a little fool, hold her tongue, and they resumed their promenade. They passed a great many fine ladies who were not on speaking terms with the countries, but were on starving terms with their countrymen, and Lily noticed that the female searcher began to yell for "la garde," and the little soldiers led her with a five-foot piece. There were some other ladies, however, who gave vent to screams, and one or two hysterics, another vowed she would write to the Times, and a third made reiterated and passionate appeals to the Deity (meaning her absent husband), who was himself being searched in an adjoining apartment, strewing flowers of elocurses of the most romantic and malignant donnurs. I think all the ladies who screamed contrived to smuggle something; and the lady passed out she was the one—the lady who had been so very anxious to be thrown overboard in the passage—of innumerable strips of contraband textile fabrics as though she had been a bad leg.

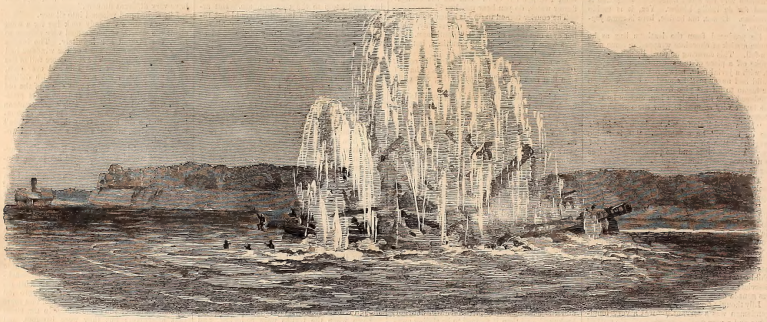
Outside the custom-house there was much crowding and shouting; and a mob of shabby men, whose hair looked dreadfully in want of cutting, entered the douane, thrusting themselves into their hands, and bawling out the names of different hotels. And, staggering before her, Lily saw an old, wizened, dingy, swarthy personage, ugly of the one who had half dragged her inclosed child out of the custom-house—with short petticoats of linsey-woolsey, and very stout legs, and very thick shoes, and a very round back, on which were perched the lady's large portmanteau, and Cutwig & Co.'s outfit. The old lady wore a mob-cap too, but she wore a man's hat over that, and a pea-jacket over her gown body, and presented a hybrid maritime appearance.

They found at last a carriage, and were taken to a hotel. And there Lily was put to bed. Quite exhausted and tired, she fell into a blessed balmy sleep, and did not wake up till late in the afternoon, when she found herself ravenously hungry, and as well as a little girl of eight years of age, with whom there had been nothing the matter but a bad fit of sea-sickness on the previous day, could be.

The lady was writing letters at a little table by the bedside.



FORT DARLING AND THE REBEL IRON-CLADS ON THE JAMES, SEVEN MILES BELOW RICHMOND.



DESTRUCTION OF THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "COMMODORE JONES" ON THE JAMES.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—HANCOCK'S CORPS CROSSING THE RAPIDAN, WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 339.]

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN SEDGWICK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE LATE GENERAL JAMES C. RICE.

GENERAL JAMES C. RICE.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JAMES C. RICE, whose portrait we give above, was one of the bravest and truest men in the Army of the Potomac—a Christian soldier in the best sense of the phrase. He was born in Worthington, in the hill-country of Massachusetts; was a graduate of Yale College; practiced law for some years, first in Natchez, Mississippi, and later in this city; and entered the army as a private soldier when the war broke out. He rose, through his own merits and bravery, from this position to that of Brigadier-General. He fought in every battle in which the Army of the Potomac was engaged except that of Antietam, from which he was absent by reason of a severe attack of typhoid fever. At Gettysburg he distinguished himself, as Colonel commanding a brigade, on the left of our line, and was appointed Brigadier at the request of General MEADE. He was, in battle, constantly in the front, and exposed himself without stint; but he was never hit but once, and that was fatally, in the battle of Tuesday, though in almost every battle he received bullets in his clothes or hat. At Malvern six bullets passed through his clothing. General RICE was a consistent and zealous Christian, a man devoted heart and soul to his country, and ready at all times to make the greatest sacrifices for the cause of Union and Liberty.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN SEDGWICK

THE "Fighting Sixth" has lost its General. The portrait of this, the oldest of the corps commanders of the Army of the Potomac, we give on this page. JOHN SEDGWICK was born in Connecticut in 1817, graduated at West Point in 1837, went into the artillery, in 1839 was made First Lieutenant, was brevetted Captain for gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco, and Major in Molino del Rey, Chapultepec, and San Cosmo Gate; the former brevet was confirmed by commission in 1846, and the latter in 1855. In 1861 he entered this present conflict as Colonel of the First Cavalry, and, August 4, was made Brigadier-General of Volunteers. His commission as Major-General dated from July 4, 1862.

A very modest man was General SEDGWICK; but he was the idol of his Corps, who all called him "Uncle John," and his intrinsic worth as a soldier was rewarded by successive promotions. He was twice wounded on the Peninsula, where he commanded a Division of SUMNER'S Corps. Succeeding General SMITH in the command of the Sixth Corps, he participated in the second assault on Fredericksburg and in the battle of Gettysburg. He always inspired his men with his own dauntlessness; and his courage on Friday night, May 6, when his flank was turned, and SHALER'S and SEYMOUR'S brigades driven back, saved the whole army from the full force of the blow. He was shot by a sharp-shooter, not as he would have desired, in the heat of action, but while adjusting a piece of artillery, on Monday, May 9.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 350.]

Here! whose soul was grandly strong and still
When the still waves of battle round it broke,
And through the hours of tumult, fire, and smoke,
Held up the sinking lines with iron will;
Whose grasp was only less severe than death's,
What joy was thine upon the fruits of fame
To join the throng of immortal names,
Who sit above in spirit council-hall!
At the last victory flight his sword embathes.
We would have kept thee; we are selfish, all;
Fairest that we on bended knees should fall
And say, "We thank Thee, God, in this our woe,
That Thou hast given us strength to let him go.
So much of his was ours, even to the faltering wrestle."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE Parisian spring of the good old times has returned in 1864, with its pleasant accompaniments of early violets and lilac flowers. There was a general laying aside of furs and woolens, and wearing beneath the genial sunshine of the charming month of April. Simple dresses, composed of robe and paletot, and of uniform color throughout, were predominant; and light-blue, light-green, and light-pink silks were introduced into pleasant relief by the brilliant sunlight. A considerable diminution in the amplitude of the skirts must be noted with satisfaction; indeed, the employment of steel crinoline seems to be altogether on the decrease. The suppleness and grace of the spring costumes this year could not have been attained otherwise than by the adoption of underclothing of a softer description. The small elegance of FANCHETTE, rather in fact, and passing with a simple curve down to the bavolet, are decidedly in favor at this moment, the materials preferred being crape and silk, and the latest ornament a sort of narrow scarf inside and outside, as shown in one of our illustrations.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Dress for a Wedding Party.—Mauve blue moiré antique robe, ornamented above the deep lace flounce adorning the skirt with three bias velvet bands, edged with narrow black guipure. Long black lace shawl. White crape bonnet, decorated with feathers and an aigrette above the rounded lace bavolet a rich blue velvet cincture, of the same tint as the bow and strings.

Fig. 2. Evening Dress for a Young Lady.—Silver-gray robe in foulard de Chêne, richly trimmed, as shown in the engraving, with blue silk stripes and narrow edging. The dress is cut in the style denominated the Forme Impératrice, and an open sleeve and chemisette are ornamented with stripes and bands to match those on the skirt. Small bias collar, finished by a rose-pink cravat.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Robe of iron-gray taffety, provided with a fluted skirt, surmounted by four rows of passementerie. The corsage is a basque, and the shoulders and cuffs are also trimmed with passementerie ornaments. The sewing-bonnet, with a tulle scarf beneath the front edge stitching a small feather. The scarf ornament is also repeated outside the bonnet.

ON THE BLOCKADE.

THE sound of the blasing steam is low,
And silent the flapping sail;
The western skies have lost their glow,
And the heathlands faint and pale;
As the sailor sits on the tarry deck
And tells his ghostly tale.

Tells of the ship that sailed his dreams
Last night down the watch we keep;
And the tale to the wondering landmen seems,
Whose first prize is not won,
Like their friends' blissful nightly ghosts that passed
Away with the morning sun.

But he has rocked on the sea for years,
And knows its mystery well;
The homing instinct through the waves he hears
When the mermaid blows her shell;
And he knows how the ocean spirits cast
Or true dreams a spell.

"Just below the horizon rim,"
Said he, "the steamer sailed;
I could make her course by the smoke-line dim
That clung the horizon trailed;
But the salt-sea mist was up in my eye,
And to make her hull I failed.

Round in an hour came up the speed,
But never a knot we gained;
Every sail on the yards was spread,
And the bellys spanned and strained;
And night and day a shark's fierce eye
On me like a gun was trained.

He did round, and we did round,
And the same steamer too,
Till we passed beyond our cruising-ground
To the Gulf Stream swift and blue—
Till we wound far into the outer sea
Unsailed by a mortal crew.

I grew old, and the ship grew old,
With the years of that ghostly chase;
The sailors' mark grew thin and cold,
And pallid the captain's face;
But the steamer was ever as far away,
And the shark he kept his place.

At last both ships into my dream
Dissolved from the ocean wide,
And the waters changed to an inky stream,
And a boatman rowed its tide;
I sat a ghost at the bow, and the shark
His hunger had satisfied."

"Come, sailor," a brawny landsman said,
"That was a dream you know."
"On whom do you think the shark had fed?"
Said the sailor quick and low.
"Fed on the ghostly winds that through Your sailor fancies blow."

"We shall make short work of the next black ship
That sneaks from out Nassau,
For a prize the water is on my lip,
And a hunger in my maw;
Come, let's turn in, for the watch is done,
And the wind is getting raw."

What, ho! A dark bulk cleaves the sea,
And ashore is a signal light;
Up! for the steam slugs merrily;
The chase shall be short to-night;
But the sailor looks where a shark throws off
A trail of blue fire bright.

The shark 'alk melts into the dark,
And the signal lights pass dim;
The prize is lost, but the hungry shark
Has a mile light banquet grim,
And the land-man knows that the sailor's dream
Was a foresight into him.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Coin-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The MORTON GOLD PENS are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but MORTON has in no case increased his Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach the subscriber's entire satisfaction, and the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, postage only excepted. Readers, you can have no safer, surer, more handy, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than a Steel Pen; and at the present premium on Gold and Pressure Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one, see "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in next column.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND KNITTING.
ALL KINDS at BARTLETT'S, 442 Broadway, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS.

BY ONE WHO HAS WORN THEM.—Parties interested in Artificial Legs will obtain much valuable information by reading the following reply to a letter, "asking advice about purchasing, &c.

REPLY.

PERRY, Ark., April 13, 1864.

Mr. Painter, Cincinnati, O.

DEAR SIR; Yours of March 15th, just received, and contents noted. You say you want my opinion on the corrugated rubber leg; so you will have a candid one, I will answer you candidly. If you get a leg made out of wood, you may be fitted for any at from one to five years; but your stump will get thinner a good deal, and you will have to put on under the place where the shaving goes in. In my experience with wooden legs, I have found this to be a great inconvenience. In the second place, the joints in wooden leg are not made strong enough, for this reason; every time you step, the joint gives a concussion, it naturally sprains the ankle-joint, which, after a week or so, becomes loose and is easily broken. In the metallic leg, which I gave away with altogether, by a stout rubber that sets like a joint, and every time you step on an uneven surface, yields like a natural foot. You will see that the metallic leg is altogether superior as a walking leg, and also only one half what a wooden one costs. Another reason is, that the mechanism in a metallic leg is very simple, whereas in a wooden leg it is so complicated that if anything gives out you will have to send to the manufacturer, and the manufacturer's, and they will charge you a good round sum for it. I, for one, advise you to get a metallic leg for cheapness, lightness, and durability. If you get such a leg of A. W. WILSON, 491 Broadway, New York, send me, you will get a good, substantial leg. Hoping you may be suited at last, and that you will have good luck all over $500 for limbs. I remain yours, I. GUNTHER, JR.

Mr. Gunther doesn't mention three important advantages my leg has over all others.

1st. I guarantee a fit in all cases.

2d. The measure can be sent, and the leg returned by Express, thereby saving the time and expense of coming to New York to be fitted.

3d. It makes no noise.

OFFER.

I have such implicit confidence in my Improved Rubber Leg, that I will give any one purchasing a stocking-leg if if they are not satisfied, after six months' trial, and I will return the money, less twenty-five dollars. Price from $75 to $100.

Send for a circular to J. W. WILSON.

Office and salesroom 491 Broadway, New York; Edwin H. Wetzel, 91 West 4th street, Cincinnati, O.

NEW VOCAL MUSIC.—"For the Dear Old Flag" to Die." "Was my Brother in the Battle?" "Hurry Me in the Morning." "Will They Be True?" "I will Be True to Thee." "Merry Little Birds are We." "If you've any gift a Mountain." "The Little Rebel Girl," "When Old friends were Here," and "She was all the World to Me."—Just out. "Home Again." "I Hear Angel Voices Singing." "Kindly Words and Smiling Faces," and "Hymn of Nature." "Sweet Spirit Hear My Little Soul," "Dying Drummer," "Weep no More for Lilly," "Katy Did and Katy Didn't," "The Hood Never Strikes his Mother," "Dost Thou Ever Think of Me, Love," "Mary Joy, the Contraband," "The New Emancipation Song," and "The Angels are Hovering Near." Beethoven's "Dear Gem, I Think of Thee." "The Rose of Clifton Dale." —Lawrence.—"Christ will Care for Mother Now."—Words too. All of which are recommended. Price 30 cents each. Mailed free. HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to Rev. Chas Irons Box 3531, New York. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN.—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Reliable Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but are suitable to numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always Ready Pen; for $1.25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1.50, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridescent Points, for keeping wear of every sort. They will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are inexpensive, solid, serviceable, and unchangeable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on all Morton Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accidents.

The Numbers and Sizes run—No. 1 being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the usual size, No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Numbers 4, 5, 6, and 7, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are Broad, Coarse-pointed, and Stubby. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 90 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 2 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 09 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 25, a No. 6 Pen; $2 75 a No. 7 Pen; $3 25 a No. 8 Pen; $3 75 a No. 9 Pen; $4 25 a No. 10 Pen, all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENHOLDERS.

For $1 50 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No 2 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 00, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50, a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED EXTENSION HOLDERS.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen; for $2 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 7 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 8 Pen; for $5 a No. 9 Pen; and for $6 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are polished with the very best Iridium Points, Pointed, Ground, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the nicest Workmanship can attain.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to 1861.

"The 3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Writing Qualities (which are only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Stock of Gold Pens, he will say that, previous to operating his New and Patented Machinery, he could not sell Pens of the Quality of the Morton Gold Pens, for the price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer, whether for light or heavy coarse or fine writing.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk; and to all who remit a sum of money for the purpose of sending me the price of goods ordered, I will guarantee the safe delivery.

Either Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $15, of 15 per cent. on $24, and of 20 per cent. on $30, if sent to one address at one time.

Address, A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

Eagle Gas Stove Works.
Summer Cooking Stove
GAS the CHEAPEST FUEL
FOR
BOIL, BROIL, ROAST, BAKE, TOAST, and do IRONING.
SEND FOR DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE.
H. D. BLAKE,
414 Broadway, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT
At your own home. Thousands can realize a Hundred Dollars Weekly. No capital required except those found in every household; profits 100 per cent.; demand large and growing. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage.
Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

Union Playing Cards.
Colored for KING, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 97 colored cards in a pack. Spades, Hearts, Clubs, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Sent to any address, mailed free, on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
14 Chambers St., N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

Opera and Field-Glasses
Can see a man distance of 2 to 4 miles. Spectacles and Eye-Glasses with French crystal pebbles, suitable for every description, Pocket Compasses, Pocket Rules, Opodeldoc, 213 Broadway, cor. Fulton St.; wholesale and retail. Send Stamp for Circular.

50,000 AGENTS WANTED.
B. T. HAYWARD,
Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

I will send a sample of either of the New Artillery, Cavalry, Portable, Engineer, or Naval Fan for $1·50; or a Solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps, Division, or Company Fan with your Name, Reg., and No. handsomely engraved thereon for $1. Send for Wholesale Illustrated Circular.

U. S. 10-40 Bonds.

These Bonds are issued under the Act of Congress of March 3th, 1864, which provides that all Bonds issued under this Act SHALL BE REDEEMED IN COIN, at the pleasure of the Government, at any period not less than ten nor more than forty years from their date; and until their redemption FIVE PER CENT. INTEREST WILL BE PAID IN COIN, on Bonds of not over one hundred dollars annually and on all other Bonds semi-annually. The interest is payable on the first days of March and September in each year.

At these Bonds, by Act of Congress, are

Exempt from Municipal or State Taxation, their value is increased from one to three per cent. per annum, according to the rate of tax levied in various parts of the country.

At the present rate of premium on gold they pay

Over Eight per Cent. Interest

in currency, and are of equal convenience as a permanent or temporary investment.

It is believed that no securities offer so great inducements to loaders as the various descriptions of U. S. Bonds. In all other forms of indebtedness, the faith or ability of private parties or stock companies or separate communities only is pledged for payment, while for the debts of the United States the whole property of the country is loaded to secure the payment of both principal and interest in coin.

These Bonds may be subscribed for in sums from $50 up to any magnitude, on the same terms, and are thus made equally available to the smallest lender and to the largest capitalist. They can be converted into money at any moment, and the holder will have the benefit of the interest.

The Funded Debt of the United States on which interest is payable in gold, on the 1st day of March, 1864, was $768,385,600. The interest on this debt for the coming fiscal year will be $45,937,136, while the customs revenue in gold for the current fiscal year, ending June 30th, 1864, has been so far at the rate of over $100,000,000 per annum.

It will be seen that even the present gold revenues of the Government are largely in excess of the wants of the Treasury for the payment of gold interest, while the receipts because of the tariff will doubtless raise the annual receipts from customs on the same amount of importations to $150,000,000 per annum.

The authorized amount of the loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars.

Instructions to the National Banks acting as loan agents were not issued until March 8th, but the amount of Bonds reported sold at the United States Treasury up to May 14th was $48,964,900.

Subscriptions will be received by the TREASURER of the UNITED STATES at Washington, and the ASSISTANT TREASURERS at New York, Boston and Philadelphia, and by the First National Bank of New York, No. 4 Wall Street.

Second National Bank of New York, 194 St. & Broadway.

National Bank of the Republic of New York, Fifth Street.

Fifth National Bank of New York, 388 Third Ave.

Sixth National Bank of New York, 6th Av. & Broadway.

Ninth National Bank of New York, 363 Broadway.

Tenth National Bank of New York, 140 Broadway.

New York Nat. Exchange Bank, 134 Greenwich St.

First National Bank of Jersey City, N. J.

And by all National Banks which are depositories of Public money, and all

RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS

throughout the country (acting as agents of the National Depository Banks), will furnish further information on application and

AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

5000 Agents Wanted,
TO INTRODUCE OUR NEW GOLD PEN.

This gold pen is something entirely new, and is now offered to the public for the first time, and is made by an entirely new process, enabling us to offer this fine article cheap. Every pen is warranted one year, and to be genuine diamond pointed, and to possess all the elasticity and writing qualities of the highest priced gold pen made. Single pens sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents. Address
WITH SILVER-MOUNTED EXTENSION HOLDER, IN MOROCCO CASES.

No. 2. Medium Pen and Holder, each 90 cents.
No. 3. Large, " " each $1 25.
No. 4. Engrossing Pen and Holder, each $1 15.

Great inducements to agents; send for circular. Send for our Circular. GEORGE A. ELY & CO., Sole Manufacturers, No. 181 Broadway, New York.

Attention Company!

Clarke's Conqueror, a powerful stimulant. Each packet contains twelve powders of wonderful strength, which in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin, will cause a heavy beard to appear, and finding it not as represented, by informing me of the fact, can have their money returned them at the end of three months from day of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent mailed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.
Address, A. C. CLARKE,
P. O. Drawer 118,
Albany, N. Y.

Short-Hand without a Master,
By which the art of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, &c., may be attained in a few hours, both simple and complete, supplement, sent, post-paid, on receipt of 25 cents, by RICHARD PARKER & CO., corner Ann and Nassau streets, New York.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $115 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches.. 18 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 20 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " " " ..... 3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Masaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Masaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sets of Bosom Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sets Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 5 50 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 18 00 each.
6000 Seal Jewelry..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders 4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS
(From Juries 3 and 4) at the
International Exhibition,
LONDON, 1862;
AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

Enameled Chamber
FURNITURE

The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, valued and chattoel, plain and ornamental, in suite, wholesale and retail. Also Mattresses and Feather Beds. WARREN WARD, 371 Canal St., N. Y.

DEMOREST'S ILLUSTRATED NEWS, a very neat, and entirely graphic illustrations of live subjects; fine pictures in colors, new and popular music, a superb variety sheets of fashions, enchanting literary matter, with other novel features. It is one of the most ably illustrated weeklies now published.—Home Journal.

Dear Mother I've Come Home to Die.
With brilliant Variations, by Chas. Grobe. Price 50c.
TURANTELLA, by Bar-ford. A very brilliant Etude. 50c.
MORNING PARADE MARCH, as played at Morning Parade by the Bands of the Army of the Potomac, by Louis Berge. 40c.
SCENES OF MY CHILDHOOD, a beautiful Ballad, by Wm. J. Wetmore, M. D. 25c.
LA RETRAITE DES GARDES FRANCAISES; La Reveil des Fatres, two elegant morceaux, by Ketterer. 40c.
THE DANCETRIX'S DREAM, a beautiful Romance, sung by Madam ANNA BishOp, composed by J. G. Maeder. 25c.
STILL SHE WAITS TO THEE, by H. Millard. Author of "I'm L'America, Fing of the Free, &c. 25c.
"WHEN NONE WITH GOOD ASSURANCE," a most charming Serenade, by P. B. Isaacs. 30c.
Also, "FIREMEN HORNS," by the same Author, both sung nightly at the popular Minstrels, and destined to become the Songs of the day.
Any of the above sent by mail, free, on receipt of the marked price. FIRTH, SON & CO., 563 Broadway, N. Y.

Louisville
National Union Press.
A Daily Newspaper to represent and advocate the views of Unconditional Union Men.

From the inception of the rebellion, the genuine Union sentiment of the State of Kentucky has found but little expression, either in the addresses of the prominent politicians or the press. This state of things, at all times a source of murmuring, though somewhat alleviated by the partial supply of loyal journals from other States, has at last ripened into dissatisfaction and a positive demand for such a newspaper.

Demanding that the rebellion shall be suppressed, we would have all the means necessary to suppress it cheerfully supplied. Regarding unity as essential to speedy success, we would enforce it as the duty of every citizen to give to those who administer the Government—while the war continues—sympathy and support. Believing the rebellion to be not only without palliation or excuse, but a crime, we must have it laughed down before we have its arguments and prosecuted it should wholly bear the responsibility of its guilt. Believing that the Democratic organ is for opposition, we would have the difficulty of grappling with it fully realized.

In so wide a field, where the instruments employed must be varied, every of judgment will be required. We will endeavor, therefore, judge lavishly of the means employed, while to us the end is regarded as of paramount importance to the authority of the Government. In a word, we wish to teach that it is the part of wisdom for the loyal people to preserve their unity, for on unity depends success. Success in war is the forcing at or triumph of our arms, and success in peace with those arms, and to every one, where, who hope for and look to the nation's success in the field—and to its fetich—and to its restoration of existing a lasting and honorable peace.

The vote of the people of Kentucky, on every occasion —and their resolutions in their primary assemblies, far behind of their publication, for the adoption of delegates are to us the surest guaranty that a majority are with us. The object of this paper is to give organization to that majority, and to develop into political action the convictions which, in their hearts, people cherish. Also, to take full advantage of the facilities at command to furnish, general and local news, and to develop some important features of a Daily, that have not hitherto received from the press here the prominence desirable in a mercantile community.

TERMS:

To City Subscribers, payable to the Carrier, twenty cents per week.

To Mail Subscribers, payable in advance, $1 00 per month; $5 00 for six months; $9 00 for one year.

Second Instalment to commence on 1st June ist.

For $10 in advance, the Daily "Press" and any weekly, monthly, or quarterly paper of publication, the subscription price for which does not exceed $3 00.

L. A. DEVILLE,
431 Main St., Louisville, Ky.

HOWARD'S SWEAT-PROOF

PHOTOGRAPHS | GREENBACKS | LETTERS

SOLDIERS' MONEY BELTS,
With compartments for Photographs, Greenbacks, and Letters. Every Soldier can have his own size by return mail, postage paid, by sending his address to HOWARD Bell Co., 426 Broadway, New York. Sutlers, Agents, and Soldiers wanted in Hospital, Regiment, and City. N. B. The Trade liberally dealt with.

New Army Watches.

ARRANDALE & CO., Importers, 167 Broadway, New York, want Agents in every county and every regiment, for the sale of their new Patent Lever Watches. Additional terms are offered to Agents. Send for circular.

DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.
For its curative action Dr. Bly will receive $10 per case.

CARPET WARP.
WOOL TWINE.
Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY & MARSHALL LANE, N.Y.

Economy in Silks, Gloves, Ribbons, &c.
HEGEMAN & CO'S BENZINE removes Paint, Grease Spots, &c., instantly, and cleans Silks, Carpets, &c., equal to new. 50c. per bottle. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Stores. HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 109, 611, and 756 Broadway, and cor. of 4th Ave. and 11th St.

SUDDEN DEATHS PREVENTED.

Remove from the system offending humors, which, if permitted to remain at this season of the year, are fraught with great danger to life itself.

COLDS, FEVERS, BILIOUS AFFECTIONS, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, SMALLPOX,

And all Fevers are SPEEDILY CURED by the BRANDRETH PILLS,

Which should be used in doses sufficient to remove all crudities and impurities from the stomach and bowels.

Oh! what heartaches would be prevented if these PILLS were used with fearlessness and promptitude in the beginning of sickness.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. Brandreth in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine, or Circulars sent free by mail for 20c. Retails for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 179 Chatham Square, N. Y.

SPRING DEBILITY.

For a SPRING MEDICINE nothing can equal the TONIC and Invigorating effect of which supplies the blood with its VITAL PRINCIPLE, or LIFE ELEMENT, IRON, in a form most acceptable to the Stomach, and NEW LIFE into all parts of the system.

PERUVIAN SYRUP,

Pamphlets free. J. P. DINSMORE, 491 Broadway, New York.

Redding's Russia Salve
A Real Pain Extractor.

It relieves the most agonizing swellings and Inflammations, heals OLD SORES, WOUNDS, BURNS, SCALDS, &c., &c., as if by magic. Only 25 cents a box. J. P. DINSMORE, 491 Broadway, N. Y.

Cocoaine.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.—No other preparation so exactly suits the various conditions of the human hair.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, SOLDIERS, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested, as a favor, to send us their address, and we will send, in return, terms, information for which they will be THANKFUL. We offer GREAT INDUCEMENTS. Prize Medal awarded to our EXPRESS. We want addresses from EVERY COUNTY in the U. S., and from every town in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 97 William St., Box 3181, N. Y.

ARMY BADGES.

ARMY BOOTS, WATCHES, Chains, Gold Pens and Cases, Jewelry, &c., &c., at wholesale prices for Agents. A Circular sent free. R. KEITH, 19 John Street, New York, formerly 109 Broadway.

Body—Brain—Mind.

Health, its restoration and preservation. Choice of Females. "Why should I be Dead?" Can I succeed here as a Lawyer, Physician, or as a Clergyman? As a Merchant, Mechanic, or Farmer? Phrenological Journal, now ready. See THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, only 20 a year. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICE

For sale by the Adams Press Co., 20 Ann Street, N. Y. Circular free. Specimen sheets ten cents.

Baker's Rheumatic Balm.

This remedy has been used in the family of the proprietor and his friends for many years, and they have induced him to offer it for sale to the public, feeling confident, after a trial, that they will consider him a public benefactor.

In cases of Chronic and Inflammatory Rheumatism it is invaluable and, for a fresh attack, it fails to cure, the money will be returned. Price $1 per bottle.

Principal Office, No. 164 Tenth Street, near Fourth Avenue. Sold by the principal Druggists. Remedies sent to any address on receipt of price.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address
S. RADDIN, Alfred, Maine.

Great Chance to make Money!
$650.000 of WATCHES, JEWELRY,
&c., given away by the Great Eagle Packet Co. Every Agent purchasing 100 Packets will receive one Gold Lever Watch, Gold Pencil, Solid Silver Spoon, Engravings, by which $10 invested will yield $50. Many have made $1,000 selling our Packets. Engravings free to any dealer. For particulars of Special Agency, address at once, H. LEROY,
G. S. HASKINS & CO., 36 & 38 Beekman St., N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW
A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the many subjects treated in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Dyspepsia, Dysentery, Piles, Liver and Kidney Complaint, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Skin, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Barrenness, Impotency, Seminal Weakness, Nervousness, Self Abuse, Cancer, Paralysis, Diseases of the Heart, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Thrive while Spectacled, Anatomy and Medical Philosophy, the Curious Marriage Customs of the World, Philosophy of Impregnation, the Physiology of Child-nursing, Advice to the Married, and a thousand of value to married and single, never before published, making altogether a volume book for curious people, and a good book for everybody. 600 pages; 100 illustrations. To be sold by all News Agents. Contents tables sent free by mail to all applicants, or the book forwarded by mail, post paid, on receipt of $1 50. Address R. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Musician's Omnibus—Contains 700 tunes for Bass violin, cornet, or 6fls. B♭. MUSICIAN'S CABINET complete, 1500 tunes, a complete Musical Library, $3, mailed. New Concertina Book—Full Instructions, Airs, Waltzes, and 200 other tunes, 25 cents. New Accordeon and Flutina Book, complete, 25 cents. New Violin Book, 25 cents. FREDERICK BLUME, 205 Bowery, N. Y.

HENRY J. RAYMOND, Esq., Editor of the New York Times, has written an Impartial, Truthful, and Standard HISTORY

OF
President Lincoln's Administration.

In this work every Message, Proclamation, Speech, Letter, &c., of President Lincoln's is given, from official copy, each under its appropriate head. It is believed that every thing he has said or written during his Administration, which has been given to the public, is included in this collection, in a form at once CONVENIENT and AUTHENTIC.

One vol. 12mo, with a Fine Steel Portrait. Price $1 50.

Agents wanted in every town. Good wages can be made. Apply to DERBY & MILLER, No. 5 Spruce Street, N. Y.

SOMETHING NEW
IN PLAYING CARDS.
LOVE SCENES.
Design from French Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of stolen kisses and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Twelve 50 cents and two red stamps, and send for sample pack. $6 per dozen. Liberal discount by gross to dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 66 Nassau St., New York.

DEMOREST'S SNOW FLAKE ILLUSTRATIONS. —A newly journal of beautiful and graphic illustrations, and a National and Family Newspaper in its comprehensive comp, for news, entertainment, music, information and the Fashions. The Model Weekly of America. Yearly $4, with Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions. Single Copies of Current No. 10 cts. Published at No. 39 Beekman Street, and sold everywhere. Do not fail to see it. Single copies mailed free on receipt of the price.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed Stone, Fountain.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—A splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustrations, Steel Engraving, Colored Fashion Plate, and seven Full-Sized Patterns, all elegant and useful, with much valuable information, only 20 cents; or yearly subscription $1, with a premium of One Dollar's worth of Extra Patterns. Do not fail to subscribe immediately.

(Form of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest will find enclosed $1 00, and 2 cts. for postage on the premium, for which please send me your Mirror of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The most splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustrations, Steel Engraving, Colored Fashion Plate, and seven Full-Sized Patterns, will be ready MAY 10.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

A Bulletin, with Wrappers, and Envelopes, kept occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Instant transportation to the Army. Address

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new Cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address
J. WILLCOX, Jr. & CO., Boston, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:

NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS; or, Sketches of a Girl's Life. Written by her Father. With a Brief Introduction by Rev. R. S. Foster, D.D. 16mo, Cloth, $0 75.

BARBARA'S HISTORY. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "My Brother's Wife," "Hand and Glove," "The Story of Two Noble Lives," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR JUNE, containing the first Chapters of Mr. DICKENS'S New Story, "Our Mutual Friend."

SIR ERASMUS. JOURNAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE. By JOHN HANNING SPEKE, Captain in the Indian Army, Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Geographical Society, Hon. Member and Gold Medalist of the French Geographical Society, &c. With Maps and Portraits, and numerous Illustrations, chiefly from Drawings by Captain GRANT. 8vo, Cloth, uniform with LIVINGSTONE'S MISSIONARY TRAVELS. Price $2 50.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Rachel Ray," "Orley Farm," "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "The Three Clerks," "The Warden" and "Barchester Towers." 8vo, Paper, Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

ANNIE WARLEIGHS' FORTUNES. A Novel. By HAMM LEE. Author of "Kathie Brande," "Kathie Brande," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VAUX'S VILLAS AND COTTAGES. A Series of Designs prepared for Execution in the United States. By CALVERT VAUX, Architect. A new Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With nearly 300 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

THE WIFE'S EVIDENCE. A Novel. By W. G. WILLS, Author of "Notes to Quit." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A POPULAR HAND-BOOK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By GEORGE CUMMING MACWHORTER. Illustrated. 2 vols., $1 50.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year..... $3 00
Two Copies for Four Months..... 1 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten.
One Copy for Two Years..... 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $2 75 each, or 11 Copies for $27 50. Payment invariably in advance.

Terms for Advertising—Fifty Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements, payable in advance.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 160,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months..... $1 00
One Copy for One Year..... 3 00
One Copy for Two Years..... 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 75 each, or 11 Copies for $27 50. Payment invariably in advance.

Terms for Advertising—Fifty Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements, payable in advance.

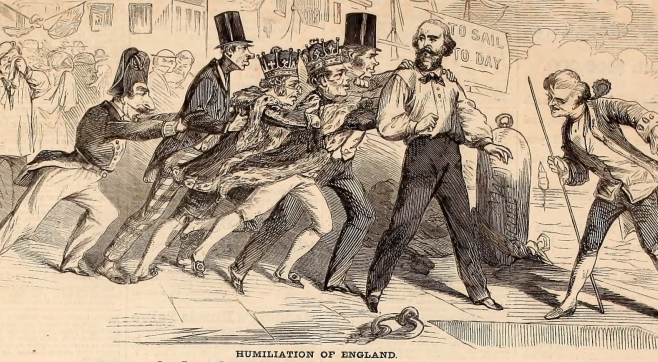
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.



HUMILIATION OF ENGLAND.

JOHN BULL to GARIBALDI. "The EMPEROR wants you to leave. Please go!"

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.

MEERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS, 697 Broadway, Near 4th St., N.Y. Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for Circular.

TROPICAL BALSAM

Prepared by Carnes Brothers and Co.

The celebrated and unequalled remedy for the cure of all forms of Consumption and pulmonary complaints, has for the past twenty years been the only preparation that can be relied on as an infallible remedy for the above complaints. Its wonderful power to cure the most severe and dangerous cases of Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Croup, Whooping Cough, Influenza, Hoarseness, and Consumption (in its first stages), has caused it to be known as the most wonderful remedy of the age. Public and private testimony can be produced, showing the astonishing cures it has performed in this and other countries. Not a single case of scrofula, severe cough, hoarseness, bronchitis, or consumption (in its first stages), has ever resisted its influence more than three days. There is danger in neglecting the use of this remedy for any of the above complaints. It is the only reliable and safe remedy known to the public, for the cure of all diseases of the throat, lungs, and chest. Its wonderful healing qualities are astonishing to the most eminent physicians. Prepared only by CARNES BROTHERS & CO., Druggists, No. 36 and 38 Gansevoort Street, New York. Sold by druggists generally throughout the United States. Price, $1 per bottle. Depot for the sale of the Balsam in Boston, 100 Washington Street. Depot in Philadelphia, 138 Market Street. Depot in Cincinnati, 177 Main Street. Depot in Chicago, 115 Lake Street. Depot in St. Louis, 61 Fourth Street. Depot in Buffalo, 213 Main Street. Depot in Albany, 408 Broadway. Depot in Troy, 252 River Street. Depot in Rochester, 3 Buffalo Street. Depot in Utica, 3 Arcade. Depot in Syracuse, 3 Salina Street. Depot in Portland, Me., 3 Exchange Street. Depot in Hartford, Conn., 3 Asylum Street. Depot in Providence, R. I., 3 Weybosset Street. Depot in Worcester, Mass., 3 Front Street. Depot in Springfield, Mass., 3 Main Street. Depot in Lowell, Mass., 3 Merrimack Street. Depot in Lawrence, Mass., 3 Essex Street. Depot in Lynn, Mass., 3 Market Square. Depot in Salem, Mass., 3 Essex Street. Depot in Newburyport, Mass., 3 State Street. Depot in Portsmouth, N. H., 3 Congress Street. Depot in Manchester, N. H., 3 Elm Street. Depot in Concord, N. H., 3 Main Street. Depot in Nashua, N. H., 3 Main Street. Depot in Dover, N. H., 3 Central Square. Depot in Exeter, N. H., 3 Water Street. Depot in Saco, Me., 3 Main Street. Depot in Bangor, Me., 3 Exchange Street. Depot in Augusta, Me., 3 Water Street. Depot in Portland, Me., 3 Exchange Street. Depot in Hartford, Conn., 3 Asylum Street. Depot in Providence, R. I., 3 Weybosset Street. Depot in Worcester, Mass., 3 Front Street. Depot in Springfield, Mass., 3 Main Street. Depot in Lowell, Mass., 3 Merrimack Street. Depot in Lawrence, Mass., 3 Essex Street. Depot in Lynn, Mass., 3 Market Square. Depot in Salem, Mass., 3 Essex Street. Depot in Newburyport, Mass., 3 State Street. Depot in Portsmouth, N. H., 3 Congress Street. Depot in Manchester, N. H., 3 Elm Street. Depot in Concord, N. H., 3 Main Street. Depot in Nashua, N. H., 3 Main Street. Depot in Dover, N. H., 3 Central Square. Depot in Exeter, N. H., 3 Water Street. Depot in Saco, Me., 3 Main Street. Depot in Bangor, Me., 3 Exchange Street. Depot in Augusta, Me., 3 Water Street. Depot in Portland, Me., 3 Exchange Street.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,

31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris.

Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

Do you want a good Magazine?

If so, subscribe to the

Atlantic Monthly

which is raised by literary journal: in America and Europe as the best American Magazine ever published. It is thoroughly national in tone, and its literary character is the highest possible. The best American writers contribute regularly.

Terms $3 a year, postage paid by the publishers. Liberal reduction to clubs. A specimen copy sent as receipt of 25 cents. Address TICKNOR & FIELDS, 135 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

DRY AND GROUND IN OIL

in several dun shades.

For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.

ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

BROWN'S PATENT BABY-TENDER, or Nipple Tasting Cradle, converted into nine other delightful and useful articles, for mothers and children, the whole designed to take the place of a nurse. Brown and Co., 483 Broadway, New York. Send for an Illustrated Circular. "If mothers generally knew the great value of the Baby-Tender in the care of children, they could willingly deny themselves one meal a day (if necessary) to procure it." Stephen Angell, Supt. Home for the Friendless, 29th St., N. Y.

$55 AMERICAN $55 LEVER WATCHES.

TRADE MARK, P. S. BARTLETT, WALTHAM, MASS., FULL JEWELED, WARRANTED, IN 4 OZ. COIN SILVER HUNTING-CASE, GOLD JOINTS, FANCY PURE PIN, FOR $55.

Also every variety of gold Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches. 208 Broadway New York.

Steel Shirt Collars, linen finished, sent per mail on receipt of $1 40. Made to order and corrugated, $2 20. A. JEANNERET, 73 Nassau St., N. Y. Sold by I. M. Davies & Co. and H. B. Claflin & Co.

Grover & Baker's Highest Premium Elastic Stitch Sewing Machines, 495 Broadway, New York.

The Celebrated CRAIG MICROSCOPE, combining Instruction with Amusement, is mailed, pre-paid, for $2 50; or with 6 beautiful Mounted Objects for $3 25; with 54 Objects, $5 50, by

HENRY CRAIG,

180 Centre St., New York.

Also, he will mail, pre-paid, the Bellows, or Perpetual STEREOSCOPE, with a sliding Focus and Field-Piece, accommodating all sights, for $3 00; with 12 assorted views, $6. A liberal discount to the trade.

Hoyt's Hiawatha Hair Restorative.

HOYT'S HIAWATHA HAIR RESTORATIVE.
HOYT'S HIAWATHA HAIR RESTORATIVE.
HOYT'S HIAWATHA HAIR RESTORATIVE.
HOYT'S HIAWATHA HAIR RESTORATIVE.

Superior to every other preparation for the hair in power to remove dandruff and grey hair to its original color and natural appearance, to prevent it from falling out, to overcome effects of perilous use of preparations containing sulphur, sugar of lead, &c., and to remove the impurities and debility of the scalp. Invisible dye for whiskers.

Hoyt's Imperial Coloring Cream.

Only five to any Hair Dressing in use. Oils and Colors the Hair at the same time. Gives it a light and rich hair to a beautiful brown or black.

Also, Hoyt's Hiawatha hair-dresser in attendance to apply the Hiawatha.

JOSEPH HOYT & CO., 19 University Place, N. Y.

Something New.

Patent Army Pocket Pipe and Cigar Holder combined. It is self-cleaning, smokes cool, can use cut cast of cake, is elegantly finished, and a superb luxury for all lovers of the weed. If you would enjoy the exquisite pleasure of a good smoke, send at once, and the order will be filled per return mail. Price per dozen, postage pre-paid, $2 00. Address orders

RICHARDS & CO., 97 William Street, N. Y.

COUNTRY BOARD WANTED,

Within an hour and a half of the city. On the water preferred—for two families. Will pay liberally for the right accommodations, and with that no other boarders be taken. Address H. F., care of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

Hand-Quarters for Army Badges. Gold Pens and Cases, Campaign Pins and Medals, Watches, Jewelry, &c. Send for Wholesale Illustrated Circular

B. T. HAYWARD,

303 Broadway, N. Y.

$7 ARMY $7 WATCH.

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, enameled dial, cut hands, "English Movements," and correct time-keeper.

A single one sent free by mail in neat case, WITH A BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $8

A neat Silver Watch, same as above, especially adapted to the Army. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$15 European Timekeeper. $15

OR, COMPASS WATCH.

A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Genuine English Jeweled or Nickel Movements," "M. J. Tobias" Independent Action, Self Detector, and has a NEAT MINIATURE COMPASS sunk in the cap and attached to the movements, making it a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time-keeper, "warranted one year." WILL STAND ANY TEST, and is an

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch,

Used by the British Army Officers.

Sent free by mail, in elegant Morocco Case, for only $15.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the want of our officers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct, timepiece; and for beauty and fine finish they cannot be surpassed in appearance by $100 watches."

Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 38 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

Steinway & Sons,

Manufacturers of Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos, have removed their Warerooms to their new and splendid Marble Buildings, Nos. 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

WARD'S SHIRTS.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed Circulars for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.

Price 75 cts. each; sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 80 cents.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED. Terms in the United States.

S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

Dyspepsia Tablets,

For Indigestion, Heartburn, &c., manufactured only by S. C. WELLS, and sold by druggists generally. 50 cents per box. Depot No. 307 Centre St., New York, second floor. Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Shults' Ongnent warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Soldiers Discharged

For Wounds, $100 Bounty paid by applying at once. Blanks and information sent by mail.

SOMES, BROWN & CO., 2 Park Place, N. Y. City.

Watches and Jewelry

Of every description.

Orders, large or small, faithfully executed. Established 20 years.

T. B. BYNNER, 115 Broadway, New York.

Gold Watch Free

AND

$15 Per Day, $15

Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large Size Stationery and Prize Packages. $25 CAN BE MADE in a few hours by smart scouts. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains a Complete Set of Fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Gold Pencils, Blotters, Emblems, Ladies' Parts Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writing, Album of Games, Gem Rich, Gaudy Pocket Calendars for the Year, Ideal Designs, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Rich and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., etc., the whole worth MANY DOLLARS if bought separately. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid SOLID GOLD or Silver Hunting Case LEVER WATCH (warranted) presented FREE to each Agent. Persons wanted to establish Agencies in every town and village. Agencies given free. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y., Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the world.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF PURE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety. COLORED STONE CHINA DINNER SETS.

The Extensive Toilet Articles of the

SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.

Send for a prospectus as below.

VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SUPERFINE COSMETIC, Restorative and fragrant, $1 25 and 65 cts. per bottle. JABONERIA FOR THE HAIR, ELEGANT, CURTAIN, but only harmless restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE PHILOCOME, THE DELIGHTFUL OIL OF THE MACASSOLIA PHILOCOME, THE EXQUISITE PERFUME, 75 cts. One sixth off by the dozen. If your druggist has not these articles, DO NOT buy of other, but enroll with your order to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 125 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums.

Purifies and Sweetens the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.

Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,

218 Greenwich St., New York.

Don't buy your Gaiters

or Shoes without Fogg's

Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the straps. Circulars sent free on application. Or inclose Ten Cents Currency, and I will mail sample of two patterns.

FREDERICK STEVENS,

218 Pearl Street, New York,

and

65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

A Chinese Preparation.

Warranted to force the hair on the smoothest face, or money refunded. Sent, post-paid, on the receipt of 50 cents. Address L. L. STONE, Albany, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VIII.—No. 388.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM T. SHERMAN.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GEN. WILLIAM T. SHERMAN.

WE give on the preceding page a portrait of Major-General WILLIAM T. SHERMAN, commanding the Department of the Mississippi, and just now prominently before the country in connection with the Federal victories in Georgia. General SHERMAN is forty-six years of age, and is regarded as one of the ablest officers in the service. A sketch of his life was published in No. 370 of the Weekly, March 12, 1864.

TOUCH THEM TENDERLY.

O TOUCH them tenderly; they fell
In the harsh storm of shot and shell,
When, like a vast Plutonian bell,
Rang the responding air
To artillerean thunder-strokes,
Shivering a chained nation's yokes,
The dappling pines and spreading oaks
Fell with the soldiers there.

Touch tenderly these sons of MARS;
Wrap SEDGWICK in the flag of stars;
Sponge the brows blood from WE LCOTT'S scars,
Through which his spirit fled
From honor here to glory where
The banner lies in fields of air,
Is bright with stars forever fair,
Without the stripes of red.

Touch tenderly the living braves:
Blessed be the gentle hand that saves
A hero! while our banner waves
The loyal heart will live
With quicker pulses where they tread.
Bind softly the poor wounds that bled
Where the wild-flowers their odors shed,
Making the free air sweet.

Touch tenderly the gallant men
Who smile at their red wounds, and then
Ask to be ordered back again,
To join the fight anew;
To go where GRANT and HANCOCK lead;
To follow BUTLER, BURNSIDE, MEADE;
To watch and march and charge and bleed
Where waves the starry blue.

Touch tenderly the man whose life
Is dear to mother, sweet-heart, wife,
Whose blood was poured out in the strife
Of liberty with crime:
For braver than the Spartan band
Are the defenders of the land,
Who like a living bulwark stand,
Each crowned with deeds sublime.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1864.

OUR WAR MAPS.

THE readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will find it for their advantage hereafter for constant reference to the elaborate and complete Maps of the Seat of War published in the last Number. Every important place and position is so carefully laid down in these Maps that the reader can trace upon them, from day to day, the movements of our armies under GRANT in Virginia and under SHERMAN in Georgia, and those of the enemy under LEE and JOHNSTON, opposed to them. They can thus gain a clear and intelligent view of the design and effect of the various movements and counter-movements of the belligerents.

"NOT EVERY ONE THAT SAITH LORD! LORD!"

THE papers which were lately suspended in this city profess an overpowering regard for the Government and the Union. They do not deny that the war for the maintenance of both has reached a most important crisis. They will agree that it is the duty of all good citizens who wish, as well as profess to wish, that the rebellion may be conquered forever, to make every allowance for the exercise at such a time of that supreme discretion which necessarily belongs to every Government. They will be disposed to view the acts of the Government, even when irritating and ill-judged, as more leveled at the liberties of the citizen but at the crimes of rebels. They will concede that at a moment like this the publication of a forged proclamation of the President to the effect that the struggle is going disastrously against us is an offense of the gravest kind, whose tendency is to strike a fatal blow at the cause for which hundreds of thousands of our fellow-citizens are fighting and falling in the field. They can not seriously plead that it is only "a hoax," nor mean absurdly to excuse themselves by saying that they had left their columns without any responsible supervision. Their columns, by their own confessed negligence, have been made the vehicle of a damaging blow at the Union and Government to which they so zealously profess their devotion, and however sincerely they may deplore the order by which they were suspended, they will honorably allow that, under the circumstances, they ought to suffer some kind of penalty, and will believe that the suppression, however mistaken an act, came from patriotic zeal rather than from despotic tyranny.

Now let every candid man decide whether, granting that the suppression of those papers was ill-judged, their comments upon the act show a sincere desire to forbear with the Government, or whether they are not intended to do exactly what the forged proclamation they published was meant to do—namely, to perplex the Government of the United States, disheaten the loyal armies, encourage the rebels, and invite foreign interference?

It is strange, of course, that journals which, by their own account, are so devoted to the salvation of the country, should put the worst conceivable interpretation upon every act of the Government; should stimulate opposition to the raising of soldiers by draft; should resist —with an acrimony that might, except for that professed devotion, be called patriotism—the whole policy of the Government; very strange indeed that papers so zealously loyal in profession should constantly denounce the Government so much more fiercely than the rebellion that they are universally considered as virtual friends of the rebels. But such is the present state of affairs. And there are probably people to be found at this moment, and intelligent and loyal people too, who sincerely believe that both of those journals, if they were swindled, hoaxed that the proclamation might be genuine; people who think that it is not a hearty loyalty to the Government which habitually does depict the Government as the real enemy of our liberties; people, in fine, who believe that neither of the journals, so professedly loyal, would be very sorely grieved if the Government of the United States should be overthrown by a compromise with rebels. It is our firm faith that such people could be found. And if it were asked us, how we will reply to papers in question exclaim, "Of what avail then are the loudest professions of loyalty!"

TWO GLIMPSES OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

WE have lately had two glimpses of JEFFERSON DAVIS, and plenty enough. About a month ago a little son of his fell from a balcony and was killed, and on the Sunday afternoon after the funeral, which was the day subsequent to the battle of the Wilderness, DAVIS is described sitting alone in his pew in church, clad in deep black, a figure of utter grief and woe. The second glimpse was at the funeral of the rebel General J. E. B. STUART. It took place at a late hour in the afternoon. The scene was most dreary. "The sad duties were read" as if there must be no time lost. The gun that threatened Richmond with justice roared beyond the city. No military escort accompanied the procession to the grave. Only the family, and the burial service at the church, JEFFERSON DAVIS is seen sitting near the front "with a look of grief upon his care-worn face."

Care-worn his face may well be at a soldier's funeral, for he has caused more funerals, more agonized heart-breaks, more comfortless sorrow, than any man on this side the moon. Nor is there probably a more wretched being in the world. Balked in his ambitious and long-plotted schemes, unsupported by those upon whom he counted in the North, deserted and disdained by the British Government, sick and sad in soul and body, his whole crime is punished by a solitary ray of extenuation or excuse. That his theory of the National Government might honestly differ from ours may be admitted; but that he should assert it by a mere defiance, by the least excuse of oppression, at such cost of blood and sorrow, is itself an atrocity. While to assert it, as he and his party have done, with the basest and most odious of purposes, is an inexpiable wickedness. Even could he succeed, and his Confederacy secure its position among recognized states, the infamy of its origin could no more be forgotten than the source of a fortune which sprang from the slave-trade.

Even could the effort to destroy the Union and divide the country prosper, the object of the destruction would be forever remembered. Great the success; enormous the hate the rebellion triumphs! So you think JEFFERSON DAVIS would rank in history with MILTIADES, with CURTIUS, with ALFRED, with WASHINGTON, with WILLIAM TELL, with WASHINGTON, with BOLIVAR, with GARIBALDI? Would his name be hailed with love and enthusiasm as a friend of humanity? Would his epitaph would have no higher theme? brain than this: "He destroyed a great, powerful and prosperous nation because it refused to be degraded, and to see its commerce, its ship, women and sell babies unchallenged." In American history the crime of BENEDICT ARNOLD disappears beside the crime of JEFFERSON DAVIS. The gloom that shrouded him in these two glimpses in the church will never pass away from his figure as it is seen in history—the gloom of unrelieved infamy.

THE SPIRIT OF THE ARMY.

IF any body is troubled by the fact that there are skulkers from our armies, let him remember that it is so every where, and in all armies. When General SIDNEY JOHNSON was in the rebel command in Tennessee he issued an order, the details of which we take from the Richmond Examiner of that time, by which every captain was to call the roll of his company before going into action, and again upon coming out, when every man who was not dead, wounded, or absent upon duty was to be cast forthwith as a cowardice. Carrying the wounded from the field during action was prohibited, and every man going to the rear upon any pretense was to be shot by the file officers.

There are doubtless some skulkers in our armies; but the spirit of the Union soldiers as a mass is unsurpassed and unsurpassable. An eyewitness tells us that the Army of the Potomac began with faith in General GRANT, but that the first week's fighting so endeared him to them that the faith has become a life of worship, and the army moves and fights under that inspiration as one hero. The same spirit seizes them every where; and the knee of one of the best cavalry regiments in the service, on duty elsewhere, which, notwithstanding the preference of all savalry for its own branch, has asked to be dismounted and sent to the front as infantry to fight under GRANT.

We do not wonder the eye-witness declares that he and his army have no more doubt of success than of the sun's rising.

FORGETFULNESS.

THE Richmond Examiner, of May 12, exclaims: "Heaven and earth now call upon the Government to bring it all the troops at its command;" and the Sentinel, of May 13, says: "If we can conquer now—and God is giving us the promise of it—our work will be done." Both these papers forget what the Virginian, THOMAS JEFFERSON, said long ago: "The Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in such a contest." The author which JEFFERSON contemplated was exactly that which the rebellion is waging, an attempt to remove the "only firm basis" of the liberties of a nation; namely, "a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are the gift of God, that they are not to be violated but with his wrath."

THE "RE GALANTUOMO."

THIS noble old ship of a Power which has steadily battled and buffeted on during our great struggle, torn and shattered by the tempest in which she was long supposed to have been lost, arrived at Naples about the first of May. She took from New York on board as cargo, the guns of 250,000, modore ISOLA, and from him we have received an interesting letter, from which we make the following extracts:

"The journal I send (Il Pungolo, Naples, May 5) can not give you an idea of the joy which pervades the whole city. Forty thousand people shouting for joy is a spectacle not often seen or heard; while more substantial tokens of the general interest felt in the Re Galantuomo are not wanting. A grand banquet is to be given to all, even the crew, and the city is to be illuminated.....Commodore ISOLA was very courteous and solicitous for the welfare of his solitary guest amidst all the trouble and anxiety of our fearful storm as in the first bright days of New York, and the pleasant sail from the Azores to Gibraltar, and thence to Naples. The officers are simply heroes. Their courage, brave endurance, and straightforward forty-days' voyage (which we had good cause to without hope for three days), is something not to be forgotten. And yet, withal, so unostentatious and quiet. I shall love Italy and the Italians while I live. What a noble thing it was those frigates searching for us! They should know how heartily it is appreciated. The formal acknowledgments and decorations and honors of the Italian Government do not tell half the warm gratitude all on board the Galantuomo bear toward them."

The journal Il Pungolo describes at length, and with enthusiasm, the festal reception of the Re Galantuomo, and after a vivid account of the storm, during which only two men were injured, and all were heroes, as our correspondent writes, the editor exclaims, with natural pride, "With such men Italy may certainly soon become one of the great maritime powers of the world." The circumstances connected with the Galantuomo have served to bind this country only the more closely to the land of CAVOUR, of GARIBALDI, and of VICTOR EMMANUEL. Viva GARIBALDI! Viva il Re Galantuomo!

GREAT BATTLES.

WHILE all our minds are so intent upon the fierce Virginia fights, and of speculation upon their progress and results, it will be useful to remember the facts of other great historic battles.

The details of the old Greek and Persian and Roman contests are of course more or less fanciful, but they doubtless indicate the relative forces. At Marathon the Athenians are said to have but 10,000 to the Persians' 100,000. The Athenians lost 192; the Persians 6400, and were defeated. Then came XERXES with his famous army, which he gave in detail, horse and foot, fleet, army, and followers, at 2,500,000. Against this invasion 7000 Greeks held the Pass of Thermopylæ, and upon the marble lion of LEONIDAS was the inscription: "Here 4000 Peloponnesians fought with 3,000,000 of foes." HERODOTUS, who loves a generous measure, says there were 5 500,000. At Arbela the tradition makes ALEXANDER vise the Great with 47,000 horse and 1,040,000 Persians. At Cannæ HANNIBAL had 50,000, and of the 80,000 Romans slain there were at least 40 thousand of the Roman force escaped. At Pharsalia JULIUS CÆSAR with 22,000 routed POMPEY with 52,000.

In later times GUSTAVUS VASA at LÜTZEN with 18,500 foot and horse defeated WALLENSTEIN with 15,000. At Blenheim, one of the pivotal battles in European history, the final check to LOUIS THE EIGHTEENTH'S ambition, the French and Bavarians under TALLARD were 60,000 with 61 guns; the Allies under MARLBOROUGH and PRINCE EUGENE were 56,000 with 52 guns. The battle wavered at intervals during the day, but at last, with a loss of 5000 killed and 8000 wounded, MARLBOROUGH almost destroyed the French army, which lost 12,000 killed, 14,000 prisoners, all its guns, with its General and 1200 officers. Not more than 20,000 of its effective men ever reassembled. At Pultown CHARLES THE TWELFTH with 24,000 men fought nearly 60,000 Russians. CHARLES was defeated, and lost nearly half of his army.

The NAPOLEON campaigns are the story of the most sanguinary battles. Yet in Egypt, as the famous battle of the Pyramids at the beginning of his career, NAPOLEON, with 10,000 French under KLEBER, routed 60,000 Egyptians and destroyed the Mamelukes; and the French loss, according to PATOUT, the latest authority, after unknown hours of severe exertion, was no more than 10 killed and 30 wounded. At Marengo NAPOLEON, with 28,000, defeated 31,000 Austrians, killing 7000 and capturing 3000, with artillery and standards, and losing about 7000. At Austerlitz the Allies were 75,000 strong, NAPOLEON 80,000. The Allies were overwhelmed, losing 10,000 killed, 20,000 prisoners, 185 guns, 400 caissons, and 45 standards. At Wagram NAPOLEON had a magnificent army of 170,000 foot, 30,000 cavalry, and 750 guns. The Allies brought into action more than 140,000. The battle was decisive. The loss on each side was about 25,000, and the French captured a few guns. At Borodino the French counted 125,000, the Russians 130,000. The latter lost 52,000, the former 80,000. In the whole Russian campaign, of an army which is rounded by modern at 500,000, NAPOLEON lost 240,000 killed, 193,000 captured, and 132,000 dead of hunger, disease, and exposure. Yet the next year he crossed the Rhine again with an army of 350,000. At Leipsic, with 175,000 men and 750 guns, he was defeated by the Allies with nearly 300,000 men and more than 1300 guns. The battle lasted for three days, and was one of the most fiercely contested ever known. The Allies had more than 60,000, the Allies more than 40,000. The tough old TORY ALISON says that it was this battle which "delivered Europe from French tyranny." But NAPOLEON made one more and final effort. He began the four days' campaign of Waterloo with 130,000 men. Upon the actual field the Allied reinforcements give the English 49,608 foot, 12,402 horse, 5645 artillery, with 156 guns; in all, 67,655, of which about 24,000 were British. The French had 48,950 foot, 15,765 horse, 7232 artillery, with 246 guns; in all, 71,947. The battle lasted for eight hours. The British loss was 15,000 killed and wounded. The French army was virtually destroyed, and NAPOLEON SOLD again went it.

The battles of our Revolution were hardly more than skirmishes. On Long Island the American army numbered 9000, of which 1500 were sick. The British had 15,000 men, with 40 guns. Their loss was about 400. At Trenton we had about 2100 engaged. The Hessians, 1500 strong, had 22 out on 4. At Monmouth the forces were about 13,000 on each side. The Americans lost 200 killed and wounded. The British about 300. In the battle of the Brandywine WASHINGTON had about 11,000 effective men. The British lost in all 600. The British lost about 600 killed and wounded. The American loss was greater, but no exact returns were made. At Camden CORNWALLIS won a little more than 2000 regulars, routed our miscellaneous force of 6000. We lost 900 killed and as many wounded. The British lost in all 1200. In the Revolutionary siege of Yorktown the Americans and French were 16,000, the British 8000. During the siege our loss was about 300 killed and wounded, the British about 550.

Such are the contests those of Marathon, Arbela, Pultown, Blenheim, Waterloo, and Saratoga are ranked by Professor CREASY as among "the decisive battles of the world." Of the battles campaigns of the spring in this country shall result in a full triumph of the national arms, it will not be the least of these decisive battles.

ART-CRITICISM.

Mr. W. H. Beard:

DEAR SIR,—In the Tribune of May 21 you address a letter to me, justly accusing me of a note an article entitled "Art-Criticism" in Harper's Weekly of May 7. That article was suggested by the rejection by the Academy of Design of three pictures, which, so far as I had heard or read them, consisted of personal vituperation of the personnel of the artist. I therefore wrote the article to which you allude, in which I assert the right of every man to express his opinion of a picture however unsound his philosophy, or distasteful his style, or erroneous his conclusions, or gross his ignorance may appear to you, as you have provided always that he does not personally asperse the artist. The criticisms in question, sweeping, severe, ignorant, and arrogant as they have been called, did not seem to me to be properly described as personal attacks upon the artists criticised, and in my mail I wrote that the most exasperated artist dared not call them so. You reply that you "not only dare but do" say that they are false in that personal sense. You say that in your own case especially the "criticism" is not so much an attack upon your art as upon your moral character.

I have read the articles again, as you suggest, but I still can not agree with you that they are personal attacks. The sentence upon your Dance of Silenus are certainly a wholesale condemnation of that picture. It is described as "here" with other epithets that I need not repeat, and as tending to the corruption of youth. But that you are "low," er that you painted the picture for the purpose of corrupting youth, the critic does not say. A man may say that I state what is not true; but that is very different from calling me a liar. The question then still remains, whether a spectator looking at a picture, and thinking it to be false in art and dangerous in morals, may not publicly say so?

If I print a book, and the reader, without any acquaintance with me or prejudice against me, thinks it sophistical, false, or immoral, may he not say so? May he not warn the public against what he conceives to be the debasing influence of my book, and hope that "this man" will write no more like it? May he not declare that my book is as bad as Mrs. Beecher's, and worthy to be read and read in the stews of Corinth, if that is his opinion? He may indeed express himself in a very offensive way, but I can not fairly demand that criticism, however false I may think it in substance and arrogant in expression, as a personal attack. Therefore you are wrong in thinking that I have approved an assault upon your moral character.

If you will allow me, I will add a few words upon the general subject which has occasioned this correspondence.

You speak of what I wrote as "an inforsement of this man's articles," meaning the Tribune criticism. Of course when you say this, you were not aware that in Harper's Weekly of the previous week I had expressed my dissent from the principle, so far as I understand it, of the criticisms in question, and also with many of their special views. Now that article I say of the picture of yours, which was so severely censured by the Tribune critic, Count Gurowski, instead of seeming to us too indecent to mention is not without a startling strain of Mohammedan satire and warning. It is not, therefore, "indorse" the articles. I merely "indorse" the critic's right to express his opinion of any artist as an artist, just as I do yours to express your opinion of my critic as a critic. Then you deny that every man has a right to express his opinion publicly of any book he is free to buy and to print. But do you really think that PROUDHON had not the same right to say that the sun never moved, as the bath Correspondence had to say that the earth moves round the sun? How is the question of ignorance to be settled? The Popes always say, virtually, that MR. DERAND is ignorant of nature. Upon your principle, he ought to insist that MR. DERAND should not be suffered to paint. He says that, if I like the pictures of certain artists, I know nothing of nature. Upon your principle, he ought to insist that I should not publicly express my opinion of those pictures, because they are subjects upon which I am totally ignorant. Certainly you can not mean that. If he should take that ground, I should reply that my admiration of RAPHAEL'S pictures, and of MURILLO'S, and of those of HOGARTH, of HOGARTH'S, of NAST'S, and of your own, might be very ignorant, but it was wholly sincere, and that I should not hesitate to express it merely because a critic, whether he were an artist or not, thought me incapable of judging.

Indeed, nobody can write a book of art in literature, painting, music, architecture, whatever it may be, take its chance? They are addressed to the human heart, and will justly judge them, and winnow the chaff from the wheat. Besides, the balance of criticism of artists and authors is pretty fairly adjusted. If our books are locked in the Round Table, for instance, they may be swathed with sweet spices in the Independent. If an "ignorant" criticism sits in the Tribune, a genial sympathy and intelligence may sparkle in the Evening Post. When you say that no person has a right to publish his study of subjects of which he is ignorant, you seem to me to forget that then nobody's right to talk could ever be satisfactorily settled.

I cordially agree with you that criticisms of pictures would always be better if they were written by competent artists. And you remember that it was said of a certain picture also that it would have been better if the artist had taken more pains. I welcome the articles in the Tribune not because I agree with their judgments, for I do not, any more than I agree with the attacks that Carlyle makes upon her; nor because I commend their style, for it seems to me that the writer is much too absolute and dogmatic, and has a most unfortunate knack of being unpleasant thing in an unpleasant way; but I welcome them because they seem to me an able and honest, and, under the circumstances, even a brave effort at serious criticism, and I am very sure that you and many other artists entirely misapprehend the spirit in which they are written. And I think you allow me to end what is meant at least for a friendly letter by copying the last sentence in yours?

You say, "The true artist desires nothing more than just criticism." I fully believe it, and also that the true critic desires nothing more than to criticise justly.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.—May 18. The House bill defining the pay of officers on the Retired List was passed after debate.

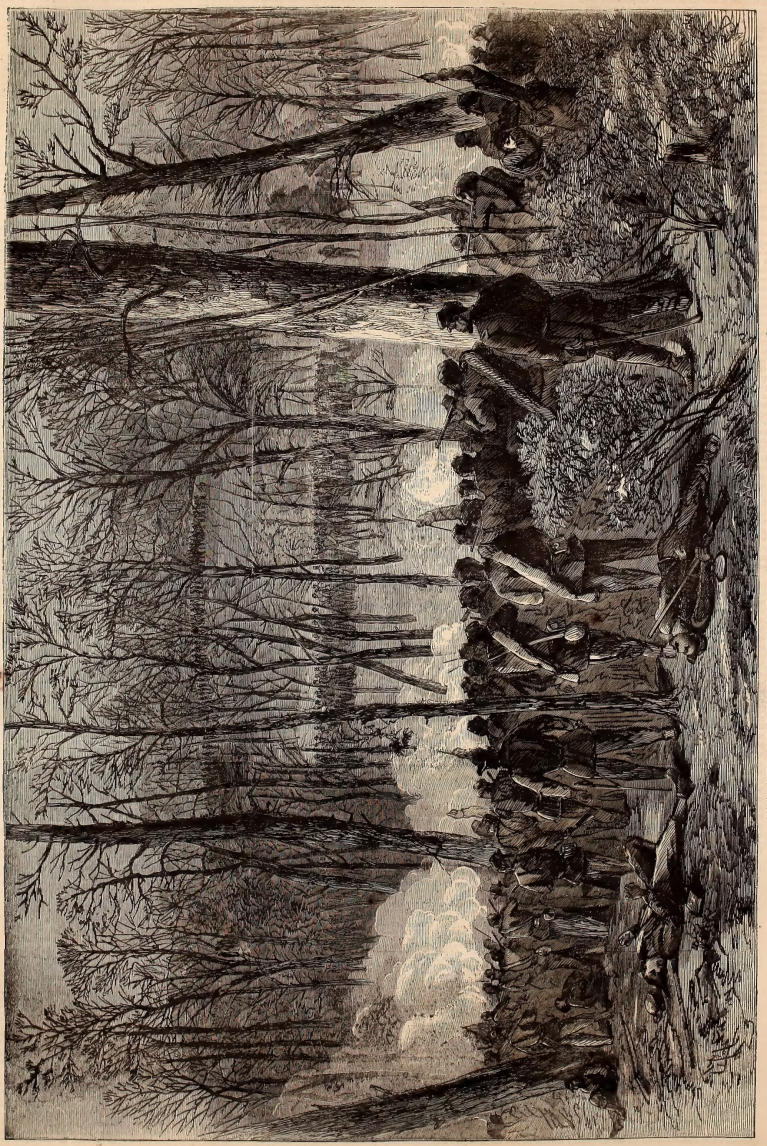
—The House bill, granting lands to the State of Iowa for railroad purposes, was reported with amendments and passed.—The bill to expedite the public printing was passed, with an amendment allowing the publishing of the report of the officers received and contract made for carrying the mails.—May 19. Mr. Morrill reported a bill, which was passed, to amend the act of Congress, approved September 28th, 1850, granting certain lands to the public authorities in California.—Mr. Morrill, from the Committee on Conferences on the disagreeing amendments to the bill for an exchange of a Territorial Government, reported a report which recommended that the Senate recede from its amendment, striking out the words "Territory of Idaho" and inserting in the qualification for voters," and inserting "All citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such" under the act establishing Idaho, in which Messrs. Morrill, Hale, Wade, Horton, and Sumner participated, the report of the Committee was adopted.—May 20. Mr. Wade's Pacific railroad bill was then taken up as unfinished business, but no action was had upon it.—May 21. The Senate was introduced by Mr. Wilson to authorize the President to call out such militia as he may deem fit for the purpose of chartering a mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil was brought up and after some discussion laid over.—May 21. Beyond debating the Pacific Railroad bill, the Senate did nothing of importance.—May 23. The bill in relation to naval supplies, which was reported upon adversely by the Naval Committee, was taken up. Mr. Grimes proceeded to defend the bill against the report of the Naval Committee, showing the abuse of the old system and the need of a reform. Mr. Hale and others participated in the discussion. The bill was taken. Mr. Morgan introduced a bill that so much of the act of Congress as authorizes cutting out the second force, and all mandatory thereof, as authorize the discharge of any officers from the service by reason of the non-payment of $100 for the procuration of a substitute or otherwise, be repealed.—May 24. Provided that the sum of $1,000 shall be construed to alter the provisions of the existing law in relation to the Military Academy at West Point.—The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up, and, after a long discussion, was passed.—May 25. Mr. Wilson introduced a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi to Puget Sound.—The Brazil Mail Steamship bill was passed.

HOUSE.—May 18. Bills were introduced to amend the two local inspectors of steamboats for collection in the District of East Tennessee and others.—The General Revenue bill was discussed at length on the clauses regulating the duties and salaries of officers to be appointed under the law. The amendments of the Finance Committee, which were verbal, were adopted.

HOUSE.—May 18. Mr. Julian reported a bill, which was read, providing for the sale of certain lands to bona fide holders of "floats" issued in pursuance of the act of October 19th, 1850, to locate Spanish grants in California.—The House then proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to abolish slavery. Pending which question as will insure more perfect uniformity of trade between the States of the Union and the North American Provinces. Mr. Elijah Ward addressed the House in favor of the bill.—May 19. Various resolutions were made, but of no special importance, when the Committee rose, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the officers and crew of the Monitor, and after a brief speech in favor of the bill by Mr. Ancona, the Committee rose.—May 20. The House passed the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to certain settlers on the Des Moines River.—May 21. The House passed the bill to amend the act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1863, entitled an act for the enrollment and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.—May 23. Mr. Ancona moved to take up the bill for the relief of the officers and crew of the Monitor, which was agreed to.—May 24. The House passed the bill to amend the act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1863, entitled an act for the enrollment and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.—May 25. Mr. Morgan introduced a bill that so much of the act of Congress as authorizes cutting out the second force, and all mandatory thereof, as authorize the discharge of any officers from the service by reason of the non-payment of $100 for the procuration of a substitute or otherwise, be repealed.—May 26. Provided that the sum of $1,000 shall be construed to alter the provisions of the existing law in relation to the Military Academy at West Point.—The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up, and, after a long discussion, was passed.—May 27. Mr. Wilson introduced a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi to Puget Sound.—The Brazil Mail Steamship bill was passed.

HOUSE.—May 18. Bills were introduced to amend the two local inspectors of steamboats for collection in the District of East Tennessee and others.—The General Revenue bill was discussed at length on the clauses regulating the duties and salaries of officers to be appointed under the law. The amendments of the Finance Committee, which were verbal, were adopted.

HOUSE.—May 18. Mr. Julian reported a bill, which was read, providing for the sale of certain lands to bona fide holders of "floats" issued in pursuance of the act of October 19th, 1850, to locate Spanish grants in California.—The House then proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to abolish slavery,



MAJOR-GENERAL WADSWORTH FIGHTING IN THE WILDERNESS.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 357.]

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—OUR WOUNDED ESCAPING FROM THE FIRES IN THE WILDERNESS.

[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

WE give on page 356 a striking sketch of the engagement of General WADSWORTH'S Division of the Army of the Potomac in the Wilderness near Chancellorsville, showing where the lamented WADSWORTH fell at the head of his command. The sketch gives a good idea of the almost impenetrable nature of the Wilderness, and of the disadvantages under which our soldiers fought.

On this page we give an illustration presenting the place where SEDGWICK was killed. General SEDGWICK was shot by a sharp-shooter, of whom the General a moment before remarked to an officer, "That fellow, at that distance, can't hit an elephant." General SEDGWICK at the time was standing at the foot of the tree on the right.

We also give a sketch showing Generals HANCOCK and WRIGHT fighting, on the 12th, for the rifle-pits of the enemy. This picture gives a general view of the battle-field in front of the Landrum House, the breast-works on the right being our advanced line the day before, and those on the left the rebel line, which was a very powerful one. Our troops were massed along under its cover, having turned it on its defenders, except at the head of the valley, where they still held one side and we the other. This was the scene of the most deadly struggle that this campaign has seen.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SCENE OF GENERAL SEDGWICK'S DEATH.

[FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.]

Another picture, on page 360, presents a scene which has been very common since the opening of the present campaign, namely, a Dull Day in Camp. The time at which this sketch was taken was six o'clock in the evening. Mr. Waud's sketch of the capture of rebel prisoners by a charge of General Winslow's Corps shows how like a river of frightened cattle they were driven into our lines by our gallant veterans. The prisoners, 1200 in all, came along pell-mell, anxious to get out of the range of their compatriots firing on our troops. If this charge had been made earlier in the afternoon it is probable that even greater success would have resulted from it.

Of another illustration on page 357 Mr. Waud, who furnishes these sketches, says: "The fires in the woods, caused by the explosion of shells, and the fires made for cooking, spreading around, caused some terrible suffering. It is not supposed that many lives were lost in this horrible manner; but there were some poor fellows, whose wounds had disabled them, who perished in the dreadful flame. Some were carried off by the ambulance corps, others in blankets suspended to four muskets, and more by the aid of sticks, muskets, and even by crawling. The fire advanced on all sides through the tall grass, and, taking the dry pines, raged up to their tops."

AUNT HEPZIE'S WARNING.

"You wanted to hear about the warning? Very well, then; toss me that bundle, please, and hold this zephyr while I wind, and I'll tell you all about it."

Aunt Hepzie had come over to take tea with my mother, and the two were sitting, in cheerful state, before the open fire; aunty was arrayed in her pontificals, her best alpaca gown and silk apron, with a stiff cap, which always came in a box and went in a box during the intervening months between sublimely upon its corner's head.

"Is there any thing of interest in the village?" asked mother. Aunt Hepzie was from the village? We were suburban.

"No, my dear, I scarcely that I know of," replied my aunt, conscientiously, at the same time adjusting her knitting sheath. "I think our church is in an awful state."

"Why do you? I thought they had seemed very united the last year," remarked mother.

"United! Fiddle! yes, Deacon Hull he say we're all froze together. Oh, he talked beautiful about it t the last Conference meetin'. Said he wondered that more than come down to prayers and Gomorrer didn't visit us. Oh, it's o' the Lord's mercy that we ain't consumed, every one on us"; and aunty cast a deep sigh.

"Why as to that, it's o' God's mercy we have all our blessings, isn't it Hephzibah?" remarked mother, with some energy. She never relished aunty's attacks upon times and people; and she went on, "As for thinking that we are in any degree like the cities of Sodom, I don't; I don't even think we are particularly deserving of it. No doubt we have all great reason to be humble on account of our sins; but what's the use of saying that we live in the worst age, and among the worst people? It's no benefit to us. For my part, I'm thankful my lines have fallen in such pleasant places."

"Well, Susan, I'm glad of you can take such cheerful view, I'm sure! but that wan't the way Deacon Hall talked. An speakin' o' him reminds me: they've got a Church Hall's reely pretty, as I've carried. They hurried Miss Squire Jones's cake tins this mornin'. Borrym'n them cake tins allers means a wedd'n' or a child dies. An' that sounds more like it—aunty was fairly under way now. I knew there would be no intermission until tea time.

"Do you that Squire Jones's nephew had come up from New York to spend the summer?"

"No. We hadn't heard of it. What nephew? asked mother.

"Why, young Farley. You remember his mother; she't was Lucy Jones. She married Farley, an' her, right off down country some wheres to live, an' this is her son."

"Ah yes, I remember his mother perfectly. Well, this will be very pleasant for Miss Jones. I shouldn't wonder. Come up here for his health indeed! Don't believe a word of it. I see him to meetin' Sun'y at Miss Jones, an' he looks mighty 'hough, 'cordin' to my way o' thinkin'. All pink and white. Well, I know one thing! If I was a girl I wouldn't speak to him with all his airs. Come upstairs!' and aunty made an emphatic pause. There was a silence broken only by the clicking of two sets of knitting-needles. I had a book, reading with my eyes and hearing with my ears, quite conscious that the present subject was supposed to have bearings upon myself.

"I tell you," began Aunt Hepzie again, sturdily, "girls better be pretty careful. There's a lot o' mighty conarstain—mighty conarstain," and she repeated the words to render them still more impressive. "All they care for country girls is to ask about an' hev a good time with 'em here, an' when they get back to the city they don't think no more about 'em 'n they do about last year's robins—not a whit more; so, Lozzy"—here she sent a shot from her black eyes over her spectacles at me—"no now you may take warnin'."

"Thank you, aunty, but I don't think it will be needed. Pink and white people aren't just my style, you know," I said.

Just out of the city there was a grand old place with bay-windows and balconies, fountains and flowers. That was the Farley place. Up on the hill there was a brown house with low roof and vine-covered porch. That was our house. Philip Farley's father owned ships on sea and blocks on shore. Mine had gone to sleep years ago under the tangle of wild brier and golden-rod up in the churchyard.

Six feet tall and broad-shouldered, with blue eyes, light hair, and a beard golden and silken like embroidery floss—that's Philip.

You see how little and dark I am; and my hair, did you ever see it down? Look at me then when I take the combs out. Black as night, and nearly covers me, you see. "Vain of it," you say? A trifle, perhaps. Why not? I know it's beautiful. If I were sorry myself I'd pretend I was not; but I'm not, you know. Wasn't it odd that a great mass of sunshine like Philip should fancy a little dusky bit of shadow like me? But he did, and I love it, of course. A woman always knows, I suppose. And I don't mind now telling you that I liked him from the first. In fact we began to love; I use the expression under protest, because it's the briefest way of putting it.

You see there is a class of our country people who, for some reason or other, are inimical toward their city brethren. You can easily imagine that my Aunt Hepzie was one of these. It was a few days after her tea-drinking at our house that she met, hustling about one bright morning in her tidy kitchen, and that kitchen, by-the-by, you should see. From silver spoon down to brass kettle, everything shone. It was a perfect bit of repercussion-gation to introduce mirrors into that house, when one may see one's face in every thing. But, as I said, Aunt Hepzie was in the kitchen when she heard a "skrimping noise," as she reported to me subsequently, with a vigor of diction peculiarly her own, and hurrying, she was met by a figure hastening in the doorway.

"Mrs. Sinclair, I think," said the stranger, with a bow.

"Yes, that is my name," replied auntie, more concise than suave. "What can I do want to come to the back door for?" she thought.

"And mine is Farley," said the young man; "it think you and I ought to be friends, Mrs. Sinclair, and I hope you'll let me come and see you sometimes for old acquaintance's sakes."

"If I do you'll be glad to see you, I'm sure," said aunty, a little less stiffly—the chivalrous bearing of the visitor was not lost upon the hostess.

"And you sent over to Miss Jones's cook from her garden. Perhaps you will allow me to set them for you in your border," he said.

"Oh, I'm much obleeged. Won't you just come in and sit down a minute?"

And the young man crossed the kitchen, flinging his broad-brimmed straw-hat upon the white table, tossing back his curls, and then seizing upon the rocking-chair.

"Wake up here, puss, and see your friends!" he said, bidding the astonished quadruped at arm's length by the nape of the neck. "Mrs. Sinclair, how is your dog Beppo? I hear that some rascallion had broken the old fellow's leg for him."

"Yes, indeed!" said Aunt Hepzie, and she went on to detail the whole affair to the visitor.

"What the heel was to Achilles, what the joint of the harness was to the Israelitish king, her dog and cat were to good aunt. Whatever the attack or tearer had been of your wonderful butter, and I want to taste it."

"Then you your soul, my butter ain't nothin' to brag of! When you go home though, you remind me an' I'll send 'long a ball on't to Miss Jones' for aunt she's allers fond of my butter, I'm sartain."

And so Aunt Hepzie, fairly conquered by goodnature, laid down her arms, and was no more to be talked against by Philip Farley. And so, I say, I suppose, she forgot her "warning," but not so I. There was not one of all those summer afternoons when Philip and I sat swinging together on the porch, not an hour of all those remembered hours when we were floating down the river, that I was for one moment forgot. Neither did I forget my mother's story of her beautiful young sister: "Lozy, aged eighteen," and the handsome young soldier, the noble lover had held and treasured, until, one day, there came a gay suitor from the city and stole the prize, and afterward trampled it under foot. I remembered it all, and I said to myself many times in the day that it was only for a little while—only for that summer day, and then I was sure things could easily be made to fall back into the old line again.

It was May when Aunt Hepzie came to tea. It was September when Philip and I stood, one evening, upon the porch. The woodbine was crimson, and away down the west the day was burning itself out behind golden bars. We had been riding up on the hills to see the sun set.

"Good-night," I said, my hand upon the latch of the door.

"Stop a moment, Lou!"

And I turned, startled a little at the quick, peremptory tone.

"Your servant, Sir," and I made a mock obeisance.

Philip stood pulling the leaves from the vine, and his face was very white. I think mine was white too, when he said:

"Do you know I'm going back to-morrow, Lou?"

"Back where?" Of course I knew, but I had lies plenty in my right hand that night.

"Home. Back to Paris. But God knows where then—into the army, perhaps," speaking quickly.

"Well, it has been a very pleasant summer," I said, carelessly enough. And then no one spoke, and it was very still, only I could hear the rushing of the brook in the glen.

"Is that all you have to say to me before I go, Lou?" he asked.

"I never bid my friends good-by. It isn't pleasant. Of course I wish you a delightful journey," I replied, coolly. "I don't recollect that I've any thing more to say."

"Well, I have; then, to say to you." And he pulled a handful of crimson leaves, and flung them, a shower of flame, upon my black habit. "Lou! you must know—I love you. I will not bid you good-by for long. You must tell me when I am to come back and claim my wife."

"O nash to pieces! a gilt's fair,
And rich and poor mate in,"

I hummed from a ballad we had read that very day.

"Lou, how provoking you are! But why don't you go on?

"I put love has never known a law Beyond his own sweet will."

"Because mine is common-sense, and yours is poetry. Your father is wretchedly out of place in this everyday world of ours, but common-sense, fortunately, is coin current the world over."

"And that common-sense and poetry never go together, I wonder? But seriously, Lou, you must listen to me."

"Seriously, Philip, this is folly. You will blush for it to-morrow. Besides, begging your pardon, the old play of the city lover and the rustic basis in between, you know. I pity you, we'll not have it acted over again at my expense."

"Stop, Lou!" and he spoke sternly this time, "this is too much for a man to bear. Can't you be in earnest?"

"I am in earnest."

"Tell me, then," and he took a step nearer me, speaking fiercely. His black figure shut out all the glowing sky. "Tell me, child, do you love me?"

"No."

He stood still an instant, then his hand touched mine, and then I heard the gate by my eyes through the darkness where he was disappearing among the trees. I went in and closed the door behind me. I had done my duty, I thought.

And next morning, of all that bright happy summer there remained only a handful of red leaves, fallen off, and the cold, sere face of the year.

And I? Of course I was very miserable. I never stopped to think; I only sometimes in the night, up in my chamber, with the stars looking at me through the one dormer window. Daytimes there was always Aunt Hepzie to keep me busy.

The morning Philip went away we sat at breakfast and I heard the whistle of the train. Something hard came into my throat. I thought, "He is gone, and he was more to me than all the world. I said, 'no.' I ought to begin house-cleaning—my mother!"

I was thinking of that last night. It's past the middle of the month," and mother threw a searching glance over the room. "Sir," said among the prophets," her countenance said. I had never been notable—the contrary rather. I cared more for my books.

"Then why not begin to-day?" I asked, adding enthusiastically, "I like house-cleaning!"

Mother looked incredulous, and more than incredulous looked Aunt Hepzie when she came in, two hours afterward, and found the parlor carpet up, the books down, and half the chairs inverted, their sword-like legs bristling at each other in the most belligerent manner.

"Mercy to me, Loizy, ef you ain't a cleanin house!" and aunty raised both hands in contemplation.

"Certainly; and why not, aunty?"

"Why not, indeed! Pretty time for you to be askin' that question; but better late 'n no time."

My want of domesticity had been a great trial to my meticulous kin, and to none a greater than to Aunt Hepzie.

"Spose you know 't Philip Farley had gone off this mornin' to enter the army? expected a sartin fer his self among the books in the great chair.

"I knew he was intending to go soon," I replied, uncomfortably. I mounted a table and began taking down curtains.

"Yes, he's gone. He come over to bid me good-by, an' I'm sorry I did. I really pitied the fellow; he acted so sorter down in the mouth. Somethin' gone wrong now, I tell you. He stood there on my premises, an' see I to him, 'I hope you'll be here again next summer, Mr. Philip,' and he said, 'I don't know where I may get down next summer, Aunt Hepzie.' Then I laughed, an' told him most likely he wouldn't never want to come and see us. 'You'll forget all 'bout your summer girl friend; but I wish to Heaven I could forget the last three months, although they have been the happiest of my life.' An' then he said, and mother went, only he shook hands with me and went out o' the yard; and if you can b'lieve it, I just sot down an' cried. I didn't have no more idee 'n the chipper round 'mong our folks this summer. Lawful heart, Loizy! what hev ye done? Smashed the silver fingerbowl or nothin'? Can't ye handle a hammer better 'n that, child?"

"Never mind, it's nothing," I said. I had crushed my finger, and the blood was streaming. The pain was a relief. I sat down, in medias res, to bind up the wound.

"That's right, dear; do it straight up in the blood. Better 'n any salve that is to cure a hurt," said Aunt Hepzie.

"Thank you, aunty; I'll try your recipe." It was more than a finger wound that I bound up in its red rag that blood morning.

"Where's your mother?"

"In the garden, I think."

"Well, I'll take this right her over a bundle o' valerian. She was talkin' on me that she was troubled to sleep o' nights. Hain't ye minded, Loizy, how pale your mother's be a gittin' lately?"

"No; I hadn't noticed." And I cursed my blindness when I saw upon her face that night the same look which, years before, my father's had worn.

That winter she died. It was New-Year's morning when, all along the country side, women stood out upon their door-steps, silent, listening, counting, while the bell tolled the years of my mother's life. During the storm and the darkness of that winter night her spirit had gone out and up, and the heavens had received her out of my sight. I was alone. A few weeks, and my solitary, aimless life became intolerable. Small as I am, I am strong of body and iron of nerve. You know there are places where such women are needed to-day, and in a month I was a hospital nurse.

Not one of your city hospitals was it; but a large building, with windows looking every way, with plenty of God's blue heaven above, and plenty of his fresh air wafted through—a place to sleep, to rest, to grow strong, and, if God so willed, to die in.

A September day was nearing its close. Golden lights and violet shadows flecked the Virginia hills. How calm and still it was over there toward the west! and yet, just beyond that calm, quiet, everyday, a fierce battle had raged. All day long those weary hospital trains had brought us loads of wounded and dying; but now, with the night, came a peaceful hush through all the wards. I stood still in the doorway, an open window. These moments of rest were rare enough now. It was just a year that night since Philip went away. Did he remember? I often wondered. I couldn't help that wonder sometimes, though I had tried to put it all by.

"This way a moment, Miss Sinclair, if you're not tired out. I want to see Dr. Mills who arrived." "I want a steady hand," he continued, as I followed him down the room. "A bad case, very bad case! A young German, wounded yesterday, leave all day giving orders about his men, and now there must be an amputation" and we went on.

"What is it, Freddie?" A little brown-haired drummer-boy put out his hand as I passed his cot.

"Am quite too tired to write to my mother to-night, please?"

"No, my boy, I'll come back in half an hour; and the next moment I stood by the side of the new patient. The assistant-surgeon was there. "Chloroform?" he asked. "No," said Dr. Mills; and then to me, "Can you stay strong to hold this arm? The other is to be taken off."

I took my place, bracing against the wall. I was a little strong girl with finger-tips like cold steel. I glanced toward the face; a handkerchief was thrown over it, and I saw by the brave man, in his agony, to conceal the writhings of pain.

"Take charge of this for a few days, will you?" and I started when I saw Dr. Mills holding out a pocket-photograph case. It was like the one Philip used to carry, and, as I took it, one red-leaf fluttered to the floor.

"Are we all ready?" asked Dr. Mills, and that instant a little red gleam from the open sleeve of the wounded man sent a sudden sickness all over me.

"Wait a moment, please," I begged.

My own cool bracelet! There was no mistaking it, for the trinket was of curious carving, and quaint design; "a Florentine-looking thing," mother always said—brought from abroad by a seafaring relative. I had lost it more than a year before in one of my boat-drives with Philip Farley. I supposed it was at the bottom of the river; I had never thought to find it here. I knew then whose hand I was holding—knew that fearful struggle that was over, that, through those weary months, while I had been trying to forget, he, during all the turmoil and tumult of battle, had never forgotten.

Half an hour afterward I went back to my little drummer-boy. "Why, Miss Sinclair!" he said, "how hard-eyes you look to-night. What makes you look so happy?"

"I've found my lost friend, Freddie!" I said. The letter to his mother was a cheerful one that night.

You know the rest; how, as soon as Philip was strong enough, we came home—a pleasant home to come to, wasn't it? But there's the tea-bell, and Aunt Philip coming up the walk. Oh, one thing more! Do you know Aunt Hepzie is coming to pay us a visit next month—coming to see the results of her "warning," I suppose!

IN FRONT OF DALTON, GEORGIA,
May 13, 1864.

TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

God never leaveth utterly
The world that He hath rounded;
With the delivering angels,
And on the wings of our black hates
Ride His supreme evangels.
In riotous glut of wrongs abhorred
A people's shame increases,
Then lo! your land is prophet-wise his sword.
And cleaves the lie in pieces.

O leader of our sacred cause,
Twin sharer in our sadness,
Defender of the trampled laws
From perjured felon's madness—
In all our press of mortal strife,
Our counsels and our battles,
Our hearts thank God our country's life
Is in thine honest keeping!

So blithe amid the cares of state,
So calm 'mid howling faction,
Clear-souled to hasten or to wait,
As fits the largest action;
With joyance like a little child's Along thy green moods straying,
And breezes as from heather wilds
In every cheery saying.

God bless the reverent lips that spake
The one grand word whose thunder
Thrilled all the gladdened heavens, and brake
Our damned chains asunder!
God bless the patient hand that traced
The golden, glorious pages
Whereby our lost crowns are replaced
For immemorial ages!

We follow where thou leadest; for
Beyond the tribulation
That drapes these dreadful years of war
We see a newer Nation,
Through balmy days of greatening power
And nights of calm ascension,
Expand into the perfect flower
Of God's divine intention.

RICHARD REALF,
85th Illinois Infantry.

A LEGEND OF LEAP YEAR.

"HARRY! Harry!"

Through the bounding pulses of the delicious waltz that filled the air, horn and viol, and mellow ophicleide, Meta Beck's little voice reached Major Keith's ear. He skillfully whirled his partner into a seat, said a word or two of excuse, and worked his way through billows of crêpe and tarlatan to the fair-haired damsel who was beckoning him into the secluded shadow of a curtained bay-window.

"What is it, Meta?"

"Stoop down, Harry!" said Meta Beck, in mysterious whisper; "I've something very particular to tell you."

"Oh, you have," said Harry, meaningly. It's Leap Year, Miss Beck, and if you have any propositions to make I shall most assuredly say 'Yes.'"

"Nonsense!" said Meta, coloring just enough to look prettier than ever. "I wish you would be serious for just half a minute, Harry!"

"Well, I am serious," laughed the young man, leaning up against the window, so that his gold army buttons were just on a level with Meta's blue eyes; "what is your unfathomable mystery?"

"There's to be a surprise party to-morrow evening!"

"Where?"

"At your rooms in the ——Hotel."

Major Keith elevated his eyebrows deprecatingly.

"But, Meta, how on earth am I to entertain forty young people in a bachelor quarters?"

"That is for you to decide, Sir," said Meta, laughing mischievously at his evident perplexity. "The girls are all so delighted at the prospect of taking you by surprise, and the gentlemen declare it will be capital fun!"

"I'm much obliged to 'em," said Harry, dryly.

"But mind!" said Meta, holding up a warning finger, "you're never to tell that I gave you a hint of their intentions!"

"I won't, Meta, upon my word—you are the sweetest little friend in the world, and I don't know what I should do without your kind offices," said Keith, fervently.

But through all the melodious tumult of the band, and all the merry confusion that filled the ball-room, Harry Keith kept pondering on the intended "raid" of the morrow's night.

The fine morning brightly in the grate the next morning, for Mr. Job Keith liked a salamander sort of atmosphere, even though the May sun was waxing hot and into the bloom in many a meadow slopes, and the thermometer laughed at fires—and Mr. Job's temperature was ruling in the red glimmer to say nothing of Mr. Job's breakfast—broiled chickens, fresh-laid eggs, and coffee, whose delicious fragrance crept through the walls and spirals into the seventh heaven of gastronomic delight—upon the table, and his velvet slippers set mathematically straight in the left-hand corner of the rug.

After these details it is necessary to state that Mr. Job Keith was an old bachelor!

"Two sleeping-rooms, two bedrooms," quoth Harry, viewing the apartments critically as he stood at the window whistling softly in inward perplexity. "I might do pretty tolerably well if it wasn't for Uncle Job. Uncle Job don't approve of pretty girls, Champagne, or bonnet-strings—he will spoil the fun completely! Uncle Job must be got rid of!"

Harry enunciated this murderous sentiment with a sort of subdued despair, adding, "and Job he's to be got rid of I don't know."

The words were yet on his lips when the door opened, and walked the identical Uncle Job—a parsy little man of about forty, with a shining bald head and round-cheeked spectacles.

"I'm late this morning, Harry—I know I'm late," he began, stirring the fire; "but I didn't sleep well last night. That confounded chanticleer-barnsail got the flannel blanket over the chintz comforter in front of under it, and I'm quite sure she has taken at least two ounces of feathers out of the pillow!"

"Indeed!" said Harry, absently.

"Fact," said Job Keith, measuring twenty-two grains of granulated sugar into his cup. "Give me an egg, Harry—that is, if they're fit to eat. Thank you, my boy. Now for the newspaper."

"Uncle Job," said Harry, suddenly.

"Eh? what is it?"

"There's a party of girls coming here to-night."

Uncle Job dropped the spectacles into the cream-jug.

"Girls! what for?"

"To see you, I suppose."

"To see me? I don't want 'em—why can't they stay at home peaceably? Girls, indeed!—when the sight of a cart-paper gives me the dyspepsia? What does this mean, Harry?"

"Well, I don't know," said Harry, chipping an egg-shell deftly with the end of his fork—"unless—"

"Unless what? Speak out, boy!" cried Uncle Job, melodramatically, the cold drops coming out of every pore on his forehead. "They want me to subscribe to some zigmarole fair, or church, or charitable institution, I suppose?"

"Ah, uncle," sighed Harry, mysteriously, "I wish that was the worst of it!"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing—only you must remember that this is Leap Year."

Job Keith sat staring at his nephew, his face alternately changing from dull crimson to pale yellow.

"Harry," he ejaculated, solemnly, "what's the use of laws if a man is to be persecuted in this way? I'll appeal to a police magistrate—I'll call in the military!"

"I suppose you might swear 'em over to keep the peace," said Harry, "but it wouldn't look very dignified—people would be apt to laugh at you, wouldn't they?"

"Harry, where's my valise?" said the old gentleman, jumping briskly up. "I'll take the ten o'clock train up to Philo's. You don't suppose they'll follow me clear up into Westchester County?"

"Oh no, of course not," said Harry, inwardly chuckling at the brilliant success of his plan. "I must say I think you've hit on the best arrangement that could be made!"

Uncle Job began to toss his effects into indiscriminate heap, and valise, carpet-bag, and clothes-basket, by turns came to the front.

"Hadn't you better stay?" he cried, as a little knock came to the door.

"Don't know," said Harry; "but I should think from the sound that [illegible] pretty widow who occupies the suit of rooms across the hall come to borrow our newspaper."

"Widow!" shouted Uncle Job, "a widow come after me! Harry Keith, don't let her in. Double-lock that door immediately, Sir. A widow! How did I know what her intentions may be? Confound Leap Year, I wish it came once in forty years instead of once in four!"

But Harry only rebuffed, greatly to Job's consternation.

"Harry!" he whispered, hoarsely, "that widow will knock the panels in if you don't open the door. Good-by, my boy, don't let the woman get the better of you, do ye hear?"

And Uncle Job darted down the back stairs, his hat perched one-sidedly upon his head, and the valise under his arm, as Harry threw open the door to a very diminutive boy, who brought no more threatening document than the gas-bill.

It was not until the train steamed into the quiet little station at Thorneydale—nearly noon of a brilliant May day, the sky above bluer than the violets along the banks, and the air full of sweet gusts from the apple-blossoms in every guarded old orchard—that Job Keith walked hurriedly up the shadowy winding lane that led to a low-eaved cream-colored farm-house, wherein dwelt his brother Philo, he congratulated himself on having at last reached a bourne of sweet and peaceful rest.

"Not a woman in sight," said Job Keith, leaning against an angle of the fence and a cluster of delicious wild honey-suckle shook its pink chalices of spice against his flushed cheek, and wiping his wet brow with a rich pocket-handkerchief, as he shifted his valise from one hand to the other. "And what a blessing that is, to be sure! What a fortunate thing it is that Philo's wife has no children's seven girls!"

"I'm sick of you, any how," said Job Keith, walking boldly up the path, and pushing open the door. "I'll take board with Philo's folks until the first of January—and Harry's nothing to me, any more!"

The syllables died away on Job's tongue as he strode into the cozy "keeping room."

The green paper curtains were half rolled up, the chairs stood primly against the wall, and the floor was covered with a gayly-colored home-made rag-carpet, while a fat, grey kitten lay basking in the broad band of sunshine that streamed from under the shades and quivered in golden ribbons on the floor.

There was nothing in Mrs. Philo Keith's neat "keeping room" to excite astonishment or appall the heart of her city brother-in-law; that is, there would have been nothing had the apartment been empty. But it was not.

Swaying composedly back and forth in the morris-cushioned rocking chair, with a bandbox on one side of her and a basket on the other, and a tall and angular female, with keen gray eyes and a complexion whose consistency reminded one irresistibly of boiled starch, perched bolt upright in molasses-colored calico, entirely innocent of any lining like crimson, and a bonnet-bristling and over with defiant-looking artificial roses, sat Job's widow dropped from his nerveless hand to the floor with a hollow sound, she rose up and confronted him.

"I've been waitin' for you this hour 'n a half!" she said, tartly.

Waiting for him! Had he steered safely from the rocks of Scylla only to be wrecked on Charybdis? Had he, to fall back on a less grandiloquent simile, jumped from the frying-pan into the fire?

"There is some mistake, ma'am, I'm sure," he pleaded, in as insinuating a manner as he could command.

"Oh no, there isn't," returned the lady. "You're the gentleman from New York, ain't you?"

Job could not deny the soft impeachment.

"And I'm Mahaly Hawkins from 'cross the river. Philo Keith knows me!"

Job bowed stiffly. He began to think that it was useless to fly the iron decrees of fate, while Mahala Hawkins, leaning deliberately on a rusty cotton umbrella, proceeded to define her platform.

"I ain't so young as I was, but I don't s'pose that makes any difference, as long as I'm spry and look sharp arter things. I'd calc'late to be as savin' and economical as possible, and keep an eye to your interests jest the same as though they was mine!"

Job sank down on a chair, with a momentary dizziness at the vista of the inevitable future, however, went on, flourishing her umbrella to give emphasis to her remarks.

"Tain't every body I'd make sich an offer to!" said Mahala. "You may think yourself very fortunate to get one like me!"

Mr. Job Keith stared helplessly at the gaunt female before him, but said nothing; a fact he was mentally cogitating whether a man could be married in spite of himself.

"I'm a first-rate cook, though I say it as shouldn't say it," proceeded the gaunt female. "I can make all sorts o' pies and fixins, and I'm a great hand to iron shirts and keep a gentleman's wardrobe in order. Besides, I can play on velvet and play the accordeon, when you get lonesome and want company in the parlor."

"A very formidable list of accomplishments," thought Job. "If it wasn't for that woman's thumping the floor every now and then with the ferule of her umbrella, I should certainly think this was a fit of the nightmare."

"Well, what do you say, yes or no?" demanded the redoubtable Mahala Hawkins after a brief pause.

"You are very kind, Ma'am," faltered poor Job, hastily, "but really I don't think it is necessary—I don't need—"

"What?" ejaculated Mahala, fiercely grasping the umbrella in the middle, "ain't you going to take me?"

"No, I am not," said Job Keith, driven frantic by this series of assaults. "Nothing of the kind, my good woman, I assure you."

"Very well," said Mahala, jerking up the words from somewhere in the pit of her stomach, and stooping to recover the bandbox and basket, "very well, Mister, I'll remember I had you on my feather and fare words. Just as you please—just exactly —only this I will say, I wouldn't go to live at your house not for the inducement you could offer, you mean, good-for-nothin' stuck up—"

And Mahala Hawkins and her adjectives vanished out of the room together, while Mr. Job Keith put his two hands in his pockets and dismally meditated whether he had better escape this system of persecution by drowning himself in the pond of water whose blue tides gleamed through the distant alders, or by running over the common to obtain protection against the rest of the sex!

"Hallo, Job! what on airth brings you up to Thorneydale?" said Philo Keith.

Honest Philo clapped his brother on the back to rouse him from the deep reverie into which he had fallen.

"Look here, Philo," said Job, in a hoarse whisper. "Do you see that woman in the big bonnet, who carried a bandbox, and a cotton umbrella? There she is crossing the little bridge now under the willows."

"See her! why shouldn't I? There ain't nothin' the matter with my eyes! It's Mahaly Hawkins, ain't it?"

"That woman, Philo, has given me a shock that I shall never get the better of—never!"

Philo stared.

"She wants me to marry her, Philo, and I declined—declined positively!"

Philo burst into a loud laugh.

"Now look here, Job, there's no use chaffin' me if I do live up in the back-woods! Mahaly Hawkins wouldn't marry the Prince o' Wales himself, I guess you're mistaken, ain't you?"

"No, Philo, no, a mistake is impossible. She told me she had been keeping here for me—she demanded in a most uncompromising manner whether I was not the gentleman from New York—"

"Oh, now I see—she was through the millstun," roared Philo, stamping on the floor with delight. "She come here to engage out as housekeeper to Uncle Thomas Keith, and bought a farm on the hill, and he was to meet her here this mornin'. Good Jerusalem! I guess you made a pooty fool of her, you did. Why, Job, what ever put it in your head she wanted to marry you?"

Like a flash through the real truth shot through Job Keith's mind. Miss Mahala had, very naturally, mistaken him for somebody else—here had been a mistake all round! He looked up, crimson and crest-fallen.

"Philo, I've been a fool; but it wasn't my fault. If you had seen the sly, sneering manner in which the women as I have, you'd be suspicious of every one that came near you. But there's one favor I have to ask of you—don't tell your wife!"

A confused giggling in some unknown direction struck on Job's ear as he ceased speaking. Philo pounded the floor with a gayer and diminished fife. Philo and a plump, pretty woman of thirty-five or so, laid their sides in convulsions of mirth.

"Why, it's Eunice Carver!" stammered Job.

Yes—it was Eunice Carver—the very one of all others whom he would not wish to be the witness of his discomfiture; the Eunice Carver who had flirted with him at eighteen, and had pouted so prettily when people accused her of being Job Keith's "sweet-heart"—and Eunice Carver still.

But her eyes were bright as blue diamonds yet, and there were the same red rosy bloom on her round cheeks that reminded Job not unpleasantly of the old times.

So Job, emboldened by the emergency, availed himself of the only apparent method of checking the tantalising giggles; he walked boldly up to Eunice and kissed her right upon the cleft cherry of her mouth.

Wasn't that pretty bold for a determined old bachelor?

That night as he lay in the little bedroom under the eaves, with the cherry branches tapping softly on the roof overhead, he came to an eventful resolve regarding the two alternatives which he had that afternoon placed before himself.

"I won't drown myself," he pondered—"that would be exceedingly absurd! But I'll see what Eunice says about it!"

And Eunice said "Yes."

Philo Keith's strawberry beds were a sheet of white bloom when his old bachelor brother first took refuge from the dangers of Leap Year; the berries glowed red and ripe among their dark green leaves, like a fallen shower of jewels, when he went away again with his blue-eyed wife.

"I don't like to tell Harry; he'll be sure to laugh at me," thought Job, as he alighted from the cars at the New York depot. "However—"

"Why, Uncle Job!" rang out the clear voice of the tall Major.

"It's you, is it, Harry?"

"Yes. I thought you might be on to-day, and I wished very much to see you, to—to— Pooh, what a fool I am! The fact is, Uncle Job, I am married."

"Are you, Harry?" said Uncle Job, smiling benignantly. "So am I!"

Harry opened his eyes very wide and whistled softly under his mustache, but it was not his "style" to evince any great degree of surprise at whatever might transpire.

"Very well, I'll not detain you just now, Sir. I'll bring Meta to call on her aunt this evening."

So it was that Mr. Job Keith, and the Major of Infantry, his nephew, met their matrimonial fates in one and the same Leap Year.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN a poor fellow is about to be buried he appears to have his very existence in a state.

NOW, Mrs. Brackett, I always like to have an old-fashioned fish ball when I buy a live lobster, Japan. I'm awful tempered, but I'm dreadful forgivin'. Have you a good cellar, a hot and cold water, stationary tubs, out-door privy on the floor, dumb waiter? Monday I want to be settled in more than day. Terms? House. Nobody to come near me that day. Wednesday I baker. Not to be at home that day. Thursday I goin up to Jacob's. Jacob's to come near me that day. Friday I goin to Jacob's. Nobody to come near me that day. Saturday I bakes, and Saturday afternoon my beau comes in. Nobody comes near me that day. Sunday I has to myself."

What is the difference between the river that runs from Albany to New York and the other is a-ver-der.

THE ALREADY OF REJOYNED FOR A WIFE.—OF AN EARNEST DISPOSITION, but of a cheerful temperament, affectionate, artless, sizable, accomplished, beautiful, benign, benevolent, charming, chaste, candid, cheerful, complaisant, charitable, civil, constant, dutiful, dignified, elegant, every, engaging, excellent, faithful, fond, fine, fair, good, graceful, generous, generative, good-humored, handsome, beautiful, healthy, lovely, mindful, intelligent, interesting, industrious, ingenuous, just, kind, lively, liberal, lovely, modest, beautiful, measurey, neat, notable, obedient, obliging, pretty, pleasing, peaceable, pure, righteous, sensible, submissive, sociable, temperate, true, virtuous, well-formed, and young. When I meet with a woman answering to all of these requirements I will.

PROGRESSORS.—An able physiologist has written that one-fifth of the human body is composed of phosphorus. It will remain this most likely accounts for the number of matches made.

An admirer of Napoleon was heard to say that that monarch was a real friend to Gerhard and his cause, and that he had taken the part of Italy for some years past. Quite so! But when the people, the party, and sovereign most vital and dear to the Italians—and he's legit to too!

"THERE'S A MAN IN IT!"—The confidence reposed in Lieutenant-General Grant by President Lincoln was happily illustrated by a characteristic anecdote related recently by the President to the escort of a fraudulent conversation with a personal friend, and in reply to a question in regard to the present campaign, he said, "Well, Sir, your question reminds me of a little anecdote about the automaton chess-player. You remember it was exhibited here a while by its skill in that game. After a while the automaton was examined and it was found that, although the great chagrin, was beaten twice by the machine. At the end of the second game, a little paper, mysteriously pointing his finger at the automaton, exclaimed in a very decided tone, 'There's a man in it!' And this, Sir, is just the secret of our present success."

A VALUABLE PROFESSIONALIST.—What's Whats," by the author of "Who's Who."

QUEER PAPERS.

The paper having the largest circulation—the paper of the future.

Paper for roughs—Sand paper.

Paper contributed by the fair—Ruffles.—The paper of niceties.

Soiled paper—The French press.

The paper that is full of rows—The paper of pins.

Paper indispensable to a lady—Foolscap.

Paper illustrated with cuts—Editorial exchanges.

Drawing paper—Bills receivable.

A taking paper—The sheriff's warrant.

Why does the Emperor Napoleon's position toward the Church force upon him to be no Christian?—Because he is a muzzle-man.

SCOTCH AND SHAKSPEARIANA.—"Dyes ken why ma auchanbrunchan's so like ane Shakspeare's plays?—Hoot toot. Ye dinna ken?—Varra weel: then I'll just tell ye, ma auchanbrunchan's like ane of his plays because it's a Tweoon."

EARLY RISING.—Jump out of bed the moment you hear the knock at the door. Don't wait for a second time when called to bet. The mind should be made up in a minute, for after rising in one of those subjects that entails of no morning over.

"How many feet long was the snake?" asked a person of a traveler, who had just related a story of his encounter with a boa killed by him. "One hundred and ninety-two inches," was the reply, "unless have no feet."

How melancholy the moon must feel when it has enjoyed the fullness of prosperity and gets reduced to its last quarter!

THE REASON WHY woman has her way so much oftener than man is, that both he and she are conscious that her way is the best.

What is the best thing to do in a hurry?—Nothing.

GENERAL WRIGHT'S CORPS RUNNING IN TWELVE HUNDRE

GENERALS HANCOCK AND WRIGHT FIGHTING FOR THE ENEMY'S RIFLE-PITS.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 358.]

D REBEL PRISONERS.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 358.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXIV.

LILY IS LEFT ALONE IN A STRANGE COUNTRY.

In the court-yard of the post-office, not far from the hotel, Lily was introduced to an enormous machine—a hackney-coach, an omnibus, and a post-chaise, stuck together—painted yellow, and surmounted in front by a kind of hackney-cab, and in the rear by a tremendous pile of luggage covered with a tarpaulin. The formidable affair was mounted on very low wheels, and to it were harnessed, by very ragged looking ropes, six horses, three abreast, and as ragged as the cords which confined them. This was the Paris diligence belonging to the Messageries Royales of Messrs. Lafitte, Caillard, & Company; and each of my courteous readers who may have attained middle age, and went to school in France, have probably journeyed by this same lumbering, jogging, and cumbersome conveyance.

The hackney-coach compartment, which held six, was called the intérieur; the omnibus-looking compartment, which afforded want of accommodation for eight passengers, went by the name of the rotonde; and that portion of the vehicle which has been likened to a post-chaise, and in which three persons could sit, sufficiently at ease, was entitled the coupé. The lady had retained the whole of this coupé; one place for herself, another for Lily, and the third for the semper; although it is questionable whether the entire diligence would have been big enough to hold that. After a time an individual in a semi-military uniform, with an embroidered badge on his arm, and a laced cap with a peak to it, who was the conducteur or guard of the machine, came to the window and read off the passengers' names from a two-bull; and the gendarme in a cocked-hat and jack-boots, who had come, it is to be presumed, to see Lily off, and to conduct her to the examination of passports, he was carrying an infernal machine to Paris to blow up the Orleans dynasty withal, waved one of his long gauntlets in token of dismissal; the postilion, a frightful-looking creature, in monstrous jack-boots, and with a quantity of pistol-holsters, all very dirty, jumped off, rang from his hat, cracked his whip, and began to scream out some abusive language to his horses, and the top-boy came running out of the post-office yard.

They were waving and staggering over the ill-paved streets of the town when a carriage, which Lily had seen before, passed them at a steady rapid pace. It was the green chariot which had been lashed to the deck of the Harlequin, and reclining in it was the invalid gentleman with the yellow face. There was no room in the rumble for M. Franz Stimm, and there his place properly was; but he was a confidential courier, and, the carriage being closed, occupied a place by his master's side.

"There is that little girl again," the sallow man remarked dreadfully, as they passed the diligence.

"She is ver graziosa; I gif her some joggo-late, my lord generale," returned the courier.

"Don't my lord me, Stimm," peevishly exclaimed the invalid; "nor general neither. I never was the one, and I'm sick of having been the other. I can't get that little girl's face out of my head. It haunts me. Who can she be?"

"Bah! bas grand chose," Monsieur Stimm observed, in reply. "Za mère elle est osme grainc; c'est une diablesse. I tink I see her somewhere in de zeatre, daucing on de cord or jumping on de horse. Hoop-la!"

But the child was by this time many yards behind, and the invalid, pettishly asking for some orange-flower, and being, as usual, assisted to take it by Monsieur Franz Stimm turned "gognac," forgot, for the time, the bright little face which, he said, had haunted him.

The occupants of the coupé traveled all that day along dusty roads, for the most part bordered with beech, and, like walking-sticks, surmounted by birch-brooms. The perspective was not enchanting. The fields were of an ugly ashen green, and divided by ditches and hedges. There were no pretty villages by the roadside; what buildings there were did not get beyond tumbledown cottages, at the doors of which toothless old women, with their heads bandaged up, sat, or with their wheels, or their children, sprawled. From time to time they met a man walking, in a blouse and sabots, powdered with dust from head to foot: a knapsack on his back, and a quantity of ribbons streaming from his hat. Sometimes he looked wobegone, and blubbered; sometimes he whistled cheerily, and was defiant, and drunk. This was Jean Pierre, or Gros Guillaume, the conscript who had drawn a bad number, and was trudging to the regimental depôt. Frequently, on coming to the base of a steep hill, the diligence would stop, and the conducteur, coming to the coupé door, politely invite them to descend. Then they would have to walk up hill, toiling after the diligence for half a mile or so; but there were no wild flowers by the way. There were loathsome beggars instead, who, in twos and threes, dotted the highway from Boulogne to Paris, flaunting their tatters, exhibiting their sores, holding up to sigh their cadaverous faces, and, in droning, monotonous tone, repeating: "Charité, s'il vous plaît! Petit sou Anglais! Petit morceau de pain! Anglais!" A recent change in the order of things in Paris has had, at least, one gratifying result—the roadside beggars have disappeared.

They staid half an hour, at five o'clock, to dine at Abbeville, where there was a noisy crowded table d'hôte. Lily could eat nothing save a spoonful of soup, and a slice from an enormous meal which followed the table. Five francs a head were charged for this repast, which gave the lady an opportunity of stormning at Lily, at the hotel, and at the world, for the next twenty miles. A little way out of Abbeville some men were singing the battles of a newly-slaughtered pig in a field; and the odor of this porcine suttee borne on the breeze gave Lily a notion of incipient cracking, and made her almost hungry.

They went jogging, rumbling, clattering on, the pestilent creature in his whip and screaming, and the horses, not to be behindhand, screaming too. They traveled all night, but Lily could not find room for the unwonted thing. At about six in the morning they stopped at a pretty large town, where, from an inn-door, a black-headed barefoot girl brought out to the coupé two white bowls of scalding hot coffee, with a liberal allowance of milk therein, and two huge slices of bread. Lily was able to breakfast very heartily, and, though her feet felt chill and numb, her spirits had risen by the time they arrived at St. Denis—about eleven o'clock—when she was told that they were within six miles of Paris.

The lady's temper had been throughout detestable, and she had seldom spoken to Lily, save to scold her. But when they reached the capital, however, her face brightened, and, at Montmartre, she condescended to inform the child that Paris was the only place worth living in all the whole world.

"Shall we be pretty much ?" she asked the little girl, with a timid look.

"We?" repeated the lady, coldly. "You are going to stay with your aunt, I am told. Bah, bah, to learn lessons and be put in the convent en pétrisse, as you will be if you are not naughty. I have not the least intention of troubling myself about you. There will be one Paris for me, and another Paris for you, ma petite."

The diligence passed by the Porte St. Denis, then a barrier, where sundry custom-house officers came to the window asking whether there was any thing to declare, and suffering the coupé to drive into the luggage beneath the tarpaulin. They took away a bottle of wine from a stout lady in the intérieur, and a bundle of cigars from a man in the rotonde, the possessors of those edibles and potables having been foolish enough not to declare them, and to wait until some of the octroi. For in those days, as now, every thing eatable or drinkable, except the octroi duty, or gave tolls, to the good city of Paris.

The diligence clattered up and down several steep streets, which were illuminated by gas-lamps, but, instead, clumsy lanterns suspended to the centre of ropes slung across from house to house, and every where Lily saw people walking, or talk, preferentially, in the gutter. A great many of the men wore blue shirts above their trowsers, and wooden shoes, and many white caps, in lieu of bonnets, on their heads. Lily thought the whole scene very unlike Stockwell.

Arrived at the diligence office, a street called Grenelle Saint-Honoré, and in the yard of which half a dozen diligences, all of the yellow and as clumsy as the Boulogne diligence, were slumbering without horses, and where a number of ragged men were lounging and smoking pipes and lounging about, they found another custom-house, and had to undergo a fresh examination of baggage. Lily's and the lady's passport was again inspected, and at last taken away from her altogether with an intimation that she might reclaim it at the office in the Prefecture of Police. The lady engaged a carriage hung very close to the ground and drawn by two horses, which, like the harness, were very ragged, and whose knees were very bandy. The driver wore a glazed hat, a red waistcoat, and a very dirty face.

Up and down more narrow stony streets, and then they crossed a wide river, and entered thoroughfare skirted by lofty mansions and splendid shops, with wide branching trees along the inside of the footways, and thronged with people, and horses, and carriages.

"Oh, what a beautiful street!" cried the child. "Do look at the shops, and the trees, and all those flags; and, oh, here is a whole regiment of soldiers!"

"Beautiful!" echoed the lady, with complacent disdain. "I should think so, little ignorance, for it is the finest street in the world. It's the Boulevard des Italiens."

But they soon left it and dived into more gloomy, narrow streets, and emerged into the filthy lanes of the old quarter of the city. Then the houses grew fewer, and the gardens more numerous, and presently they turning in the boot, called through the window:

"Was it the Rue de la Pépinière, or the Rue de la Courcelles, the bourgeoise asked?

"De Courcelles, ganache!" replied the countess, addressed as bourgeoise.

"Thanks for the compliment," the driver, who was a good-natured fellow, replied. "Je vous la souhaite belle et bonne, ma bourgeoise. Do you have any thing else by way of pour-boire? Hahahehe!" Ostrogoth of a rhinoceros!" The latter remark was addressed to one of the white horses, which was essaying to lunch on his neighbor's near blinker. And they went on again.

They reached a street where there were no houses to be seen, only a double succession of staring white stone-walls, of different heights, and here and there a green door. At one of these doors, the number five, the carriage drew up. The bell-rope, a long link which dangled by a long wire from the wall, and this was presently answered by a lad in a shabby livery, and whose face was fearfully scarred with the small-pox. Lily's trunk was alone removed, and the coachman was ordered to wait. The pock-marked lad conducted them across a dreary court-yard, in the interstices of whose stones rank dank herbage grew, up a broken flight of mildewed stone steps, across a bare hall, or vestibule, papered green, which smelt very mouldy and felt very damp, and so into a dismal saloon with six long bleak doors, a pattern like a chessboard, and which was so highly polished that Lily almost broke her entrance, and was very near tumbling down.

She was bidden to sit on a vast chintz-colored sofa, and remained there, shivering and shrinking to the harsh ticking of an ormolu-clock on the mantle-shelf. The lady left her at the expiration of ten minutes, and Lily thought she could hear voices in an adjoining apartment. She remained on the sofa for another ten minutes, and then the door bang violently shut. Through one of the tall windows (which reached almost to the ground) she saw the form of the lady-passenger hastening across the court-yard. The shabby lad opened the door for her. She entered the carriage. She was gone. Lily's heart sank within her. She was now left Quite Alone indeed.

CHAPTER XXV.

LA PENSION MARCASSIN.

THE child's hand was on the handle of the clock; but it turned on the other side, and a person came in.

She was tall and shapely, and had once been handsome; but she had bidden farewell to middle-age, and, without pleading guilty to imminent antiquity, would have had little chance, if arraigned, of a verdict in her favor. Of her good looks only enough was left to make her angry at the remembrance of having been comely. Her hair, banded in the old long-fingered church by they were, retained their symmetry, and were dazzlingly white. But they were heartless-looking hairdressing, and, more accustomed, if manual expression can be eloquent, to give but fets than to give charity. The nails looked as though they had been bitten, not pared. Her hair, iron, not silver gray, was disposed in plain bands beneath a rigid cap of point lace if you will, but lace that was dirty, as though it had been brought out of some white metal. She was tall, very tall, and was draped in one long black silk dress, without a flounce, and with a long train, lying in few folds, and those stiff and angular. A great cross of dull gold was on her neck, and that was all the ornament she wore. Her voice was chilly and windy. The words came as though a cold, slightly moist, air, charged, a draught of cold air let in, and then closed.

"I am Mademoiselle Marcassin," she said.

She spoke in a low tone but with a foreign accent, fainter and harder than that which marked the speech of the strange lady. Her words fell like drops of sleet upon Lily's fainting little heart.

"Stand before me, here, in the light, so," continued Mademoiselle Marcassin. "Listen to me with all your attention."

She placed her white thin hands on the child's shoulders, turned her round, and dressed her up, in a military manner, by the window. Anon she went to the window shutter, and let the dull daylight came in, white and almost blinding.

"I wish you to see me very plainly," she remarked, "and to talk to you. Mark them well. Tell me if they look soft and yielding."

Lily did mark them. She was too frightened to say what she thought, but to her mind those eyes were gray, hard, baleful, merciless.

"I am your schoolmistress," went on Madem oiselle. "You are not to be here to be taught, and to be punished if you misconduct yourself. Here you will be taught nothing, and punished if you had no more idea of uttering a word than of dancing a gavotte, or setting the house on fire. "The fact is, you are to learn must be to hold your tongue."

"This is the last time," she pursued, "that I shall speak to you in English. You had better forget that I ever addressed you in that tongue. I shall address you in French when I think you have been long enough here to comprehend me, and if you do not understand you will be punished. What do you know? I mean, what lessons do you know there in England?"

With much blushing and faltering Lily went over the whole round of her book-learning. Mademoiselle Marcassin heard her in contemptuous silence.

"As ignorant as a squirrel," she resumed, when the child had done, "and, I dare say, quite as restless and troublesome. Here you will be industrious as well as tamed. We can not begin too soon."

She rang a bell, and in a few minutes—rendered by Lily in a tremor bounding approximating to breathless terror—a low tap came to the door, and again, who looked, as to garb and demeanor, and again, who looked, as to garb and demeanor, and gold cross and all, a duplicate edition of Mademoiselle Marcassin, only she was somewhat younger, shorter, and stouter, came into the room.

"This," said the lady superior of the establishment, "is Mademoiselle Espremêl, the head governess. She will take you into the school-room and tell you your duties. In all things she is to be obeyed even as I am. Woe be to you if you are insubordinate. Now go."

And without another word she turned on her heel and disappeared. The lady addressed as Mademoiselle Espremêl took Lily's hand, and in an equal silence led her away.

They traversed the hall and another room, which was Mademoiselle Marcassin's private salle à manger, and then entered that all this part of the house, though it was bare and comfortless, was very stately and polished, and had a curious pervading odor of cold stones—for cold stones have an odor—and beeswax. But when the head governess pushed aside a green baize door, and they crossed a high walled graveled play-ground, they entered upon quite another region.

Every thing was barer, every thing more cheerless; every thing, moreover, had a squalid, frowning, prison-like aspect. From the moment Lily entered that house to the moment she left it she could not divest herself of the notion that she had done something, that she had committed some crime, and that she was in retribution for it, under the immediate auspices of Mademoiselle Marcassin and her subordinates.

There might have been twenty girls, between the ages of ten and fifteen, in the first white-washed school-room they entered. It was a frightful looking room, in sepulchral whiteness relieved only by the dingy black of the transverse desks, a big black stove in one corner, from which a blacker pipe crawled along the ceiling like a serpent, and a black board supported by a double frame—a kind of alphantine easel.

The girls looked as though they had done something, and were much disturbed in their minds in consequence. The teachers, however, of whom there were two present, seemed to be of a contrary opinion, and to hold that they had done nothing, and did not mean to do any thing, at least of what was good. For which reason they continuously girded at the twenty pupils.

"The first class," remarked Mademoiselle Espremêl, dryly, to Lily, as she marched her through. She made the observation in a tone similar to that which a female turnkey might use in pointing out the refractory ward.

A girl of twenty-three face and black hair could not resist the temptation, as Lily passed her, of pulling slyly at her dress, and making (in perfect safety, however, be it understood) a face at her. But the quick eye of the head governess caught the impudence in transit, and she was down on the merry one in a moment, like Thor's hammer.

"Five bad points for Mademoiselle Marygold," she exclaimed; and then, turning to the culprit, continued, "you are becoming a Rothschild in bad points. Beware of the day of reckoning."

Mademoiselle Marygold set up a whimper, as a governess whose hand was not to be hatcheted, that, when she bent over the girls at their writing lessons, they were apt to feel the backs of their necks, and to make sure that they were safe on their shoulders—chalked five crosses against the Marygoldian name on the black board. She had a tremendous balance of black marks already in her disfavor.

"The next room," said the head governess, as they entered another apartment, somewhat smaller than the first, but holding an equal number of school-girls.

None of the girls ventured beyond a quick and furtive moment of looking up as the two passed through. The door was a double one, and, apparently about eleven, with a very dirty face, the result of her having rubbed her countenance with her hands and the underside of her hair having mingled with the tears which streamed from her eyes. This young lady was on her knees in a corner by the door; and very uncomfortable in that attitude she seemed to be. There was reason enough for it, as she was standing on a square wooden ruler, the sharpest edge upward, specially provided for the mortification of her flesh. And, moreover, the poor young lady's head was decorated with an enormous fool's cap of gray paper, decorated at either side by lengthy bows or ears of blank crape, and which gave the poof little thing somewhat of the appearance of Mr. Punch in full mourning.

"Mademoiselle!" said the head governess, regarding this forlorn little personage with severe disdain.

"Again, Lucy? Then good night for the Prix Monthyon, truly. A pretty Resière, my faith! She is in penitence," she continued, turning to Lily, "She passes half her time in abject degradation."

Here a fresh burst of sobs came from the unhappy Mademoiselle Rose face, as it could not be much blacker, became absolutely fairer for the outbreak; for the tears traced little white channels for themselves in her cheeks till she scrubbed them all together in a muddy neutral tint. They left the luckless Niobe, and went into another school-room.

It was the largest of all, and there were perhaps fifty children in it. They were all very little girls—none of them older, and many younger, than Lily. Likewise there were no desks in this room, but rows of benches, and no seats for the governesses. And the forms on which the children sat were slightly raised one above the other, by a kind of amphitheatre.

"This is the third class, and you belong to it," said Mademoiselle Espremêl, with a slight yawn, as though tired of officiating as mistress of the ceremonies to this very insignificant guest. Mademoiselle Rouault, then, is the little one to be put sur le banc des petites. Her name is my faith! Madame forgot to tell me her name, but you will see it in good time."

This she said in French to the teacher. She continued in indifferent English to the child,

"What sort of knowledge have you?"

"Lily—Lily Floris, ma'am," answered the child, meekly.

"I ask you for your name of baptism, not your name of family," interposed Mademoiselle Espremêl, sharply. "There are half a dozen Lilies in the school," she added to her confidator, "and three in this class. That will never do. Never mind, Madame will find some other name to her. Elle n'est pas grand'chose—she is not of much account—I fancy." And, without waiting, Mademoiselle Rouault, and retired, leaving Lily trembling in the middle of the class.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY LIBRARY

Mademoiselle Hudault was not ill-natured, but she was overworked. Her eyes could not be ever where, consequently the child who was nearest her, and on whom her eyes most frequently lighted, had, habitually, rather a bad time of it; she was the scape-goat, and suffered for the sins of the rest of the forty. The forty were certainly enough to try the patience of Mademoiselle, or of any other mortal woman. Some of them were always going to sleep, and had to be shouted up into wakefulness. Others, who were day children, would creep on all fours to the corner where the baskets containing their dinners were deposited, abstract hunks of bread, bunches of grapes, or morsels of cold charcuterie—generally strung on the porcine corkscrew and essay to munch surreptitiously behind their books or slates. Then detection followed, and there was a disturbance, and the unfortunate provisions were seized, and Mademoiselle Hudault would threaten to confiscate "la totalité," or to give the whole of the class "en punition." Add to this the fact that the majority of the pupils who had lessons to get by heart were in the habit of repeating their tasks to themselves in a monotonous drone; that when a band of small disciples was called up for "repetition," there was sure to be a book lost, or a page in the essential part torn out; that Julie was always making complaints against Amanda for pinching her, and that the bitter lamentations of Natalie in consequence of Hortense having crammed her left ear full of slate pencil, were (all-high) incessant; that the atmosphere of the class-room was close almost to stifling point, and the odor exceedingly disagreeable; and that Mademoiselle Hudault's sole assistant in teaching and managing the forty girls was a depressed young person of sixteen, who was a little dull, and somewhat lame, and was understood to be maintained out of charity by Mademoiselle Marcassin, and it may be judged how far the misery of the class was overworked, and that her nightly couch was not a bed of roses.

Mademoiselle Hudault, who spoke no English, made signs to Lily to sit at the extremity of the form nearest the wall where the child crouched in half-listless, half-alarmed quiescence. The strange noise confused her, the heavy, drowsy smell stupefied her. She saw very vaguely and shaken by her journey; she had eaten nothing since the morning; the class-room began to swim round: then it settled into a murky haze, and she fell into a trance that was half sleeping and half swooning.

She roused to find herself in a little pallet-bed, in a long, low, hospital-like room, with whitewashed walls. On either side, as far as the eye could see, were more pallets, and ever against her, stretched in interminable perspective, a corresponding line of white, ghastly-looking couches.

There was somebody at her pillow. It was the merry young girl with the wavy dark hair, who had pulled her dress and made a face at her, and who had been apostrophized as Mademoiselle Marcassin. No sooner did Lily open her eyes than this young lady proceeded to kiss her on both cheeks with great heartiness, bidding her (in Lily's delight, in English, he still for a dear, and she would soon be well.

"You're English and I'm English," quoth the merry young lady, who spoke with extreme rapidity, as if to make up for lost time, and compensate for the many hours during which she was compelled to hold her tongue. "And Madame (that's Mademoiselle Marcassin), but we call her Madame, although she never been married, to distinguish her from the rest of the governesses, who are all old frumps, and Mademoiselles of course. We're both English, and as you can't speak a word of French yet, Madame says I'm to take care of you, and tell you things, and air you ride in the third class till you're able to get on by yourself. And oh! what fun to be in the third class, and I'm going on for fifteen, and I shall escape that horrible first class, with Mademoiselle Glacon—icicle's her name, and she's her nature—and Mademoiselle Esprémiél—we call her the hippopotamus—bothering us all day long, to say nothing of Madame; and then she comes the lovely airy a blow up. And now tell me all about yourself, my little darling. I'm seven years older than you; but we're the only two English girls in this jail of a place—and it is a jail, and worse than a jail—and we must be great cronies."

Here Miss Marygold paused, as it is to be apprehended, for want of matter than for want of breath, for she never had to go far for one.

"You weren't very well, and dozed off like; and you couldn't understand when Ma'mselle Hudault told you to wake up, and that's the box your ears if you didn't; Madame don't allow it, but Ma'mselle can't help her temper sometimes; and you were a cross old thing to the others, but she's always in a hurry, and that makes her hasty; and then one of the girls reminded Ma'mselle that you couldn't speak French, and another said you were ill, and then they threw water on the-and-water out of one of the day-girls' bottles) over your face, and you didn't wake up; and so, as you couldn't walk, you were carried to this bedroom, which is Dormitory Number Three, and the doctor came and said you would be very nicely after you had half some sleep and some soup, and I'm to sleep next to you; and, upon my word, here comes Annette with the soup, and it's as nasty as ever, I do declare!"

The plateful of soup which a bony female servant, with a tall white cap, and a yellow silk handkerchief crossed over her breast, brought to the bedside was certainly not nice. It was very hot and thick, but it had a sour shell.

"Beans, cabbages, and tallow," remarked Miss Marygold, in contemptuous disparagement of the potage. "That's what we're fed upon at the Pension Marcassin, with cold boiled horse and Vinegar-and-water to make up. Don't touch it, Lily, I beg of you. Not eating your soup is called rebellion here. Madame says that Atheists and Voltairians alone refuse to eat their soup. What, can't you eat it? Well, it must be awful somehow, and to keep things quiet and comfortable I'll eat it myself."

So which was presently proceeded to do, swallowing the nauseous compound in great gulps: but presently lowering its vigor, was to be eaten by Lily, and, indeed, the child needed but little persuasion, for, though her gorge rose at the soup, she was half famished with hunger.

"Annette's a good sort," went on Miss Marygold, when the soup was gone, with a grin of satisfaction at Lily's returning appetite, had departed, "and never tells tales. We should be short stayed with Annette. She'll bring bread-and-jam, for not half of us can eat the nasty messes they serve up in the refectory. I think the girls who have got money to spend, like me, buy things, and then she's a kind-hearted soul, and gives away out of her profits to the poor ones and the little ones."

Lily said that it was very kind of Annette, and emboldened by the kind mercy face of her companion, ventured to ask if she were long over time?

"Yes-time!" echoed Miss Marygold. "Bless you, my pet. You'll never see say tea here. Why, only princesses and duchesses drink tea in Paris. Coffee, Madame says, is the vice of a mouth, when the Abbé Fruthomme comes to catechise the girls, and prepare them for their first communion, and for confession, dear! I'm not, and Ma'mselle Espréménl says I'm a heretic, and Ma'mselle Glacon says that out of the pale of the Church there is no salvation, and the girls tease my life out, because I don't cross myself, and don't believe in purgatory; and when madame has company, Annette sets tables it with boiling orange-flower water, and puts rum into it, and hands round bonbons and chocolate drops, and all kinds of nasty things. Tea! You'd better forget all about tea. We have hot milk and bread in the morning, and dry vegetables, cheese, and wine (that's the vinegar-and-water I mean), at twelve; that's called breakfast number two; and at five o'clock we have half past now, and the clock was striking when Annette brought you the soup—we have that horrible soup at five o'clock. Supper's our soup that's worse, and some meat that's either half raw or half burnt, and potatoes messed up in all kinds of forms, and we have bread that's never fresh, and that's all till the next morning. Tea! Not if Madame knows it."

Miss Marygold paused again for respiration. Her lungs replenished with a fresh supply of oxygen, she resumed Lily's brief but sad history in her bed, soothed though fatigued, and with a smiling face upturned toward her companion: that her papa Miss Marygold's father Mortress called Polly; but that the diminutive in question was only made use of in England, and that here Mary Marygold was being compulsorily taught, and there being many Marie-Jeannes, Marie-Claudes, Marie-Françoises, and Marie-Louises in the school, she was compelled to answer to Mary-Gold, as though the one-half were her christian name, and the other her surname.

"And a poor neglected Marygold I am," she continued, shaking her wavy hair. "My father was left guardian to the children of a poor bookseller's shop at Exeter, down in Devonshire, you know; but he failed in business. He was what you call bankrupt, and he failed business-and-sixpence in the pound. And then we came over here: I and pa, and my little brother Joey. And Joey died in the Pension Marcassin a long ago. And he's buried in the Fosse Commune, the poor people's grave at the Montmartre Cemetery.

"All pa's money was gone," she went on, wiping her eyes, "and he couldn't get any work to do. And now he's a kind of parish clerk to an English chapel in the Champs Elysées, where they call it. But he'll get my darling; and he picks up a little by interpreting, and showing the museums and places to English visitors stopping at the Hôtel Bristol, where he has a hard job to get along! He placed me here at school as an articled pupil or three hundred francs a year, and it's as much as ever he can do to pay it: but I learn as much as ever I can, and I've been here two years and a half, and when my time's out, which will be in another eighteen months, I shall get a situation as governess and help pa, and we shall be very happy and comfortable. Dear old pa! I don't tell him how badly I'm treated here, for it would make him fret, and he'd quarrel with Madame, or take me away, and I don't know half enough yet, even to be a nursery governess, and it would be a dreadful thing."

Again she took breath.

"You see," she resumed, "I try to learn as much as ever I can, and they do certainly teach you a lot of things here, and Madame is awfully clever. They say that she's a little prig. She had been-ever-a Overdyke he had to be kept out of the sand-beds as if he were himself a pig, for in the garden he would go down on all fours, and grub among the growing vegetables with his projecting teeth. He relaxed also a brotherly regard for the whole race of pigs, and understood them so well that they would let him ride upon their backs. His pleasantest memories were incidents of his life among them as a child. This Clemens, who had a narrow head and a low forehead, was of imperfect intellect, though not an idiot. Given to laughter, and open to flattery and influence. He can be controllable fits of passion. Once, when he had tried to murder his brother-in-law with a woodcutter's axe that he held in his hand, he was carried away laughing to confinement.

The other wicked boy at the Overdyke asylum had learned to live as the beasts of the forest, only prowling about villages of nights to steal food. He climbed trees for eggs and birds, that he ate raw, and had extraordinary knowledge of birds and their habits. So each that he knew he gave a name of its own, and it is said that birds seemed to recognize the names he whistled after them.

Sir William Sleeman, in his narrative of journey through the kingdom of Oude, gives a very curious account of a boy, said to have been taken when running on all fours with the wolf and her three cubs. They were all seen coming down to the river to drink when the boy was caught. The wolves, left to themselves, are very numerous among the ravines which run down to the banks of the Goomtee River. They are wolf reserves, for the Hindoo belief, that a drop of wolf's blood spilt within the bounds of any village deems the village so destructive to cows as scarcely for wolf protection than a game law. The vagrants, with whom no conscience pleads for the protection of the wolves, are said to divide equally with them in depredation. Very young children go about with costly ornaments upon them. Wolves carry off and eat the children, but leave the ornaments untouched for refuse, and for the chance of finding these, the vagrants patronize the wolves, and are on visiting terms with them.

Getting more apocryphal as it proceeds, the narrative says that the wolves are said to be so easy that a he wolf always eats the children he gets, and so does a she wolf, except when she is sucking; in that case she shares with her own puppies stolen baby. Now as to the particular boy whom Sir William Sleeman found at Sultanpoor, and who was said to have been caught when travelling on all fours with the wolf foster-mother, and his three cubs of foster-brothers, to the river to drink. When first caught he had to be tied like a puppy not run off into holes and dens. He ran away from them, and, like a wild animal, snarling like a dog, to bite them. He ate his meat raw, like wolves, using his hands as forepaws; would let a dog share with him, but would growl at a human being who came near. He was sent to Captain Nicholetts, commanding the First Oude Local Infantry, with whom he became tamer; but he growled at all who passed, and he fed on all fours, and ate whatever was thrown to him, preferring raw meat and bones to gnaw. He could eat half a kid, and drink a large bowl of buffalo buttermilk without drawing breath, and would pick up and eat earth and small stones. He delighted in cold, but hated clothing. When the weather they gave him a quilt, but he tore it up and ate it bit by bit like bread. This he was of repulsive aspect; he shunned human society, preferring that of dogs, but when his favorite, a pariah dog that came and lived with him and his dinners, was shot because he was depriving the young foundling of his food, the boy showed no concern whatever at its loss. "The beast child," who was supposed to have been taken from the she wolf at nine or ten years old, lived three years among men, signifying wants by a few words, and showing affection limited to his mouth—and was never known to speak till a few minutes before his death, when he put his hand to his head and said it ached, asked for some water, drank it, and then died. These few words spoken before death would have been the return of an old childish impression.

Another of Sir William's stories is of a boy said to have been suckled by a wolf when seven years old, and while his parents were working in the fields at Chupra. Six years afterward he was caught in a mango grove on the river side, by a party of exile, and recognized by a birth-mark, as well as by the race of a scar, and the marks of the wolf's teeth in his loins; for she had been seen to take him and carry him off by his loins. This boy was alive at the time of Sir W. Sleeman's visit, but could not articulate words, his knees and elbows were hardened with going on all fours. He followed his mother about like a dog, he could get his food as he would make off to the jungle. He also liked his meat uncooked. The village boys threw frogs to him, and he ate them like a bullock did and its skin was taken off, he would go and eat it like a village dog.

The unproved fact, in the case of both these idiot boys, who had been outcasts in the woods, is the well-nursing. The nursing of wolf-reared is commonly attached in India to the outcast idiot children, who are sometimes found living, like the wolves, on the savages' food and prey.

In Poland the same belief once gave to such unhappy children a credit or discredit which placed them among the bears. Of one such boy, caught two centuries ago in a bear hunt, it is said that he appeared to be eight or nine years old, went on all fours, and ate greedily such things as bears love—raw flesh, apples, and honey. He was taken to the king of Poland and baptized as Stephen. With difficulty he was taught to walk upright. He never could learn English, but expressed his views of life with an ursine growl. The king gave him to a vice-chamberlain, who employed him to carry wood for his kitchen. He never had much wildness, and sometimes escaped into the woods, where the bears never molested him.

Such stories are not more credible, though more honestly set forth, than that of the Irish boy exhibited at Amsterdam, as having been reared by a sheep, so that he ran upon all fours, cropped grass, and bleated.

GENERAL HOSPITAL, CENTRAL OFFICE.

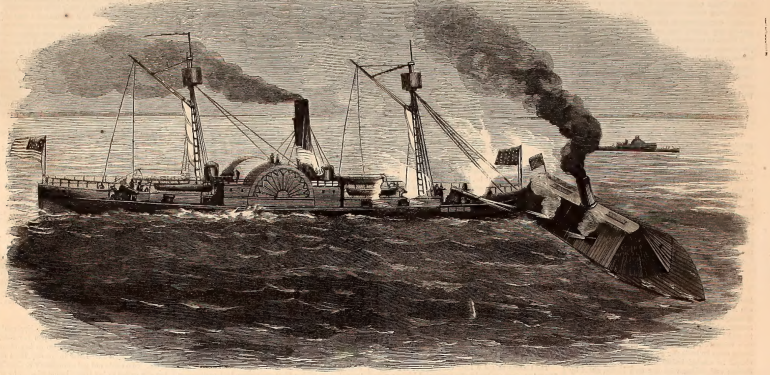
SHERMAN'S DEPARTMENT—ENGAGEMENT AT SNAKE CREEK GAP, GEORGIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 355.]

THE WAR IN GEORGIA.

WE give on this page two illustrations of recent events in Georgia, sketched on the spot by our artist, THEODORE R. DAVIS. The capture of Dug Gap by General GEARY'S Division of HOOKER'S Corps was an achievement worthy of the veterans who had already earned renown by their bravery at Mission Ridge. The assault was made on the 8th instant. Ridge after ridge was carried by the fearless veterans, who climbed the perpendicular crags with steady feet, often crossing rocky gorges where a single false step would have been instantly fatal, and at last swept the enemy from the heights as so much chaff. Mr. DAVIS writes: "Captain BARTLETTE, commanding a storming party of the Thirty-third New Jersey, was killed on the last crest. The Thirty-third behaved with splendid valor. Our loss was 220 killed and wounded. Some of our troops, after they had actually climbed the last ridge to the crest of the palisade formation, were hurled from the top by the rebels, who, instead of taking them prisoners, preferred to mangle the brave boys among the rocks beneath. The place was defended by STEVENSON'S Rebel Division. Colonel CLARK, of the 145th New York, was among those thrown from the top." For an account of the engagement at Snake Creek Gap see news page.

SHERMAN'S DEPARTMENT—GENERAL GEARY'S ASSAULT ON DUG GAP, GEORGIA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE NAVAL FIGHT IN ALBEMARLE SOUND.

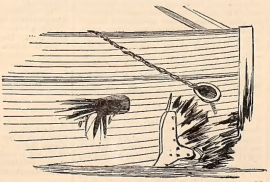


THE STEAMSHIP "SASSACUS" RAMMING THE REBEL RAM "ALBEMARLE."

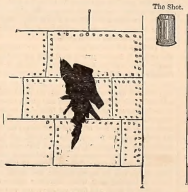
We give on this page a sketch of the engagement in Albemarle Sound, North Carolina, on the 5th inst., between the United States steamer Sassacus and the rebel ram Albemarle. Our correspondent on board the Sassacus, in sending the sketch, says: "No better opportunity than was here presented could have been desired for testing and deciding the mooted point as to the possibility of injuring an iron-clad by ramming with a wooden ship. The engagement may be briefly described as follows:

"The Mattabesett senior ship, being in advance, had commenced a circle of which the ram should be the centre, while we at a short distance followed in her wake. The Bombshell, a consort of the ram, was rendering him every assistance by a constant fire upon us; and though the design of running down the iron-clad was fully formed, we turned for a moment to the weaker vessel, and delivered a fire which brought the flag down and the officers and crew to their feet, frantically waving white handkerchiefs and shirts in token of surrender. Turning from the Bombshell, and being then about three hundred yards distant from the ram, we started for him at full speed, striking him fair and square, caressing him over so that the water swept his decks, receiving the raking fire from his guns, and soaring into him the contents of the whole of our forward battery almost at the same moment. The instant he had perceived our intention he endeavored to avoid us by putting on all steam and going ahead, so that after we struck his forward motion gradually laid us almost alongside, our guns meeting his, muzzle to muzzle.

"At this juncture a shot pierced our boiler, and in an instant every thing was enveloped in scalding steam. So dense was the cloud that objects were shrouded and invisible at the distance of a rod. The roar of our guns, the crack of musketry, the screams of the scalded and dying now commingled to make the scene most appalling; yet in the midst of all our men stood firm, and, with a heroism never surpassed, continued to pour a deadly fire of solid shot into his very ports, our riflemen coolly seeking every chance to pick off the enemy at their stations, and our look-outs aloft throwing hand-grenades through his gratings, until, after twelve long minutes, our engines working upon a vacuum and beyond control, we slowly but definitely drifted out of range. As we separated the muzzles of both his guns were seen to be broken off; yet for an hour the fire was continued upon him from the other vessels of our fleet till the darkness became too great, and, cruel failure and defeated, he sought refuge in the river from which he had so vaunt ingly sallied. Beyond the displacement of our stem this ship was not injured by the collision, nor was she made to leak in the slightest degree. We struck at a speed of about eleven knots. We are entirely satisfied as to the ramming qualities of our ship."



APPEARANCE OF BOW AFTER THE BATTLE.

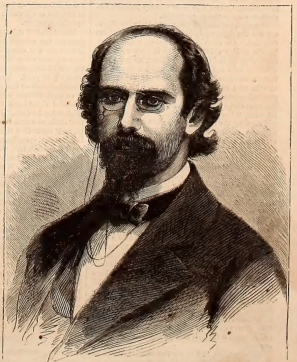


EXIT OF SHOT FROM BOILER. ENTRANCE OF SHOT IN BOILER.

REBEL RAM.

THE following extract from a correspondent on the United States ship William Badger, off Beaufort, North Carolina, explains the illustration on this page of the REBEL RAM AT WILMINGTON: "One of the rams that have been so long building at Wilmington, by the rebels, to annihilate the entire Yankee blockading squadron off that harbor, has lately made her 'first appearance' among our vessels, but signally failed to go through with the modest part assigned her by the over-confident Confederates. She was compelled to retreat inside the rebel fortifications, from behind which she takes an occasional peep at the 'Lincum gun-boats' in the distance, and makes a display of three formidable horns, designed to tickle the ribs of our wooden vessels so very unpleasantly. If they should undertake another such rampage the fleet is determined to capture or destroy them. They have three rams in all, but we have a heavy force to oppose them. Probably a few doses of 9-inch Union pills dropped down the smoke-stack may operate rather disastrously, and afford a few months' employment to the mechanics of Wilmington—if they should ever get back there.

REBEL RAM AT WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.



JOSEPH HOWARD, JUN., THE FORGER.

GENERAL TORBERT CAUSES THE

"We have at present on board this vessel (Badger) the officers, crew, and some passengers of the blockade-runner Stranger, ex Shandy, captured by the U. S. steamer Kansas on Sunday, the 15th May, with a cargo of cotton from Wilmington. The way the ram is fast aground in the harbor, and efforts to pull her off have been unsuccessful."

JOSEPH HOWARD.

WE give on page 365 a portrait, from a photograph by Mr. CHARLES H. WILLIAMSON, Brooklyn, of JOSEPH HOWARD, JUN., whose name has been brought prominently before the country in connection with the forged Proclamation which was last week palmed upon the public through the columns of two New York daily papers. The history of the case is already known, and it is only necessary to say here that Mr. HOWARD'S action was in the last degree inhuman and dishonorable. Mr. HOWARD is yet a young man, and has been connected for some years with the press, holding at the time he committed the forgery which sent him to Sing Sing the position of city editor on a Brooklyn journal.

WIDOWED IN THE WILDS.

IT is now many years since I accompanied my husband, a missionary, into the wilds of South African Africa. At length we reached our station in Namaqua Land. When I saw the wild savages among whom and with whom we must henceforth live to sink; but the goodness of our purpose upheld me; moreover, there was little time for fears, for a house must be built ere we could live in it, and the chapel be erected before we could commence our duties; and toiling with our own hands, aided by our guide and driver, who remained for a while to help us, we at length completed both.

It was a day I shall ever when we heard the little bell ring out over the creek, summoning their inmates to the chapel, at one end of which my husband was to instruct the men; while at the other I should try to instil into these rude wild women the womanly and wifely virtues; and though for a time these efforts were not by any means fruitful, and my husband's services were more frequently sought as a rain-maker or witch-finder than in any other capacity, we ultimately saw our endeavors unveiled, and we won their respect and confidence, and, as we hoped, in one or two cases, something more.

Thus passed nearly three years; and though to the world our life at that remote mission station might seem desolate and dreary, it was in reality full of interest, and cheered by the daily increasing hope that we had planted the germs of the religion and civilization which would spread and bear much fruit.

Such were our prospects, when one day we learned that the great chief Luto, beneath whose protection we lived, was taken ill, and we resolved to visit him; more especially as, like most missionaries, my husband possessed some medical skill. The chief's kraal was scarcely five miles from the station, and we started early, to avoid the heat of the tropical sun; but we had hardly traversed half the distance when a dead silence, as of expectation, broke the intense stillness of the wilderness, increasing as we advanced, until it swelled into a succession of wild cries and fearful shrieks. Ignorant as whether this might not be the form of mourning for one so exalted as Luto, we hastened on, though, when we reached the spot, it was with fear that we could force our way through the thick belt of terrified-looking Caffres who were eagerly pressing forward to witness the scene within.

At length we reached the front; but very different was the view we looked on to what we had anticipated. On one side, stretched on a dingy mat, lay the mighty chief whose will was law over hundreds of miles and thousands of lives, writhing and writhing with neuralgic pains, and his stern countenance disclosed by suffering. But his eyes glowed with rage as he caught sight of me, with a deep guttural intonation: "I am bewitched—an evil-eye has been cast upon me. However," he added, with set teeth, "I will be punishing him."

Following the direction of the chief's outstretched finger, our horrified and astonished eyes fell on the form of a Caffre bound hand and foot while writhing, and pinioned to the ground; while two others, wearing the filthy decorations of witch-doctors, were busily engaged in breaking and spreading over the uncovered chest of the wretched man nests of the fierce red ants whose formidable mouths and deadly torture—each fresh application of which drew forth a new burst of agony from the sufferer, and elicited another fiend-like triumph from the chief Luto.

But mingled with our horror at the scene was the feeling that the victim of this fearful superstition must at once be rescued. It was obviously a difficult task, for the prosecutor was likewise the judge, but it must nevertheless be achieved; and I, as in due respect, in consideration of his sovereignty, but eagerly, earnestly, entreatingly, as if we had been petitioning for our own lives, we besought the chief to release his tribesman. The answer was an abrupt negative. But in such a case, and with those frightful cries ringing in our ears, we were not to be deterred; and more zealously, more anxiously than ever, and with many assurances that health and sickness were in a Higher Hand, we preferred our suit.

At length, wearied of our importunity, the chief uttered the emphatic denial no Caffre ever rescinds. That door of hope was closed. But it was impossible for us, the servants of religion, civilization, and humanity, to stand idly by and witness such a sacrifice; and though well knowing he incurred much peril by braving the despot's will, my husband sprang to his feet, and snatching an ostrich-feather fan from one of the chief's attendants, bounded with it across the area, and pushing aside the conjurers, swept with a rapid hand the ants from the tortured man; then cutting the detaining withes, he assisted him to rise.

So sudden and unexpected was this act that Luto and his great men seemed almost paralyzed by its temerity, while my heart trembled with fear as to its consequences. Another moment, and the chief recovered himself, and catching up an assagai, which lay beside him, ere I could interpose, hurled it, with a fierce Caffre denunciation, full at the devoted missionary.

To this day I seem to hear the whir of the swift weapon, as its long slender shaft quivered through the air; to see the gleaming steel of the barbed head, as it entered the side of my beloved husband, and struck him down on the very spot from which he had just rescued an innocent victim.

With a cry of anguish I rushed to his side, while the entire Caffre concourse was stirred by howls and deafening yells, whose meaning I did not seek to learn. My whole heart was filled with the husband moaning in, it might be, his death-agony, as I knelt beside him, and tore my dress in shreds to stanch the wounds through which the life-blood was welling. Meanwhile, louder and higher swelled the tumult around me, until it broke on my sorrow with a tenfold fear lest they were executing the punishment of their unfinished deed, which alone and friendless among their savage enemies I could not expect to resist. At length a step approached me, and involuntarily I clasped my beloved one closer, as if that could avert his fate.

But the voice which addressed me was a friendly one—that of Keemer, the most promising of our little flock; and he came to bring me the welcome intelligence from the chief to be at my wounded husband back to the station, to which was added an imperative command to return to Luto's kraal on the following day, and no longer trouble his. A few other friendly Caffres followed, and between them the missionary was borne carefully home. That night, however, he died.

The Caffres raised a lofty cairn of stones, which formed at once my husband's tomb and his security from the wandering beasts of prey; but ere it was finished a messenger arrived from the chief Luto. "It the Caffre law," he sent word, "the widow and children of a slain man become the property of his conqueror, therefore my child is my wife." But he would be merciful to me; and if I and mine left his territory at once we might go free."

I had neither wish nor power for our transport, and at first it seemed that I must take my little one in my arms, and go forth alone to encounter the horrors of the wilderness for her sake. But Keemer did not desert me in this strait. The only pack-ox we possessed was devoted to my use, and he, his wife, and two of their children, with myself and my child, made up the party. At early dawn we mounted our pack-ox, and headed on our solitary way, over hill and dale, and precipitous passes, where a single false step would have been destruction; through thick, thorny jungles, which tore us as we passed, and across vast plains of burning sand, where there was neither tree to shelter us from the fiery sun-rays, nor water to allay our consuming thirst. Sometimes for days at a time of hunger, and heat, and weariness, until darkness brought our anxious journey to a close.

We had crossed about half of Caffreland when, one night, the ox on which my child and I had hitherto ridden fell down dead, having contracted on the flat was killed by a hyena. This was a serious disaster, and Keemer was greatly troubled at the thought that, having lost our only conveyance, another, I must henceforth travel on foot. But I had suffered too many great afflictions to have much care for small ones; and folding my child in my cloak and blanket, which had formed alike our saddle and bed, I trod diligently on beside the faithful Caffre, who, in addition to his wife and children, had now to look upon his shoulder.

That thought I dismay bust, it soon appeared our progress was reduced one half; and so weary did I grow with this unusual exertion, that more than once we were compelled to halt for a half-day's rest. On one of these occasions we had camped beside a large ely, or pond. The day was intensely hot and oppressive, and we had reposed in the scanty shadow of an aged mimosa, when suddenly we perceived an extended cloud-bank showing darkly against the bright-blue horizon. Instantly Keemer, who was expect mode us watch its coming, as, advancing rapidly, as if borne on a strong wind, it swept along the distant sky, spreading and increasing as it proceeded, until it covered half the heavens with inky blackness, and seemed near enough to be heard in its furious tempest. When it reached the zenith it began rapidly to descend, emitting a strange crackling sound; and in another moment, above infinite astonishment and consternation, like a great hailstorm, a vast swarm of locusts came rushing down upon us, whirling, whizzing, and darkening all in a blinding and bewildering mass, until they lay three or four thick upon the ground.

Not a spot remained uncovered by them. Far as the eye could reach across the level prairie nothing was visible but the dark-brown mass of the insect brown and green armor of the aerial legions, as they battled bircely, and ate voraciously every leaf, and leaf, and blade of grass, which escaped them. Even the arums on the borders of the pond, and the blue and white lotus flowers floating on its surface, were hidden beneath their straggling clusters, while the feathery foliage above our heads drooped and trembled under the universal pest.

Small as were the ravagers, it was a fearful sight; and yesterday's smiling verdure around us was now scarcely an hour after, when the living cloud rose to seek fresh pastures, and we looked on the desolation it had left behind—the denuded shrubs, the skeleton-like trees, and the long stretches of bare brown earth, which that morning had been green and glowing with verdure and flowers.

If any thing could have increased our horror at the scene it was the knowledge that our path lay through this new-made desert, and that, however full of weight and peril, we could in no way escape it, since the same dire destroyer had passed both east and west; while at the same time we knew that its kraals would immediately be forsaken, and the game would flee where pasture could be found, and that consequently no food would be obtainable. The only course open to us was to press on indefatigably, and trust to Providence to bring us to the fertile country which should be our home.

Could we escape the desert there might be hope; and making an almost superhuman effort, for my child's sake, I again dragged on, upheld by the determent by the low wailing cries which now and then broke from my suffering treasure. At length even Keemer's courage could strive no longer, and in utter exhaustion, and, as it seemed, sick unto death, I sank upon the ground, with scarcely strength left to entreat my sorrowful companion to leave me to my inevitable fate, and endeavor to save my child.

It seemed as if the Caffre even understood me, for he stretched out his wearied arms, and a few tears rolled down the infant cheeks, withered and dried by the fierce heat. But Keemer laid him by my side I felt with a pang that his short race was run, and that he too was about to tread the dark journey. By an effort I gathered him in my feeble arms. My last tie to earth seemed broken; and trying to forget the fierce pains of that miserable desert death, I prayerfully awaited its coming. At length my little one's moans and my own intolerable agony commanded his hour and mine alike had come, and with, as I believed, my expiring breath, I murmured for him and me the same words of faith and hope with which my husband breathed his grave of the beloved husband we were now about to join.

For a few hundred thousandth time was the axiom verified that man's extremity is God's opportunity; for when hope was past and life was almost gone from us, we were discovered bound into Luto's kraal, and, coming to the devastated district, had left his wagon on its edge some twenty miles distant, and travelling with a few attendants about the same extent, had providentially encountered us just in time to save us from the privations we had suffered with him. Every kindness was lavished on us by this good Samaritan; and as soon as we were equal to the journey Keemer returned with us to the colony, where Keemer accompanied us, and where he has ever since remained, valued by me as the friend in my greatest need, and generally respected as a most efficient teacher of the Caffres within the colony. But neither time nor resignation can soften the unavailing remembrance of the sorrows and sufferings attending my widowhood in the wilds.

MELTED.

"LOVE him? Of course not. Marry him? I should as soon think of marrying the King of the Cannibal Islands with their grand equipage." Thus my dear Dora Deane, your friend St. George Endlov (I wonder where he got his name) hasn't any designs on me, nor I on him."

"Fie, Constance, to call St. George Endlow King of the Cannibal Islands! He's the very handsomest man of my acquaintance."

"Precisely, and of mine—an exquisite of the first water, the prince of dandies."

"He's not a dandy, Constance mine. I don't believe you think so either. St. George a dandy! He doesn't help himself to scent more than you, Constance Sutherland can. But dandy! You'll find he is not that, Miss Constance."

"Shall I? Well, dear, I've no interest in the matter, I'm sure; but I never saw a handsome man yet that wasn't a dandy to his very heart's core."

"Poor Endlow! He is all over with him so far as you are concerned. You're a very prejudiced personage, Constance Sutherland."

Dora Deane and Constance, as a waltz on somebody's arm, and Constance Sutherland remained, had left me by the droped curtains of the window at which she sat.

"Proud, unapproachable, and peerless!" was what the world of Constance, queen in right of her beauty of all the gay circles which she frequented; but a somewhat scornful queen, since she seemed utterly indifferent to the homage she received, and rarely melted enough from her hauteur to be conversational, except with a select few. A beautiful proud girl, men declared and was said to be unsuspected herself, a great deal; but a woman with a heart and an intellect, a woman worth winning, a woman who could be melted and made tender and divine, if human creatures can be so, and in Love's vocabulary the possibility is certainly much talked of.

Just outside the window at which Constance sat, and hidden from her view by an immense flowering shrub that stood there, sat during the whole of the preceding conversation St. George Endlow. As Dorcas had guessed, he was at first, and a very natural feeling had made him shrink from changing his position afterward, lest Constance should see him and think he had heard her unpleasant comments upon himself. Besides, he said to himself, listening, that it would be but a right thing for him, even under such questionable circumstances as these. He was sitting there still, unable to quit his post for fear of overhearing him, when a fine gentleman, Constance's brother, joined her, and he had the pleasure of hearing himself under discussion again, somewhat to this effect:

"Mr. Endlow turned soldier—it must be a mistake!" exclaimed Constance; "dapper gentlemen are misformed, and dapper men as he is are not likely to risk spoiling their beauty by exposing it to hazard or active service."

Constance's brother rose very soon and left her, half angry, half laughing at her prejudice against "Endlow." St. George sat a moment, the bold blood rising to his very temples. If it had been a man who had spoken thus of him he would have known how to answer him in a manner to seal his lips forever after on that subject. Being a woman, and that woman Constance Sutherland, he rose presently, and passing from the shadow of the shrub, stood before her, his splendid eyes making vain endeavors to subdue their flash as he said,

"If Miss Constance will permit me I should like to thank her for her magnanimous expression of herself concerning one whom she supposed not present, and therefore unable to defend himself."

Constance's cheek grew vivid color flooding her naturally tranquil face. She blushed with shame to the very tips of her delicate fingers, and stood too confused to retort even a reproach for the part he had played of listener. Never had she looked so beautiful in the eyes of St. George, but he only compressed his lips, and was turning on his heel when she lifted her hand with a gesture half haughty, half appealing, saying, in a low voice,

"I beg your pardon, Sir. Nothing could justify the language I have used concerning you."

He did not speak at once or touch the hand she extended to him. But presently he took it in his own, and with a vicelike pressure, saying, in a rapid undertone,

"Give me a chance to possess this hand, to deserve it as mine, and you will soon say, 'Why?'"

"That were impossible," retorted Constance, instantly growing white and standing haughtily erect.

"Why? Do possess or deserve?" questioned St. George, calm again.

"Either." And she vanished from the window.

"Pity about St. George Endlow, isn't it, Con?" said young Sutherland, lounging in his sister's sitting-room morning some months after. "Oh. I forgot; you never liked him. Splendid fellow though. Rode in the Crimea, fought his way up, and died at the head of the brave boys he was leading."

"Died!"

It was all Constance Sutherland's lips could utter; and then, with her hand upon her side, she went slowly out of the room, up to her chamber, and shut herself in. Later in the day Dora Deane came. She could not get admittance to Constance, and went away in the extacies. Constance is ill, said it just; she was a thoughtless girl.

Ill she was. St. George Endlow is badly wounded. Hadn't you better go down and nurse him, Constance?"

The thought swung open, and Constance stood upon the threshold saying, "Wounded? Fred said dead."

"Oh! I believe that was the first report; but it's contradicted. Fred says, said, Lightly."

The next train took Constance Sutherland toward the battle-field. I doubt if she knew herself, in the agonies of his death scene, that it was St. George Endlow.

She found him. It was long enough first—an agony of suspense—and there was a frightful gash across the broad white forehead that had been "too handsome."

He needed her long before she reached him, and did not know her when she came. But he lived to bless his life to her care, to love her with a fond tenderness that in the old distance he had never dreamed of; and to receive at last from her trembling lips the confession that he was more to her than all the world besides.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same price as ordinary pens, and are superior to any. This is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System, for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, in every variety of all sizes, and may be had of the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail. All the great inventions sent by every part of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Gold Pen Trade can be obtained by agent or every part of the world, at the same price, postage only accepted.

Reader, you can have an ordering, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High-Price of Everything, you can afford to use a Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one, send "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," on receipt page.

SEWING MACHINE AND NEEDLES.

ALL KINDS AT BARTLETT'S, 647 BROADWAY, N. Y.

SELF-GUIDE FOR SEWING MACHINES. $1 by mail. NEEDLE SETTER WITH GUIDE. 75 cents by mail. BARTLETT'S Needle and Sewing Machine Depot, 647 Broadway, N. Y.

Cocoaine.

BERNETT'S COCOAINE kills dandruff, dresses the hair perfectly, and renders it soft and glossy. There are genuine imitations of which the public should beware. BERNETT'S PREPARATIONS go among the best class of people, and are pronounced incomparable.

$60 A MONTH! Wanted Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell the Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. 16 circulars sent Free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

EMPLOYMENT

AT your own homes. Thousands can realize a Hundred Dollars Weekly.—No stencils required except those found in every family. Any person can profits the next. Complete sa four. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage.

Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$125 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	40 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	18 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3500 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3500 Watch Keys	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Roman Studs	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
6000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
20000 Gold Pens, Silver M'tnd Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1: eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

(From Juries 9 and 40 at the International Exhibition, London, 1862),

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE AWARDED FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with 50 Receipts, to be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N.Y.

Enameled Chamber FURNITURE

The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, velvet and chestnut, plain and ornamental, in suits, wholesale and retail. Also Mattresses and Feather beds. WARREN WARD, 317 Canal St., N.Y.

DEMOREST'S ILLUSTRATED NEWS, every week, contains graphic illustrations of live subjects: also, pictures in color, new and popular music, supplemental sheets of fashions, entertaining literary matter, with other novel features. It is one of the most spicy ills issued weekly for publishers.—Home Journal.

Have you an Affection of the Heart?

Are your energies suddenly prostrated? Does continuous trouble you? Have you a cold, heavy feeling on one side of your head? Have you a pain in your side and at the pit of your stomach through to your back? Do you feel unequal to your daily avocations? Are you depressed by anxious fears, feeling as if some great calamity were going to overwhelm you? Is your appetite bad? Are your daily ejections intermixed with fecal matter as taken into the stomach—are they of a clay-like color? If all or any of these symptoms affect you, have recourse to BRANDRETH'S PILLS. They will not disappoint you, but will restore you to perfect health and the full enjoyment of all your faculties.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. Brandreth in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

Beautiful False Moustaches, 50 Cents and $1 a pair; sent free by mail. Send stamp for Circular. Address H. J. PHILO, Brooklyn, N. Y.

SOMETHING NEW IN PLATING CARDS. LOVE SCENES. Design from French Artists.

The above Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Enclose 50 cents and two red stamps, and send for sample pack. Liberal discount to Agents, Canvassers, and dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 69 Nassau St., New York.

DRUM PHUNNY PHOLKS and Sentrille Songs for 25 for our Common Schools. Do not fail to see No. 9 of the funniest sort of Phun, containing the most complete Budget of Conundrums, Wit, Humor, and Sentrilling Nonsense ever issued. Sold here, there, and everywhere. Price 10 cents. Descriptive Circulars free.

THE AMERICAN NEWS CO.

New Song Books.

OSMAN'S HARE. A collection of Comic and Sentimental Songs, expressly for Clubs (Nos. 1 and 2 bound and 3d, etc.), 25 cts. SURLING SONG BOOK, No. 3, containing New and Popular Songs, will have a permanent place in the collection of Nos. 1 and 2, many of which are not to be found in any other collection. Price 25 cents.

Sent, post-paid, by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Sunlight within my Heart, a gem of Song. Why I loved her. Faust March. I loved that gear old Song. Just out, 30 cents.

Musician's Omnibus. 700 tunes for flute, violin, or 2 fls. $3.

Complete Musician's Omnibus. A musical library of 1000 tunes for violin, flute, or flageolet. Mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

New Army Watches.

ARRANDALE & CO., Importers, 107 Broadway, New York, call attention to every description of Watches, manufactured in their new styles of Watches. Unusually liberal terms are offered to Agents. Circulars free.

DEMOREST'S NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED NEWS. —The live, spicy and most brilliantly illustrated paper in the country. Yearly, $4.00. Price, Demorest's Mirror of Fashions as a premium. Single copies 10 cents, mailed free on receipt of price, at No. 20 Beekman Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHIOS? If you will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) without injury, use Lyon's Kathairon. Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. KNOWLAM, No. 355 Broadway, New York.

U. S. Artificial Leg Depot, 658 Broadway, N. Y., Rochester, N. Y., Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where Government furnishes the U. S. Artificial Leg and Arm to Soldiers gratis, or its value applied on the Amputation Fee. Soldiers disabled in battle, who has Internal motion at the ankle like the natural one.

Descriptive Circulars FREE. Call or send for one.

For instructions address DR. BLY, at nearest Depot.

CARPET WAP.

WOOL TWINE.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine, or send stamp for Circular. Agents Wanted for $5, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, exercise, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the many subjects treated in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Piles, Liver and Kidney complaints, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Female System, Organic Derangement, Impotency, Seminal Weakness, Rupture, Bad Breath, Cancer, Epilepsy, Diseases of the Heart, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Throw Aside Spectacles, Marriage and Single Blessedness, Curious Marriage Customs of the World, Philosophy of Impressions, Physiognomy, Phrenology, Choice of Pets, the Married, and a thousand of value to married and single, never before in print. Altogether a curious book for curious people, and a good book for every one; 300 pages, 12mo, muslin, $1 00. Sent by mail. Agents. Contents tables sent free by mail to all applicants. Any person forwarding $1 will receive Free a copy of $1 50. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Great Chance to make Money!

$650.000 of WATCHES JEWELRY, &c., given away with our Stationery Prize Packets. Every Agent purchasing 100 Packets will receive Free a GENUINE SILVER WATCH. We also publish SPLENDID PRIZE EXHIBITIONS, by which $10 invested will yield $50. More money to be made selling our PACKETS and ENCLOSURES than in any other business. For particulars of SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS, send for New Circular.

G. S. HASKINS & CO., 26 & 28 Beekman St., N. Y.

The Steam-Engine Indicator and the Improved Manometer Steam and Vacuum Gauge; their utility and application. By Joseph Wetherill. Illustrated. 1 vol. 12mo, flexible cloth. Price $1. This day published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

U. S. 10-40 Bonds.

These Bonds are issued under the Act of Congress of March 9th, 1864, which provides that all Bonds issued under the Act SHALL BE REDEEMED IN COIN, at the pleasure of the Government, as very perfect not less than ten nor more than forty years from their date; and until their redemption FIVE PER CENT. INTEREST WILL BE PAID IN COIN, on Bonds of not over one hundred dollars annually and on all other Bonds semi-annually. The interest is payable on the first days of March and September in each year.

As three Bonds, by Act of Congress, are

Exempt from Municipal or State Taxation,

their value is increased from one to three per cent. per annum, according to the rate of tax levies in various parts of the country.

At the present rate of premium on gold they pay

Over Eight per Cent. Interest

in currency, and are of equal convenience as a permanent or temporary investment.

The authorized amount of this loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars.

Instructions to the National Banks acting as loan agents were not issued until March 16, but the amount of Bonds reported sold at the United States Treasury up to May 14th was $54,564,900.

Subscriptions will be received

By all National Banks

which are depositaries of Public money, and all

RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS

throughout the country (acting as agents of the National Depositary Banks), will furnish further information on application and

AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Body—Brain—Mind.

Health, its restoration and preservation. Choice of Pursuits.—What can I do Best? Can I succeed best as a Lawyer, Physician, or as a Clergyman? As a Merchant, Mechanic, or as Author? PHRENOLOGY will answer. See THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, only $2 a year. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For sale by the Adams Press Co., 30 Ann Street, N. Y. Circular free. Specimen Sheets 6d. cents.

Attention Company!

Clark's Onguent, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers and moustaches in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Any person using this Onguent, and finding it not as represented, by informing me of the fact, can have their money returned them at any time within 2 months from day of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed with post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the price.

A. C. CLARK,
P. O. Box 1715,
Albany, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED to sell the largest and most attractive line of FEMALE PACKAGES in the world, ten kinds. Old hands at the business will do well to try a sample box. Send a 6ct stamp for circular.

JOHN GIBSON, No. 32 Beekman St., N. Y.

DEMOREST'S NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED NEWS. —A weekly journal of beautiful and graphic illustrations, and a National and Family Newspaper in its most comprehensive sense, for news, entertainment, useful information and the Fashions. The Model Newspaper of America. Yearly, $4 00, with Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions for one year as a premium. Single copies 10 cts. Published at No. 20 Beekman street, New York city. Agents wanted. Do not fail to see it. Single copies mailed free on receipt of the price.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed Stitch. Price $1500.

Apply to DANIEL ADEE, 57 and 59 GREENE STREET, 389 Pearl St., N.Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR of FASHIONS.—A brilliant display of beautiful novelties, music, elegant fashion plates, and New Patterns, an Illustrated Braid Sheet, with much valuable information, only 25 cents; or yearly subscription, $2 50, with a premium of Dolbe's worth of Extra Patterns. Do not fail to subscribe immediately.

(Form of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest of the Mirror of Fashions: Send $1 00, and 2 cts. for postage on the premium, for which please send me your Mirror of Fashions one year, beginning with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—A splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustration, New Music, Beautiful Braid and Embroidery, and Seven Full Sheet Patterns. Ready MAY 20.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, SOLDIERS, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested, as a FAVOR, to send us their address, and we will send, in return, FREE, information for which they will be THANKFUL. We offer EXTRA INDUCEMENTS, and a SUM FOR SPARE MOMENTS EXPRESS. We want addresses from EVERY COUNTY in the U. S., and from EVERY CANTONMENT in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 97 William St., Box 2331, N. Y.

$12 WATCHES. $12

An elegant Watch, set in very heavy Silver Cases, of splendid finish, silver capped, ruby jewelled, fine English movements, pure white dial, and steel polished hands, presently presented as premium to all ordering.

THOS. AMES & CO., 599 Broadway, N. Y.
P. O. Box 5096.

Short-Hand without a Master,

By which the art of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, &c., may be attained in a few hours. Sixth edition, with a supplement, note, post-paid, on receipt of 50 cents. Address DAVID PARKER & CO., corner Ann and Nassau Streets, New York.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."

THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following Sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen: for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen: for 75 cents, the Mexican Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in sizes to numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 50, the Mexican Pen; and for $1 90, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridomin Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

MOUNTED AND WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident.

The Numbers indicate the quality: No. 1 being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Numbers 4, 5, 6, and 7, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are broad. Coarse Business points. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For $0 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 2 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 25 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 25, a No 6 Pen; $2 75 a No. 7 Pen; $3 25 a No. 8 Pen; $4 a No. 9 Pen; $5 No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME PENS, WITH SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $1 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK HOLDERS.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen; for $2 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 7 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 8 Pen; for $5 a No. 9 Pen; and for $8 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are gotten with the very best Iridosmin Points, selected, and every one of the quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

"The 3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to writing, Steel Pens; and Good Writing Qualities the only true considerations any Gold Pens made elsewhere. Each and every Gold Pen is warranted to be what is stated, that previous to opening its New and Patented Mechanism, he could not have made as Good Writing Gold Pens for, the price, and the Gold been furnished gratis.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or "Quality," "Number" and "Quality" of Pen wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk; and also the send twenty cents extra for registering, in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will guaranty their safe delivery.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium for the same rendered.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent will be allowed on sums of $15, of 15 per cent. on $20, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

Address,
A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

DR. B. C. PERRY'S DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York,

Formerly of 99 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free.

For particulars, address stamp for Circular.

$75 A MONTH.—Agents wanted to sell Sewing Machines. We will give a commission on all machines sold, or pay a salary of $75 per month and the above wages, and all expenses paid. Address,

B. B. SHERIDEN & CO., Detroit, Mich.

NEW VOCAL MUSIC.—"For the Dear Old Flag I Die." "Was my Brother in the Battle?" "Bury Me Not Where the Cold Winds Blow." "I will Wait Thee True." "Merry Little Birds are We," "If you've only got a Mother." "Lilies of the Valley for the Bride." "Old Friends were Here," and "She was all the World to Me." "Come Home to Mother." "Come Home Father." "Voice Singing," "Kindly Words and Smiling Faces," and "Hymn of the Wanderer." "Rock me to Sleep Mother." "Dying Drummer." "Weep no More for Lilly." "Katy and Kitty Kelly." "Come Home Father." "Come Home, Mother." "Dost Thou Ever Think of Me, Love," "Little Footsteps in the Hall." "Lilly Dale." "Sweet Genevieve," and "The Angels are Hovering Near."—Purchasers, "Dear Ones, I Shall Come Soon." "Little Children, Lullaby." "Lawrence.—Christ will Care for Mother Now."—Words all of which are accompanied by Piano Forte each. Mailed free. HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway.

U. S. G.—The new Song for the times, by Emmett, author of "Dixie's Land," published in the interest of Gen. Grant.

He's a brave fellow round, and as sure as you're alive, He'll die one more round White House door, in 1865. Price 30 cts. Sent by mail, post-paid.

WM. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway, N. Y.

Opera and Field-Glasses

Can see a man distance of 3 to 4 miles. Spectacles and Eyeglasses with French flint glasses. Microscopes of every description, from 25 cts. to $25. H. HUNT, Optician, 543 Broadway, cor. Prince St., up stairs. Wholesale and Retail. Send Stamp for Circular.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by United States troops, via ADAMS' UNITED EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutters charged low rates.

JEFF DAVIS. "Is dat you, BUTLER? is dat you?
Is dat you knockin' at my door?"

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.
MERCHANT MANUFACTURERS,
672 Broadway, Near 4th St., N. Y.,
Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine.
Send for Circular.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
31 & 33 Chatham & 26 Park Row,
Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

Do you want a good Magazine?
If so, subscribe to the

Atlantic Monthly

which is praised by literary journals in America and Europe as the best American Magazine ever published. It is thoroughly national in tone, and its literary character is the highest possible. The best American writers contribute regularly.

Terms $3 a year, postage paid by the publishers. Liberal reduction to clubs. A specimen copy sent on receipt of 15 cents. Address TICKNOR & FIELDS, 135 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Steel Shirt Collars, linen finished. Mailed on receipt of $1.50. C. ANDERSON, 78 Nassau St., N. Y.

WARD'S SHIRTS.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free every where.

STEEL COLLARS
ENAMELED WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years by preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.
Price $1.50 each; sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 90 cents.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. HARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

Something New.
Patent Army Pocket Pipe and Cigar Holder combined. It is self-cleaning, smokes cool, can not get out of order, is elegantly finished, and a superb luxury for all lovers of the weed. If you would enjoy the exquisite pleasure of a good smoke, send at once, and the order will be filled per return mail. Price per dozen, postage prepaid, $3 50. Address—
SHANNON & CO., 27 William Street, N. Y.

Keep it before the People, That Fish's Patent
GOOKING LAMP
Is the only article known with which you can cook
THREE ARTICLES OF FOOD
AT ONE TIME,
WITH ONE BURNER,
over a
COMMON KEROSENE LAMP
OR GAS BURNER,
and not cost to exceed
ONE CENT
to prepare a meal.
Manufactured by
THE KEROSENE LAMP HEATER CO.,
206 PEARL ST., NEW YORK.
Send for pamphlet and Price list. Address
WM. D. RUSSELL, Prest.

Don't buy your Gaiters or Shoes without Fogg's Patent Lever Buckle.
They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the straps. Dealers or manufacturers can employ this Cheap Currency, and I will mail sample of two patterns.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

A Chinese Preparation.
Warranted to force the hair on the smoothest face, or money refunded. Sent, postpaid, on the receipt of 50 cents. Address L. L. STONE, Albany, N. Y.

TROPICAL BALSAM
Prepared by Carmen Brothers and Co.
Is a certain cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Croup, Whooping Cough, Influenza, Pain in the Side, Back or Chest, and all Pulmonary Complaints. Its wonderful healing powers are known throughout the United States, and in many parts of Europe. Over 1,000,000 bottles have been distributed in this country, and not a case of Consumption has been reported where it was used. It is perfectly harmless, containing no opium in any form, and may be taken by the most delicate female or infant with perfect safety. Its taste is pleasant, and it is the most wonderfully successful remedy. Hosts of families in all parts of the country will certify that it is the only medicine that has benefited them in this country. Sold by all druggists. Price 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1 per bottle. Be sure to call for Carmen Brothers' Tropical Balsam, as some druggists, to make more profit, will offer other articles. Ask your druggist for it. Sold by all druggists in the United States, Canada, and Europe. Depot, 56 Maiden Lane, New York. Principal Office, 1 Bleecker Street, New York. Sold by WM. F. SHELLS, No. 8 Wall St., New York; and

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 389.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1864. [SIX DOLLARS PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

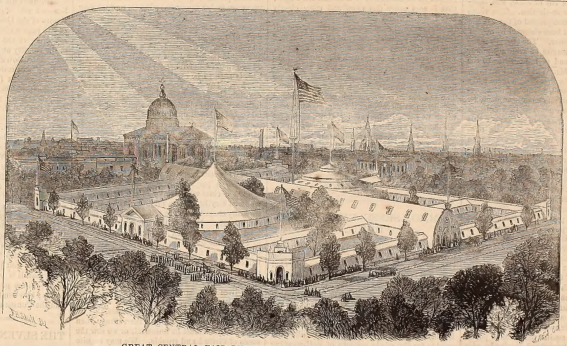
Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GREAT CENTRAL FAIR IN PHILADELPHIA.

We give herewith a view of the GREAT CENTRAL SANITARY FAIR BUILDINGS at Philadelphia, Pa. These buildings cover a space of four acres of ground on Logan Square and possess great architectural beauty. The Main Hall is over five hundred feet long and thirty feet wide, and is considered fireproof. Paintings valued at $500,000 will be exhibited in this Gallery. The FAIR, which opens the first week in June, will, it is believed, exceed in extent and results even the Metropolitan Fair held in this city. Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey will all contribute to the Exhibition, and all parts of the country will be more or less represented by characteristic productions. As indicative of the deep-seated loyalty which has distinguished Philadelphia from the very commencement of the rebellion, this Fair will have a historic significance.

During the continuance of the Fair a newspaper, called Our Daily Fare, will be published every morning, giving full reports of all current events, facts illustrative of the Sanitary movement, and original articles from some of our first writers. Contributions are also expected from well-known European authors. This paper will also contain a number of interesting documents by General Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Lafayette, William Penn, and other great men of our past, never before printed. Among other literary curiosities, a curious autobiographic letter, by the English novelist, Smollett, to an American, will be exhibited.

The heart of every soldier fighting in the field must be cheered by these efforts in their behalf.

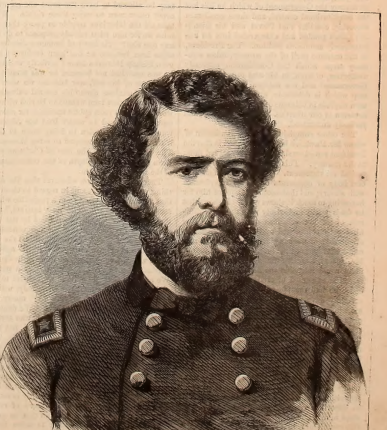


GREAT CENTRAL FAIR BUILDINGS, LOGAN SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.

GEN. GOUVERNEUR K. WARREN.

GENERAL GOUVERNEUR K. WARREN, whose portrait we give on the first page, is one of our ablest and most skillful officers, having demonstrated in all the positions he has occupied the highest qualifications for command. He is a native of New York, and entered West Point in 1846; and in July, 1850, was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He served acceptably in various positions until the outbreak of the rebellion, when his high soldierly qualities found vigorous employment in the field. Rapidly rising in the scale of promotion, he was in May, 1863, made a Major-General, and served in all the campaigns of the Army of the Potomac with distinguished bravery. Upon the reorganization of that army, in March last, he was promoted to the command of the Fifth Corps, which was strengthened by the consolidation with it of the three divisions of the First Corps. During the present campaign General WARREN has added to his high reputation by the most exalted courage. His corps was the first to be attacked in the battles of the Wilderness, and has sustained, heavy losses in every engagement, evincing the highest daring even in the face of overwhelming odds. No army ever had corps commanders superior to HANCOCK, SEDGWICK, BURNSIDE, and WARREN. On page 372 we give a sketch of the General rallying a body of faltering Marylanders in one of the engagements about Spottsylvania. He seized the colors of a regiment from the hands of a retiring Sergeant, and, carrying them himself, led the regiment back to its place in the line of battle in spite of a storm of shot and shell.

GENERAL GOUVERNEUR K. WARREN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



GENERAL HORATIO GATES WRIGHT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.—[SEE PAGE 374.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1864.

OUR WAR MAPS.

THE readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will find it for their advantage to preserve for constant reference the two elaborate and complete Maps of the Seat of War published in Number 317. Every important place and position is so carefully laid down in these Maps that the reader can trace upon them, from day to day, the movements of our armies under GRANT in Virginia and under SHERMAN in Georgia, and those of the enemy under LEE and JOHNSTON, opposed to them. They can thus gain a clear and intelligent view of the design and effect of the various movements and counter-movements of the belligerents.

THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

IT seems to be understood that the Baltimore Convention, on the 7th of June, will nominate MR. LINCOLN for re-election. The views which we have hitherto expressed of the wisdom of this course have not been changed by any of the events of the summer. The direct opposition against him, of the exercise of arbitrary power by the Copperheads, and of indifference to the Slavery question by MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS, seem to us to be, in the first case, a mere party clamor, and, in the second, a profound misapprehension. Summary arrests have been made by the Government, as in every war they must be made. The practical question is whether this power has been generally abused. That mistakes may have been made is to say that men are fallible; but that there has been a peculiarly dangerous exercise of this power, whether in the detail or in the intention, he is a very hardy man who would seriously affirm.

Of course we do not gravely combat the assertion that the President has menaced our liberties, and meant to menace them. There is a phrase in the western part of the State, applied to very difficult enterprises, that you might as well try to pull up Niagara at the tail. This is advice of exactly the proper dignity to be offered to gentlemen who, mindful of Junius and the pamphleteers, attempt to depict MR. LINCOLN as playing the part of CHARLES OF ENGLAND IN ART. The President's policy, if an English precedent must be found, is to be sought rather in that of WILLIAM THE THIRD, who established the British Constitution. Nor will the student forget that, while JAMES was the advocate of the divine right of kings, against the political economists of the people, the Copperhead gentlemen who decry the President are the champions of the privileges of rebellious slaveholders against the natural rights of man. It is enough to say that these indignant vindicators of civil rights against executive usurpation are the zealous politicians who repudiate the principle of the Declaration of Independence. JEFFERSON DAVIS, after an election in which he and his friends take part, attempts with them by force of arms to destroy the Government of which he has lost the constitutional control, and these gentlemen smoothly consider that DAVIS and his friends have been goaded and exasperated into an unfortunately erroneous position. The President, in the extreme peril of the country, takes summary steps which the Constitution expressly authorizes, or even, in his zeal to maintain the Government and the national welfare, takes a step which is debatable, and the same gentlemen exclaim in phrases of horror at the direct invasion of our liberties. It is a party cry, and perfectly understood.

The other complaint urged by gentlemen of whom MR. PHILLIPS is the spokesman is that the President considers slavery the only sacred thing in the country. This seems to us simply a ridiculous misstatement. But the very fact that one body of opponents decry his interference with slavery, and that another denounce him for hindering it, shows what? Actually that because he deals warily and wisely with the most difficult of all the questions of the war—neither hindered nor hastened by the sour exaggerations of one side, or the caustic taunts and bitter misrepresentations of the other. The argument of MR. PHILLIPS and his friends is, that if the President could set aside the habeas corpus, which is the most sacred of civil rights, as it is conceded he had the power to do, then he might certainly have abolished slavery, which is the most infamous of human wrongs. But the reply to this, which is so obvious that it would seem impossible for it to escape the attention of those who did not wish to avoid it, is plainly this: that both in the suspension of the writ and in any measure of emancipation the President must be controlled by his conviction of public approval. It is very clear that the public mind might be entirely ready for one step, when its opposition to the other might be so resolute as to imperil the very object for which alone both steps were to be taken. Indeed the fallacy of this complaint is that it requires of MR. LINCOLN to embody in his policy as President the views held by a few of the most advanced Abolitionists, when nobody can be clearer than that the views of these gentlemen are not those of the great mass of the American people. That those views are right, both as regards slavery and its relation to the war, we individually fully believe. That an enormous change toward their adoption has been made by the country, under the teaching of the war, is as evident as the progress of General GRANT toward Richmond. But that no policy is wise or practicable which is not supported by popular conviction, is the whole secret. While, therefore, it is the duty of every sincere citizen to influence public opinion by every means to can command, and it will take the simple, manly, American ground of fair play for all men, it is idle for him to denounce the Government for not taking for granted what it knows to be untrue.

The Government can not carry on this war by doing what it thinks to be abstractly right, but by doing all the right that is practicable. If we believed MR. LINCOLN were likely to be unable to see or unwilling to do that, we should oppose him as warmly as support him. But we thought that he lagged behind public sentiment we should feel that he retarded it. It is because we believe that the nation is heartily in earnest in its resolution to maintain the Union that it sees every day more and more clearly that Union without Liberty is impossible; that it will very soon establish the proposal, and ultimately the political, liberty of all innocent and capable citizens; and because MR. LINCOLN, with marvelous sagacity, with incorruptible honesty, and with entire devotion to the expression of this movement of the popular mind, that we hope to see him President for another term. The London Spectator, which has been calmly friendly to us throughout the war, says in words which we cordially approve: "How any honest Northerners who read these noble words (in the Kentucky letter), and see how modestly yet firmly MR. LINCOLN has acted on the lessons which have opened his eyes to the great Divine purpose of his war, can hesitate for a moment's opinion of any untried man for the next President, we find it hard indeed to conceive."

COMMON-SENSE VERSUS PREJUDICE.

IN the late meeting of the Methodist General Conference in Philadelphia the Rev. DR. MOORE is reported to have said that he believed God Almighty was going to give us an exodus of the whole colored concern to South America." And what exodus does the good Doctor think that the same Almighty has given to the whole colored concern, or the whole Irish concern, or the whole English or Scottish concern? Above all, what exodus for the whole concern of well-meaning but not very philosophical gentlemen who complacently theorize about the wholesale exportation of the less most valuable to any country, the laborers?

The man of African descent born in America is exactly the same natural rights here, as a man and a native, that the man of European or Asian descent has. All that he asks, and all that he can fairly claim, is that he shall have the same chance to develop himself as the white man. If he may be allowed to have the same chance with every other man to enjoy those rights. Why take all the laborious trouble to prove that we must do for him what we propose to do for any one else? He has had immense disadvantages here because he has been enslaved: but even Bishop HOPKINS has cheerfully said that he was enslaved not because he was unable to take care of himself, nor because we were so nervously anxious about his moral salvation, but because other men wanted to be rich without working. The most subtle apologist for slavery never quite dared to assert that the Africans would have been stolen by the hand of God if they had not been wanted to serve Mammon. The very urgency of the plea of Christianizing them only shows the depth of the consciousness of the wrong done them.

There is no question whatever that the only thing necessary at present in regard to the negro is that we shall remove from a prejudice which some of us amusingly call an "instinct," and that every man who has been freed by the war shall be protected against the consequences of that prejudice. The "instinct" against the African race is akin to the old "instinct" against the Jews, which was only the effect of ignorance, guished by men of sense with so fine a name. We are told that the colored men aspire to social and political equality. Certainly they do. Is nobody aware that they aspire to marry our sons and daughters! Do they? We demand the proof. We challenge any body who says so to name a single instance of the kind, so that he knows, but that he has ever heard of. The fact is, that they no more demand to marry us than we to marry them. Marriage is an affair of mutual inclination, and when there is a general mutual inclination to marriage between the people of different races they will do it. Until then they will not. Social equality is settled by individual taste, not by a theory of races. The people of African descent in this, as in all countries, leave that question to solve itself. Might we not, with advantage, emulate their wisdom?

But they aspire to political equality! Certainly they do. They would be very poor Americans if they did not. Surely, if an emigrant from the Isle of Skye, wretched, ignorant, drunken, degraded, utterly useless, or a nuisance and pest to the country, may justly aspire to political equality, as he does, the moment he sets foot upon our shore, it would be very difficult to show why a man native to the soil, half of whose blood may be the blood of the worthy MASON of Virginia, by inheritance, or the sober WHARTON of Texas, or the valorous TOOMBS of Georgia, and who is himself honest, industrious, and intelligent should not aspire? In a Government like ours we would as soon trust to the vote of FREDERICK DOUGLASS, for instance, as to our own, or to that of the last ship-load of emigrants from any nation in Europe. If you say that this is an exceptional case, we reply that it is no more exceptional, the numbers and circumstances considered, than any intelligent vote among the mass of voters. If you say that, however worthy an individual may be, yet that the general feeling against the class makes it unwise to do any thing toward enfranchising them, which is the ground of MR. DOOLITTLE, of MR. COWAN, and of MR. TEN EYCK in the Senate, you merely set out the existence of a prejudice makes it wise to yield to it; which may be true so far as say specific act is concerned, but which can never be true as regards the duty of resisting and exposing the prejudice. In other words, there may be a choice of evils. We would not have a law which is not supported by general conviction, for such a law, good or bad, is sure to be evaded and to bring the authority of law into contempt. But we would certainly, by as many means as possible, endeavor to influence public opinion to demand and to sustain any law based upon natural equity. There is undoubtedly a strong opposition to what is called negro suffrage. But that opposition is the sheerest possible prejudice. It is an opposition to the fundamental doctrine of our Government, its very genius, and to common-sense. It is an opposition springing from no "instinct," but from a prejudice which inevitably exists against a class which is the legal victim of an enforced servility, and a prejudice which is most carefully cherished by the most despicable partisan appeals. It is such an opposition as all kind must be accepted by every legislator and by every reasoner as a fact, it is still an opposition which no truly sensible and patriotic man will cease to endeavor to remove or disappears. Foolish themselves combat it, and we have yet to see whether the men who have heroically exposed their lives in the cause of the flag to same dangers then any other soldiers are to have less privilege under that flag than all others.

If indeed we mean to limit the suffrage then the conditions must be universal, or we sow the seeds of discord and trouble. We may require a stated intelligence, or a certain property, as a qualification. But we do, we must not presume against a candidate's satisfaction of the conditions because he is of one race, or country, or religion or party.

We are at war because we have refused to treat one class of our population as we concede that all men should be treated, namely, with perfectly fair play; and we shall be at war until we have conquered the "instinct" which denies to intelligence, moral worth, and industry that absolute equality which the law which we freely allow to ignorance, immorality, and degradation. May the good Providence upon which DR. MOORE relies grant us a sure and speedy exodus for "the whole concern" of such "instincts!"

THE LATEST PORTRAIT OF THE PRESIDENT.

UPON page 373 of this paper we present the latest portrait of the President of the United States. He is represented attended by his two secretaries, MR. NICOLAY seated by his side, and MR. HAY standing by the table. In his eastest, care-worn face, saddened by a solemn sense of the great responsibility which in God's Providence has devolved upon him, we see the man who said to his neighbors, as he left his home three years ago, that he was called to a graver task than any other President since WASHINGTON, and who whose simple faith and devotion bade him ask them to pray for him.

From that moment to this, through three years and more of storm, of beginning amidst clouds and darkness, and gradually emerging into a more cheerful light of hope and final success; through all possible perplexity of events, which have sometimes elated the bitterest enemies of the national life, and sometimes disheartened its most sanguine friends, the faith of the President has never wavered, nor his hand faltered. And now in the beginning of his last year of office, his policy fully declared, and the end of the Union, freed from foreign jealousies, united and resolved, under a military chief whom even the enemy fears and respects, the President contends a more than equal respect, a more thorough confidence among all faithful citizens at home and trusty friends abroad than any President since WASHINGTON.

Look thoughtfully at this rugged face. In its candor, its sagacity, its calmness, its steadiness and strength, there is especially expressed the distinctively American. The hardy, simple traits of the best American character are there. Turn then to the portrait of General GRANT in our paper of three weeks ago, and there you see another purely American face. There are the same homely honesty, capacity, and tenacity, the same utter freedom from every kind of cant and affectation, in each. It is to such men, one in the council, the other in the field, in every fibre, in every heart-beat, in every hope and thought and study, very intimate and quality, American, that the salvation of American institutions has been providentially intrusted. Children of the people both of them, sprung from the poorest and plainest ancestry, as unpretending and unselfish in their high places to-day as in the time when they were both unknown, they are men illustrative of some of the character of American civilization and of the American people. There is but one prayer in the great multitude of American hearts to-day, God bless President LINCOLN and General GRANT!

SENATOR POWELL'S CONSTITUTIONAL ANNUITY.

MR. SENATOR POWELL lately proposed in the senate a vote of censure upon the executive authority of the Government, in closing the offices of two papers which had been made vehicles of the purpose of the President's name to the peril of the country at a most critical moment in the war. MR. POWELL called the act a "violation of the Constitution." But a violation has no formal respect for the Constitution? In the Thirty-sixth Congress, when we were not at war, there was a simple proposition to guarantee free speech in the Southern States. The right of free speech in peace being an express provision of the Constitution, and MR. SENATOR POWELL saved No. 1. But he had voted against a bill by jury he could not more fully have disdained the Constitution. We can assure the Senator that he took no more by it than he deserved. No one who has watched his course can have the least doubt that in his view nothing is more constitutional than a rebellion to overthrow the Government; and he must be an extraordinary man who believes that the Constitution of the United States would be safer if confided to the interpretation of MR. SENATOR POWELL and his friends VALLANDIGHAM, COX, and FERNANDO WOOD, with the assistance of the papers that published the Richmond Enquirer only, than it is in the hands of the Administration. These gentlemen are the friends of the rebels; how can they be the friends of the Union and the Constitution?

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT, THEN AND NOW.

WHEN the rebel conspiracy was ripening there was entire confidence upon the part of the leaders that the city of New York would stand by them. They counted especially upon the Seventh Regiment. It was the military representation of the fashion and capital of the city, and there could, in their estimation, be no doubt of the course it would take. Little gentlemanly sops were administered to make every thing pleasant. There was a removal of the remains of MAJOR ANDERSON to Woodlawn. The Sixth Regiment was the escort. There was a dedication of a WASHINGTON Monument in Washington, when a Virginian was the orator and the Seventh was the guard of honor. It would be a very pleasant beginning, it was thought, to have so pretty a regiment ready drilled to serve the secession Convention.

The Convention began its sessions in Charleston and Baltimore, and while the news of the massacre of loyal citizens in the latter city was trending along the wire, the Seventh Regiment, with ranks fuller than ever before, was marching down Broadway through the same applauding crowd that it now be forgotten. THEODORE WINTHROP, who had joined it during the week, wrote the sparkling story of its march to Washington. But so soon as the conviction of the southern rebels that the regiment would be true to them and false to the country and Government, that it was a friend who was in Baltimore at the time told his host the news of their arrival in Washington, he refused to believe it, and insisted that it could not be. Indeed the prompt movement and fighting front of this regiment was one of the decisive events of the war. It was the first shattering blow to the delusion that party spirits was strongest in the free States than patriotism. And to the moral effect of its action the historian will add that it has furnished some of the noblest and most efficient officers of the army.

We have been recently reminded of the brilliant record of the Seventh Regiment during the war by a characteristic sneer in the Richmond Examiner. General SHALER, who was captured by the rebels with General STARVATION at the battle of the Wilderness, was formerly Major of the Seventh Regiment. The rebel paper speaks of the prisoners as follows:

"The two worthies are named SHALER and STURGIS; the former has visited Richmond before in his capacity as Captain of a company in the New York Seventh, and that dandy company of Gotham soldiery was entertained here on the occasion of the Mozeale funeral obsequies. At that time, we recollect, SHALER and do some more contemptible, but not his comrades were received with all the cordial, unexplosive hospitality of Virginia. Now, as vening with his crew of coal-heavers and fire-tenders, to burn and sack the city to which he has been an honored though unworthy guest, he experienced Virginia's other style of receiving visitors, and will have an opportunity of comparing the Libby with the Ballard. This SHALER, however, has at least kept himself quiet, and has in silence laid up all these things in his mind, and pondered them in his heart.

This is not the manner in which men talk who are sure either of themselves or of their cause.

THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

We have attempted to do our share in exposing the relation to our own situation of the French conquest of Mexico. That it is essentially an unfriendly act; that it was begun because our Government was supposed to be ruined, and that our ruin is a cardinal condition of its ultimate success, no man who has considered the subject will deny. What our policy should be is, therefore, a very grave question.

Yet, situated as this country is, there is always one indubitable test of every measure proposed. It is that which NAPOLEON gave to his marshal: "Find out exactly what the enemy wishes you to do, and then will you not say you don't do it." The heart of every rebel in the land would leap for joy if we should declare war against France. Is it worth while then to do it?

If not, there is henceforth but one dignified attitude for us until we are ready to demand explanations, and to make war if they are not satisfactory. It is silence. Congress, Message, its Resolution, and the Secretary of State upon several occasions, have declared the invincible repugnance of this country to the project of erecting an Austrian empire by French bayonets upon the ruins of the Mexican republic. We do not here discuss the manner in which the Secretary has done it. But no words can add force to that simple declaration. The substance of the Monroe doctrine is unquestionably a fixed principle of American political faith. Steadily opposed to such a bald iniquity as the French conquest of Mexico, our action in regard to it must be governed by circumstances. It therefore, Mr. WILSON DAVIS, who is Chairman of the House Committee upon foreign relations, thinks a war with France wise, we hope he will frankly propose it, that the question may be fully discussed. If, however, he is merely making a political demonstration against the general conduct of our foreign policy, we hope he will see that, to stand making faces and doubling up fists and threatening, without striking, is not a dignified attitude for the United States.

THE NATIONS.

The confidence of the people in their cause and their Government is shown in nothing more significantly than in the unflagging order with which the Government loans are taken. They give every time they invest a direct personal interest in the maintenance of the Government in which he thus becomes a stockholder. The subscriptions to the 500 loan reported at the Treasury close to the 28th of May amounted to a hundred and sixty millions of dollars. Could there be a more desirable or safer investment? It is to be redeemed in coin, and although the rate of interest is only five per cent. in gold, it is now equal to nine per cent. in currency. It is exempt also from State or local taxation, and may be reckoned to add two or three per cent more to its annual value, making a productive security which might safely even Shylock himself. It is impossible to be taken at the rate of nearly a million a day.

The argument of an overpowering and unmanageable debt arising from the history of other countries does not apply to this. The power of producing wealth upon this continent is almost infinite. It can be measured only by our resources, and they are incalculable. After some seasons, said MACAULAY, when your population is as numerous as ours, you may know something of the difficulties and troubles. But it is well for us that our great and costly struggle occurs in the very vigor and flush of our youth, when the tremendous continent subject to an indomitable energy.

"THE LOUISVILLE NATIONAL UNION PRESS."

This is the title of a daily paper lately established in Louisville, Kentucky, as the organ of the genuine Union sentiment of the State. Its publisher, Mr. L. A. CAVILL, is known to us as a gentleman of high character and admirable capacity, and the numbers of the paper which we have seen are an earnest of the skill and ability with which it is to be edited. The Union Press is unconditionally Union. It belongs to no party but the intelligent loyal men who understand that the United States are a nation, not a league or a confederacy, and that consequently the doctrine of supreme State sovereignty is a treasonable chimera. It believes that slavery is the real cause of the rebellion, and that, as the conspirators have used slavery as a means of destroying the nation, the nation is rightfully destroying slavery to save itself. The Union Press is full of good matter, neatly printed, and we cordially commend it as an illustration of that border-State fidelity which was thought by many hardly to exist. It will be for that reason a valuable visitor in any household in the country.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.—May 25. The House bill making an appropriation of $725,000 as an award for damages from the depredations of the Sioux Indians was passed.——The bill to amend the act to prevent smuggling and secure the revenue of bonds, or other instruments, was passed.——The bill to amend the act of March 3, 1863, Mr. Johnson offered a resolution calling upon the President for information as to the delivery of Soulé Arguelles to the Spanish authorities.——He moved a resolution declaring that the act of the Administration in suppressing the publication of the New York Daily and Weekly Journal of Commerce was a violation of the Constitution.——May 27. Mr. Sumner introduced a resolution declaring that the proceeding to revoke from the Union and holding against the National Government a portion of their property is equivalent to a rebel State, subject to military occupation, and without any representation in the Senate or House of Congress; and referred to a vote of both Houses of Congress: and the Senate will decline to receive any Senator or Representative from any rebel State until after such a vote of both Houses." This resolution was intimated by Mr. SUMNER to have reference to the case of Mr. Fitzhugh, of Arkansas, who claims to have been elected United States Senator from that State. Mr. Fitzhugh was formerly an avowed Secessionist.——Mr. Wade's bill to amend the act to define the pardoning power, to rule to form a Constitution and State Government was passed. It changes the time for holding the election authorized under the provisions of the bill.——May 28. The joint resolution to amend the Charter of the city of Washington in regard to the registration of voters was passed. The bill still further amends the charter, allowing persons to be registered as voters who have heretofore borne arms, without prosecution or fine.——Mr. Sumner presented a joint resolution vesting the thanks of Congress to Colonel Shaw, of the Massachusetts 54th, for his gallant leading into a gold medal be prepared for presentation to him, under its proper supervision.——Mr. Wade's bill declaring as a recognition of the invaluable engineering ability displayed by him in planning the defenses of the Potomac, entitled Admiral Porter's fleet to pass over the falls of Red River.——The amendment to the Constitution was then considered.——A report was received from the President nominating Colonel Richard Busteed, of Alabama, to be Judge of the Supreme Court from the Internal Revenue bill the clause taxing domestic sewing machines was struck out.——May 26. The bill passed without any constructive action.——May 31. Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution declaring that charges against General Butler complicity with the rebellion in his incipient stages should be referred to a committee to investigate the charges.——The Internal Revenue bill was then taken up, and the amendments reported from the committee were acted upon.——A proposed amendment of Mr. Powell, to effect slavery in the States, was voted down.——Amendments to the Eastern fisheries, caused a long and very animated debate, in which Messrs. Fessenden, Sumner, Wade, Hale, England, Lane people and institutions, were assailed by Messrs. Saulsbury, Davis, Powell, Kennedy, Carlile, Nesmith, Wilkinson, Howe, McDougall, and Wilkinson. A vote was taken on Mr. Howe's bill, and amendments, and it was defeated.

HOUSE.—May 25. The joint resolution that the unfortunate portion of books and documents purchased by each House and not delivered to the members be distributed to the present members and delegates was passed.——The resolution declaring that the thanks of the President Lincoln to the resolution adopted yesterday, including the commendation of the gallantry of Admiral Porter and Mr. Dryden relative to the resolution adopted by the House thanking him for his services in the navy.——Mr. Sweat says that it is practically an Executive question; that in the case of Louisiana the President has the power, and that while the President receives the unanimous declaration of the people of the loyal portion of the State that it is entitled, he directs Mr. Dryden to inform the French Government that he does not expect from you the heroisms associated policy concerning the French occupation of Mexico.——Mr. Stevens moved to refer the Reciprocity question was disposed of. After rejecting a substitute proposing the abrogation of the treaty, and another authorizing the President to give the necessary notice of the termination of the treaty, the bill passed the House, by a vote of 78 to 71, postponed the consideration of the subject to the first Monday in January next December.——The Senate bill providing for the payment of claims of Pennsylvania for the Conemaugh and Juniata Furs was passed.——May 26. The Senate bill modifying the act of March 3, 1863, and other acts, was passed. Any sent to Government officers without the prepayment of postage.——The Senate bill to pay Mr. Fitzhugh Lee $5,000 for the repair and preservation of the works for the Potomac was passed.——The Senate bill to provide for similar purposes on the sea-board, was passed.——A bill was also passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1856, for commencing the construction of the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad, in Michigan, and for the purchase lands were at that period appropriated.——The House, resuming the consideration of the Senate bill to amend section case of McHenry against Younger, by a vote of 77 to 70, and 3 days, expired.——The Senate bill to amend Mr. Yeaman entitled to retain his seat.——The Committee of Elections reported in favor of the sitting member in the district and under whom direction the rebels are interspersed with the Northern troops in the hospitals of Washington, and as to the comparative treatment of the rebel and loyal soldiers in the Southern prisons. Mr. Lesear offered a long preamble, coinciding with a report that the Secretary of War has in his charge measure for the suppression of hostilities between the North and South, and an authority to that effect, to be given into a Convention may be called off at the States, with a view to the restoration of the Union on the basis of constitutional rights. Objection was made, when Mr. Lesear moved a suspension of the rules, and the motion was consequently adjourned.——May 31. A bill to carry into effect consultation with France, Spain, and Great Britain was passed. It provides that consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents of the United States shall be appointed and cross of the vercia of their respective countries in the United States, and shall be entitled to the same privileges and other subjects.——The bill authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from Memphis to the Ohio Tennessee was passed, after a brief discussion, by a vote of 84 against 57 by way of the Mississippi Central Railroad, city Railroad and Telegraph Company, and giving alternate sections of land toward the construction of the road. It which is to extend from Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, was also passed by a vote of 80 to 57.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

The week has developed some important events in General Grant's campaign. Our readers know that the retreat of Lee beyond the North Anna River, our former position, commenced on Tuesday night. Hancock's corps, having crossed that river, pushed steadily forward, encountering the enemy's pickets on the right of the enemy before them, until Lee took up a strong position seven miles southeast of Hanover. Having himself in part the extreme left of our position, the second corps assailed and drove the enemy from their intrenchments on the road to Middle Hanover. Birney's Division, which, on the 24th, had captured the rebel picket line on the left and right sides of the river, led the crossing, capturing about fifty of the enemy's pickets. Gibbon's Division, under General Mott Ford, Warren advanced in the morning, cutting the Virginia Central Railroad between Hanover Junction and Hanover Court House. Wednesday, tore up and destroyed nearly six miles of the Virginia Central Railroad west of Sexton's Junction, as the Richmond and Fredericksburg road, and on the Pamunkey River. Thursday, the enemy continued to twenty-five miles from the point at which Grant crossed the North Anna, and is only sixteen miles from Richmond. In the forward movement the cavalry led the advance, the First and Second divisions taking possession of Hanover Ferry and Hanovertown at nine o'clock on Friday morning, and capturing seventy-five men who were stationed at that point. The Sixth Corps came up soon after, and by Saturday noon the entire army had crossed the Pamunkey. Saturday night, in thirty-six hours, marched nearly thirty miles, crossed two rivers, and resisted a position for us on the Virginia Central.

General Grant, having crossed his army, at once advanced, moving his left some miles south of Hanover C. H. Pamunkey, swelling the development of the strength and position of the enemy. Saturday night the cavalry divisions of our cavalry engaged the enemy, driving him about 3 miles. That day we had killed and 300 wounded. Most of the killed of the enemy and many of his wounded fell into our hands.

On Monday dispositions for an attack were made by General Grant, but the enemy early having ordered retreated to destroy the railroad bridge over the Little River and South Anna, which they had crossed, and to retreat to two miles southwest of Hawes's Shop, where the headquarters of the army were established. On Monday evening the enemy attacked our position, but were repulsed. General Grant, in a dispatch dated Tuesday morning, says: "The enemy came over on our left last evening and attacked us, but were handsomely repulsed, and with considerable slaughter. To relieve General Warren, who was on the left, General Sheridan pushed around with one of the rest of our lines. General Hancock was the only one who had any fighting to do to make the attack upon the enemy's flank. He drove the enemy from his intrenched skirmish line, and still holds it. We have lost no artillery, and I suppose them to be light."

The following dispatch, not from General Grant, gives more details. They are as follows, the first being dated Tuesday, May 31, and the last June 1:

"In the course of the afternoon Warren had pushed down and struck the enemy's fifth division, under Lomax, and routed a joint detroit of Shady Grove Church. Crawford's division, of the fifth corps, was in the rear. They attacked and crowded back a little. The enemy then threw a force, which appears to have consisted of Lee's corps, upon Warren's left, attempting to turn it, but were handsomely repulsed by Griffin's brigade, after considerable fighting. Griffin holds his ground at a distance of seven miles from Richmond and Fredericksburg. He has taken a number of thousand prisoners, and that there are many rebel dead on his front. Sheridan's cavalry are now on the right. He has driven the enemy's cavalry, and the enemy's troops he has left, apparently to cover their retreat. Sheridan's cavalry is now on the right as soldiers. Hancock has been raging ever since dark, but has just closed. Our troops have gained ground all the time. Wright, Warren, and Hancock were ordered to pitch in, but do not seem to have got much further than Sheridan."

The other dispatch above referred to is dated at six o'clock Tuesday morning, and says: "The enemy attacked last night, Colonel Brooke drove the enemy out of a strong intrenchment on our left centre, and holds it. The losses are not reported. Burnside's whole corps got over the Pamunkey last night. He has had a very severe fight with Warren. The left of Hancock's corps upon this side of Hawes's Shop. Our line is upon Hancock's right, and threatens the left flank of the enemy. Sheridan, with a portion of his cavalry, is operating on our left flank. Wilcox is on his right and rear, for which reason he has not been reinforced heretofore. It is fairly wooded with pines, with few good openings. The latter are favorable for us, but the enemy can fallen back south of the Chickahominy."

INCIDENTAL MOVEMENTS IN GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

Upon the arrival of General Grant's army, preparations were at once made for the evacuation of Fredericksburg and Aquia Creek, and by the close of last week all but sick and wounded had been sent to the rear. Hospitals and supplies, military stores, and the contraband also, were sent to Belle Plain. The subject from the Rappahannock to Belle Plain is under the charge of Washington, who, in addition of block-houses, warehouses, etc., which they successively passed, has built a bridge across the river. Grant now has his base on York River he is not at all independent of Belle Plain. A few days supplies were sent by way of Port Royal, on the Rappahannock, but the Government has always depended upon the line of the York the natural channels of communication with his army.

On the 24th General Hunter, who is moving down the Shenandoah Valley, had reached Salisbury, where he found the enemy, 6000 strong, in his front. Colonel Thoburn, of Billy mile mountain, Hunter's division, which is probably his objective point. He first offers, however, to guard the Shenandoah Valley.

THE CAMPAIGN IN THE PENINSULA.

On Tuesday, May 24, General Fitzhugh Lee, with about 2000 cavalry, and some infantry and artillery, attacked our pickets at Hanover Junction, on the north side of the James River, below Powhatan. The pickets consisted of two companies of cavalry, under Major Wells. The attack Lee sent a flag, stating that he had force enough to take the position from them in the surrender, and as to the rest the pickets should be forwarded over to the authorities at Richmond. Major Wells, in reply, said that he would defend his position to the last extremity, and that the consequences when he took the place. General Wild replied. With 150 men of the 36th colored regiment, Colonel Bell, were repulsed and driven back in disorder, leaving between fifty and sixty of their dead on the field. Our loss was 40 wounded and 7 killed. One rebel Major was killed, and a Lieutenant-Colonel made prisoner, and 21 privates were also captured. On the same day General Butler's army was in a considerably more advantageous position, met the enemy, and after a fight of an hour and a half drove them back. The very slight loss on our side.

On the 25th a slight skirmish took place about three miles from City Point, in which Colonel Ames, of Massachusetts, was severely routed. The advance of General Grant has not been made. According to General Butler's report, since the advance operations have taken place since the 4th of May, the number of the rebels in front of the advance of the Tenth Corps were on the 23d brought to Richmond, and from Butler's army to Richmond the York. Of this movement, Secretary Stanton, in a bulletin of the 26th, says: "It is not true that the enemy's forces at Bermuda Hundred, not required for Butler's purposes in the field, have been withdrawn for the defense of General Smith, to the Army of the Potomac, and is supposed that this is the reason for the apparent change in the command of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina. General Gordon's division is still reported of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, and remains in front of General Butler in the field."

On Monday, the 30th, the rebels attacked Butler's position, but every assault was repulsed. On Tuesday General Butler says: "We made demonstrations against the enemy's works in front of the 10th corps, and in front of our position at Bermuda, but only to find that they were in strong force and well intrenched. It is quite likely that these demonstrations are for the purpose of covering the movement of troops to the front."

In reference to the rebel losses in the Peninsula engagements, a letter in the Richmond Enquirer, dated May 27, says: "Late Petersburg papers acknowledge a loss of 1,500 in the fight at Drury's Bluff, and 2,000 in the fight admitted to two or three general hospitals, at Richmond, on the 16th and 17th. They do not acknowledge a loss of over six hundred and fifty. Our loss at the battle of Drury's Bluff and other smaller engagements amount to Palmer's Creek and other smaller, both killed and wounded. about three thousand, including both killed and wounded. The number of the wounded received here sent to Fortress Monroe. The number included in the Confederate States Hospitals in Richmond, Petersburg, and also the rebel surgeons, is 5,000.

"These figures may be relied on as correct in every respect."

THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA.

General Sherman's march is still onward. Our record last week closed with the occupation of Kingston and the line of the Etowah River by our forces on the 18th ult. From that point, on the 24th, having brought up his supplies, General Sherman resumed his march, pushing in a southwesterly direction for Allatoona, situated some twenty miles distant, on the Western and Atlantic Railroad. Flanking this position, which is said to be even stronger than Atlanta, and having gained favorable ground for Dallas, lying some twenty miles almost directly south of Allatoona, he came upon the enemy with the rebel General Hood's 30,000, an engagement took place between them and M'Pherson's corps, in which the rebels were defeated, with a loss of them of 1500 killed and wounded left in our hands, and 2000 prisoners, while our own loss amounted to not over 300 in all.

General Sherman's head-quarters were still at Dallas at last accounts. Dallas is about thirty-two miles from Atlanta.

GENERAL BANKS'S CAMPAIGN.

General Banks, who is part of his army, arrived at New Orleans on the 31st of May. In accordance with the country during his return from Arkansas, General Banks left the Red River at Port De Russy, and General Steele at Natchitoches, his military forces having been mustered to Morganza, on the Mississippi. A. J. Smith's command also marched to Semmesport, and thence embarked in transports. General Smith had a spirited engagement with the rebel General Polignac on the 4th, defeating it, driving it several miles, and capturing 300 prisoners. A large part of the enemy is killed and wounded. It stated at 800. General Smith's command arrived at Vicksburg in transports on the 14th inst. Late dispatches from General Canby state that he is actively engaged in compelling the rebels to evacuate Mobile by General Banks and General Banks, and organizing the forces of the West Mississippi Division. This will include the Army of the Departments of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana. General Canby, Commander of the Military Division, consists of the respective departments, under the order of General Canby, as Division Commander. His military jurisdiction will be the same as that formerly exercised by General Grant, and will be exercised in the Departments of the Mississippi and the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee.

THE NAVY AND MILITARY ITEMS.

Brigadier-Generals Gibbon and Ferrero have been nominated Major-Generals of Volunteers. General Oglesby has resigned, and Brigadier-General Buell has been General Ogle-by has tendered his resignation three times, and it is evident that he will not be allowed to leave the service for General Dodge. General Oglesby has been engaged in the United States Service for General Dodge. General Buell was mustered out for refusing to accept a command under General Grant.

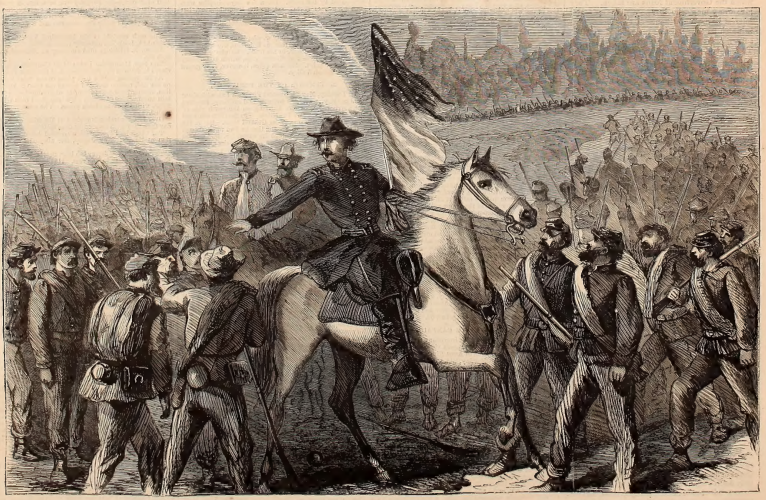
General Hascall and Frost, and Lieutenant Gov. Colonel T. L. Dudley have paid the forfeit of their late rebel states to Tennessee, through agents or attorneys. It is supposed that they will be elected by the Legislature of Tennessee.

It appears from the rolls of the Medical Director that 28,000 men have been sent to hospitals from battle-fields in the present campaign. About 5000 of these have since gone to the front, and 2000 have been returned to the Union lines for General Grant. The Government will be returned

BELLE PLAIN, VIRGINIA—GENERAL GRANT'S LATE BASE OF SUPPLIES.

BELLE PLAIN, VIRGINIA.

BELLE PLAIN, Virginia, the recent base of supplies for General GRANT's army, is simply a rude landing on Potomac Creek, constructed for the present emergency, right at the foot of a range of wooded hills, along which sharp, precipitous roads wind away toward Fredericksburg, nine miles distant. There are no houses of any sort within a mile of the landing, and the appearance of the surrounding country is desolate in the extreme. The offing, which is embraced in our sketch, was constantly crowded with transports and naval vessels, receiving and unloading stores and troops; and the scene from the heights on a clear day was almost as full of life and animation as New York Harbor.



ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GENERAL WARREN RALLYING THE MARYLANDERS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND HIS SECRETARIES.—[SEE PAGE 370.]

NEWS FROM THE FRONT.

"HOLD there, courier, what news from the front?
Go not so fast on your galloping way!
Have the armies met, has a battle been fought?
Tell us which side has won the day.
And who is living, and who lie low;
We all have friends in the ranks, you know."

"The armies met but a few days since,
And a terrible battle has been fought;
We are victorious, thank the Lord!
But the victory, oh, it was dearly bought.
For the ground is littered with limbs dead,
And the trampled grass with their blood is red."

"Tell me, courier, ere you can
How it has fared with my own brave boy?
He was not of the gallant some,
His mother's only remaining joy."
Then spoke a woman wrinkled and gray,
As the courier paused a while by the way.

"Your boy, good woman? Alas! he is killed;
In the front of battle I saw him fall,
With his face to the enemy he lay,
Shot through the heart by a rifleman's ball;
But tell me, mother, was your boy's life
More dear than our cause in this deadly strife?"

"Courier, I have already said
He was the child of my later years;
I have given five to our noble cause—
And the last one will wipe away those tears:
'Tis hard with one's flesh and blood to part,
But I yield them all with a willing heart."

"Courier," said a young wife then,
"Is my husband living, and is he well?"
"My Captain, lady, was wounded at first,
Close by my side in the fight he fell;
And asked that this token to you I'd give,
For he knew himself that he could not live."

"O God, he is dead! 'tis my picture this;
I bade him wear it on every field
Close to his heart, where I placed it then,
Praying his precious life it might shield;
And I strove to keep the tears from my eyes
When I gave him to God a sacrifice!"

"And, courier, what of Walter Holt?
Pray tell me if of him you know aught"—
This from the lips of a fair young girl.
"I know how bravely and well he fought,
And I know of a will that he has not won;
But otherwise he is safe from harm."

"Oh, courier, tell him when you return
How that of our king he may be sure;
That I am his whenever he will:
And 'though he has lost an arm, and is poor,
Bid him remember that I have you,
And will prove what a Yankee girl can do."

Then the courier spurred his foaming steed,
Thinking what he rode away:
"Oh! when will the sight of battle clear,
And show us the dawn of a brighter day?
When these groans of anguish and grief shall cease
In the golden sunrise of perfect peace?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GAMBLER'S HYMN.—Nonsense! Speak grammatically, and say Hymn's Ace.

Why is the top of a bald man's head like the North Pole?—Because it is a great bear (here) place.

PUTTING YOUR FOOT IN IT.—"Putting your foot in it," it seems, is a way of legislating slyly. According to the "Asiatic Researches," a very curious mode of trying the title to land is practised in Hindostan. Two lads run a dog in the disputed spot, to each of which the lawyer on either side put one of their legs, and there remains with one of them a bleed, or emphasis of being stung by insects; in which case his client is defeated. In our country it is generally the client, and not the lawyer, who "puts his foot in it."

When is a woman like a watch?—When she is capped and jewelled.

THE GIRL I LOVE.—Oyster Patty.

DR. Mead, calling one day on a gentleman who had been severely afflicted with the gout, found, to his surprise, the disease quite gone. The patient rejoicing in his recovery over a bottle of wine. "Come along, doctor," exclaimed he, "I am glad to see you, and to taste the health of Madeira." "Alas! a pipe that has just been broached." "Ah!" replied the other, "you physicians are like the pipers at the duke's—the cause of all your suffering." "Well, then," rejoined the sage Aesculapius, "Sir, I am glad, for now I have found out the cause, the sooner we get rid of it the better."

TRUMPS.—A farmer, by chance a companion in a coach with Sydney Smith, kept boring him todeath with questions, to the great annoyance of Sydney, who, however, kept up such a poser. "And pray, Sir, how are turnips f'ared?" "Why, Sir," he at last answered out South, "I will depend upon the boiled legs of mutton."

A drunken fellow, sitting on the steps of St. Paul's church, the other day, having challenged the passers-by to come and subjugated, "If I haven't got longer than the wind to the Cape of Good Hope, I'll eat the whole of the Queen's navy."

THERE is an anecdote of a honest Irishman, where mingled sense of the duty of gratitude and the awkwardness of obligation would wax in the characteristic expression, "Oh, that I could see your honor knocked down in a fight! Sure, and would n't I offer a fardin to help you up!"

A vendor of bogs was recently extolling his wares in presence of a customer's husband. "No lady should be without one of these beautiful sticks," said the vendor. "Well, of course not," dryly remarked the husband, "else should be selling bogs."

A countryman was shown Guinebrough's celebrated picture of "The Pigs." "To be sure," said he, "I could easily tell you pigs; but there is one fault—nobody ever saw pigs fighting together like this when out in the open air."

A few days since a dunce called on a young gentleman, and presented him a bill, which he was somewhat taken aback by on reading him aside and mutually saying: "My dear Sir, call next Thursday, and I'll tell you what to call again."

The late Lord Peterham, a great dandy, possessed a cellar of snuff, arranged in jars, cold to have been worth three thousand pounds. He had the finest collection of boxes in England, and had a box for every day in the year. On a beautiful old light blue Sevres box being particularly admired, he would lisp out effectively, "Yes, it's a nice comfortable box; but it doesn't do for visiting."

Partly fulfilling a promise is like breaking your word and offering some of the bits.

A neglected wife declares that she and her husband are like two cradle-stones, because she may say that he and she are never seen together.

People who have never been in Italy form very mancreasure ideas about it.

Why is a wire like a soldier?—Because it is tested and trained, and has ten-drills and chords.

"It's all stuff," as the lady said to her husband, who was complaining of dyspepsia after a public dinner.

An eminent divine preached one Sunday morning from the text, "Ye are children of the devil;" and in the afternoon, by funny coincidence, from the words, "Children, obey your parents."

A northern English rector used to think it polite not to begin service before the arrival of the squire. A little while ago he forgot his manners, and began, "When the wicked man—" "Stop, Sir!" called out the clerk, "he an't come yet."

A young gentleman from the "rural districts," who advertised for a wife through the newspapers, received seventy-three spurious husbands, informing him that he could have theirs.

THE ANCIENTS OUTDONE.—Talk of Daedalus and Icarus! A man made a daguerreotype, and had a fly in it!

VERDUM SAT.—Time is never in a hurry, but never idles.

WHEN a second deluge to occur the best place to retreat to would, of course, be Jew-ar-k.

GENERAL HORATIO GATES WRIGHT.

GENERAL HORATIO GATES WRIGHT, of whom we give a portrait on our first page, now commanding the Sixth Corps of the Army of the Potomac, entered West Point from Connecticut in the year 1837. In July, 1841, he was appointed Second Lieutenant of Engineers, and in January, 1844, became Acting Assistant Professor of Engineering at the Military Academy, holding the position to August of the following year. In July, 1846, he was appointed Assistant Professor, and in the spring of 1848 was made a First Lieutenant, becoming subsequently Captain, in the Engineer Corps. In 1861 he was promoted to Major, and in September of the same year was made Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and placed in command of the Third Brigade of SHERMAN'S force, which participated in the Port Royal expedition. When the Army of the South was reorganized, under HUNTER, General HORATIO WRIGHT was, on the 23d of May, 1862, placed in command of the Third Brigade of General BERRY'S Division. Subsequently he was ordered North with his brigade, and participated in McCLELLAN'S Peninsular campaign. In July, 1862, he was appointed a Major-General of Volunteers, and ordered to the Military Department of the Ohio, with head-quarters at Cincinnati. He held this command during the advance of BRAGG'S army through East Tennessee and Kentucky to the Ohio River, and by his ability and skill in organizing and for the protection of Cincinnati. He retained this position until March 26, 1863, when, in consequence of the General-in-Chief's order, that officers holding rank of Major-General, he was relieved by General BURNSIDE, and ordered to report to head-quarters for assignment.

For a short time General WRIGHT was kept unemployed, but was then assigned to the command of the First Division of the Sixth Corps. During the passage of the Rappahannock in November, 1863, General WRIGHT was placed in command of the Sixth Corps, which was attached to General SEDGWICK'S right wing of that army. At the opening of the week's fighting of General WRIGHT particularly distinguished itself, and General MEADE, in his general order of November 9, 1863, complimented not only General WRIGHT and corps commander, but particularly mentioned the division so recently under his command.

When the Army of the Potomac was reorganized during March, 1864, under General MEADE, for the present campaign, General WRIGHT was assigned to the command of the First Division of the Sixth Army Corps. Upon General SEDGWICK'S death he succeeded to the command of the corps, and has just been renominated as a Major-General.

THE STATION-MASTER'S DAUGHTER.

I HAD lost sight of my old college chum, Fred Pepper, for several years, till I accepted an invitation from him and stationed myself for a week or so at his house in one of the midland counties. According to arrangement, he met me at Wellington Junction, a station about twenty miles from the house, the remainder of the journey having to be performed on a break belonging to Fred.

"You will have to take a fresh ticket here," said Fred, after I had alighted from the train, and we had greeted each other with a hearty shake of the hand. "You will find the booking-office at the upper end of the platform."

I went to the window indicated by my friend, and obtained the needful ticket; noticing at the same time that I was waited upon by a young woman—rather an unusual thing in England, though not so unfrequent in Scotland; quite a mite as a young woman, so diminutive as scarcely to be she, so slight of figure; with large, shy, brown eyes, and brown hair; with small, pale, clearly-cut features, hardly to be called pretty, but with an expression of candor and good temper that was infinitely pleasing. Whatever touches of adornment the otherwise dingy office had received were due to her busy little fingers; to her evidently belonged the three pots of scarlet geraniums, and the box of nasturtiums in the window; the canary, lively and loud-voiced, in its circular wire cage; the elaborate piece of embroidery on the desk; and a green-backed volume of poems.

"Are all your booking-clerks in this part of the country so charming as the one who has just waited on me?" inquired I of Fred.

"Ah, you have seen little Madge Carlston, I suppose," said he; "but you must not expect to find another like her. Have you never heard of her before? Well, then, I must relate to you a little circumstance which happened three or four years ago, and which made Madge quite a heroine in these parts. Let us secure a compartment to ourselves, and then you shall have it."

My friend was well known on the line, and the guard civilly locked the door set to his bidding, and we were left undisturbed. Having faced ourselves, therefore, comfortably in opposite corners, Fred proceeded to favor me with the following narrative.

"Two years ago," commenced he, "old David Carlston, the station-master, was station-master at Birkwood, a little road-side place about fifteen miles from Wellington Junction. David had been station-master for many days, could show two or three medals, and had probably obtained his post on the line through the interest of some friendly director, rather than from any particular aptitude he himself displayed. He had been a widower for many years, and his small household was managed by his daughter Madge, or Madgy, as she was generally called by her father and every one else.

"There was—and is, for aught I know, either guard, or passenger, at Birkwood; so that the line fed by David and his daughter was a very lonely one; the village of Birkwood, which contained only about a couple of hundred inhabitants, lying a mile and a half away down the main road.

"It has still an exceedingly lonely look, having much less time on her hands, gradually initiated herself into the duties of a clerk at a small station; being always accustomed to help her father, and in fact to expect the reverse of David. His duties were over by eight o'clock in the evening, there being no train of any description to pass through Birkwood after seven in the morning; and having seen that his night-signals were all right, the old soldier would, like the weather-wise farmers, generally trudge down to the village, to smoke his pipe and drink an evening pint at the Birkwood Arms. At this place, by virtue of his military experiences and his two medals, he was looked upon as a hero whose dictum was in most cases indisputable. One nightly visit to the Farriers' Arms were a source of no small disquietude to Madge, for it not unfrequently happened that Dave, elated by the liquid by the excitement of congenial company, and by the rude but genuine applause which always greeted his stories of warlike adventure, would return more of the Farriers' heady home-brewed than he could conveniently carry, and would reach home at a late hour in a state which prevented no recollection next morning of how he got there.

"It was hardly likely that such a girl as Madge Carlston could have reached the age of seventeen, even in a remote place like Birkwood, without having her suitors for her hand. Of the unfortunates rejected ones who had been sent about their business, with no measure of hard words, but with a gentle demeanor, and a kindness that tried her fortune, and had been rejected, like others before him; but whether there was something in Madge's soft refusal which left room for hope, or whether the spur of success, or whether it was owing to the constancy and true nature of the affection, I am not prepared to say before, that would by no means take his rejection as final. 'It's a woman's privilege to change her mind,' he would say; 'and who knows but that Madgy may change hers!'

"Will's most formidable rival was handsome Frederick Lee, the only son of Lee of Lee Hall estate—a fellow scape-grace, who had been turned out of doors by his father some years before; had since gone to Australia, and had come back, after being five years away, quite as poor as he went, and was no more likely to have come to anything, or something should turn up likely to suit his lazy abilities.

"Dick had not been back long before he singled out little Madge Carlston as the object of his attentions. He began by paying court to her father, and would frequently, on the station of a morning, having no work of his own to engage him, and smoke and chat with the old man between trains, listen with respectful attention to his long stories of stories, retail the latest village news, and give him now and then a helping hand with the signals or the train, at a time, in the morning seemed long and dull which was not enlivened by a visit from laughing, good-natured Dick. Madge he made no overt profession of his love, being quick enough to perceive that she was one of those who are not to be won in a day; but he took care in twenty different ways how constantly she dwelt in his thoughts. To what extent he succeeded in winning her affections no one ever knew, for she was inclined to leave to her his suit seems certain; indeed it would have been strange if a girl of her limited experience and single-hearted affection had not been gratified to receive his addresses.

"Matters had progressed thus for some months without seeming to progress at all, when, one autumn forenoon, Madge, occupied up to the station-box companied by a stranger, whom he presented to David as his friend Mr. Kulp, from Australia. Madgy, who was looking on unseen from behind the blind that shaded the open window, thought she had never seen a more sinister and ill-looking visage than that of Mr. Kulp. He was dressed in a new, shiny suit of black, which he looked very awkward and ill at ease, his great horny hands being especially difficult to dispose of, and wandering incessantly into his pockets and out of them again; he would evidently have felt more at home in the shirt and highlows of a digger. His face and neck were the color of a brick, and his straggly red hair and long red beard, rudely trimmed by some country barber, did not add to the attractiveness of his appearance. His features were bold and coarse in appearance. His features were bold and coarse in appearance. His features were bold and coarse in latter room, and seeing that the cash-box was there as usual on the chest of drawers, she passed forward into her own chamber, the window of which looked out at the back of the station, and down the road that led to the village.

"It was David's custom, as an extra measure of precaution, to place the cash-box in his bedroom overnight. After the departure of the last train he made up his receipts for the day, and put the amount into the box which traveled backward and forward between the bank and the station, ready for conveyance to head-quarters; so that when Madge saw where it always was, she thought one night she felt quite satisfied as to its safety, and never once thought whether the amount it contained might be large or small.

"Perfectly assured by this time that the movement of the door-handle was a pure piece of imagination on her part having quite recovered the steadiness of her nerves, now that she was safe in her own little bower, she sat down in front of the glass, and leisurely proceeded to brush out her long brown hair, pausing now and then to smile at the bouquet left by Dick, and humming a familiar tune to herself, wondering how much later her father would be, and becoming more anxious, as the time very, as it was nearly midnight, as the orchestra in which he would reach home. She had sat thus for some time, when she was startled by the noise of something striking against the window. She got up, put the candle in the furthest corner of the room, drew aside the blind, and looked out. The moon was nearly at the full, but thick masses of cloud overshadowed the sky, leaving only a sort of dull half-light in which nothing could be clearly discerned. There was, however, sufficient light for Madge to make out the familiar figure of Dick Carruthers looking to her with one hand, as though he wished to speak to her. Her fears took alarm at once; something had happened to her father, and Dick had come to break the bad news to her. She drew up the blind and flung open the window with hands that trembled so much that they could scarcely do the bolting, dreading, yet hoping to know the worst.

"'Your father has been taken with a fit at the Farriers' Arms,' said Dick, 'and I am come to fetch you. Make haste, and put on your things, and let us be off.'

"Dick was standing in an open space of ground about a dozen yards from the house, where his figure could be plainly made out; a little to the rear of a few yards further from the house, was an outbuilding belonging to the station; and Madge, while Dick was speaking to her, distinctly saw the head and shoulders of a man protruded for a moment from behind the gable of the building, as though in the act of listening, and then withdrawn. To whom whoever he might be, evidently thinking that, as the night was so much overcast, it would be impossible for any one to see him from the house. With a woman's intuition Madge at once felt that the head and shoulders could belong to no one but Mr. Kulp.

"I will be down in a minute or two,' she called out to Dick in a loud, shrill voice which she hardly recognized as her own.

"She came in, shut down the window, and reshaded the lamp, and stood for a moment with her fingers of both hands pressed against her eyes, thinking intently. Then taking up the candle, she carried it to her father's bedroom, the window of which looked in the direction opposite to her own; but instead of proceeding to put on her bonnet and shawl, she came back into her own room, where she drew the blind about an inch on one side, and looked out. It was as she had thought; there was a pair of them; and at the moment she looked out they were talking earnestly together, as they stood close to the gable of the outbuilding; but more than once Dick seemed to push the stranger back out of sight, and cause forward himself, and took up his first position, close to the house, waiting for Madge to come out.

"Madge stood up in a maze of doubt and fear. Why had not Dick observed the light in the cash-box? Was it because he had been absorbed by the stranger? Who was he? Was it Kulp? Was it true, next there be any concealment at all?

"'Are you ready?' called Dick; and then there came a sharp imperious summons with his knuckles on the window-sill; and then the door itself was tried; but it was locked.

"Madge stood in front of her brief reverie, opened her bedroom window, and looked out for the second time. 'Do make haste!' exclaimed Dick the moment her head appeared; 'your father is dying.' 'How long are you going to be?'

"'Answer me one question,' said Madge. 'Did you come up to the village alone? Is there anyone here besides yourself? You know, Dick, that I am easily frightened—and—the hour is late, and—and—'

"Before Dick could reply the hidden man burst out into the moonlight, revealing Mr. Kulp to Madge's straining eyes.

"'Come, stow all that jabber!' exclaimed Kulp, brutally. 'And be quick about it, you girl! Dick—' we should have had what we came for before now; but you must needs go to work in your own idiotic way, and see the result—all this precious time wasted, and nothing done! Look you here, you woman!' turning to Madge; 'you need not expect your father home just at present; he's disposed of, where he'll trouble nobody for some time to come; so there's not a soul within a mile of you, except us two—two fellows who don't like a trifles, against a wisp of a girl who gives tongue if she sees a mouse suddenly. Now we've nothing against you yourself; we don't wish to do you any harm. What we've come for is the money we know you have in the house—not the old man's own money, but the money belonging to the railway. You can drop it quietly out of the window, if you like—we know within a quid or two how much there is—and we'll take our leave at once; and you'll be none the poorer—but you'll only do it the way that will suffer, and they can afford it. But offer any resistance, or try on any of your tricks, and we'll not only have the money, but your life into the bargain.

"The idea of any one thinking it worth while to risk the station had never entered the head of Madge; but as Kulp spoke, she remembered that there was that night a much larger sum of money in the house than had ever been there before. Dick, from his frequent visits to the station, was doubtless well aware that old David was in the habit of keeping the cash in his bedroom, as a security against thieves. All these thoughts passed through her brain while Kulp was speaking. When he had done, she gave one great despairing sob, wrung from her by the thought of her lover's treachery, and her heart for the moment seemed to wither up within her. But the necessity for immediate action was pressing—she would have time enough in the dark future before her to indulge in the whole heart's bearness. What must she do? If her father was not ill, as those men had first averred, then why had he not come home? He had now, even when most overcome, staid out till this hour. Was it not possible—nay, probable—that they had murdered him first, to get him out of the way, and had then come on to the station to complete their work by robbery, and perhaps murder, there?

"A rude answer rose to her lips at her brief reverie. 'Now, young woman, what are you about? Do you expect us to wait here all night?'

"'Oh, Dick, tell me, tell me, for what has become of my father?' she said, still speaking through the window, and heedless for the moment of Kulp.

"Dick rose from his seat as if he were going to reply, but Kulp waved him back. 'Your father's disposed of where he'll trouble nobody, as I told you before. And now let us have your answer at once. Do you mean to give us that money quietly or not?'

"'No—a thousand times no!' exclaimed Madge, passionately. 'And you villains, you shall not take it, if you dare!' and she shut down the window with a bang, as though disdaining further parley.

"The thought of her father lying wounded, perhaps dead, in some lonely spot, lent her a courage, a reckless audacity, that made her for the time almost indifferent to any thing that could happen to herself. Her sudden defense had been, it was her first question. Scarcely any. The doors and windows, indeed, down stairs were fastened; but she knew well that a few blows would be sufficient for the assaults of two men determined on effecting an entrance. There were no arms of any kind in the house. There was the kitchen knife, which on the stairs opening into the kitchen—she might, perhaps, do a little toward securing that. It—that she was still incapable of thought but it was only she went into the room, the cash-box containing the cause of all these misfortunes stared her in the face. Her father's keys lay by it. She opened the cash-box, and took out the bag containing the day's receipts, its notes, checks, and the memorandum of it in the broom of her dress. She then put the bag containing the silver and copper into the box, locked it, and threw the keys under the bed. Her next proceeding was to secure the frail door at the foot of the staircase as well as she was able, by inserting a small wooden bolt which was at the top and under any one from opening it in the ordinary way; and then by piling against it several chairs and other light articles of furniture, sufficient, even as her limited strength permitted her to life. She was with every thing thus set as was possible, which a few minutes would suffice to demolish; but every minute was a gain in her desperate strait; not only hope but reason returned to her, and as much as possible—help might come, she knew not how or whence, when least expected.

"Outside, every thing remained quiet. Could it be possible that they would, after all, go away without attacking the house? With this blessed hope lending new force to her efforts, she crept back to the window of her own room, and peeped through. Alas! no—both of them were still there. They were stooping over a long dark object, standing close at hand for the purpose of relaying the line; and having selected one, they lifted it on to their shoulders, and brought it to the front door of the house. At the first stroke of this novel but powerful battering-ram, Madge saw the door shake, crack, and shrink, and trembling, to the ground; all her little stock of courage had vanished, and she seemed, for the time, to have lost the power of motion or position. Like the blows of a pavior's rammer came the shocks against the door down stairs, and on each of these Madge felt that she must scream, and she throb. Suddenly, with a great crash, the door gave way, and with a yell of triumph Kulp burst into the house, followed by his more taciturn mate. Madge started up, and double-locked her bedroom door; then rushed to the window, determined to leap out at any cost, and forgetting in the moment that the window, small in itself, was still further impeded by a bar of iron, intended to give it more sufficient to prevent even her little body from squeezing through.

"With a cry of despair she turned away from the window, and then, a moment after, almost laughed to herself—so sudden are the alternations of feeling in such a frame—to think that she had entirely all about the little loft over the bedrooms. Surely there, of all places in the house, since it was evident that they knew the house well, there was no escape, she would be most secure. It was a mere rock-loft, open to the sloping rafters of the roof, and lighted by a skylight composed of a single pane of glass; it was used by David as a storehouse for his odious, seeds, and various kinds of rubbish put away at odd times by the old man, as never likely to be wanted again; but to Madge, in that hour of her extremity, it seemed a very harbor of refuge. The short broken ladder by which David gained access to it was always kept behind his bedroom door. She unlocked the door of her own room, got the ladder, and placed it against the wall under the opening into the loft, which showed black and grim above her head, there being no door to it or fastening of any kind.

"Madge paused for a minute before going up the ladder. After feeling that the money was still safe in the broom of her dress, she went lightly into her father's room, and blew out the candle, which had been burning there since first taken out of her own room; she next locked the doors of both rooms, put the keys in her pocket, and then stood to listen, with one foot on the ladder, ready to ascend. From the moment the front door was burst in to that in which Madge now stood not more than two minutes had elapsed, sufficient, however, for the two men down stairs to ransack every corner, and so make sure, before commencing further, that Madge was hidden nowhere below. The door at the foot of the stairs was opened, and the moment Madge heard this she mounted the ladder noiselessly, and creeping through the opening into the loft with the agility of a cat, reached down with one hand, drew up the ladder after her, and then sat down by the edge of the opening to await, with a heart that beat almost to bursting, whatever might happen next. The door not yielding easily, the battering-ram was applied to it, and half a dozen blows were sufficient to break it in. Then the lamp in the room piled up behind it was quickly dragged down by the indefatigable Kulp, on his way to the bedroom where his chum was, and by the light thus afforded Madge, inclining Dick to drink out of his brandy-flask; after which he struck a number of matches and a candle, for all their work hitherto had been done by the light of the cloudy moon. Having procured a light, they spent a few minutes, during which time he relieved his mind by a large amount of swearing, Mr. Kulp advanced cautiously up stairs. Having reached the landing-place in safety, and having both of them to be locked, Dick and he held a brief consultation. Dick was inclined to break into the old man's room, being well aware that the money was always put there overnight; but Mr. Kulp, whose quicker perception saw at once the right side of the opening into the loft, gave it as his opinion, emphasized with numerous oaths, that both bird and money would be most easily had away in that dark little nest at the top of the house; so it was agreed that he should explore the loft while Dick effected an entrance into David's room. Mr. Kulp's first task was to fetch a couple of chairs up stairs, and having fixed one of them upon the other, he proceeded to mount to the top, but as Dick succeeded in breaking open the bedroom door.

"Madge, in her hiding-place, sat quite motionless, with other portion of her dress on the opening in the floor, through which she momently expected to see Mr. Kulp's ugly head protruded. She could hear every part of every thing at this time, and could tell of the moon's light came through the little skylight to enable her to distinguish the objects around her with tolerable clearness. She heard Mr. Kulp climbing laboriously up to the chairs, and thought in her terror that a single move now would cause him, all, for she never doubted that he would murder her when once he got her into his power. The first word of Mr. Kulp's speech that made its appearance through the trap was an immense bony hand, with which he seized the ledge, as a help in pulling himself up. Once the head of Madge by an old woman mallet; on the instinct of the moment, and without pausing to think, she grasped it, and brought it down with all the force on the hideous claw beside her. Mr. Kulp gave a yell of mingled rage and pain, which Madge heard as it was going down to the floor with a terrific crash. He was on his feet in an instant, swearing horribly try, and Madge knew that he was at once preparing to mount the chairs again, Dick, with a joyful cry, burst out of David's room, exclaiming that he had found the cash-box, and that Mr. Kulp was not inclined to stay at all risks, and have his revenge, for his hand hurt him terribly; but Dick hurried down stairs, and Kulp, under his arm, and Mr. Kulp's captivity rendering him fearful that unless he quickly followed he might perhaps never see either Dick or the cash again, he postponed the consideration of his revenge till a future period, and hurried after his friend, leaving Madge with what she would do to her if she stirred out of the loft, or gave any alarm, for a full hour at the least.

"But Madge never proceeded. Deceived by the weight of the box, they had hurried away without opening it, thinking that it contained the money of which they were in search, whereas it held only a little bag of silver and copper placed there purposely by Madge. But Madge knew that the respite was only a short one, and that they would not go far before breaking open the box, and on discovering the deception they would hurry back, and woe to her if they found her there when they returned!

"She would get out of the house at any risk, and try to make her escape across the fields. She descended the ladder, and after feeling that the man of was still safe in the bosom of her dress, got down as quickly as possible, and prepared her way down stairs, and through the house in the portion. In a few minutes more the night-mail would be due; but alas! if there was a Dick Swood, one never slacken speed, but rushed past in complete indifference to the existence of any such insignificant spot.

"An excellent idea for the walk would turn on the red light at the signal, and stop the train. Under the circumstances she felt herself justified in doing so. Then she could return with its living freight would come up in time to save her from the two miscreants, who would certainly be back in a few minutes more. The hope was a faint one, but she could not afford to throw it away. To reach the train—yes, it was necessary that she should first—see the platform to that end of it nearest the road taken up the two men on leaving the station, although her first intention had been to try to make her escape by hurrying away in the opposite direction. There was, however, no time to hesitate; the risk must be run at once, if at all. So she sped as fast as she could to the end of the platform, and seizing the iron lever which worked the signal, gave it the necessary turn, which changed the glass in front of the lantern at its summit, and displayed the red light in place of the white one. She had just turned to hasten back along the platform, when Kulp and Carradus, leaping over a hedge about twenty yards away, came suddenly upon her, and a loud cry from one of them proclaimed that she was seen.

"In their hurry to get back to the station, after discovering the trick that had been played them, they had cut off the angle of the road by coming across a field, and were consequently unseen by Madge till they were close upon her. Madge was like a wounded animal brought to bay: to flee was useless, she would have been overtaken in less than two twenty yards; resistance was equally out of the question; what resistance, in fact, could a girl like her offer to two men of no desperate calibre? There seemed nothing left for her but to lie down in dumb despair, and pray that her misery might be as short as possible. But the idea flashed into her and practiced ear caught the first faint sound of the approaching train—only five minutes more, and she would have been saved!

"She was still standing close to the semaphore. On the instant she turned, and despite the impediment of her dress, ran quickly up the iron ladder-up, up to the very top, till she sank exhausted on the little grating fixed close under the lamp for the convenience of lighting and cleaning them. Mr. Kulp laughed loud and long.

"'What a precious fool the wench must be,' he said with an oath, 'to go and fix herself in a trap like that! Now I shall have her as safe as a 'possum in a gum-tree—have her coming down for life both, or my name is not Jared Kulp!'

"'Never fear, Jared,' yelled Dick, and hurried off into the house.

"Neither of the men had yet heard the noise of the advancing train, for the wind was in the opposite direction; but Madge heard it coming nearer and nearer, but as slowly, as it seemed to her agonizing ears, that her heart within her grew sick with fear that it would not arrive in time to save her. No sooner had Dick disappeared than Mr. Kulp drew a formidable bowie-knife from some hidden pocket, and having unsheathed it, seized the short half-broken ladder in his teeth, and mounted the ladder: he had evidently determined not to await the return of Dick, but to accomplish his revenge within his own private way. Just as he had got two steps upward when all at once his ear caught the shrill whistle of the approaching train, and he knew that his work must be done quickly, or else left undone forever.

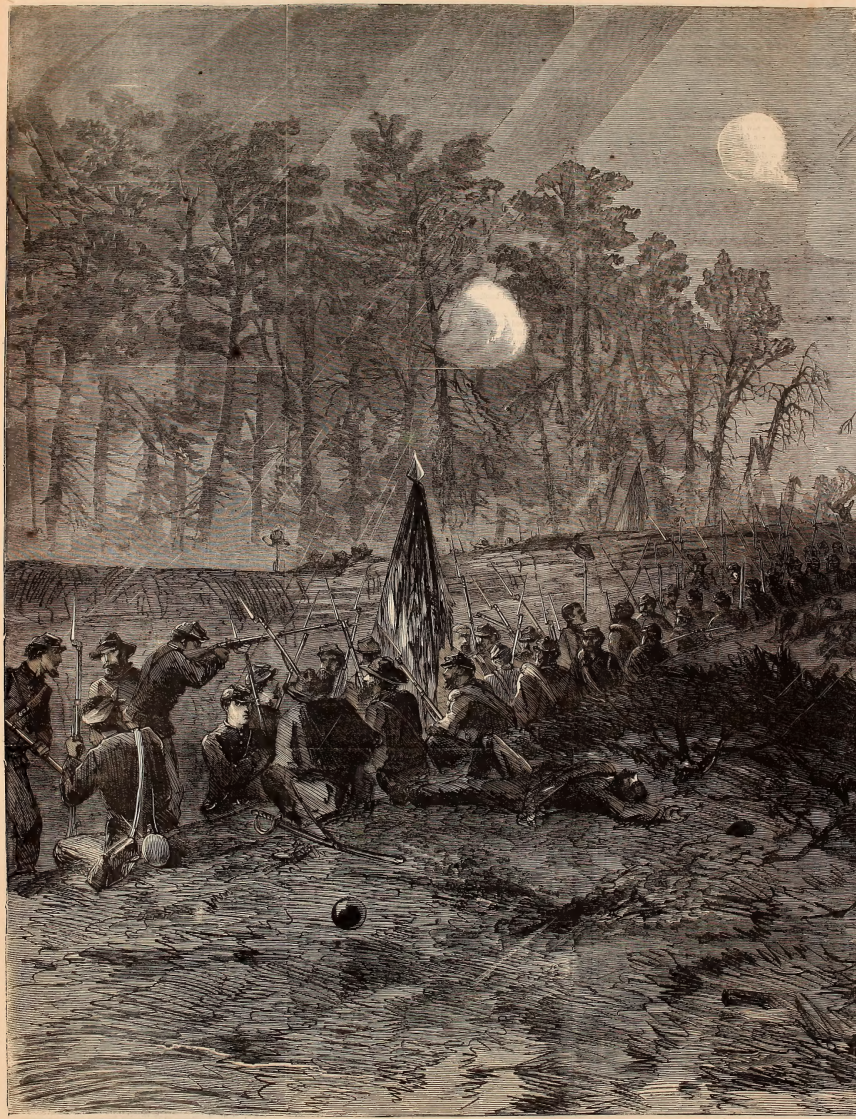
"'Now or never!' he said, and he sprang up the ladder, and, kept from falling by the tall running round it, had not held all that together.

"A day or two previously the semaphore ladder had been removed for repairs, and an old one temporarily substituted in its place. Instead with a stout rope at the top to keep it firm. Madge's nimble fingers were busy with the knots before Kulp began to ascend it, but the rope was thick, and the knots difficult to unfasten, and she shuddered to think that Kulp would reach the top before her purpose could be effected. She had contrived to undo one of the knots, and was busy with fingers and teeth at the second, while Kulp was coming slowly up the ladder toward her. Step by step he drew nearer. She tried to call to him, to warn him of the fate which awaited him, but her throat was dry-per she had lost all power of speech. The light from the lamp above her shone obliquely on his shaggy head, his coarse red whiskers, and features-up up at her, and the bare knife held between his teeth. Half a minute more and he would have reached her. Then, yielding to her last desperate effort, the knot gave way; the rope fell to the ground, and Madge, with a shriek that rang loudly and already trembling under the weight of Kulp, shook for an instant; then its top glided slowly along the semaphore-bar, and finally fell clear over the end, and fell swiftly through the air, with the terrified wretch clinging to it; and coming down with a terrific crash on the opposite side of the ridge of the platform, rolled over with its burden on to the line, just as the wildly-shrieking train forged by very into the station, and came to a dead stop a few feet from the lifeless body lying across its path.

"I, who tell you this, happened to be traveling by the mail train that night, and quickly out of the train, followed by several of the passengers, to ascertain the cause of the stoppage.

"Some time elapsed before Madge, lying insensible as far above our heads, was discovered; and when it was at length considered safe to get her down, but it was managed after a time, and the poor girl was laid on her bed unconscious of all that was being done for her; and when she did awake from her state of insensibility, it was only to lapse into a brain-fever, from which she did not thoroughly recover for several months.

"Old David turned up in the morning haggard and penitent. He had been on a drunken spree for a bridge all night, where Kulp and Carradus had purposely left him. Carradus himself got clear away, and has never been heard of from that day to this. The railway company made Madge a handsome present as soon as she got well again; but they removed her father from a situation for which he was evidently incompetent, and made him ticket-collector at Wallington Junction; and this station Madge was, at her own request, installed as booking-clerk; but I hear that she and Will Ferguson are about to be married, and I dare say you will come this way, perhaps, there will be no Madge Carlston to serve you with a ticket."



ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE STRUGGLE FOR THE SALIENT, NEAR SPOTTSY

LVANIA, VIRGINIA. MAY 12, 1864.—From a Sketch by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 382.]

PARIS LOVE-SONG

It was an April morning
When my true love went out;
The wind had never a warning,
The sky had never a doubt.
Fair and fugitive lustres
Flitted o'er thought and speech;
Hopes were hanging in clusters,
A little out of reach.

He wandered, he and no other,
Down by the little brook;
The stones sang, one to another,
"A king is coming! Look!"
The brook said, cooing and creeping
"Pray, and you shall see!"
Through the leaves he went peeping,
And there he saw—me.

Saw me, took me, crowned me,
There as I stood in my shame;
I knew that he had found me
Before I knew his name.
I went as I was fated,
Faint with and surprise;
A week and a day I waited
Before I saw his eyes.

I had never a whisper
For all the words he said;
But the hope was a pleasant hope,
It talked to him instead.
Brook, you told my emotion,
Hearing the sighs his vow;
Brook, you have not a notion
What I feel for him now!—

Feel for him now, as the days
Go sailing softly by,
Dreaming of how it stays
That out before us lie—
Dreaming of the coming time
When I his queen shall be,
All at life shall speak in rhyme
To my king and to me!

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE ONLY CITY OF THE WORLD WORTH LIVING IN.

PARIS, dear, delightful, inimitable, unrivalled Paris, city of delights, city of art, and taste, and luxury; of fashion, and elegance, and wit. Paris, unapproached among earth's most delicious haunts. Paris, the only world. Paris, the only city of the world worth living in.

Certainly. This is the refrain to a very old song. You and I, every baby else, have been singing it, always heartily, and with a kind of sincerity, never ad nauseam, ever since per railway or per diligence we first set foot in Lutetia The Beloved. There is no need to renew in mature age the vaccination we have had in our youth. The Paris virus, once imbibed, is not to be eradicated.

Of course Paris is enchanting. Every body knows it; every body says it. One may toil, and grow rich, and die in London; one may drag on an existence at Vienna, vegetate at Brussels, prowl through the year at Florence, be bored at Rome, hipped at Venice, terrified at St. Petersburg, stupefied at Berlin, excited at New York, soothed at Boston, deluded at Dublin, intoxicated at Edinburgh, astonished at Seville, amused at Hamburg, dazed at Amsterdam, fatigued at Naples, absorbed at Manchester, satisfied at Liverpool, cared at Brighton, and killed at New Orleans; but to live, to love, to see life, to enjoy life, to make the most of life, there is clearly no place in the world for man or woman but Paris.

This is an assertion scarcely worth arguing upon. Figures are unanimous. Of course, there are no bonnets in the world worth the Paris bonnets. The Boulevards are unequalled among streets. Nobody knows how to cook out of the Palais Royal. No pictures worth looking at are to be seen out of the Louvre, except, indeed, those at the Luxembourg. Who ever had a theme so trite? While I, a single Englishman, am daily sounding the praises of Paris, fifty thousand Americans, Italians, Swedes, Russians, Poles, Czechs, Moldo-Wallachs, Montegrins, Maltese, and Mussulmans are crying out that Parisian life is the life of lives, and that the only city worth living in is Paris.

Lily Black lived in Paris for seven years. Until she was fifteen years of age she never passed that gloomy porte cochère in the outer wall of the Pension Marcassin. It was her penitentiary, her prison-house; and a terrible one it was.

There was a vast play-ground; and in it, when she was not under punishment, she was privileged to walk. But the precincts she never stirred. She never went home for the holidays. The vacations at the Pension Marcassin were three days from the June de l'An, the first of January to the fourth—a week at Easter—a month from the first of August to the second of September. These holidays came and went for seven years, but she remained immured. She had seven years' penal servitude. When she grew many long tasks were set her, and these she learned and wrote, and repeated or submitted to Mademoiselle Marcassin, or, in her absence, to the governess left in charge. It was a dreary probation, and she was Quite Alone.

Lonelier when, at the end of the second year of her captivity, Polly Marygold took her departure. The girl could not refrain from sundry chullitions of joy at her deliverance from a school of which she was weary, and from a schoolmistress whom she hated, but she was nevertheless unfeignedly sorry to leave Lily.

"It's like deserting you in a desert island, my darling," she cried, as she kissed her and kissed her again on the self-same occasion of meeting of her going away; "or rather it's like leaving you in a savage country full of cannibals. For cannibals they are here, and nothing else."

"But you will write to me, Polly? You will, won't you, my dear?" poor Lily replied, twining herself round the neck of the only friend she had ever had in the world. "Oh! say that you will write to me—that you will never desert me, or I shall break my heart. I am so very, very lonely."

"I know you are, my pet. I wish to goodness you were coming with me. Who knows? Perhaps they'll turn you out as a governess some of these days. Although," she continued, with a profoundly sagacious look, "my own opinion is, that you are heiress to immense estates and vast wealth in England, and that some wicked, wicked people are keeping you out of it. Think of the good thing your name too, the cruel wretches!"

"But you will write, Polly, won't you; you know you promised to?"

"Yes, my darling," returned Miss Marygold, with a touch of sadness in her voice; "I'll write, but goodness knows if you will ever get any of my letters. Madame will 'sequestrate' them, or I'm very much mistaken. As for coming to see you, the creature had best not be encountered. Her door sears again, I'm certain. She has spent my premium, and got all she could out of dear pa; and it's very little she ever cared about me, I wonder whether they paid a premium with you, or so much a year?"

And so Polly Marygold took her merry face and her wavy black hair away, and the world became shaded a trifle darker to Lily. There remained a situation as governess in the family of a French nobleman in Brittany. It would be a relief, she said, to have children whom she were to be brought up as ladies and not as governesses.

It has been said that Lily's very name had been changed. Not much stress was laid upon her retaining or bearing her Christian name of Lily; only, as ladies were numerous in the school, she was never so addressed in the class-room. But her appellation of Boris was rigorously condemned, and she was informed that her surname of she was to be Mademoiselle Pauline. It did not much matter. Lily, as though she had not been a name at all. Once, going up into a great store-room where the girls' boxes were kept, she found a box with "Miss Lily" roughly painted out from the well-remembered trunk with which Cutwig & Co. had fitted her out; and she found a box with Miss Boris on it, because of the social extinction with which it was sought to visit her, than at the recollection of the two names passed in the class-roll, as Miss Jeanne Jeanns and Melia were so kind to her, and where Cutwig & Co. fitted out all the world.

Often, too, she thought of the old gentleman who had kissed her on the forehead at Greenwich, and talked to the strange lady in the balloon. "If he misses me," she sometimes mused, with the dinner dwelt steadfastly in her mind. She would see the splendid old gentleman with his chains and rings, and his fringe of white whiskers; the military gentleman with his black face, dyed moustache, resplendent uniform and spurs; she could hear the laughter, and the clinking of the glasses, and the wine gurgling: she was in order of battle came up to her, and tried to titillate her sense of smell. She could see the gray Thames water, the lagging barges, the ships slowly sailing across the Isle of Dogs. Essex shore in the distance, the ruddy sunset behind all. But the tall gentleman who had held her between his knees, and had kissed her forehead, and fondled her, was salient and prominent above all the picture. His hair, his eyes, his big, bushy drawl, his pitying eyes, his hands, so strongly-looking yet so tender, were all present to her. And the more she thought of him, the more she wept; but why she wept she could not tell.

Then would pass before her a terrible image. That night in the play-ground was always in the scene was. How happy and peaceful the deer seemed. With what quiet cheerfulness the dinner-bell rang, in the bright air, from the tower of the town, in the rigging of the ships, twinkled! But then the terror and angry words of the strange lady came in as a sharp contrast, and marred all this tranquil loveliness. Lily remembered how she had looked up at the moon, and looked upon her with darkling, lowering eyes. And she wept no more; but shuddered.

Now all the pleasant and quiet gulfs yawned between the few and troubled episodes of her young life. The last was the gloomiest, dreariest, strangest of all. She knew them very clearly, which the strange lady had declared to be the only city in the world worth living in.

This was Lily's Paris:

To rise before it was light in winter-time. To be moved out of bed breathless by the first cold, raw, nine-tenths of whose area were icy chill, and the tenth red-hot from the dead baking shivering presence of the stove. To hear over lessons, lessons, lessons, from half an hour after eight until twelve, then to crowd into the refectory for the second breakfast. Then (if haply she were not under punishment) to wander into the play-ground till two. Then to fag at lessons, lessons again till five. Then once more to flock into the refectory to dinner. Then after another hour's scurrying in the play-ground, if it were fine, or cowering in the school-room if it were wet, to go through an hour's hideous torture until bedtime—a torture which was called "the study hour"—a time when the girls were supposed to be meditating over the tasks of the day which had just passed, and speculating over those of the morrow which was to come—a time when neither books, nor papers, nor slates were allowed; but when absolute and immovable silence was enjoined, and the movement of a hand, the shuffling of a foot, the turning of a head, was punished by hard tasks—when a cough was pain, and a sneeze intolerable—when if a girl, rendered desperate by this excruciating command that nothing could summon break silence could be cue coûte—ask some irrelevant question, make some incoherent remark—she would be sentenced to "half an hour longer" for a quarter of an hour—to hold it literally, taking the offending member between her teeth, and forefinger, and stirring to retain her hold upon it with the most ludicrously lamentable results of slipperiness—when, if another girl, as would then happen, dropped off to sleep, she would be doomed to stand on one leg for five minutes, and so, in drowsiness that was not to be subdued, would doze off again, and stagger, and come at last to the ground—to be, to do, and to suffer all these things were among Miss Lily's experiences of the only city in the world worth living in.

She was miserable, and she had cause to be miserable. The governesses did not so much dislike as they contemned her. It was not about publicly by Mademoiselle Représmeil, as their head governess, or chief, Marcassin, had Pauline, or "la petite Anglaise," was poor, and all but friendless, and "n'avait pas de famille" almost through charity; and that the sphere in which she now moved was much superior to that to which she had been accustomed. Lily knew that could not disprove these malignant innuendoes. She could not but admit the probability of the schoolmistress knowing a great deal more about her than she knew about herself. So she let them have their way, and suffered in silence. Her fellow-sufferers were slow to take up the cue dropped by their instructresses. None of the big girls petted her. There were no rich girls in the school. The elder pupils were mostly in training to be governesses, and toiled too hard to find time for petting any one. If wealth can render laziness, it is not unkindly to the cultivation of tender-heartedness.

A rich old maid, the over-grown, petted child of some great and generous soul alive. 'Tis poverty, griping, galling, grinding poverty that makes spinsters harsh and sour.

Children are often apt to be pitiless. They have not felt enough pain themselves to compassionate in early infancy others, and they are frequently eager to inflict agony, of the scope and purport thereof they are ignorant. Lily had scant mercy from bellious and ungrateful girl to me?" interrupted the schoolmistress, with a furious look. "Aliona! It is of a piece with your other impertinence."

Lily could only sob and wring her hands in reply.

"The very clothes you have on your back have been paid for or renewed by me these two years past. You are a burden, a past, an incumbrance to the school. It is by fraud that you have learned the piano, the dance. You have robbed me of lessons in drawing and geography. Not one cent have you to pay for the police for the escroquerie of your parents—if you have any parents—little miserable, who could not have been put into the Ecole de Enfants Trouvés? Why do I not send you to the Dépôt of Mendicity? Tell me, little impudent brat!"

In a body as well as a mental rage at last, which was strange with this frigid woman, she rose and seized Lily by the shoulders and shook her. The terrified girl fled into a corner of the room, too much shattered to shriek, but trembling and holding her hands before her face.

Mademoiselle Marcassin resumed her self-possession. She was a coldly logical lady, and recognized the inexpediency of a personal conflict with a pensionnaire whose only fault was that her friends had neglected to pay their half-yearly bills. Besides, she knew that the charges she brought against the girl of being "idle, impertinent, wayfaree, and insubordinate," were groundless. There were few girls in the school more studious than Lily, and there was not one better conducted.

She sat down at her bureau again, replaced the packets in the drawer, and locked it. "A truce to these absurdities," she said. "No harm has been done yet. Let us have no more whimpering, or we will see what effect the atmosphere of the wood-shed"—it was an hour-and-a-half day bread-and-water will have upon you. Come forward, and stand in front of this bureau, and listen to me."

Lily came forward as she was commanded. She heard with her eyes, and stood before the Marcassin, pale, but composed.

"People who eat bread must earn it," remarked the schoolmistress. "Don't think I am going to keep you—pour vous beaux yeux—for your own sweet sake. If you continue to live here, you must work. Are you ready to work?"

"Yes, madame, as hard as ever you wish me."

"We shall see. If I sent you away from here, your destination would be the Prefecture de Police. You have no domicile, no papers, no name even that offers reasonable proof of identity, and I question whether the council of your nation would be at the trouble of reclaiming you. The woman who brought you here—I wish I could catch sight of her, la vauvienne!—spoke English, but she was French. She told me you had been born in France. Thus, all the police could do for you would be to send you to the house of detention—a penitentiary, understand me well—where you would be confined till you were twenty-one years old, and where you would be kept all day, either kneeling on the cold stones singing psalms, or working your fingers to the bone with needle-work, like the unhappy girls of the good sisters who have little machines and leathern thongs to keep their correctionnaires in order."

Lily's heart sank her. She had heard appalling stories of the severities practiced in the Maisons de Correction—stories which, in justice to the good sisters, conduct those establishments must be branded as apocryphal. Could they be worse stories than Lily might tell of the Pension Marcassin?

"You may remain here," continued the Marcassin. "But on a different footing. You are no longer a pensionnaire, but a fille de classe. You will do what you are told, and learn what you are permitted; and will make yourself as useful as common gratitude for being fed, lodged, and clothed should render you. We will say nothing of the question of your board and education. If I can not discover the swindlers who have covered me out of my money, you and I will have some future conversation on the matter. Now you may go."

SCENES AT FREDERICKSBURG.

In company with other delegates of the Christian Commission I reached Fredericksburg, Virginia, on the 12th of May, seven days after the first advancement of the Army of the Potomac with the Confederate forces under General Lee. The speedy which presented itself to our view as we passed down the pleasant streets to the head-quarters of the Commission was pitiable to the last degree. The town was one vast hospital; every church, every store, every dwelling, every door-yard was crowded with wounded; even the side-walks were occupied in many places by exhausted soldiers on their way from the field in search of shelter and assistance. On the day—the 12th of May—there were six thousand maimed and mangled veterans thus accommodated in this charming town, this intelligently traitorous town, lying by the river's brink, with green and smiling slopes stretching away behind it, and rows of thrifty trees spreading their broad boughs along its ample streets. Walking abroad on a tour of the day, groups of soldiers, with arms and faces bandaged, with fleshings mangled, by many leaning on crutches, some supported on the brawny arms of kindly comrades, met us at every corner. Entering the roomy churches, a wounded hero was found lying in every pew, with his dirty blanket for a pillow; others crowded the vestibule, aisles, and pulpit; while among them all nurses moved softly to and fro, some with cups of coffee and baskets of fruit, some with basins and sponges, some with bandages, lint, and clothing—all with something needed by the suffering. Stepping into a private mansion, the parlors overflowing with life, and flowers creeping up to the windows, soiled, weary, wounded men were found in every nook and corner, occupying chairs, sofas, beds, or lying on the floors, or sitting in ghastly rows against the walls, patiently awaiting necessary relief. Every where weariness was finding rest, and brave, patient souls were finding anchorage in still, homelike harbors, away from the battle's storm.

Hourly, as the days and nights slipped on, trains of ambulances from the distant field wound along the streets, passing here and there to leave additional wounded, or to bear away those who fell out the dead and dying, and carry them away on stretchers to the dead-house, or the rooms where the more serious cases were lying, to die in the course. Scarcely an hour passed, in the five days immediately following our arrival, that trains of this kind did not arrive from the front, the ambulance trains proving inadequate to the emergency. Every hour they were brought in, and, as soon as ours, the men lying flat on their backs and suffering necessarily from the incessant jolting and the absence of the comforts relied for recent and slight lances. In some instances the poor fellows thus brought in were without any thing to eat or drink for over two days.

THE HOSPITAL ORGANIZATION.

As far as possible the wounded, as they were brought in, were classified and assigned to the divisions and corps to which they belonged. In the Second and Sixth Corps the loss had been so great that several of the hospitals visible where we found them required to accommodate merely the serious cases. One principal surgeon, with as many assistants as were needed, was assigned to each hospital, the delegates of the Christian and Sanitary Commissions acting as nurses. These men labored with a zeal and fidelity which can not be too highly commended. Many worked night and day, snatching bits of sleep at odd moments, in carrying stores, dressing wounds, washing the faces of the sick and wounded, preparing food and drink, writing letters to the friends of patients, and the like. This last is a prominent feature in the work of the Christian Commission. Its delegates, in all cases where deaths occur visit the wounded, taking down particulars of the event to the friends and relatives of the deceased, always sending a lock of hair as a testimonial of the last one's remembrance of the half of the wounded whenever they desire it, with the homes they have left to battle for the nation's sake. Thousands of these letters have been written, and news from the field which might never, but for this Commission, have been informed as to the fate of absent dear ones.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE WORK OF RELIEF.

For the first week after our occupation of Fredericksburg the hospitals were in great chaos, and there was much suffering in consequence. The few citizens who had failed to join in the exodus of the population refused to render any facilities for the care of the wounded; the stores had been stripped by the Confederate soldiery, and absolute destitution prevailed in consequence. The most prominent utensils, such as cups and basins, being almost unprocurable, and the hospitals, especially, that many of the wounded were neither cleansed nor removed from the wagons in which they were transported from the field for a day or more after their arrival, and some who were carried to Belle Plain were a whole week without surgical assistance. Within a few days, however, after the first engagement, the medical and sanitary work was thoroughly systematized; adequate supplies were obtained, and the condition of the men was made comparatively comfortable. On Saturday the 14th, when we arrived, we commenced the hospitals, and probably 2000 others wandering about the streets, there were none for whom it was impossible to provide shelter. All who were conscious, and who had suffered amputations, or sustained injuries in vital parts, a great amount of suffering which it was impossible for any thing to relieve.

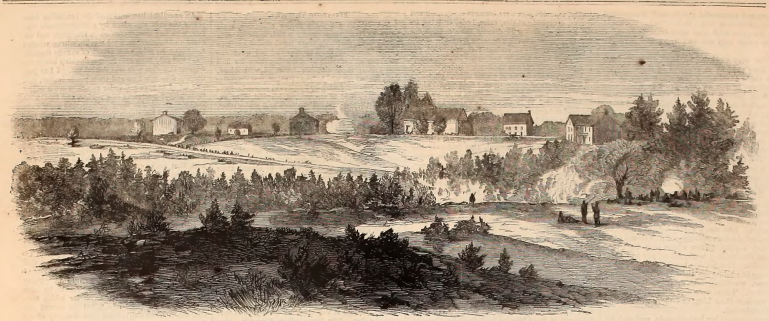
CHARACTER OF THE WOUNDS.

A large proportion of those who had gone into hospital had sustained wounds of the arm and right hand. This was the case, at least, in the last fight in the engagements in "the Wilderness," where the scrub timber and thick shrubs were a many a head, the right arm, lifted necessarily in loading the rifle, had presented a mark for the sharp-shooters of the enemy. So, firing deliberately from the cover of the brush, had thus disabled an unnatural proportion of our soldiers in the arm so peculiarly exposed. The wounds were generally slight, for the most part slight, and would not permanently disable those sustaining them. Many, however, wounded from the same cause in the right hand (generally; in some cases balls were extracted, in others broken pieces of the shell removed, and in a few eyes were shot away, the latter being a most painful wounds of this nature required the closest care and attention, and to be dressed often, and sometimes aggravated, once or twice a day. One poor fellow who fell under our care—J. H. Pervis, of the Thirty-seventh Alabama Regiment—was wounded in four places, namely: in the neck, breast, shoulder, and right arm—all the wounds having been made by a single ball. Fredericksburg had a most aggravated and offensive character, emitting a horrible odor; but the sufferer was attended to with the same care as our own men. He finally got fairly fully cleaned and dressed twice a day.

In most instances, however, the lost scratches as compared with the injuries of many who fell in the desperate engagement of Thursday, May 12. Some of the men who came in from the battle-field were literal hulks. Arms, legs, hands, feet, and in some cases even the bowels, were shot away; and for two days after their arrival in the hospitals a large force of surgeons was constantly employed in amputating fractured limbs. Walking the streets, you could see streams of stretchers bending under limp and mangled bodies, dead and living, flowing in and out at the doors; while all about groups of soldiers stood chatting with calm unconcern, simply saying, as the litters drifted past them, "There goes Colonel Hall," or "That is Private So-and-so—dead, poor fellow, at last!"

SPIRIT OF THE MEN.

Yet amidst all these scenes of horror, these pain and sufferings, under which common men would have perished, these royal-souled veterans of the Army of the Potomac did not utter one whimper or complaint. Suffering often for food and drink; their clothing saturated with blood, their limbs limp and helpless; sometimes dragging themselves on crutches by painful marches, from the distant field to the nearest hospital, they endured all with a robust patience and resignation, knowing that to join the stuff of which martyrs are made, seeming to rejoice that it was their privilege to "do and be strong" for the nation's sake. A cup of coffee, or ration of "hard tack," seemed to compensate, in their view, for all pains and misery; and the instant access of shelter and a basin of water, and the kind hands of the surgeons and nurses, on

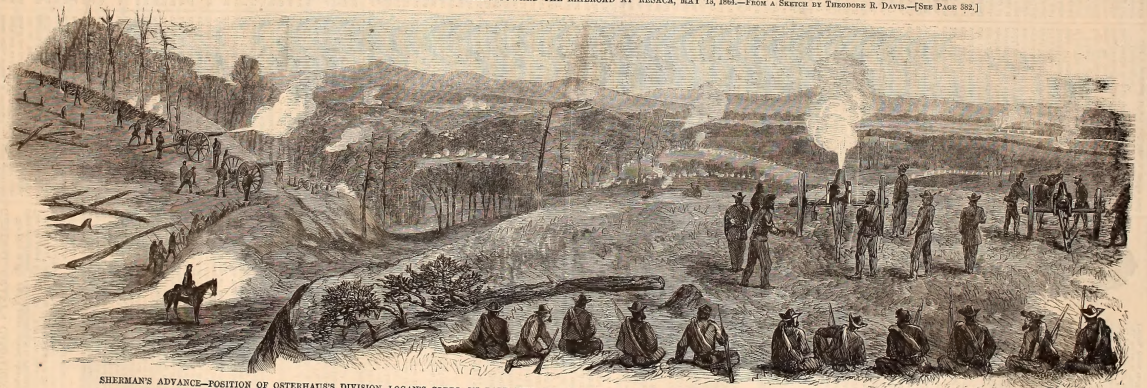


SPOTTSYLVANIA COURT HOUSE, VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 382.]

BATTERIES ON GENERAL WARREN'S LEFT, NEAR SPOTTSYLVANIA, VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 382.]

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—CROSSING THE RIVER NY, VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 382.]

SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—GENERAL LOGAN'S SKIRMISHERS ADVANCING TOWARD THE RAILROAD AT RESACA, MAY 13, 1864.—From a Sketch by Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 382.]



SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—POSITION OF OSTERHAUS'S DIVISION, LOGAN'S CORPS, ON BALD HILL, MAY 14, 1864—SHELLING THE RAILROAD AT RESACA.—From a Sketch by Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 382.]

A BLOCKADER'S STORY.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Weekly, on board the United States steamer Virginia, off Galveston, sends us the following curious and interesting story. The writer, we believe, is entirely trustworthy:

For the benefit of those of your readers who may be interested in psychological investigations, I send you an account of the following remarkable incident which occurred on board of this vessel a few weeks ago. Having captured a schooner, which was taken while attempting to violate the blockade, she was dispatched, in charge of a prize officer and crew, to the port of New Orleans, with orders to proceed without delay. At the time of the capture we had a sick man on board who was delirious, and had been given up by the doctor as past all hopes of recovery. When in health he had been remarkably quiet, but in his present excited state to talked incessantly. Soon after the schooner had left for New Orleans the sick man called out in a loud, authoritative voice, "Schooner ahoy! What schooner is that? Schooner ahoy! what schooner is that, I say?" He appeared to have some difficulty in understanding the noun, but at length said, "Oh, that is your name, is it?" "The prize schooner's name was Spanish, the Juanita pronounced Wanita.] "What water have you got?" "Five fathom—four fathom—three fathoms—two fathoms." "Look out there! you will be ashore!" "Heave the lead!" "One fathom." "Look out, you are right ashore!"

After this time his mind turned upon other subjects, and nothing was thought of his wanderings until the next morning, when he was the Juanita hard and fast among breakers on the beach of Galveston Island about two miles distant. How she went there we have not yet learned satisfactorily; but anchoring as near as possible to her we saw that she had been abandoned, and the officer and crew were prisoners in the hands of rebels.

That the connection between the ravings of the sick man and the fate of the schooner was not a mere accidental many will undoubtedly conclude; but so many developments have been lately made, showing that intercourse can be unconsciously established from one mind to another, that I can not dismiss the subject so abruptly, but will give a few more particulars concerning it.

It may be said that the man was probably a seaman who had often known the like, and that at this time the subject was by some slight incident presented to his mind. But this was not so. The man was a landsman, had never been to sea in a vessel, or even seemed to notice whether it was thrown or not. Then, again, he took the soundings correctly, within a little inside of what we were then lying, which was in 5½ fathoms, and carried them gradually in, just as the water actually shoals as we approach to the shore, and stopped at where the schooner was when among the breakers.

If it be said that although he might not have appeared to take notice of the soundings, yet he must have often heard them given, and his mind being in an unusually excited state when they were presented to it, then I would answer that the soundings two fathoms and one fathom he never could have heard; for we never go into less than three, after less three fathoms, t. e., 2*d*. Why, then, did he not stop at that point?

The time at which the schooner struck agrees, as nearly as we can ascertain, with that of the wanderings of the sick man, after which his mind turned to other subjects. He died two days after. We have since learned from deserters that no lives were lost, but we have been unable to find out the particulars as to why the schooner was run ashore.

I do not pretend to explain the relation which existed between the minds of the persons on board the schooner and that of the sick man, or even to say that there was any, but simply state the facts for those who may be interested in such subjects.

THE COAST-GUARDSMAN'S TALE.

"Goon-evening, Sir."

"Good-evening. A fine night, this."

"Yes, fine enough, but a little out of sight. Pity for us we don't have more of them."

The scene was on the south coast of Cornwall, where I had come a few days before on a pedestrian tournament of the long vacation, to seek a short repose from the turmoil and worry of the law; having labored me but on my own-born budget of Lincoln's Inn, where the old sun-dial, with its quaint motto,* seldom looked at, and still seldomer heeded, is perpetually reminding us of the fruit lessons by which we hold our lives; to seek a little rest and quiet, in short, about the quietest part of England. My lodgings at a little village public-house half a mile from the sea: and the short walks gradually extended, the regular hours and the quietness of every thing externally and externally was fast bringing me round again, when the circumstances I am about to relate took place.

It was a fine moonlight evening, and I stood gazing out of my window at the few strangers still passing up and down the village street, when a coast-guard with cane into my head to take a walk along the cliffs by moonlight. I had often thought of doing this, wondering what sort of life the Coast-Guardsmen led of it—those men by whom every inch of England, as we may, is watched most every night, and as they pace up and down, night after night, and year after year; and so I resolved, at last, to put my long-felt intention into execution.

I had been sauntering along for about half a mile, looking at the blue waves, reaching far, far out into the distance, and checkered here and there by the distant sail of some fishing-boat, gleaming silver in the moonlight, and at the long golden track, reaching from far away up to the base of the cliffs—the foot-path of the fairies, as I had been told long ago —and peopling it, in my fancy, with the light spirits of the air, tripping along in many a fantastic maze, on the glittering surface, and calling to their sister sprites in the water below, when I was startled by an approaching footstep, and, looking up, saw a man close to me, while the inviting smell from a short pipe quickly recalled me from my fancies to the sense of ordinary existence.

All that I noticed of his dress was that he had a rough pilot-coat, with a low hat, while a thick walking-stick owned his only apparent weapon of offense and defense. In short, it was with him that the sentence "first above written" were exchanged.

I soon found that my new acquaintance was one of that very body of men whom I had been pondered about; and so, having fallen into conversation, I walked on a bit with him.

"I suppose you don't have much to do now besides walking up and down, do you?"

"Why no, Sir. There's not so much doing as there used to be, now-a-days, and I dare say you see some goings on in my time—Mind where you are treading, Sir!" he exclaimed. "The cliff is not very safe along the edge, and if it 'gave' you it would be smashed on the rocks below, like a poor fellow I knew was some time ago. God rest his soul!"

"What of him?" I said. "Did any one fall over here?"

"Why no, Sir. He didn't exactly fall over, and it wasn't over this cliff, neither, but the one we shall come to after a few more strides more, and I am a bit before my time, I expect my mate won't be up for ten minutes or so; and, if you like to hear the tale, though it is not a long one, I will tell it to you on the spot where it all happened. Indeed, to say the truth, I shall be very glad of your company, for it is a wisht* night as I have ever waited there, I am always glad to turn my back on it again."

We soon reached the bay by the light of the moon. After looking along the cliff, to see if there were any signs of his coming mate, the coast-guard sat down on a stone, and I lighted a cigar, and, taking my place beside him, he began:

"It is not so many years ago, Sir, eight or nine, maybe, when a young gentleman came down here, as it might be you, to spend a month or so—our town being a quiet sort of place, Sir, that's not much a bad-looking sort of fellow, and had small and white hands. Indeed many people would have called him handsome, though there was always a kind of look about his mouth I didn't like to see. He was staying at the Royal Arms, and there was soon got tales about the town of the way in which he and two or three other wild young fellows about town, as there are, every where, I expect, got up a bit sitting up at nights, the drinking and card-playing, and the wild freaks they used to be at. But as he had always plenty of money and paid his bill every week (it was by his own wish), Polmarthen, the landlord, Sir, never cared to say any thing to him. He was a close man, was Polmarthen, and used often to be made plenty of money out of his customer; but it would have been better for him if he had never seen Mr. Hendon under his roof. His daughter, pretty Kate Polmarthen as she was always called, was the prettiest girl in the town, (though I don't guess what's coming), and many was the glass that had been emptied in her honour, and many a young man would have given his right hand to have had her good graces; but, though she was a bit of a flirt, there was none that had ever found favor in her eyes but Ralph Tregarva, a fisherman's son, fellow as ever was seen. Folks often wondered how it was that old Polmarthen ever allowed his daughter to engage herself to Ralph Tregarva, as he was only a boatman; but though the old man loved money much, he loved his daughter more, and though I hear there was some trouble about it, yet, in the end, he gave way to her in this. It was not long, however, after Mr. Hendon came down here that a change seemed to come over poor Kate. She was at silent for hours, and if Ralph came to try and cheer her up, she would answer him quite as harshly to him, and then sometimes burst into a flood of tears, and beg his pardon, and kiss him, and tell him that he was the dearest man out of sight, and that she was not worthy of him. I was a great friend of his, and I gathered most of this from him at the time, poor fellow! I was sitting in the cottage one day toward the evening, thinking it time, and he was there, when Kate came in, and when young Tregarva burst in with a face as white as a sheet, and scarcely able to stand. 'What is the matter, Ralph?' I said. He could not speak at first but staggered to a chair and fell, rather than sat, down on it, holding his face between his hands, while the big sobs shook him. Kate hastened to and shake him from head to foot, though not a tear fell through his fingers. I stood by him for some little time, but he seemed to forget that I was present at the letter, and at last I laid my hand on his shoulder. 'Come, Ralph, be a man; what is all this about?' He turned round like a flash, and I saw that I could curse you. Do you try mock at me?' and with his strong arm he struck me a blow that would have been invisible at any moderate distance; and it was with deep foreboding that I went my rounds that night. What I returned next morning I found the small piece of paper lying on the floor. It explained all. It was a letter from Hendon to Kate, evidently written in a hurry, and was all crumpled up as if it had been clenched in the fingers. No doubt it had flung down in the first moment of rage, but as it I do not know. It left no room for doubt. He urged her to fly from the village, and promised that he would privately marry her. Soon after I heard more. That same evening Kate Polmarthen had disappeared. That morning her bedroom had been found empty, and she was gone. What surprised others, though not me, was, that her father made no search after her—for he made none. He knew only too well why he had gone. Hendon was still in the village, in order, I suppose, to divert all attention from himself, as he was not aware that the note had been found, Ralph and I each keeping our own counsel. What need to publish the certainty of her shame? We heard nothing of Ralph for three days, when he returned and went about his work just as usual, but resenting fiercely any mention of the past. His manner, too, was quite changed. Oh! so haggard and wild he looked, and during a dogged kind of sullenness in place of his former light-hearted gayety. Even to me he never spoke now, and one or two attempts I made to draw him out into conversation were met with such taunts of rage that I was obliged to leave him to himself. And now I must come to the most painful part of my tale. You see that the bay below is closed in at high-tide, and is then very quiet covered. It was high-water about half-past eleven on the September evening when I was on my beat, and a bright night, just like this. I was walking along the top of the cliff, just where we are now, when I thought I heard a groan below, on the rocks there, which was nearly under water. Surprised at this, I looked over and I saw that there was a figure there, and that the sea was about and about it now up. I could recognize the voice of Hendon, and called out—'Hollos, there!' 'Help! help!' he cried. 'I am cut off by the tide. I can't swim. Send a boat. For God's sake, help me!' So it was. Incensed against him, he had, I suppose, waited there and had found himself cut off by the rising tide, which would have been the case an hour and a half before I was there, but he must have waited at least that time with the water gradually rising higher and higher. But what was to be done? Two, I had no doubt, could conceively I had taken it out, but it was only a short one, about a dozen yards long. I always carry a bit about with me. It often comes in useful, but what good was it now? I could not descend the cliff, and if I left my beat and went for assistance he would be drowned long before I could return. Even while I hesitated I heard a step behind me, and Ralph Tregarva stood by my side. I told him what was the matter, he, in the measured, dogged tone he had always used since then, though there seemed to be an exchange of every passion in his tone that day, and that made me shudder. 'I will go. Give me that rope.' 'Good God!' I exclaimed, 'it is certain death!' 'I know that, however, he shall not have the rope out of my hands, let himself over the edge of the cliff, and was going down, hand-under-hand, clutching at every bush and every tuft of grass. My head swam watching him. One slip, and he would be dashed, literally 'smashed' on the rocks below; but he seemed to bear a charmed life, for still I could see him going down, further and further, and then as a lizard, till he was only some eight or nine yards from the bottom. There he stopped. There is a flat ledge of rock there, and he lay down on it, and was still right, and I could hear him as plainly as I could you, Sir. 'Mr. Hendon!' he called out. 'Oh, thank God, you are come at last!' 'Mr. Hendon answered. 'Here I am. How can I reach you?' 'I have a rope with me; if I throw it you, can you get up here?' 'Yes, yes; be quick, be quick. The tide has risen up to my knees, and I can hold dead with cold.' 'I can't, Sir, I can't,' he cried out, with a laugh, such a laugh! It sounded like the laughter of a fiend. 'Oh, for mercy's sake, be quick!' 'Mercy!' echoed Tregarva. 'Mercy! as you have never shall be shown to you. Where is Kate Polmarthen?' 'I do not know. I do not. Indeed. Quick! the water is over my knees.' 'Liar!' reiterated Ralph, in a heedless of his agonizing entreaties. 'I have swimmed my life away once. Did you think it was to save you? No; it was to secure my revenge. Never shall you come up here alive. Listen to me. Do you know what I am? I was among the first to visit her house. Her father found a letter from you, telling her where to go, and that you would meet her. You had forgotten to put in her hurried departure. But never shall you meet her in this world. Liar! seducer! Your last hour is come. I have but to throw you the rope and you are safe. Your life is in my hands; but had I a thousand lives, and were each of them entwined in your one, I would give up all, to punish you.' Again the scream arose —Mercy! mercy!' 'Mercy!' again echoed Tregarva. 'Such mercy as you gave to him unless my, such shall you have. You shall die, wretch—die in your sins; and, as the water mounts higher and higher, think of the love you have sold and you have murdered—think of me whose peace of mind, you, in your wantonness, have utterly wrecked, and then ask for mercy.' Oh, that I could forget the fearful scene that followed. The wretched Hendon, as the water mounted higher and higher, while each wave rolled him from his feet, made a frail hold on the projections of the rock, clung to the cliff, shrieked for help, struggled prayers and blasphemies in his agony, while the relentless waves came dashing in, rearing up, with a hoarse boom, against their victim, and above all, rose the mocking yells of Tregarva, as he exulted in his terrors and sufferings, like a wild beast over his victim. Again and again I tried to make assistance was near—yelling in, and while his death-shriek still rings in my ears, Hendon was torn away from his hold. His victim fore upon him among the spray for one moment, the next he was dashed with fearful force against the rocks, and the next a bloodstained shattered body was borne out to sea. Ralph was contemplating the cliff, when, losing his scanty footing, he fell, and for one moment was suspended from the shrub he was holding, and then, as the roots gave way under his weight, he fell down into the sea to which he had consigned his victim. His body was never found. That of Hendon was recovered next day, and an inquest held. I was the principal witness, and a verdict of 'wilful murder was returned against Tregarva.

* Cousin for "dull—melancholy."

* An ice memento pendent uterinibus.

I have little more to tell. Poor Kate and her babe lie side by side in the church-yard. And now, Sir, can you wonder that I don't much like being here all alone? But I see my mate is coming, just in time, so I will bid you good-night, Sir."

"Good-night."

And I returned to my lodgings, a sadder and more thoughtful, if not a wiser, man.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

We give in this week's paper several sketches illustrating General Grant's Campaign in Virginia. That on pages 376 and 377, "The Struggle for the Salient," pictures the desperate fight of May 12, which resulted in a brilliant victory for General Hancock. A Times correspondent thus describes the struggle:

At the point at which Hancock's assault was made, at 4 o'clock in the morning, the rebel breast-works formed an acute angle, the apex of which was somewhat elevated, with a slope facing a ditch, entered the works at the salient, and swept up the banks of the right, regarding from it. Those driving the enemy a mile the latter rallied, and at 8 o'clock A.M. returned and formed a line of battle in the enemy's works. As this was the key of the whole position the fight was gradually renewed, and the main body of the army massed on the left. The Sixth Corps (Wright's) had been on the left of the Fifth Corps (Warren's) during their skirmish line, and united with Hancock's right, and converged on the salient of the rebel works. The history of the day, after 6 o'clock in the morning, is all summed up in five successive and fierce assaults, which failed to retake the lost position. At first Ewell's corps assisted in the repulse, and then Hill's corps and Longstreet's army drawn over from the rebel left, and the whole army of Lee threw itself in five desperate efforts to retake the fresh works. But it was all in vain, as every assault was bloodily repulsed.

So terrible was the death-struggle, however, that at different times of the day the rebel index was placed on the one side of the works and ours on the other, the men standing actual tip-toe upon the ramparts, and firing beyond the muzzles of their guns. Nothing like it has equaled the savage desperation of this struggle, which was continued for fourteen hours.

Our sketch presents a vivid view of this incident of all the fields of this campaign.

On page 380 we give three sketches by A. R. Waud. The first represents the Mine Ky, which is one of four known respectively as the Mat, Ta, Po, and Ny, which, together, form the Matterpoy. The Ny lies northeast of Spottsylvania Court House, and will be historical for its connection with the battle so fatally fought there.

Spottsylvania County House, as it is presented in Mr. Waud's sketch, is seen to be a mere hamlet, being made up of a few straggling woods. It is the capital of Spottsylvania County, and contains a court-house, a jail, an Episcopal church, two or three stores, and probably fifty dwellings. The name is taken from a point within the federal lines. The rebel rifle-pits appear in the distance.

Another sketch exhibits the Batteries on General Warren's left, showing their position and range.

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

We give on the preceding page two illustrations of General Sherman's campaign in Georgia. The sketch entitled General Logan's Skirmishers Advancing through a Wood represents Mr. Beaca, presents a vivid picture of the difficulties of our advance in a country as peculiarly strong for defense as that in which General Sherman has mostly operated. Mr. Davis, in sending this sketch, says: "The country hereabouts is so little cleared, and the woods are so full of brush with undergrowth, that it is by no means a pleasant undertaking to clear the forests, exposing one's self to the fire of hidden marksmen. The skirmishers went in to-day, however, with a willingness and determination that very soon rushed them in the occupation of the enemy from the woods, and the advance of our lines to a strong position, from which an extensive view of the country below can be obtained. It was in this thick underbrush that General Kilpatrick's force was routed."

Another sketch by Mr. Davis represents General Osterhaus's Division of Logan's Corps by Bald Hill, on the morning of July 21 or May 14. From this position the railroad bridge at Resaca was shelled, causing a suspension of the trains, and doing other damage. The enemy responded briskly to this fire, and several of our officers were wounded, among them Captain Sheridan, chief signal officer of General Hancock.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the great improvements in machinery, the present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, the manufacturer was on a credit and already sold at Peddle.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the premium on the Gold, Greenback Tax, &c. Therefore he has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, postage only excepted.

Reader, you can have as enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your own peculiar style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High-Premium Price of everything, a Gold Pen is actually now the cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you have ever used a "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," or next page,

The new 14th Army Corps Badge, in solid silver, $1 25; in gold enamel, $2 00. Also the new Badge for 19 A. C. at same price. Badges constantly for every Corps and Division. Silver Shields $1 each, with Name, Co., and Regt. engraved. Agents will be liberally dealt with. Send for a new circular. R. KIRK, 10 John St., formerly 102 Broadway, Cedar St. Watches, Chains, Rings, Gold Pens and Cases, Jewelry, &c.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $125 00 each.
200 Gold Watches..... 70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches... 20 00 each.
2500 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " " " ..... 3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3100 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Sleeve Buttons..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2500 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
6000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders 4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Purchasers of all the various articles, stating after each one their name, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of his Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena
RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS
(From Juries 2 and 40 at the
International Exhibition,
LONDON, 1862;
AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.
Can be served up in as luxurious variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to
WM. DURYEA, Agent, 168 Fulton St., N. Y.

Enameled Chamber FURNITURE
The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, without and chamber, plain and ornamental, in suite, wholesale and retail. Also Mattresses and Palliasses. WARREN WARD, 377 Canal St., N. Y.

DRUM PIPE PHUNNY PHOLKS and Sensible Sense for 10 of your Common Cusses. Do not fail to see No. 2 of the funniest sort of Phun, containing the most complete Budget of Conundrums, Witty Puns, and Everlasting Nonsenses ever hewed. Sold here, there, and everywhere. Price 10 cents. Dealers supplied.
THE AMERICAN NEWS CO.

A Single Box
OF
Brandreth's Pills
Contains more vegetable extractive matter than twenty boxes of any pills in the world besides; fifty-five hundred physicians use them in their practice to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their value is yet scarcely appreciated. When they are better known sudden death and continued sickness will be of the past. Let those who know them speak right out in their favor. It is a duty which will save life.
Our race are subject to a redundancy of vitiated bile at this season, and it is as dangerous as it is preventable, but Brandreth's Pills afford an invaluable and efficient protection. By their occasional use we prevent the collection of those impurities which, when in sufficient quantities, cause so much danger to the body's health. They soon cure liver complaint, dyspepsia, loss of appetite, pain in the bowels, pain in the back in the breast-bone, sudden faintness, and costiveness.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. Brandreth in white letters.
PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.
For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

WANTED.—A smart, experienced, and cultivated Lady Agent in a few hundred dollars to become part owner in, travel with, and lecture for, or manage the Public Exhibition in this country, having been doing a first-rate business, capable of extension, and repaying the investment in a few months.
It is no paroramic or minstrel show, is highly moral and intellectual, and is recommended by the press, clergy, public schools, and the masses generally.
Address, immediately,
In a dexterous, teacher, or any energetic and capable man, a splendid chance is offered, other business requiring the whole time of the present owners. Apply to J. F. NILES, Newspaper Advertising Agent, No. 1 Scollay's Building, Boston, Mass.

WANTED—Several Teachers, and experienced canvassers wanted for the "Pen-Pictures of the War," or Leaves, Incidents, and Sketches of the Rebellion. Complete in one octavo volume. This volume of gems is now ready for the press. Low terms. Subject to Lafayard Bill, 10 Spruce St., New York. Send for a Circular.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1849)
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILCOX'S PATENT ANGLE-TIP RIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Agt. No. 23 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired at Low Prices.

The Spirit of the Fair, Complete.—Now ready, bound in Illustrated Patriotic Fair Newspaper. Price $1 00. Sent free by mail on receipt of price. JOHN F. TROW, Publisher, 50 Greene Street, New York.

The Wonderful Cantering Horses.
Think of the delightful exercise of riding a horse propelled by the weight of the rider. Girls ride as well as boys. Call and ride, or send stamp for circular with prices. Inventor, Jno. Cassin. S. W. SMITH, 403 Broadway, near Broome Street.

SOMETHING NEW
IN PLAYING CARDS.
LOVE SCENES.
Designs from French Artists.
The above Cards have fifty beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards. Price 50 cents per pack; sample pack, 25 cents and two red stamps, and send for sample pack. $3 per doz. Liberal discount to Agents to dealers. H. A. HASWELL, 69 Nassau St., New York.

NEW MUSIC.
The popular Song, "Dear Mother, I've come Home to die," transcribed for the Piano by A. Baumbach. Price 25 cents.
The Ticket of Leave Polka, by J. G. Meader. Dedicated to the Foresters. Price 30 cents.
Sleep on my Darling, a beautiful Cradle Song, by Geo. Dunkle. Price 30 cents.
Albert, or Say not Adieu! A charming Romance, with Spanish and English Words, by Mrs. C. M. Brinkerhoff. Price 30 cents. Any of the above sent by mail, free, on receipt of the marked price. FIRTH, SON & CO., 563 Broadway, New York.

NEW INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.—"Yacht Club Polka Mazurka"—"The Events in the Balcony." "The Kiss Waltz Redowa." "Columbia College Polka," by Johann Hauck.—"Sweet Violets Waltz," by An Admirer." Muller.—"New Katy Did Schottisch," Henry Pryse.—"Golden Rod Mazurka," Kerrison.—"Lucy Long Schottisch," "Heart Climbings, a Waltz," "Idyllwild Polka," Keller.—"La Belle Cadiz," "Monitor Polka," "Our Flag Forever," "Laughing Gallop," Baker.—"Tender Glance Schottisch," "Lullaby of Love, a Silver Lining," "Schottisch Fair Polka," "Summer-House of Rose Gallop," Fredericks.—"Rose Bud Polka," "General Grant's March," "General Gilmore's Grand March," Vignettes, Hoff.—"Golden Rose Mazurka," Kerrison.—"Rose of Louisiana," "Rose Hill Polka," Powell, 40 cts. each.—"Livingston Waltzes," "Wallace Waltzes." They contain all the Illustrations, Parkhurst.—"Always Look on the Sunny Side," Marshall, 50 cts. each. All of the above highly recommended. Mailed free. Published by HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway.

Printing-Press for Sale.
One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x54. Price $4000.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Bathbone, Warningham, and all places accessed by Union troops, should be sent by EXPRESS'S EXCHANGE, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

Great Gift Distribution
OF
Gold Watches, Diamond Rings,
And Elegant Jewelry.
VALUED AT $500,000.
GOODWIN, HUNT & CO.,
Jewelers,
197 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send stamp for Circular. All letters should be addressed to our Box 5766, Post-Office, New York.

Heads of the Leaders.
The Hon. JOHN BROWN, Governor of Ohio: Mr. THOMAS BARNUM, the Lawyer; R. T. TRALL, M.D., Author and Physician, with Portraits, Biographies and Characters. Also, "How to Become Rich," "How to Succeed," and "How to Write." Personal Identities. The Science of Forces. Heads of Men and Women Compared. Self-Government. The Human Will. Efficacy of Prayer. Dreams—their Cause and Significance. Premonitions of Death. Talking in Sleep. Foretelling Events; with Phrenology, Physiology, Physiognomy, Psychology, and much other interesting matter, in the JUNE NO. ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

FIELD, NAVY, and OPERA GLASSES manufactured by B. H. HORN, Opticians, 212 Broadway, corner of Fulton St.; also every description of Microscopes, Telescopes, Spectacles, and Eyeglasses at wholesale and retail. Send for Circular.

D. BARNUM'S
"SELF-SEWER,"
FOR ALL SEWING-MACHINES,
Preserves the Eyes, avoids bending. No basting.
NO Machine complete without it. Price $3, 50, with DIRECTIONS, sent by mail. For sale for all Machines, at the inventor's manufactory, VILLOCQ & GIBBS Sewing Machine Office, 508 Broadway, New York.
D. BARNUM.

Whiskers! Whiskers!—My Onguent will force them to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Price 25 cts., or 6 packages for one dollar by mail. Address
DR. FRANKLIN, Colchester, Illinois.

Standard Goods.
The reputation of Dr. Burnett is a guaranty of the good quality of his manufactures. It is sufficient to say of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts, that for their purpose, they are not inferior to his celebrated Toilet Articles.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES!
For sale by the Adams Press Co., 20 Ann Street, N. Y. Send for Circular. Specimen Sheets 10 cents.

Attention Company!
Clark's Onguent, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustaches in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Any person using this Onguent, and finding it fail as represented, by returning the empty box can have their money returned them at any time within 6 months from date of purchase. Price $1 05. Sent safely and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.
Address, A. G. CLARK,
P. O. Drawer 115,
Albany, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW
A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.
Among the valuable matters treated in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Piles, Liver, and Kidneys, Dyspepsia or Digestion, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Sexual Organs, Self-Abuse, Barrenness, Impotency, Seminal Weakness, Syphilis, Skin Diseases, Mercurial Diseases, Diseases of the Heart, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Throw Aside Spectacles, Deafness and Sexual Philosophy. The Philosophy of Marriage, Causes of the World, Philosophy of Digestion, Philosophy of Sleeping, a Chapter for the Married, Hints to those of value to married and single, never written before, and which will be worth a book for every family. Illustrated with numerous wood engravings; 100 pages; 100 illustrations. To be had of the Medical Agents. Consultation free. Price $1 00 in all applicants, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 00. Address R. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1129 Broadway, New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in 21 weeks upon the smoothest face; without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post-paid, with advice on exercise of the face. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

U. S. Artificial Leg Depots, 658 Broadway, N. Y.; Rochester, N. Y.; Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where Government Pensioners for the loss of a Limb or Injury to Soldiers gratis, or the value applied on the Amputation of a Limb. Rock-a-Doleed Leg, which has lateral motion at the ankle like the natural one.
DOUGLASS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.
For instructions address Dr. BLY, as nearest Depot.

CARPET WARP
AND
WOOL TWINE.
Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 94 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine Wringer, manufactured by mail for 20c. Sold for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 179 Chatham Square, N. Y.

New Army Watches.
ARRANDALE & CO., Importers, 167 Broadway, New York, want Agents in every county and every regiment, for the sale of their new styles of Watches. Extraordinary liberal terms are offered to Agents. Send for circular.

Sunlight within my Heart, a gem of Song. Why I lived here. Fresh March. I lived that dear old life no more, each 25 cents.
Musician's Omnibus, 700 tunes for flute, violin, or flute, $1.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Hewyer, N. Y.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Everlasting Pencils. Several articles in use. Sample sent free. Address JOHN E. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN, THE BEST OF ALL PENS,
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.
On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.
For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 50 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Boy's Pen; for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in size to numbers 0, 2, 4, 6, and 8 respectively.
THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.
For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.
Any of the Gold Pens, Gold-Mounted Gold Pens, with Iridescnia Points, the average wear of which is ten years, will be fitted to a gross of the last Steel Pens; although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchanged.
MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.
The name No. 2, "Premium," "Diamond," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident.
The Numbers indicate size only. No. 1 being the smallest, and No. 10 the largest. Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.
Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Numbers 4, 6, 8, and 10, and made only of fine quality.
The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are broad, Coarse Business points. The engravings are fac-similes of the name and styles.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.
For $0 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 25 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 75 a No. 5 Pen; $2 a No. 6 Pen; $2 25 a No. 7 Pen; $4 a No. 8 Pen; $5 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.
THE SAME PENS, IN SILVER-MOUNTED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.
For $1 50 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.
For $1 75, a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.
For $2 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.
For $2 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.
For $3 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.
For $3 50, a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.
GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK HOLDERS.
For $3 50 a No. 2 Pen; for $4 a No. 3 Pen; for $7 50 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 50 a No. 7 Pen.
For $4 50 a No. 3 Pen; for $6 a No. 4 Pen; and for $6 a No. 10 Pen.
The "Lucky" Pen is supplied with the very best Iridescnia Points, carefully selected, and none of the quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.
The "Lucky" Pen is superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.
The "Lucky" Pen intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity and Good Writing Qualities (the three essentials) any Gold Pen ever manufactured.
In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that, from the use he has made of the Improved Machines, he could not have made as Good Writing and Durable Pens, for prices, less than he now offers them contemplatively.
Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wished, and in particular to describe the Point by Person—whether it is for limber, coarse or fine.
All communications sent by mail or otherwise, letters are at my risk; and to all who send twenty cents (the charge for registering a letter), in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will guarantee their safe delivery.
Pens repaired at short notice, or will be altered the full premium on receipt of 50 cents.
Any Pen 10 per cent. discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $15, of 20 per cent. on sums of 30 per cent. on sums of $50.
Address, C. MORTON
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

Union Playing Cards.
Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Midas for Jack. 52 enamelled cards in the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags—red, white, and blue, and you pay all internal taxes. Two packs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. Agents wanted to introduce the trade. Send for Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY, 14 Chambers St., P. O. Box 6,000, New York, N. Y.

Have you Seen
Fowler's Celebrated Adding Machine?
For proving additions in the ledger, tallying weights or measures, ascertaining the value of articles, &c. Sent by mail or express upon receipt of price, $5 00. Address Lock Box 3,000, Boston, Mass., or 161 Broadway, Room 2, N. Y. Send for Circular.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by writing to Dr. Ure, box 2531, New York. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.
ALL KINDS AT BARRETT'S, 52 BROADWAY, N. Y.

SELF-GUIDE FOR SEWING MACHINES. $1 by mail. NEEDLES WITH GUIDE, 50 cts. by mail. Buttler's Needle and Sewing Machine Depot, 667 Broadway, N. Y.

$12 WATCHES. $12
An elegant Watch, set in very heavy Silver Case, of splendid finish, silver capped, ruby jeweled, fine English movements, warranted for 3 years, and regulated, promptly forwarded on receipt of Twelve Dollars.
TIOGA, ARCE & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.
P. O. Box 2256.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:
BARHAM'S HISTORY. A Novel. By AGNES D. FARRANCE, Author of "My Brother's Wife," "Maud and Glove," "The Story of Carnarlan," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.
A POPULAR HAND-BOOK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By GEORGE CURRIE MCWHORTER, Lima, Ohio, $1 00.

GRANT TURNING LEE'S FLANK.

TROPICAL BALSAMAN

Prepared by Carsons Brothers and Co.

This celebrated and unparalleled medicine, composed entirely of vegetable balsams, gums, and herbs, has many years past had the most popular support of both Allopathic and Homœopathic practitioners, for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Croup, and all other diseases of the chest and lungs, including Consumption, in its first stage, and for the relief of which it is unequalled. Every dose relieves, and its regular use for a few days will cure the most distressing Cough, Cold, Hoarseness, Asthma, or Croup. Public Speakers, Singers, and Actors will find it a most valuable preparation to clear the throat and strengthen the voice. Sold by all Druggists. Depot, 21 Platt Street, New York. Principal Office, 13 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass. Branch at the above corner constantly supplied.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON,
MEERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS,
672 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y.,
Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $5 for sample pipe.

50,000 Agents Wanted.
Hand-Guarettes for Army Badges, Gold Pens and Cases, Compasses Pins and Medals, Watches, Jewelry, &c.
Send for Wholesale Illustrated Circular
B. T. HAYWARD,
305 Broadway, N. Y.

Don't buy your Gaiters or Shoes without Fogg's Patent Lever Buckle.
They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can enclose Ten Cents Currency, and I will mail sample of two patterns.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
63 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

WARDS SHIRTS
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.
WARD'S,
STEEL COLLARS
ENAMELLED WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collars, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.
Price 75 cts. each; sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 90 cents.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, 397 Broadway, N. Y.

Wheeler & Wilson's Highest Premium
LOCK STITCH
Sewing Machines.
625 Broadway, New York.

Keep it before the People,
That Fish's Patent
COOKING LAMP
Is the only article known with which you can cook
THREE ARTICLES OF FOOD
AT ONE TIME,
WITH ONE BURNER,
over a
COMMON KEROSENE LAMP
OR GAS BURNER, and not confine
ONE CENT
to proper cooking.
Manufactured by
THE KEROSENE LAMP HEATER CO.,
206 PEARL ST., NEW YORK.
Send for pamphlet and Price list. Address
WM. D. RUSSELL, Prest.

Cherokee Medicines.—Every reader of Harper's Weekly is requested to send their address to us, and we will mail free of postage our 32 page pamphlet securely sealed, giving valuable information. Address Dr. W. R. Manvin & Co., No. 61 Liberty St., New York.

VERMILYE & CO.,
No. 44 Wall Street, New York,
Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,
converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.
The Bonds of new 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

U. S. Army Agency,
61 Sherker Street, N. Y., opposite Pay Department.
All persons having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.
Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid:
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying small objects 500 times. Mailed free everywhere for 35 CENTS, or FOUR for $1.00.
Address J. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

GUNS, PISTOLS,
Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
34 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris,
Sands St, Birmingham, Eng.

What is more to be desired than
A PLEASANT HOME?
Whoever would know the secrets of making home pleasant, should read
HOUSE AND HOME PAPERS, by HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Thirty papers are published in each number of the Atlantic Monthly
and have attracted attention everywhere. They are full of interest and benefit to every household. They will be continued through the year. Subscribe to the ATLANTIC at once, and secure the reading of these invaluable papers
The ATLANTIC is furnished at THREE DOLLARS a year, postage paid, or 15 cents a number. Clubs supplied at reduced rates. Send 85 cents for a specimen to TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

Munro's Ten Cent Novels.—These Books have received a popularity that has never been equaled by any other Publications in the same space of time. Every one should read them and recommend them to his neighbor. They are No. 1. The Hunters.—2. The Trapper's Retreat.—3. The Patriot Highwayman.—4. The Hunted Outcast.—5. The Track of Fire.—6. The Man-Eater.—7. Charlotte Temple.—8. The Death Fiend.—9. The Indian Slayer.—10. The Tiger of the Ocean.—11. The Traitor's Triumph.—12. The Ocean Rovers.—13. The Fiery Cutlass.—14. Zeke Sherman, the Lion-Hearted Scout.—15. The Scourge of the Seas. For sale by all News Agents, and sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, 10c. each. GEORGE MUNRO & CO., 137 William St., N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, enameled dial, cut hands, English Movements, and warranted time-keeper.
A single one sent free by mail in neat case, WITH A KEY-RING, for only $7.
A NEW SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$15 European Timekeeper. $15
OR, COMPASS WATCH.
A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Foil" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Genuine English Jewels or Ruby Movements," "A 1 Time-keeper." Independent Action, Self Balance, and has a SELF-REGULATING COMPASS sunk in the top and attached to the movements, making it a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time-keeper, "warranted one year." WILL STAND ACID, and is an

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch,
Used by the British Army Officers.
Sent free by mail, in elegant Morocco Case, for only $15.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct timepiece; and for beauty and finish they are equal in appearance to $100 watches."
Address LYMAN, P. NORTON & CO., Importers, 58 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the SOCIETY HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.
Send for a prospectus to
VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOVEREIGN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 75 cts. per bottle. LAPONEA, FOR THE HAIR, ESTRANT, CREOLIA, but only barnes' re-formation, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. PEARLY FOUNDATION, THE DELIGHTFUL OIL, 75 cts. MAGNOLIA PHILOCOMA, THE LIQUEFIED PO-MADE, 75 cts. One sixth off by the dozen.
If your druggist has not these articles, take no other, but remit with your order to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 125 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and they will receive carefully packed.

Shults' Ongnent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 50 cents. Address C. F SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

IN those cases of scarcity, retarded growth, the person over 19, by its peculiar stimulating power, the Balsam of the Tuumerous Syrup Birch has been found to excite the Beard, &c., to a fine and vigorous growth. History and a small sample box of this Balsam, sent sealed, on receipt of return postage.
JOHN RAWLINS, 853 Broadway, N. Y.

Grover & Baker's
Higher Premium
Elastic Stitch Sewing Machines,
495 Broadway, New York.

The Graefenberg Company's
UTERINE CATHOLICON (Morrhuine),
An Infallible cure for "Female Weakness," and all Uterine complaints of women.
Price $1 50 per bottle. Five bottles for SIX DOLLARS.
GRAEFENBERG VEGETABLE PILLS.
The best Pill in the world for family use, and for all Bilious and Liver complaints. Price 25 cents per box.
Address all orders to J. F. BRIDGE, M.D.,
Resident Physician GRAEFENBERG COMPANY,
No. 139 William Street, Box 7ulton, New York.
☞ BEWARE OF DEALERS EVERYWHERE. ☜

Moths placed near
CEDAR CAMPHOR
will in 21 minutes, and even their hair in ten. Cedar Camphor is stilling to insects life. Bugs breathing through their skins are killed as soon as touched by cedar camphor, and the best protection for Clothes and Furs against Moths. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Pastured by HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Boston.

"The only enamelled "Turn-over" Collar made in metals. Send 31 for a "Turn-over" or 75 cts. for a "Chancy" to C. H. HUNTING, 94 Fine Street, N. Y., and receive it by return mail.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, below Broome St.
IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety.
COLORED STONE CHINA DINNER SETS.

AGENTS WANTED to sell the NATIONAL ALMANAC AND ANNUAL RECORD FOR 1864. An indispensable work for every one. 10,000 sold the first week. Address GEO. W. CHILDS, Publisher, 628 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Watches and Jewelry
Of every description.
Orders, large or small, faithfully executed. Established 20 years.
T. B. BYNNER, 175 Broadway, New York.

Gold Watch Free
AND
$15 Per Day, $15
Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large-Size Stationery and Prize Package. $25 can be made in a few hours by any one. The guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid steam GOLD OR SILVER WATCH and Gold Chain (warranted) presented free to each Agent. Persons wanted to establish Agencies in every town and village. Circulars free. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra inducements, free. S. C. H. RAUBE & CO., 105 Nassau St., N. Y., Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the world.

MASON & HAMLIN
One to Twelve Stops. $75 to $350 each.
CABINET ORGANS
An illustrated catalogue free to any address. Address MASON BROTHERS, NEW YORK, or MASON & HAMLIN, BOSTON.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT
DRY AND GROUND IN OIL
In several rich shades
For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.
ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

Steinway & Sons,
Manufacturers of Grand, Square, and Upright PIANO-FORTES, have removed their Warerooms to their new and spacious Marble Buildings, Nos. 82, 84, and 86 Fourth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

The Celebrated ORAIG MICROSCOPE, combining Instruction with Amusement, is mailed, post-paid, for $2 50; or with 8 beautiful Mounted Objects for $3 25; with 24 Objects, $5 50, by HENRY CRAIG,
180 Centre St., New York.
Also, he will mail, pre-paid, the Beliscope or Inverted TELESCOPE, with a sliding Focus and Field-Piece, according to all eyes, for $3 00; with 12 assorted views, $6. A liberal discount to the trade.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT
Hardens and invigorates the Gums
Purifies and beautifies the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.
Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.
HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,
215 Greenwich St., New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:
NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS; or, Sketches of a Girl's Life. Written by her Sister. With an Introduction by Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

SPEKE'S AFRICA. JOURNAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE. By John Hanning Speke, Captain H. M. Indian Army, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society, Hon. Corr. Member and Gold Medalist of the French Geographical Society, &c. &c. With Maps, Illustrations, and numerous Illustrations, chiefly from Drawings by Captain Grant. 8vo, Cloth, Uniform with LIVINGSTONE, DARTH, BURTON, &c. Price $5 00.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00. Payment invariably in advance.
Terms for Advertising—Fifty cents per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

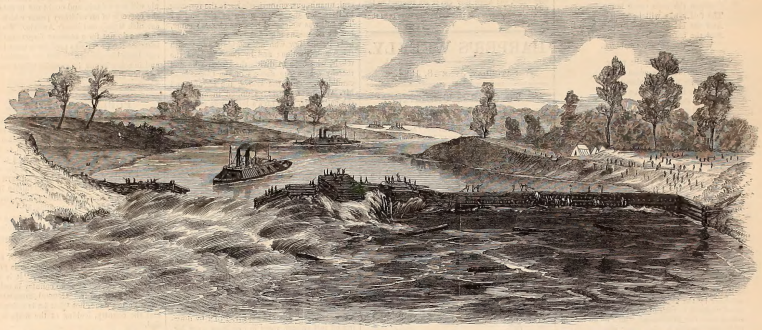
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
TERMS.
One Copy for Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00. Payment invariably in advance.
Terms for Advertising—Fifty cents per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

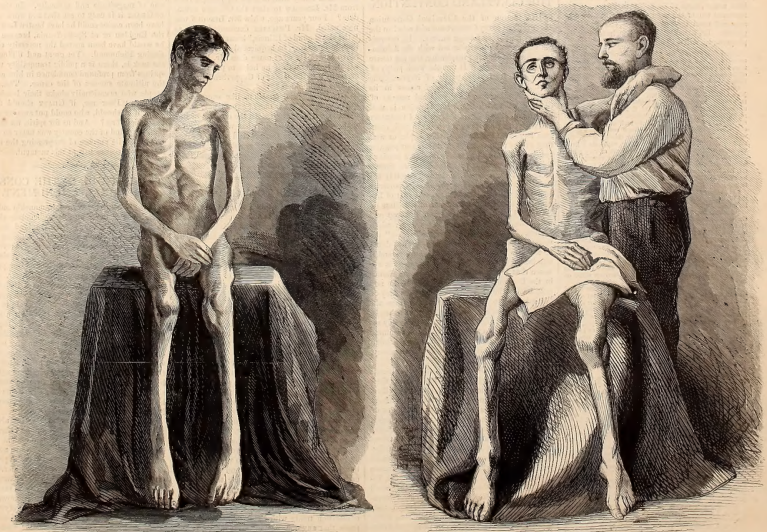
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 390.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



PORTER'S GUN-BOATS PASSING THE DAM IN THE RED RIVER, NEAR ALEXANDRIA.—SKETCHED BY MR. GEORGE SLATER.—[SEE PAGE 395.]



REBEL CRUELTY—OUR STARVED SOLDIERS.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN AT UNITED STATES GENERAL HOSPITAL, ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

WHEN THE BOYS COME HOME.

THERE'S a happy time coming
When the boys come home,
There's a glorious day coming
When the boys come home.
We will end the dreadful story
Of this treason dark and gory
In a sun-burst of glory
When the boys come home.

The day will seem brighter
When the boys come home;
For our hearts will be lighter
When the boys come home.
Wives and sweet-hearts will press them
In their arms, and caress them,
And pray to bless them,
When the boys come home.

The thinned ranks will be proudest
When the boys come home,
And their cheer will ring the loudest
When the boys come home.
But all shall see the traces
Of battle's royal graces
In the brown and bearded faces
When the boys come home.

Our love shall go to meet them
When the day has come home,
To bless them and to greet them
When the boys come home.
And the fame of their endeavor
Time and change shall not disever
From the nation's heart forever
When the boys come home.

JOHN HAY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON.

FURTHER PROOFS OF REBEL INHUMANITY.

EVIDENCES of the inhuman treatment of our prisoners by the Confederate authorities at Richmond continue to multiply. We give on the preceding page two illustrations which afford indubitable proof on this point. These illustrations are made from photographs taken in the United States General Hospital, Division No. 1, Annapolis, Maryland, under Charge of Dr. Z. C. ARCHIBALT. They represent two of the unfortunate prisoners as they appeared upon their return from the Richmond prisons. Dr. ARCHIBALT WALLACE, in sending the photographs, writes as follows:

These two pictures are what may be called good specimens of the sad cases which are brought to the hospital from the prisons and Belle Isle. They are from the worst of the cases, and those worst cases from a humorous body, both are dead.

Out of one hundred bad cases brought in by boat on May 7 thirty have since died. Dr. VANDERKIEF said they "called from the effects of neglect and cruel treatment at the hands of the enemy." Dr. V. is an honorable, upright, and warm-hearted gentleman. The question is asked, "Is the condition of the originals of these pictures entirely due to starvation, or to their want of clothing which has reduced them?" I answer this by giving the statements of two of the men, which are, with only a little variation of time and place, the statements of very many —of all, in fact, whom I questioned. The variations are when I did question were in different parts of the hospital, had been taken in at different times, and could have had no collusion with each other in answering my questions.

I take from my note-book first the statement of Corporal W. M. SMITH, Co. D, 12 years, Company D, Eighth Regiment Kentucky Infantry:

"I was captured in September, 1863: was on Belle Isle six days and nights without shelter. They took away my blanket and gave me nothing. It rained or we were wet, by at night in the cold dew and frost. While in prison, after leaving Belle Isle, in December, I got sick and had worse the same summer duties in which I was captured: I lay on the floor. I never had any bed since I was in it, nor any cover. After I got well of the small-pox I had to wash my clothes, but I had given them all away. I came to me to this hospital in the same clothes. Diarrhea came on after I got sick."

The poor fellow was so shrivelled up that he looked like that of an ape. It was sewed and wrinkled and in folds. He could have taken a bed-cord and have pounded it to him, and inquired what he wanted it for. He then talked with emotion, and said, indeed, he had suffered, and, as the tears gushed from his eyes, said, "To talk of starving to death!" I rejoiced when I found that the picture was a failure, for a sight of that face in a picture, I really believe, might have killed the mother who bore him.

The next picture was as shrivelled up, but not quite like that of an ape. It was sewed and wrinkled and in folds. It could be taken by a bed-cord and have pounded it to him, and inquired what he wanted it for. He then talked with emotion, and said, indeed, he had suffered, and, as the tears gushed from his eyes, said, "To talk of starving to death!" I rejoiced when I found that the picture was a failure, for a sight of that face in a picture, I really believe, might have killed the mother who bore him.

Another statement, that of Private JACKSON BROWNING, aged 20, Company D, Sixty-fifth Regiment Indiana Mounted Infantry, is as follows:

"I was captured December 16, 1863; was two months on Belle Isle. Had no shelter of a tent, ever was out in full of holes, and the water came through. A good many had no shelter at all; I had. Got no new clothes. Was not from me my bed and cup, and gave me an old jeans rag sack. They took my overcoat, two blankets, and gum blanket. I had been but three times on Belle Isle. I think it was in the month, for I never saw such treatment, and never lasted any of the same queer taste. I never had enough to eat while I was on Belle Isle; my ration was not near enough to satisfy my hunger. I got bacon and bread every day, until the two months my stomach gave out; and then the weakness came on, so as bad I left. I had to eat my rations or starve. I gained and rubbed it off and on as I could. Taxes in the last month of my confinement diarrhœa came on. I was sick the hospital on March 24, 1864. I am getting stronger and better every day. My weight was 130 pounds. My height is 6 feet 1 inch."

This man (BROWNING, who thus weighed originally 185 pounds, I carried down stairs in my arms and weighed. He was 24 months in the rebels' hands, and had never been sick in his life. He weighed on May 19, 1864, 104 pounds, and he had then been eight weeks in the enjoyment of abundant nutriment, with stimulation and every attention that the United States hospitals. What would he have weighed when he first came from prison? I do not know. I have seen the skeletons brought in the hands of the rebels for months, but I have never before been released when a month before I saw them. Upon his arrival here the hospital the nurse and the surgeon both assured me that his fore-arm was so thin that it was transparent between the bones when held up to the sunlight. Certain it is that I have never seen a more emaciated human form, whether alive or dead, and yet he said that he was gaining flesh and strength every day. What must he have been one month before I saw him? For at this time he could not change his position in bed without assistance. His stomach was in such condition two days after, not from disease, that when he was first admitted he was fed on milk, a teaspoonful every fifteen or twenty minutes. It was all that he could bear without vomiting. The kind nurse and surgeon put food by and ate right his behalf failed to do more than support him for a time. He died shortly after I left Annapolis—died of starvation.

The daily ration of those men in the prisons and on Belle Isle was, first, a piece of corn bread, made of unsifted corn meal, dark and heavy. Its size is five inches long, four inches wide, and one inch and a half thick. I have seen these rations brought here as specimens. Second, as a drink-ration, they generally receive two pints of meat three times a week. Sometimes not nearly as often. They have had two ounces of meat once every day. When sick with diarrhœa they have the same rations with the addition of a little corn meal mush and the Indian and repulsive.

The portion of these men's depletion is perfectly plain. Under the combined effects of bad and deficient food their stomachs gave out. Then came congestion, loss of appetite, nausea, weakness; then diarrhœa, and often completion of the hunger of atonic diarrhœa, the result of imperfected blood and deficient powers of circulation. So they suffer, and die, or they are returned to the hospitals, where, under the care of a humane country, for whom to care for those whom, for whose country, for whom they are so humanely and their own, they have been thus sorely afflicted.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1864.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received the following official decision from the Post-office Department in Washington:

"In reply to your letter of yesterday, I have to state that the 74th sec. of the Postal Law of 1863 authorizing Book Manuscripts to be sent at printed rates of postage can not be so construed as to include articles for Newspapers and Magazines. You must so advise the Book Manuscript publications. I am, etc.,

"Acting 1st Ass't Postmaster-General."

SEC. JOHN B. L. SKINNER,
Section 26 of the Law prescribes "that if any matter on which by law postage is required to be prepaid at the mailing office shall reach its destination without such prepayment, double the prepaid rates shall be charged and collected at delivery."

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY must therefore give notice to Correspondents that all communications sent to them by mail must be prepaid at the rates of letter postage—i. e., three cents for every half ounce; and that communications on which the proper postage is charged will not be taken from the Post-office.

Also, that the return of Book Manuscript for which the full amount for postage should be inclosed. Where this is not done, the manuscript will be destroyed. In no case the writers will be charged at the Post-offices double rates—i. e., six cents per half ounce.

They regret this, where possible, to all MSS. weighing more than four ounces should be sent by express rather than by mail.

THE CLEVELAND CONVENTION.

THE action of the Cleveland Convention gratified every Copperhead and rebel in the country and every foreign enemy. Its ostensible motive was dissatisfaction with the Administration, but its chief inspiration was the desire of personal revenge. It was the work partly of angry and intriguing, partly of impracticable men. That some of the chief actors in its proceedings have especial personal reasons of dissatisfaction with the Administration is well known; and that Messrs. PARKER PILLSBURY and STEPHEN S. FOSTER represent in their opinions any great multitude of the people, or that they are by nature qualified to lead or to express sympathy fitted to be leaders in such a crisis as this, nobody familiar with their careers, sincere in each of them during the last twenty years, believe. The only name of practical importance connected with the Convention was that of LEONARD BORDWELL, formerly Governor of the State of New York, and one of its most honored and honorable citizens, and his letter was read in silence, his suggestions disregarded, and the work of the Convention assembled in great part. It came to nominate General FRÉMONT, and it nominated him. His friends announced in advance that they would not accept the platform in the Convention, and, making a puerile and base insinuation, declared that if he sent any of his minions to the Convention, whatever the consequences should be upon their own heads. Refusing to verify credentials the assembly received itself into a mere meeting, and assuming to speak for the American people, for foreign nations, baptized itself the Radical Democracy, and adjourned.

It is indisputable that any number of citizens have a perfect right to meet and express their opinions, and nominate candidates for any office. But it is to be remembered that in a time so much of extreme national peril the practical union of all faithful citizens is a high moral necessity, and that calmness, forbearance, and prudence are imperative patriotic duties. When, therefore, a practicable and usual method of ascertaining the general popular wish is opened—when all voters who have given their support to measures of the Government by every efficient means, including the overthrow of Slavery, if that shall be deemed essential, are invited to send representatives of their views to a Convention, then every citizen who wishes to maintain that unity, and who knows that his private preference must, by the highest necessity, yield to the general conviction, will abide by the action of that Convention. If he is of opinion that the policy of the Government is weak or slow he will do what he can to impress the public mind with his views. But, failing to succeed, he will not do all that he can to change that policy for one which, by giving the Presidency to the friends of rebels, substitutes treachery for weakness, and which, instead of slowly defending the right makes haste to yield to the wrong.

The Cleveland Convention was called by men who despaired of controlling the Union Convention at Baltimore. When they saw that the overpowering tendency of popular preference was for MR. LINCOLN, they denounced the Baltimore Convention as packed, and called another to meet a week previously and nominate another candidate, with the intention of saying that the nomination at Baltimore, after a Union candidate was in the field, was a willful schism at the moment of the Union party. Was this a loyal and honorable action, or was it an indication that personal passion was stronger than patriotism? Were the gentlemen who met at Cleveland really the representatives of the great mass of the Union men of the country? Was the response to the call before the meeting general, unanimous, enthusiastic? Is the response to its action the hearty assent of the nation? The call was welcomed by three classes: some, but by no means all, of the extreme abolitionists; by the few who are morbidly angry with the Administration; and by the friends of the rebels, who hope to divide the Union vote and thereby secure the success of the Copperhead candidate. Thus the World, the Herald, and MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS united in approving the call. MR. PHILLIPS's letter was read with enthusiasm to the Convention, while MR. RONALDSON was denounced. Now there is no question that the united Union vote would triumphantly prevail in November. There may be a question whether it can be divided and yet the Union party succeed. MR. PHILLIPS and his friends take this chance; and if MCCLELLAN should be elected he will owe the heartiest thanks to MR. PHILLIPS and the Cleveland Convention.

If it be asked why should not the friends of MR. LINCOLN give way to those of General FRÉMONT, the reply is one of fact; namely, that every sign shows MR. LINCOLN to be, upon the whole, the candidate most acceptable to the great mass of the Union party. If this were not so, if this were not known to be the truth, why should the Copperhead journals so lustily cheer MR. PHILLIPS and the Cleveland friends? It is because they hope and ardently pray that these gentlemen may do what MR. BURNEY's friends did in 1844, when they helped MR. POLK by cutting off just enough votes in one State from MR. CLAY. Can the better part of the Cleveland gentlemen really wish to draw off enough votes from MR. LINCOLN to elect the Chicago nominee? Four years ago, when MR. LINCOLN was nominated, MR. PHILLIPS denounced him as "the slaveholders' candidate," because he thought that, in some way, he acquiesced in the Fugitive Slave Law. By what name does MR. PHILLIPS expect to be known if he helps to put this Government into the power of Copperheads and rebellious slaveholders?

The Presidential question, like every other question in politics, is one of expediency, not of abstract, absolute right. In the conduct of human affairs we must do what we can, upon a fair estimate of facts. And will any suggestions, unbiased man deliberately say that he thinks it more practicable to elect General FRÉMONT than MR. LINCOLN?

A BAD MEANS TO A GOOD END.

THE Secretary of State has written a letter explaining his action in the ARGUELLES case. He says that our laws make the slave-trade piracy, and in our treaty with Great Britain we pledge ourselves to keep upon all Powers the duty of putting a stop to the traffic. There is no treaty of extradition between Spain and the United States, and the surrender of ARGUELLES was made, he says, in pursuance of the law of nations. There is, indeed, he adds, no obligation to return a fugitive without a treaty, but a nation is never bound to furnish asylum to criminals against the human race; and if the comity of nations by treaty might seem to be properly practiced, he thinks it was in such a case as that of ARGUELLES.

Now that ARGUELLES was a criminal of the worst kind every one has read the facts of the case as stated will deny; and we shall all admit that it was very desirable that, the accusation being true, he should be sent home to Cuba to be tried and punished. If there ever were a case in which a man might be summarily seized and conveyed by force from a State, as precisely stated, was the case. But the Secretary has only to ask himself whether he would have treated in the same way a pirate who was accused of destroying a Spanish ship at sea, and who had escaped to this country, to perceive that the act is not to be allowed. His excuse shows, what was not disputed, the purity of his motive; but it proves conclusively that there ought to be an extradition treaty with Spain; but it does not prove that any officer of the Government is authorized arbitrarily to imprison and deport from the country a person who may or may not be the person who may or who may not have committed a crime with which he is charged against the laws of another country with which we have no understanding upon the subject. The Sultan of Turkey never exercised a more absolute despotism.

The slave-trade being the foul crime that it is, and the Spanish Government being, as this case shows, so very anxious to lay hands upon offenders, and the seat of the offense of sale being so near us, the true answer for the Secretary to give the Spanish Government would have been the proposal for an extradition treaty. That would have covered this case and all others. It would have shown to Spain that we did not wish to harbor her most infamous criminals, and would have been the most practical and the expression of a general alarm that the guarantees of personal liberty had become less sacred in the midst of war.

If for any reason an extradition treaty is impracticable, then a law of Congress prescribing the method in which the surrender of criminals shall be made is the other alternative. But if neither course is adopted the extradition of such persons is impossible, because the American people will not submit, and ought not to submit, to the exercise of an arbitrary power which would astonish Russia and justify Austria. We repeat that we do not for a moment forget that in this instance the power was used for a most humane and laudable purpose. But at another time, and in other hands, its exercise might be inconceivably disastrous.

PUBLIC CONFIDENCE.

THE good sense of the Secretary of War in issuing daily bulletins of the campaign can not be too highly commended. It is another proof that the fact that we have settled down to war in earnest, and that the country wishes to know only the truth. The good results of the system is seen in the deaf ear which we all turn to the mere rumors of the street and bulletin boards, and in the question universally asked upon every fresh intelligence, "Is that official?"

This happy result is greatly enhanced by the public confidence in the perfect truthfulness of the reports of Generals GRANT and SHERMAN. There is no rhetorical display in them. Lieutenant GRANT drives the enemy to cover, and he does not instantly telegraph that he is pushing them in disorder, he says that he is "in defensive advantage," and the country is calm because the General is. General SHERMAN tells what he has done, not what he is going to do, and the country, looking at the map, is satisfied.

Every body understands that the task before GRANT and SHERMAN is, as the President says, one of magnitude and difficulty. In the case of GRANT it is easy to see that the work would be immensely simplified if the rebels had left the Rapidan or at Spottsylvania, because then he would have been spared the necessity of besieging Richmond. For a great deal of difficulty the task is, there is a public tranquillity which springs from profound confidence in him and in the ultimate success of the cause. There are people who are habitually shaky their heads and whisper, "Dear me, if GRANT should fail!" Well, if he should, who could put another army in the field? And as the last hope of the revolution, the mind of the country was never so firmly fixed in its purpose of suppressing the rebellion at any cost as it is at this moment.

THE VOTE UPON THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

THE difference between statesmanship and partisanship was never more conspicuously shown than in two late events. In England the disfranchisement of the laboring classes has been a source of anxiety, and seemed to threaten the peace of the future. In America the slavery of the negro race has complicated our public affairs, and has engaged civil war. Yet MR. GLADSTONE, a member of the British Cabinet, and by birth and sympathy of the governing class, in a speech at Manchester, has proposed that provision shall be made for a great enlargement of the franchise; and he does it because he thinks it just and expedient. The men to whom he proposes to give a vote are, he contends, just as fitted for it as those who already have it, and that the immediate relative agitation of the question ought to be anticipated and prevented by wise concessions. This is MR. GLADSTONE's policy; and the result is universally, more honored and powerful in England to-day than ever before.

Now in our own country we have the always perplexing and exasperating question always at issue. Whatever its moral excellence as a system may be, there is no doubt that while men are men it will always be the most angry political question, as it has hitherto; disturbances and differences which have ended in war. The fundamental idea of the Constitution was the practical abolition of emancipation, and of consequent removal of this source of vital irritation. In the very presence of the terrible mischief it has occasioned it might be thought that every legislator, from the highest motives of expediency, would favor its lawful, constitutional disappearance. And yet fifty-five American representatives, professedly calling themselves Democrats, or friends of equal rights and fair play, voted against the simple proposition to ask the people of the country whether they wished slavery to be abolished. There was but one solitary and most honorable exception upon what is called the Democratic side of the House. Every so-called "Democrat" voted in favor of human slavery, except JOHN A. GRISWOLD of TROY, New York, whose name shall be gratefully remembered.

It is a sorrowful and shameful record. Henceforth no service that these gentlemen can render to the country, no protesting enthusiasm for the Union and the Government, no noisy gasconade about liberty and man, can conceal the disgraceful fact that while the war which they have produced holds us all steeped in blood to the lips, and imperils civilization itself, they deliberately voted against the chance of lawful and peaceful emancipation. Mr. GLADSTONE, with the sagacity of a statesman who knows that whoever enlarges liberty, in any direction, is dear to the heart of man, has taken a step which will always rejoice those who follow him and bear his name. But with what bitter regret and indignation will the descendants of these fifty-five gentlemen remember that their ancestors dealt this deliberate blow at justice and liberty!

REBEL CRUELTY.

THE pictures which we publish to-day of the effect of rebel cruelty to our prisoners are hard to look upon; but they are not fancy sketches from descriptions; they are photographs from life, or rather from death in life, and a thousand-fold more impressively than any description they tell the terrible truth. It is not the effect of disease that we see in these pictures; it is the consequence of starvation. It is the work of desperate and infuriated men whose human instincts have become imbruted by the constant habit of outraging humanity. There is no civilized nation in the world with which we could tie at war which would suffer the prisoners in its hands to receive such treatment as we now get from the rebels; and the reason is, that none of them are slaveholding nations, for nowhere are human life and human nature so cheap as among those who have learned to hold their fellows as property.

The Committee on the conduct of the war have made the most searching investigation of the condition of returned prisoners, and their report of the cruelties to which they have been subjected is accompanied by the evidence. But no evidence is like these pictures. The Committee say:

"The evidence proves, beyond all manner of doubt, a determination on the part of the rebel authorities, deliberately and systematically practised for a long time, on the subject three of our soldiers who have been so unfortunate as to fall into their hands to a system of treatment which has resulted in reducing many of those who have survived and been permitted to return to us to a condition both physically and mentally, which no language we can use can adequately describe.

* * * * * * *

"The general practice of their captors was to rob them, as soon as they were taken prisoners, of all their money, valuables, blankets and good clothing, and that, upon their arrival at Richmond, they have been compelled to sell blankets or other covering, in buildings without fire, or upon Belle Isle with, in many cases, no shelter, and in others with nothing but old disused tobacco sheds, interposed by rents and holes as to present but little barrier to the wind and storms.

* * * * * * *

"In respect to the food furnished to our men by the rebel authorities, the testimony proves that the ration of each man was totally insufficient in quantity to preserve the health of a child, even had it been of proper quality, which it was not. It consisted usually, at the most, of two small pieces of corn bread, made in many cases as much as the witnesses state, of corn and cobs ground together, and half cooked and soaked; of, at times, a small piece two ounces of meat, usually of poor quality, and unfit to be eaten, and occasionally a few black, unripe sweet potatoes, or something of that kind. Many of our men were compelled to sell to their guards and others, for what price they could get, their clothing and blankets in order to be permitted to receive of that forwarded for their use by our Government, and to obtain additional food and vegetables to sustain life; they, by endeavoring to avoid one privation, suffered another from the same cause—the want, on the part of the rebel authorities, of the common humanity in respect to clothing and covering that they were in before they received any from our Government. When they became sick and emaciated in consequence of starvation and privation, and were admitted into the hospitals, their treatment was little, if any, improved on that of prisoners; they doubtless suffered less from exposure to cold than before. Their food still remained insufficient in quantity and altogether unfit in quality.

* * * * * * *

"Your Committee, therefore, are constrained to say that they can hardly avoid the conclusion, expressed by so many of the returned soldiers, that the treatment they have been referred to are the result of a determination on the part of the rebel authorities to reduce our soldiers, by starvation, by privation of food and clothing, and by exposure, to such a condition that those who may survive shall be unable ever so as to be able to render any effective service in the field. And your Committee accordingly ask that this report, with the accompanying testimony be referred to the proper and testimony in relation to the massacre of Fort Pillow, at Memphis, in their opinion, no less than the other, the result of a predetermined policy. As regards the authorities of the rebel newspapers, that our prisoners have received at their hands the same treatment that their own soldiers in the field have received, they are evidently but the most glaring and unblushing falsehoods. On no one instance cannot be designated by such statements have been most insidiously men, in the prime and vigor of life, yet have died by hundreds under the treatment they have received, although required to perform no duties of the camp or the march; while the rebel soldiers are able to endure long and rapid marches, and to offer a stubborn resistance in the field."

We hope not to be told that such pictures will make children shudder, for we should certainly be amazed if they did not. Such pictures are for parents to ponder. This is the spirit which inspires the rebellion. How is it to be cast out? Can any thing which makes American citizens capable of torturing other American citizens in this fiendish manner be safely tolerated? Shall we lop off the branches, or shall we uproot the tree?

"OUR MUTUAL FRIEND" AND "DENIS DUVAL."

THE second number of the new story by DICKENS, published in the July number of Harper's Magazine, is finished. The Sloppy and Mr. Nick Bodfin are two of his most characteristic figures, and the reading of the Decline-and-Fall-of-the-Roundabout-Empire is one of his most rollicking pieces of melodramatic humor. Indeed the tale opens like a very earthquake of melodramatic incidents. The two numbers have introduced persons and mysteries and threads of interest enough to keep attention and wonder unflagging for a year. In Lizzie Hexam we have one of the pathetically and powerfully-drawn women which, like Little Dorrit and other of his creations, are among the most beautiful tributes to English literature to womanly character. Thus far, with the exception of the second chapter, which undertakes what DICKENS can never accomplish—a good description of "society"—the story is laid in that lower order of London life which the enemy cannot fail to find unscrupulous. Its queer, quaint, shifting play of light and shadow are nowhere so wonderfully varied as in this. The characters are all sharply drawn by any one who impresses you as a master. The shop and the business and the personality of Mr. Venus—the street stall and vocation of Mrs. Boffin's Wegg—the Harmony Jail, or Boffin's Bower, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, with their strict regard for social distinctions—the "Mrs. Boffin" Wegg," said Boffin, "is a high-flier at Fashion, and her make is such, that she does it credit. And Mrs. Boffin, Wegg, I hope to find that you come to be. Henceforth, old lady, this is the gentleman that's going to dedicate and sell your Decorations"—the—the inn of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters and Miss Abbey Potterson, who presides over its destinies—all these things of real life are in the true fancy which makes the reader almost gasp to reflect that they are written by the author of Pickwick and Martin Chuzzlewit. Mr. Venus's parlor and the Boffins' their places with Joseph Andrews and Roderick Random.

But THACKERAY'S "Denis Duval," of which the third part is in the July Harper, might have been written by a younger hand. Delightful as it is, in power, and in style. The exquisite finish of this tale is unsurpassed, and the picturesque interest with which it invests the little Kentish town and the characters of the English sea-coast a hundred years ago, are very remarkable. There is a delightful ease of conscious power in it, and as we draw to an end of the number, and, musing over the tender little scene with which it concludes, remember that there is but one more—for it is finished—we feel that the rich and generous mind that were never so kind and generous as in this story, we close the book with a sigh and a blessing.

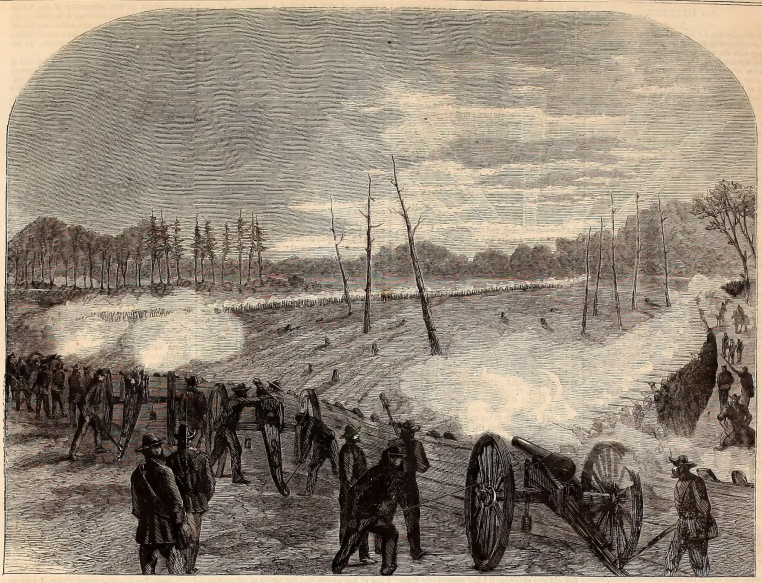
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

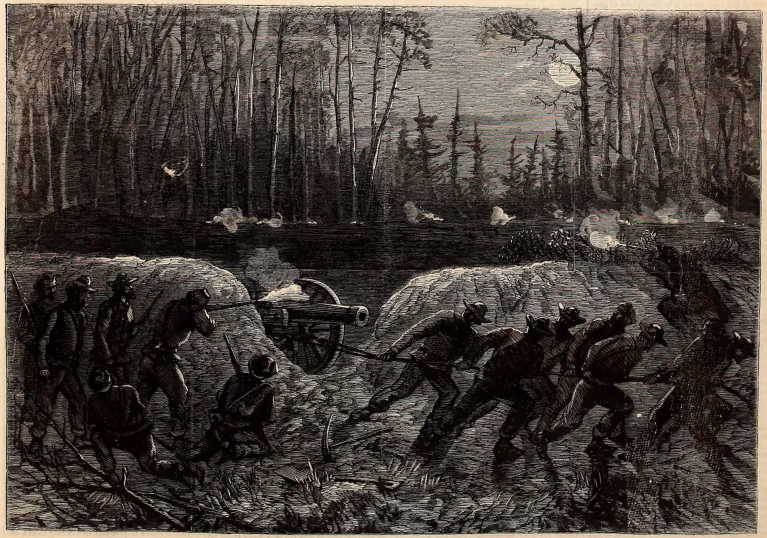
SENATE.—June 1. The Senate bill to amend the act relative to public printing was passed.—A resolution was adopted requesting the Secretary of the Interior to transmit to the Senate all information received by him from our agents, what they have done in relation to selling the Sioux public interests.—June 2. The House bill to expedite the settlement of claims in the Treasury Department and elsewhere, the bill relieving the professors of the West Point Academy of liability to military service, and the joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant-General Joseph Hooker, and the officers of the Nineteenth Army Corps, for his skill and ability in extricating our gallant army from Chattanooga, were passed.—June 3. The consideration of the Internal Revenue bill occupied most of the session.—A resolution was adopted calling in reference to the tax on tobacco.—June 4. The House bill to provide for the better organization of the Invalid Corps, Invalid Brigade, Odds Volunteer Militia, was passed.—The bill to amend the act of February 25, 1863, to prevent fraud on the United States of lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, House bill, was finally passed.—The bill to pay Wisconsin her five per cent. on the proceeds of public lands, House bill, was passed.—June 6. The bill giving 100,000 acres of land to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a Military Road from Green Bay to Lake Michigan, was passed.—The Internal Revenue bill, with the same amendments, was reported and were adopted.—June 7. Several bills were reported but no final action was taken.

HOUSE.—June 1. Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill for the construction of an Indian Bureau Railroad, for the use of military and postal purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.—A resolution calling for a report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing amendments of the Senate to the Army bill, and for a report in the Missouri contested election case of Birch contesting Mr. Knox, was adopted.—The amendments of the House discharged the Committee on Elections from any further consideration of the subject.—June 2. The bill prohibiting member, relative to the Indian Bureau Railroad, was referred.—June 3. The session was mainly occupied in discussing the Conference report on the Missouri contested election case of Birch contesting Mr. Knox, which was finally adopted.—June 4. The bill to amend the act relative to the settlement of claims in the Treasury Department, and elsewhere, was passed.—The House bill relieving the professors of the West Point Academy of liability to military service, and the joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant-General Joseph Hooker, and the officers of the Nineteenth Army Corps, for his skill and ability in extricating our gallant army from Chattanooga, were passed.—June 7. The consideration of the Internal Revenue bill occupied most of the session.—A resolution was adopted calling in reference to the tax on tobacco.—June 8. The House bill to provide for the better organization of the Invalid Corps, Invalid Brigade, Odds Volunteer Militia, was passed.—The bill to amend the act of February 25, 1863, to prevent fraud on the United States of lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of railroad lands

THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA—CHARGE OF LOGAN'S TROOPS AT THE BATTLE OF RESACA, MAY 14, 1864.—FROM A SKETCH BY THOMAS R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 388.]



THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA—ROBINSON'S BRIGADE, OF HOOKER'S CORPS, SAVING THE FIFTH INDIANA BATTERY, MAY 14, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 395.]



THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA—GEARY'S DIVISION DIGGING THE GUNS OUT OF A REBEL BATTERY BEFORE RESACA, ON THE NIGHT OF MAY 15, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 393.]

AN HEIRESS.

I.

HOW grew tired of her work—it was some tedious lace-copying—and flinging the pen down with a little weary sigh she went to the window for amusement, or for sight-seeing. Plenty of the last there, for the window overlooked a busy street; and soon Hope's brighter face did not belie her name. Take a long look at her now at this point of her life, for Hope Carroll is to play a very important part in this history; is even now, as she stands there in the small plain room, a very important person, though she is yet unaware.

Well, what do you say to her? She is not in beauty; no, but the attractive in the very teeth of that demurrer. Attractive from the crown of her head, with its wavy hair, to the sole of her shoe, which shows royal hollow as she stands a tip-toe—for she is not tall—and leans out to catch another glimpse of a passing figure that pleased her eye. Oh, not a beauty, but delicate and fair and womanly in mould, and motion, and tone. There is about her too a look of soft youth, yet Hope is deep in her twenties. Miss Miles who lives across the way would tell you, with that peculiar triumphant smile that some women assume when they are enlightening you on such subjects, that Hope was twenty-six every day, if she did "stren so young."

Hope was young, but merely by seeming but in all interior life. She had about her, or within her an ever-springing freshness which made for her an immortal youth that would last until her dying day. So, as she stands there now with the weight of, it may be, even twenty-six years, there is this odd quality of young grace in her movements and expression which her life of planning care can not utterly overwhelm. Her day's work is almost done, looking down the gay street she forgets her weary toil in the dreams and fancies the constantly changing faces suggest to her and those some one of these many faces will look up, and a smile and bow pass for greeting to her. In this observation of hers two light steals and she turns away with a little sigh from her peasant pastime, yet half holds still to her dreams as she goes to the tinkling of the tea-bell. Only she and Aunt Mary at the small round table; only she and Aunt Mary in the small tenement. They two make the home there; a very pleasant home, though it has its cares, its anxieties, which proceed from that rough jarrier—Poverty. There is a trifle that goes out with Aunt Mary: that is not half enough to support them, and Hope in her capacity of copyist makes up the principal. Hope, if you were but a friend, would tell you that she was certainly one of the most favored of women in having such constant occupation, such good and constant employers. Her clear and legible chirography would be enough to answer all that, and you should wonder perhaps that with such constant employment, so well paid, that Hope wasn't richer woman. But consider this girl, with her delicate though by no means physique, and do not wonder that she can not confine herself for eight or ten hours of each day to the close, moveless occupation of a copyist. Well, you would see a trifle that fresh bloom upon her cheek which deepens as she seats herself at the table under a brilliant globe of gaslight.

Hope, will you take marmalade to-night?

Hope sits gazing into the little amber and gold gilt-cup that Aunt Mary always places for her, and answers irrelevantly:

"And shape them with cinnamon."

"What!" half questions, half exclaims, Aunt Mary.

Hope lifts her head and laughs. The dream clears, and she comes back from her fancy-wanderings to answer more sanely: "No, I will not have any marmalade, thank Mary."

"Hope, what were you thinking about?"

"Thinking? I wasn't thinking, Aunt Mary. I was sitting at a banquet—

"On golden dishes and in baskets bright
Of wreathed silver: sumptuous they stand."

And I don't know, I believe I was the queen of it, and was listening to some sort of a tingly fellow as he talked splendid nonsense to me.

"King of it, was she, and to them, srited to thee?" sung Hope in conclusion; her quotation fitting only to some dinner fancy of hers.

Aunt Mary laughed, and asked Hope how she could condescend to come down to such simple fare and to only her society after that fine feast and company. Hope laughed back, and told her that she brought her company with her; and as for the feast, nothing so easy as to turn this amber cup into gold and the veal and ham table-furniture changed just as swiftly into "wreathed silver" and cut-glass. The marmalade melted into "—dainties than the creamy curd."

The little white biscuits became French puffs, and all imaginable sweets and wonderful wines glistened and glowed in the fairy table.

"Just like Duke Humphrey's dinner. Ah, Aunt Mary, did you ever read that story, 'Duke Humphrey's Dinner?' You shall read it, Aunt Mary, soon, then, and I too. It was the most charming and delightful thing. I read it long, long ago in one of Harper's Magazines. Ah me!"

And Hope, though she smiled, looked a little wistfully at the amber cup. By-and-by:

"Aunt Mary, I should like to be rich, and be queen of fete and feast. If I were rich, Aunt Mary, I should be handsome."

There was the least tinge of bitterness in the sarcasm of this remark. Aunt Mary made some demurrer against the sarcasm, not the assertion, which Hope took up.

"Oh, I don't mean that the gold would gild my face entirely; I have more vanity than that; but I mean that, with its prestige and the pretty fresh things it would buy me, I should be discovered by the new undiscovered world to be a beauty. Not that I should be that, but pretty, fresh things, and artistic taste in the arrangement of them, would make any woman more attractive."

Aunt Mary rallied Hope a little on her ambition and her vanity, but Aunt Mary did not moralize. She had the genius to sympathize with what she had long passed, and her gay raillery at Hope contained no restriction or reproof. Thus these two, so wide asunder in years, were closer than many comrades of the same age. But after the raillery the good lady opened another subject, some project or plan of housekeeping, and the fairy feast was all out of sight, when rat-tat came the postman's knock upon the door.

Hope did not even look up when Aunt Mary took the letter the carrier handed to her; for Hope had no curiosity and little interest in the postman's visit. She had no young-lady love for letter-writing, which was quite natural when you consider that her daily occupation gave her enough of that kind of employment. Aunt Mary, on the contrary, had correspondents in plenty; nieces, nephews, and cousins scattered through several states, and so found. The rat-tat of the postman, then, had deep interest for her. But this letter puzzles her. She puts on her spectacles and carries it nearer to the light.

"Why, Hope, it's for you."

"For me?"

Hope reached over, and taking it into her hands, recalled as Aunt Mary had done, even the direction before she opened it. Toronto! She knew no one in Toronto. What could it mean? She broke the seal, and reading the contents, her surprise did not seem to abate.

"Aunt Mary, who is James Reston?"

Her face was pale now, but full of the surprise that was in her face.

"James Reston? Why, Hope, it's your Uncle James—your mother's brother."

"How stupid of me! I had forgotten. We children always called him and his wife Reston, and I had quite forgotten his name. I always think of him as Uncle Jim Colman."

"I know I was so young when your grandmother married again. But what has the letter to do with him, Hope? Has he remembered you after all this time?"

Hope handed the letter to Aunt Mary that she might read it for answer to her question. And Aunt Mary did read it, but found little in the letter contained? It contained Hope's fortune. Yes, nothing less; for it was as good as that, though couched in very cold commercial terms by the will of James Reston she, Hope Carroll, was sole heiress of all the lands, estates, and funded property of James and Jane Reston. And Hope was forthwith summoned to appear before the courts of Toronto to prove and establish the said Hope's identity. Aunt Mary was watching Aunt Mary's face, and knew when she had got to the end of the letter.

Hope's eyes were staring out of a sensation novel equal to this, Aunt Mary? That this uncle, whom I haven't seen and have half forgotten in all these years, whom I never knew, who was rich, or bad, or indifferent in the time, should suddenly appear to us after death in the form of a will like a prince's? Aunt Mary, do you suppose it's true? I feel odd and elvish, as if I had stepped into a fairy ring and some fairy's nerve-wand were about me."

"Nonsense, Hope; it's all fast and sure enough; but very strange, it is true."

Hope knew it was nonsense, but she was steadying her emotions a little by this gayety. They sat and talked, Hope hearing her part very soberly for a while, as they planned their journey, and all the little details concerning it; but after a while the fairy spirit broke out again, and Hope was to steady her emotions but as an outlet of exuberance.

"Ah, Aunt Mary, I'll have the purple silk gown I've always wanted, and laces, and jewels, and bracelets in abundance!" Hope had a barbaric taste for ornaments. "We'll ride in a coach every day; I do hope it will be green, a pumpkin as we drive up to the door, auntie. And I'll have a feast like the one of my fancy, with the basket of silver and the gold cup, and I'll be queen of it.

"All in a purple gown she stood
Her hair within a diamond snood.'

I shall be a beauty then, you may be sure, auntie;

"For through the diamonds her hair
Shine soft as silk, and still more fair.'

Ah, that last, that rose upon her cheek."

"Hope, go to bed," said Aunt Mary. "Your head is getting light."

"But the best of all is, auntie, you shall sit with folded hands from morning until night."

"Hope, I should be tired to death of it."

"You shall go to routs and balls then, every evening, and not come home till morning."

Hope's gay voice here failed her. The two looked at each other for a moment and the tears came into the young and old eyes. Deep within both their hearts swelled the tide of thankfulness for this easy and plenty, of freedom from anxiety and care, that had come to them.

II.

In the brilliant rooms of Mrs. Hofman Grey there was a little buzz of expectation, which sometimes amounted to a slight waiting-bush. What was it? All the reigning belles had arrived. Even Mrs. Marsh and her beautiful twins, who always made a sensation. A young man standing by Ellen Marsh broke into his pretty party talk to say:

"My cousin, George Dane, says the old house on Ludlow Square is turned into quite a palace of art. George, you know, is a judge of art."

"Oh!" the little beauty looked thoughtful a moment and forgot her flirtation. "How I wish I knew her well enough to call," she ended, animatedly.

"George is quite intimate there," the young man resumed.

"He admires her, doesn't he? Thinks her very handsome?" the fair Ellen asked, archly.

"Yes, he admires her, but I can't believe George thinks her very handsome. She has wonderful style and air, I'll admit, but her face is cold and irregular; yet I've known fellows as fastidious as George, and with as critical a knowledge of the lines of beauty, fall vivaciously, after they had known her a while, of her beauty. You know—"

Young Ranger did not finish his sentence: he stopped to watch the entrance, as did his companion, of a lady who was making her way toward her hostess at that moment—a lady young and with the aspect of beauty. Or who watch her unexcitedly will not call her beautiful; but we will admire the marvelous grace and art of her dress, which in every detail is suited to the wearer, which so calls out every fine feature, which conceals every bad or indifferent one. It is not a brilliant, showy toilet. And Mrs. Hofman Grey, who likes people to adorn her rooms with their most splendid attire, seems to feel it pointed and aggrieved that the special guest to whom she looked for magnificence should present herself without a single diamond, or even a pearl, to do honor to the occasion. George Dane, that wise, far-seeing critic, stands aloof and observes this scene. He sees the sympathetic Mrs. Grey's face. He knows what it means; and there is an expression on his own face, a half smile of appreciation, which, if you saw it, would tell its own story. George appreciates the taste that consults only becomingness, and enjoys truly an artist's eye the lovely grouping of flowers. Lilies to real that you would need to catch their odor, and, looking into their dewy hearts, would expect to see the yellow pollen powder the pearl silk and floating lace. As Mrs. Grey's eye detects this lace her brow clears. Mrs. Grey understands all the various grades of the delicate fabric, and this tender, fairy-meshed stuff counts for diamonds in adornment. So with her floating hair. She knows the rare consciousness of perfection in her costume, which gives her something that smiling ease which a woman must always feel with that consciousness. Hope Carroll goes down the room to meet and speak, to receive greetings, and exchange them with men and women who two months since did not know of her existence. She perceives the value of it all—and there is some value—and she knows the vanity thing it is worth—an opportunity to be present at fine pageants, to have the power to know the many, to find the few, to hear and to see, and never be worth hearing or seeing. So Hope enjoys herself. Her enjoyment is of a vastly amusing kind; sometimes a little bitter-sweet, as when she, though she realizes the world she does not think so very badly of it generally.

"It is natural for people to go where there are fine rooms full of fine things: is it unnatural that these should be? Are bouquets or the scenery of them finer people than in different surroundings? I don't find fault with this, Aunt Mary; but I wonder whether, if I had all this wealth, there are half a dozen persons who have become fond enough of me through these surroundings to make them so in the little home with them. And Hope would give a faint sigh as she concluded.

Hope had been prophetic of herself in declaring that she looked beautiful in the gay shining of her wealth, and the power of adornment it gave her. Just as Mrs. Grey, especially, did not see what subtle taste brought such effects of color and outline. They looked, and saw, through soft surrounding and in soft and sumptuous lights, a fair face that looked fairer and fresher for the surroundings; a form that somehow expressed itself by contrast and harmony in such graceful ways that they exclaimed at once, "What a beautiful woman!" There was one at least—George Dane—who understood, but, understanding, only admired the more. He was one of the many whom fortune and fashion brought to her door; for Hope was herself in fashion. As a attractive young woman with an almost unlimited income, how could this help being the case? Mrs. Grey was not the only one of Hope's many admirers. He was one of the few interesting people whom she welcomed for their genuine joy or appreciation. She was not exactly of the former class: he was scarcely genial, with his half satiric unbelief, his philosophic cynicism; but he was certainly one of the few. Hope with her keen sense of wit and humor, and her insight and experience of life.

Yet yet and then as he sat in her parlor, which was one of those rooms in what he had named the "palace of art," as he sat there talking interestedly and interestingly, he would would fit to the small plain room in the little plain house on Martyn Street, and he would wonder if George Dane was one of the few who would follow her there. It was a question she was not anxious to put to the test. This evening, as she went through the rooms with that smiling ease he certainly did not follow her or pay her any court. Hope liked this. It was a change. But by-and-by he came up with his cousin Will Ranger.

"I want this boy to know you, Miss Carroll," he said, lightly, with a certain air that said as well, "You will honor him."

The "boy" lent his graceful young person before the famed beauty, and he felt blind lame and impotent for his boyish blush and slight embarrassment, and George Dane turning at the appeal of his hostess, the new acquaintance was left alone together for a few moments. Danger, fresh from his first parties, and the pretty belle and the accomplished young girls like Ellen Marsh, was taken captive by the soft, subdued graciousness of this maturer woman, whose tone was pitched on its youthful aspect. There are some women and some men who have a way of smiling slowly upon you as you speak and they listen, as if your utterance that seems to imply that what you say is of the utmost importance to them. This was Hope Carroll's way. Will Ranger, when he gave up his place by her side and received that brilliant, sweet smile, did not wonder any longer "that fellows as fastidious as George Dane, and with as critical a knowledge of the lines of beauty," thought Miss Carroll handsome. Hope knew her power; she had known it long ago when her range was smaller; and she laughed sometimes to see how now it was not only wider range that had been given her, but a newer charm which deepened all her natural ones. Her laugh turned scornful sometimes at this personality of the heiress pushed itself through every thing to her view. Yet with all her insight into human action, her knowledge of the world, it was not in the nature of things for Hope to be unhappy. On the contrary, she enjoyed herself vastly.

"Hope, how you play with life!" one day said an old friend; an old, old friend of the little house on Martyn Street.

"Well, I worked with it for a long time; give me my playday now, Aunt Mary," answered Hope, merrily, yet meaning earnestly. It was a day after this night of Mrs. Grey's, and George Dane was present with Will Ranger and Selwyn Carroll. People whispered that Miss Carroll had a secret liking for this Grant—that some time she might take his name. Who knew? Let us be brave enough to trust the bronze shaft that holds that charming Faun. He is handsome, but that is not the best of him. There is a certain ropes about him which is strength and sweetness. To look long into the gray-blue of his clear eyes would be to believe in every-good-thing that he gave of himself. How different from the satiric play of George Dane's dark, inscrutable face!

Into Selwyn's only clear eyes comes a fresh light as Hope answers the carping friend with her frank confession of those working-days.

"Mrs. Lee—that's the "friend"—does Miss Carroll play with life when she goes down into those crooked alleys by the mills?"

Mrs. Lee looked surprised, questioning. Selwyn answered it, nodding his head with the words, so in earnest was he:

"She does. The back windows of my office overlook Mill Street."

Mrs. Lee now looked as if she would like to have asked Hope's pardon; but Hope, with flushing cheeks, was busy over the music-stand, and asking young Ranger to help her—Ranger, who flashed adoring glances at her upon this revelation. Hope's eye turned away as she caught them; she half smiled to herself, blushed deeper still as Selwyn met her in the turning. Only George Dane seemed unstirred by the revelation. In fact George appeared a little bored. He whistled softly an opera air, tapping lightly a tattoo accompaniment upon the arm of the chair. Then he rose very much like an adieux. He stood on the threshold a moment, hat in hand, which he waved with a playful sort of extravagance to the group around sewing, "Farewell, sweet saint!" There was a flitting smile upon his thin, darkly ringed lips, and Hope thought a tone of mockery in his voice. This was quite intolerable. George Dane's satiric sense was very amusing when he touched upon impersonal topics; but against herself—?

III.

THE winter had gone, summer had come, and Hope at the sea-shore dispensed hospitalities in the loveliest of cottages. Of the many she had chosen but few—but few and intimate. There was a girlfriend, a widowed cousin whom she liked, Selwyn Grant, and young Ranger. She had asked George Dane, but George had said he knew

"Hope, I'm a cross-grained fellow, I suppose, but I hate to visit; it seems to me to take away some of my right to be cross-grained, so I prefer my hotel. When I get away from my office I shall run down to your neighborhood for a week or so; you'll see much of me then."

All summer Hope staid there, nor ever wished to be elsewhere, nor ever wished to receive from there, nor ever wished to receive from there, darker, thinner, more saturnine than ever in his cool white linen garments—offering a marked contrast to Selwyn Grant's frank, fair countenance, and Will Ranger's happy boyish health. But they all vellyed with him cordially.

"You ought to have been here before, Dane," Selwyn said to him. "You've lost all these golden weeks hovering in the city."

"Yes, I dare say; but I don't suddenly take out a lease of independence when summer comes," answered George, with a grim smile. "I've been rather entertained, however—been ferreting out a knotty case that has hung over my anxious already," and George's grimness relaxed into the most triumphant look of the conqueror. Selwyn, who observed, and thought he understood, Dane's fellow, offered another contrast to him at this point. Selwyn Grant was a man of leisure; not an idle man. With abundant means, he refused indolence; his warm sympathies, his health of mind and body, all saved him from idleness. But George Dane, as he had said of himself, had taken out no lease of independence. By temper or fortune George was not a man of leisure. He worked at his profession as one to be loved it sometimes—alert, quick, highstrung. He gave him a handsome yield, whether in his favor or not Grant's words, "he was not burrowing in the city."

While gossip accorded Selwyn Grant—who pecuniary had no need to draw a matrimonial prize—to Miss Carrol, why did it pass by George Dane without a word of suspicion, when he sat at her table and called her intimately "Hope?" Probably because George Dane, now seven-and-thirty, had passed by in their several seasons, before after fortune: had been at their tables, had been intimate in just that passionless, friendly way of his with one and another, without any of that gallant assiduity, that waiting attendance which distinguishes a suitor; because he could stand by and see them second and won; could even applaud the winning, too—it had come to be understood that George Dane was no fortune-hunter in that way. That he was, in fact, too cold and ambitious, of too stern a pride to seek any object but professional distinction. This it comes to pass that he has long talks with Hope, discussions of books or thought when they are in a manner intimate and confidential, yet that he can sit there just outside the window those summer nights, alternately smoking, while Selwyn Grant within—the handsome, manly fellow—goes on with his wooing. At the end of the chapter, perhaps, you may expect to see George Dane applauded.

It was on a morning after one of these nights that George was met by this announcement—not what he had expected.—"George, I have decided to spend the coming winter in Rome."

"Then you go there with you?"

"Aunt Mary, of course, and we go in company with the Fanshaws."

"You are to be?"

George looked more surprise than he usually allowed himself to express. Hope colored a little at the quiet words and the look. She must have understood his surprise. He said no more however about it, at the moment, but pondered on the winter plans. She seemed in high spirits, full of anticipation, and George rode away after their conference, saying to himself,

"I dare say Grant is going too."

Hope was glad, but Selwyn Grant did not join the party that sailed with her; neither did he go to meet it.

The winter passed, spring came, summer again. It was full a year before Hope returned. A year older, yet Hope bore the burden bravely. Her face was fresh and fair in healthful coloring, her eyes full of sparkle, her figure round yet lithe.

"Hope, have you found the fountain of youth or the philosopher's stone?" asked George Dane as on the day he called after her return.

Hope lifted her eyebrows with a merry sort of affectation, as the fond of assuming sometimes.

"Why?"

He made a grimace.

"As if you didn't know that you bloom fairer than ever after a year's wandering."

She laughed.

"I am like the aloe, you know, I bloom late."

"I know that you have had cares, for you have told me so; but there isn't a print of them on your face. How does it happen?"

She grew serious. "Partly temperament, I suppose, which is in a measure inherited from—the print at least; and then you have only known me since life was easier to me, through this fortune that my uncle left me. I was not unhappy then, when I lived in the little house on Martyn Street and was Aunt Mary's. It was a pleasant home, and I enjoyed my reading, my friends, or any amusement, with great zest after my work was over for the day. Hope and Mary were always building for me very fair and stately edifices of happiness, and my days seemed going on almost pleasantly, sometimes. But my wisdom was only hidden even then. It was one abiding care for the future. I knew that I had no nearer relative than Aunt Mary; for her I loved as a daughter, for she had been to me, and I used to think with vague trouble of what would happen to her if some ill should come to me, if I could not work as I did. Ah, does any man know what this shadow of possible want is, that hangs over the head of so many women, partly nurtured as we were: women poor and proud, who can look to no one for home comforts and cares? Over my head always hung this shadow. It used to blot out all the sunshine in my castles sometimes . . . I think if you had known me then you might possibly have seen the shadow once in a while breaking through upon my face," she concluded, in a low tone.

"I am glad I don't see it there now, Hope."

"Yes: do you know I never wake now without that consciousness of relief first thought, that the shadow of that care is gone. Ah, I think Heaven for it. it is such blessed relief."

Her countenance was beaming slightly forward, his arm resting upon his knee; a usual attitude when deeply interested? As she paused he asked a question, which probably was suggested by the simple, friendly tone:

"Hope, are you never to be married?"

It was abrupt, but it seemed neither too free nor in any way intrusive to Hope, who knew that he was thinking of her in particularly kindest, and, with no meaning in than Aunt Mary. She colored a little however, very faintly, just evincing the blush of her womanliness. Her voice was as steady and quiet when she spoke in reply.

"I suppose I haven't had my heart touched deeply enough, of course. I have not touched my body's heart deeply enough. Then I think I am wanting in faith. I have seen too much into human nature, perhaps, and—well—I am not, it seems to me, one of those who have an ideal; but I have not met the man whom it appears to me is enough in unison with me to make it safe for him to marry me. I have one bit of romantic sentiment, perhaps;" and she colored many a fervently, "I wish to be loved for myself. You will not think this arrogant, you understand—"

He broke in:

"Yes, I understand. You have little faith; it is no wonder: but there was a fine fellow, last year, Hope, whom you liked I doubt. There was one man, when you knew, whose consideration for various reasons went beyond yourself, though you attracted to your fortune. We will allow this to be natural to those fifty; but you found one who offered a broad contrast. He stood out nobly, you will admit the fifty." There was no earthly reason of any kind why she should doubt him."

The calm, friendly interest that was displayed in this still closer questioning, and the confidence and sympathy that existed between these two, hindered the questioning from the least approach to impertinentness. His tone and manner both implied too strongly for any such suspicion, solicitude for her welfare, and a fear that she was making some mistake with her life. He waited, still regarding her earnestly, after he had spoken those last words:

"There was no earthly reason of any kind why you should doubt him."

Her eyes met his and down as he said them. For a moment she kept silence, then, still looking down, her color deepening very much, she answered, lowly:

"I doubted myself."

He knew pretty nearly what she meant, and by-and-by he said,

"Hope, perhaps I should not have questioned you then, but I have seen all along what your fear has been—that you might be wooed for your fortune." He rose up to go, held out his hand, and for the last words: "Don't let it fetter you, this fear, Hope; you ought to be happy. Good-by."

She stood for some minutes just where he had left her, looking out upon the rich glories of the autumn landscape with an expression of mortification gathering upon her face. These last words had struck her deeply. What, was this vague fear rendering her suspicious; and did he think after all that she had not been true to her self-trust in regard to Selwyn Grant? She sat down there by the deep window, and gazing out upon the wide, bright street, she began communing with herself. She liked the woof of which her life was wrought at the present time; it was full and splendid, but in the future had she no dream of closer companionship? Only she and Aunt Mary in the world. Some day Aunt Mary would leave her, and some day her youth would be gone. She started, for here went riding past a brave and loyal gentleman, one whom she had known and trusted for many years—Selwyn Grant. He lifted his hat, bowing low, and there was a sudden flush upon his cheek at sight of her. For a moment or two after he had passed her color came flushing like his. You would have said at once there were the signs of love in him, like the lady of Shalott, she had seen Sir Launcelot,

"As he rode down to Camelot."

But no, Hope knew better than any one that this was not her Sir Launcelot. And why not? Hope herself asks herself this question. "He pleases my taste, he stirs my imagination; I admire him; I know him to be loyal, noble, and of high principle, and I know that he liked me for myself; why is it then, that he does not fill my heart?"

IV.

Hope sat at a great feast. She was queen of it, and wore the identical purple of her fancy-feast—that soft, cool lilac purple that evening light does so much to bring out. And what was the drawing of her youth! She thought of it, and smiled as she sat for a moment in the midst of the splendid scene, and of the gay and the white flying feet of the dancers; hearing through all the murmurous hum of many guests, whose figures shone in the richly decorated rooms under the blaze of the chandeliers made a brilliant pageant. Hope smiled, and rising, stood again at the window, looking down, her gracious presence carrying a charm wherever she moved. At last she comes upon a group eagerly discussing some bit of news or gossip. She hears as she approaches the voice of Will Ranger:

"She will know if any body, she is his most intimate friend. I'll ask her. Miss Carroll, do come to meet her, and the group closed in leaving them alone.

"What is it I am to know if any body, and to tell you if I know, Mr. Raynor?" and Hope smiled in such a fascinating way that the young man but his well-nigh forgot his purpose. He stooped to pick up a glove she had dropped, pressing it to his lips in the action—the glove of a friend—and then remembered to say, while Hope was still smiling, in a sort of indigent amusement:

"About George Dane. He is my cousin, but I never know any thing of him. It's about the name of his engagement. He is engaged to Miss Wharton of Washington, do you know? Ellen March says she knows it to be so. Ellen was in Washington all last winter."

George Dane just then entering, and looking round him for his hostess that he might pay the customary call of respect, Hope hastened to catch her glance across the intervening sea of faces. Will Ranger, who stood beside her and listened to her commonplace words of thanks for remembering the matter of the runner, heard nothing, saw nothing in her face or expression as she answered him that next time as unlike her deliberate consciousness; but what was it, what mute appeal or question did George Dane make to her with those eyes of his? Once before he remembered to have seen that look in her face. It was on a day when some one hastily brought him a telegram, and though then he trusted that Aunt Mary had been thrown from a carriage? He had never forgotten that look—it flashed over her face, and was gone. Will Ranger's eyes perceived Will Ranger taking in his usual style to her, and he knew him to be unconscious. As Hope met his look, it flooded her face with red. Ranger had vanished at his approach, and as he took her hand he looked inquiringly at her.

"Is it bad, Hope—anything happened?"

Gradually, as he watched her in his onward progress through the throng, the color and brightness die out of her face; and as he questioned her now, notwithstanding the flush that came to her cheek, she could see that it grew big arm in his, and said, "Come out into the garden."

The long windows were wide open, and the last September night had the fragrance breath in it of summer.

Hope, her arm in his, followed his guidance with a vague unresistance; and as she went, every moment, through a certain sense of exterior confusion, she was conscious of the throb of pain of her heart. She began to see that her life, enriched by such steady friendship, had never missed anything; that it was the natural way of unfolding. Her whole life seemed threatened. If George Dane had been other than what he was, other than the constant, quiet-minded, unimpassioned friend, she would have never discovered her heart. He led her out into the garden into a sheltered pleasance, and then again asked her:

"What is it—what has happened, Hope? I saw by your face the instant I caught your glance?"

His cool, only kind friendliness aroused her pride, struck, too, a cold chill upon her. She recalled inwardly; outwardly her manner was calm enough, though she answered hurriedly to his question:

"Nothing has happened. Will Ranger was asking—telling me something, and—I had just heard some news that startled me."

She had bungled at her answer, that she felt at once; in trying to remedy it she had made it worse. George Dane kept silence for a little space; then, as if he had waited for her to speak further if she had been disposed, and was relieved to find it a matter of small importance, he began telling her something that was then interesting him. In the midst of it Will Ranger came in sight with Ellen March. As they passed in the pleasance suddenly George Dane stopped to say:

"Will, what marvelous story were you amusing Miss Carroll with when I came in?"

It was a mere impulse, unreasoning, half mischievous, that prompted this, for George Dane was too much of a gentleman to wish to intrude into any thing seriously kept secret. To him the matter had ceased to be of any interest himself.

"I asked Miss Carroll to tell me something about a bit of news I had heard. We thought she'd know," he answered.

Ellen March took up this answer with her gay bantering voice, which revealed the whole. George gave a satirical, indefinite reply, and turned abruptly away with his companion. Hope's heart died within her; a glance in his face—his face which never turned to her now—and she knew that he had her secret. Without a word he kept on, not toward the house, but in the path away from it. Where was he going? For her life she could not have spoken; she still holding her arm firmly against himself, he kept on.

On the grounds was a little pavilion where she sometimes went when she desired to be undisturbed. It was simply furnished, the door easily opened by one who understood its hidden bolt. George Dane had made away a table to this little hermitage; its hidden bolt was well known to him. Into this retreat, then, he now surprised Hope by turning. He opened a door for her by the moonlight-flooded window, and himself remained standing, leaning, facing her, against the casement.

"Sit," he said, gently, "and let me speak to you." Still unresisting, she obeyed him. "Hope, there is a confession you have to make to me."

Hope felt as if the soft south wind was full of taunting, jarring voices.

"In the course of my acquaintance with you, Hope, I came to the knowledge of one thing—that you were the one woman that I could love. At the same time I made the other discovery I need not other—that you would never marry a man whom you were not assured would take you just as readily penniless."

He stopped a moment, his face paled and flushed; then, with a resolute lift of his head, he went on:

"Hope, I loved you. I do not love easily nor lightly. I had lived nearly forty years without finding a woman who could be to me what you were; but for all that, Hope, I would never have taken you unless you were penniless apart from the result of my professional work, if I had been assured that you returned my love. Had I been the possessor of a large fortune apart from this you would have found me a determined wooer. Hope, do you understand?"

She understood, but she could not speak. He went on: "Life is uncertain. I would not, first of all, put a wife or family into the possible position of great poverty in case my death would be sure to do. Secondly, I am fastidious about the conditions and circumstances of life. If these conditions and circumstances prove to be inharmonious to my tastes, I prefer to bear them alone. If there are to be struggles and privations, I prefer to struggle by myself, and to endure without to complain. Perhaps this is very worldly; perhaps I should have been willing to take the whole possession of the loved one; but it is not my nature to lose myself in romance. I can love ardently, certainly, but I cannot lose sight of the fact that we live in an age when all refined social conditions are somewhat imperative for the enjoyment of this love. I am not speaking for any cause, the cause of a suitor, Hope, when I say all this to you. I say it because I consider it your duty, in viewing what is for of your peculiarities—and I do not blame you for it—I am much too proud to offend you by offering myself as a suitor."

At he ceased he passed his handkerchief across his forehead, as men do when under some emotion. Hope looked up at him, met the eyes and knelt the brow. Then he turned toward the door with the words:

"Shall we return to the house?"

Already he was holding the door open, was waiting for her to pass; and she sat there motionless, thrilling under his words. Thinking—"This man, who plainly tells me that he would never marry me for love, is nevertheless the man that I love. He is a different man from him of last year—from Selwyn Grant. He is worldly and ambitious and prudent. He other has none of the heroic elements. He would have dared any thing, borne any thing for my love; but he did not fill my heart. I knew all this, and yet—and yet—I know that he is the very ideal of a lover, but I do not love this man who stands smashing here before me. He fills my heart."

Something like this it was which flashed through her mind; and as he stood waiting she spoke his name.

"George."

He started at the accents of her voice, they held so much in their low sweetness. Then she put out her hand.

"George, come back. We two are only suited to each other; we can not lose each other. Will you take me now with this very fortune I have made such a bugbear of?"

He took her, holding her closely in his arms; and when he spoke his voice was full of tender vehemence:

"Hope, I take you, loving you so well that the possible misconstructions of the world at my choice do not embitter or deter me. You know that I love you, Hope."

She knew it by the very rest and content that filled all her heart as he spoke. Verily, "we love whom we must."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SARDAKE.—The editor of a journal was set all aback the other day, when he asked a farmer's wife how she made sausages, and received the answer: "Take your inards, scrape 'em, scald, and stuff 'em."

Sir Watkin Williams Wynne talking to a friend about the antiquity of his family, which he carried up to Noah, was told that he was a mere mushroom of yesterday. "How so, pray?" said the baronet. "Why," continued the other, "when I was in Wales, a pedigree of a particular family was shown to me: it filled three large skins of parchment, and near the middle of it was a note in the margin: Also unto this the world was created."

A poor woman, who had attended several confirmations, was at length recognized by the bishop. "Pray, have I not seen you here before?" said his lordship. "Yes," replied the woman, "I am the confirm'd as often as I can; they tell me it is good for the rheumatiz."

It is said to be satisfactorily demonstrated that every time a wife scolds her husband she adds a wrinkle to her face. It is thought the announcement of this fact will have a most salutary effect, especially as it is understood that every time a wife embraces her husband it will remove one of the old wrinkles!

Lord Chancellor Hardwick's bailiff, having been ordered by his lord to procure a new set of parliamentary electors, came one day into the dining-room when full of company, proclaiming with a burst of joy he could not conceal, "I have been at Royston fair, my lady, and I have got a new swarm of your honour's voters."

Lady ——, spoke to the butler to be saving of an excellent cask of small beer, and asked him how it might be best preserved. "I know no method so effectual, my lady," replied the butler, "as placing a bunch of keys in it."

A humorous comment on artificial memory was made by a waiter at a hotel where Fitzsimile dined, after giving his lecture on artificial memory. As he went out the professor left the table the waiter entered, with "——'s hat, sir, and umbrella." "Well, I protest, the memorium has forgotten his umbrella!"

"The great admirer of Avon's bard," who inquired where the Shakspeare Gallery was to be, thinks that I. C. D. means "I informed that it may be found in Macbeth, Act V., Scene IV., Line 2."

In a small party, the subject turning on matrimony, a lady said to her sister, "I wonder, my dear, you have never made a proposal; I think you would receive." She replied, "No, not the brimstone, only the spark."

A coachman, extolling the sagacity of one of his horses, observed, that if any body was to go for to use him ill, he would bear nothin' like a Christian."

Mrs. Horsley, in her entertaining work on Constantinople, gives a curious account of the diet of Circassians. She says, "They eat cucumbers and chestnuts, and are nursed at the same time!"

A tectotaler asked Pat, the other day, if ever he saw a drunken man sober. "Yes, sir," replied Paddy, with earnestness, "I've seen many a man drunk, but I couldn't tell whether he was a tectotaler or not."

In a bookseller's catalogue lately appeared the following article: "Memoirs of Charles the First—with a hand copy. Only sixpence!"

"Pray, Mr. Abernethy, what is the cure for gout?" asked an indolent and luxurious citizen. "Live upon sixpence a day, Sir, and earn it!" was the pithy reply.

A great writer has observed that nothing is more difficult than to make presents with judgment. The difficulty is one which never troubles most people in the least. They avoid all questions of propriety by not making presents at all.

On a railway the following notice appears: "Hereafter, when trains moving in an opposite direction are approaching each other as expeditiously as possible, and signals will be required to bring their respective trains to a dead halt before the point of meeting, will be very careful not to proceed till each train has passed the other."

A dyer, in a court of justice, being ordered to hold up the cloth he had in his hand, "Please your honor, please," said she judge to him. "Put on your spectacles, my lord," answered the dyer.

There was much sound palpable argument in the speech of a country lad to an older, who boasted his ancient family: "I'm proud of my family, too," said the peasant; "we've plowmen wy, 'the older the seed the worse the crop.'"

A farm was lately advertised in a newspaper, in which all the houses were described as existing. But the good authority of the air were detailed in the richest flow of rural description, which was further rewarded with this: N.B. There is not an attorney within fifteen miles of the premises."

A girl forced by her parents into a disagreeable match with an old man, whom she detested, when the clergyman came to the altar to ask the service were he to be asked if she consents to take the bridegroom for her husband, said, with great simplicity, "Oh, sir, that is what you are the first person who has asked my opinion about the matter."

"My dear, come in and go to bed," said the wife of a jolly son of Erin, who had just returned from the fair in a decidedly how-come-you-so state. "You must be dreadfully tired, eve, with your long walk of six miles." "Arrah, honey," was the reply, "sometimes I will. Put 'im wasn't the length of the way at all that fatigued me, 'twas the breadth of it."

If you are installed in a gentleman's house let the first thing you open be not your own mouth but the door.

"A play upon words," as the school-boy said when he kicked his dictionary up and down the study.

Why is John Bigger's boy larger than his father?—Because he is a little Bigger.

Many persons are now anxiously examining the maps to see if Richmond is in Virginia, and if so, what is the manner without a map. He discovered it by sitting down upon a map in a way-fields.

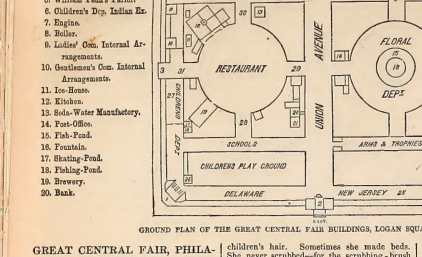
Persons should always dress to suit their figures. A hump-backed lady, for instance, ought to wear a camel's-hair shawl.

"When are you sure the smugglers have landed a cargo?" demanded a cockney of a custom-house officer. "When I arrive is," replied the Government punster.

"Mr. Smithers, how can you sleep so? The sun has been up three two hours." "Well, what if he has," said Smithers. "He goes to bed at dark, while I'm up till after midnight."

THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGI

NIA—"ON TO RICHMOND!"



GROUND PLAN OF THE GREAT CENTRAL FAIR BUILDINGS, LOGAN SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.

GREAT CENTRAL FAIR, PHILADELPHIA.

We give on this page the GROUND PLAN of the Great Central Fair Buildings in Logan Square, Philadelphia—of which we gave a picture last week—with a key explaining the location of the various departments. The arrangement of the buildings is as admirable as it is complete, and contemplates, it will be observed, even a greater variety in the features of the Exhibition than attached to the Metropolitan Fair in this city. The Floral Department will no doubt be especially attractive, since all Nature can now be drawn upon to contribute to the display. One of the finest features of the floral show is a fountain which occupies the centre, which is numbered 16 in the diagram. A huge circular sheet of water is made to fall umbrella-fashion from a considerable height; beneath this is a circle of pea-jets, which are intended to shine through the descending water, and thus form a globe of liquid fire. The effect is described as exceedingly beautiful. The WILLIAM PENN Parlor will be furnished as nearly as possible like the Quaker parlors of the early days of the colony.

We are indebted for our views of this Fair to the kindness of Mr. GEORGE W. CHILDS, the well-known publisher. Mr. CHILDS is Chairman of the Publishing Committee, and has given himself with patriotic energy and enthusiasm to the work of promoting, in every way possible, the success of this grand charity of the Quaker City.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXVII.

AN ABBÉ.

LILY went into the cabinet of Mademoiselle Marcassin a young lady pupil at a boarding-school. The social status was not a very dignified one; but, at all events, it was something. The profound gentlemen who compile the census-tickets could have thought Lily worthy to be registered as a single item in the educational schedules. She entered the cabinet a school-girl. She came out of it a hybrid creature, something between a servant-of-all-work and a galley-slave.

Mademoiselle Marcassin kept her word to her after a fashion. Lily was fed, lodged, and clothed after a fashion; that is to say, she was privileged, after the pupils had fed, to consume the scraps of their repast—her refectory not being the common dining-room, but a silo-place, half pantry, half store-room, where not only the copy-books, slates, drawing materials, and such like, required by young ladies, were kept in stock, but likewise sacks of lentils and haricot-beans, and large jars full of the peculiarly nasty stewed pears which were unchangeably served at the conclusion of the principal meal under the generic title of dessert.

She was lodged, but not in any of the dormitories. She had a room to herself (a hole rather) in the garret, where she had a mattress on the floor, and a sewer and basin on a rush-bottomed chair. The Marcassin was too rigorously just to suffer her to sleep in the sleeping accommodation provided for pupils who paid; the Marcassin was too after a fashion, to degrade her by forcing her to associate with the domestic servants. She was clothed too, was Lily, after a fashion. Cast-off garments, mostly of the rag-and-tatter description, were flung to her from time to time, to be mended and cobbled together, when her own rags gave signs of dropping off piecemeal.

She was permitted to pursue her studies after a fashion. When there was no particular slavery in hand she was suffered to sit in the class and listen to the lessons. Neither bad marks nor good marks were given her. She was beyond those. If she alone of a class could answer a question, she was not privileged to take her competitors up. She remained, for good or evil, at the bottom.

She helped about the house. She cleaned knives sometimes. She combed the younger children's hair. Sometimes she made beds. She never scrubbed—for the scrubbing-brush was an instrument which to the Fennion Marcassin. In French housekeeping there is a tradition that dry polishing is a holy thing, but that water-work does harm. Lily's special task-work, however, was in the lingerie, or wardrobe of the school. She passed many hours there every evening. There was always an immunity of mending to do, and most of it fell to her lot. As she was not allowed to touch the piano, for fear of wearing out the keys, or to draw, because crayons cost money, or to write, because paper and slate-pencil are expensive, her fingers might have grown stiff and awkward but for the compulsory lissomness they acquired in that everlasting needle-work. She grew to possess astonishing dexterity as a seamstress.

Once a year all the mattresses in the establishment were ripped up, the wool taken out, and, compressed into cakes as it generally was by continuous pressure, carded, by means of iron teeth set in wooden slabs, into fleecy puff. Two prodigious old women, hoarse voiced and hairy chinned, who looked as though they had been horse-guardiers in the Imperial Guard who had taken to petticoats in their old age, used to come to Mademoiselle Marcassin's, and for card vermicelli as well as she could. One of the old women used to bring a stone flask full of corn brandy with her, from which she frequently coaxed into her old mouth what she called "la goutte du bon Dieu." The other would persist in smoking a short pipe in the intervals of labor, much to the disgust of the Marcassin; but the old woman worked cheaply and expeditiously, and so was not denied her narcotic. Lily was dreadfully afraid of both of them. They spat and swore, and were like men.

"I remember," would one of these would Chevaliers d'Eon say—"I remember, La Mère Housiflalle, when the little King of Rome used to be wheeled about the Tuileries Gardens in a little carriage drawn by two Astracan sheep.

"And the Duke of Bordeaux, Ma'me Pitchet," would the other say. "Diantre! was he not baptized in water from the Jordan? Are you remember the Terror, Ma'me Plumet?"

"If I remember it? Imbecile! Was I not dancing at the Opera when Messieurs of the Committee sent for me to be one of the nymphs that marched by the side of the car of the Goddess of Reason? Ah! yes, I have not had bad chances in my time!" and this she said with a horrible leer at Lily. "I have had cashmere shawl diamonds in my time. But I have had misfortunes. It has all been through my devotion to the Emperor. That accursed minister of police would not give me a passport to take because of my sympathies. When I asked for a box-opener's place at the Funambule they told me that I was a Bonapartist. Why not call me a sorceress at once? And now I am eaten up and tormented as forty sous a day and my soup. Bah!" And the old woman would expectorate and take another pull at the "goutte du bon Dieu."

They called Lily "c'te jeunesse," and laughed at the clumsy way in which she carded. One day, however, La Mère Housiflalle, in the one day—it was in her second year of carding—of her beauty, and asked her why she buried herself in that place when she might have canzonets and diamonds? Lily shuddered as she thought of Mademoiselle Marcassin's lop ear. Her ears burned, but her lips were cold. Of all the bad people in this bad world there is nothing, I apprehend, worse than a bad old Frenchwoman.

Lily Floris—"c'te jeunesse," "la petite Anglaine," or the "fille de classe Pauline," as she was indifferently called—was fifteen, and shapely and fair. She thanked God every night in the simple English prayers which had been taught her by Barbara Bunnycastle that she did not hate any one. She prayed for strength to continue obedient, industrious, and uncomplaining. But hers was a hard time, very hard indeed.

To the rest of the school-girls, in the days when Mademoiselle Marcassin's cares were her, she had been a heretic. They told her that she was doomed to eternal perdition because she did not go to mass and cross herself. They were incredulous as to her believing in any thing save Satan—and not much in him. As a heretic, she was not allowed to accompany the other girls on Sundays and fête days to the neighboring church of St. Philippe du Roule. As a heretic, she was necessarily excluded from the particular catechisings, admonitions, and exhortations which took place prior to the yearly festival of the First Communion.

There were generally twenty or thirty girls every spring to take this first communion, They looked ingenuous, devout, innocent, beautiful, in their white frocks and veils, their snowy wreaths and spotless gloves, their little white silk stockings and white shoes and bouquet of white flowers. Lily used to look after them with longing eyes as they filed through the play-ground on their way to the entrance-gate. She was sorry that she was a heretic; but was she one, and, if so, was it her fault?

She thought not, and that she would ask the Abbé Chatain. He was "directeur" of the establishment. He catechised the young ladies and confessed them, and generally prepared them for the first communion. He was a tall, lean ecclesiastic, with a hollow visage, very high cheek-bones, a square jaw, broken teeth, somewhat jaundiced eyes, and iron-gray hair. In his long black cassock, black rabat with white cambric edging, heavy shoes with buckles, flapped hat, and portentous umbrella, he had seemed for years to Lily an awful and forbidding personage. He took a great deal of snuff too, and when he blew his long, bassoon-shaped nose with a blue cotton handkerchief the sound was awful. He had a manner of breathing hard, too, when he spoke, and of screwing up his eyes, and clattering his jagged teeth, the reverse of encouraging. Yet the girls said that the Abbé Chatain was amiable, and forbore to visit the little peccadilloes they acknowledged in confession with any unusually disagreeable penances.

It was a long time before Lily could make up her mind to speak to the abbé. As a heretic, the ecclesiastic kept aloof from her; and she, too, dreaded that her confessing him might be an act open to misconstruction.

One day, however—it was during the August holidays, and the abbé had called to pay a visit of politeness to the Marcassin, who, being indisposed, could not receive him—Lily clothed herself in the full armor of a desperate resolve, and sought him out. The worthy ecclesiastic was walking up and down the play-ground, smiling and waving the blue cotton pocket-handkerchief in a contemplative manner, as usual. One flap of the wide sleeve of his cassock was drawn up, displaying a not unsymmetrical calf, and in this traditional clerical coquetry it may be that the much-argued question of cassocks and strings, known as "ladies' pages," originated.

Lily stole up to the clergyman, and was about to address him. To her dismay he suddenly produced a book from his pocket. "Alas! alas!" thought she, "he is going to say his breviary, and he will be walking up and down the play-ground for at least twenty minutes without any daring to speak to him, and then, perhaps, Madame, who is lying down, will awake, and the abbé will be called in, and my chance will be gone forever."

To her relief, however, the book was not a breviary. It was doubtless a devout work, but not of so strictly canonical a nature. Indeed, the doctrine it contained seemed not only of a heterodox, but of a positively revolutionary kind. The abbé, wagging his head approvingly, and following the text with an appreciating forefinger, would every moment utter a gleeful chuckle. It was a merry book, and the abbé was no soul ascetic.

"He is a droll of a farceur," murmured the abbé, "this Monsieur de Béranger, although he has written some bitter things against the reverend fathers the Jesuits! What do you want, young girl?" he added, suddenly, and throwing, accidentally of course, the hand which held the book behind him, but still keeping the page open with appreciative forefinger.

"If you please, Monsieur l'Abbé—" poor Lily began.

"But I do not please," the ecclesiastic rejoined, sharply. "I have nothing to do with you. You are not a catechumen. You do not belong to my class. Go to your minister. I can have nothing to say to you. Enfin, que me voulez-vous?"

"Oh! Monsieur l'Abbé, do pray hear me," the girl pleaded, joining her hands, and her eyes beginning to stream, "I am so truly, so miserably unhappy."

"By your own fault, I take it, young girl," remarked the abbé; "the worthy Mademoiselle Marcassin—a true shepherdess to her flock—reports you as being obstinate, rebellious, opinionated, recalcitrant. Kindness and severity have been tried, and both in vain, to you. Go to your minister—are you an Anglican or a Puritan?—and demand of him what prayers and penitence you should resort to, in order to enter into a better frame of mind."

"But I have no minister," cried Lily, despairingly; "I have no friends, I have no home. I am quite alone in the world. I am a poor little English girl, left, abandoned, deserted here by cruel strangers. I am destitute, and an object of charity. I have never been outside these walls for seven years. I strive my best to be good, and to learn, and to work, but I am always punished and made miserable. Oh! I am most wretched and helpless."

"Tiens," muttered the abbé, taking out the blue cotton handkerchief and wringing the basson nose, but without the bassonic sonorousness, "this has the appearance of being pitiable."

"Oh, Sir; dear, kind Monsieur l'Abbé, if you would only intercede for me; if you would only soften Madame's heart toward me! If I could only be sent back to England, perhaps the good ladies with whom I was at school when a very, very little girl, near London, might know something of my friends."

"It is hardly possible," said the abbé, not unkindly, and shaking his head. "Madame has told me under what circumstances you are here. Perhaps the kind people who imposed upon her likewise robbed some mistress of a school libas, down there in England, when you were an infant. Have you no other friends that you can remember, however faintly?"

Lily hesitated for a moment. How could she name Cutwig & Co.? Old Mr. Cutwig had given her a new shilling, and Mr. Rauns (on account of Cutwig & Co.) a South Sea Bubble. Mella a kiss; but this acquaintance of two hours' duration could scarcely with propriety be called friendship. Then she thought of the tall, fair-haired and whiskered man on board the boat, who had given her "jogodate." Could he be called a friend? Mr. Alec Floris. Finally, her thought reverted to the tall gentleman who had been so kind to her at the Greenwich dinner. She had never forgotten him. A thousand times she had thought of him with gratitude and affection. Many and many a time, during the early morning in her wretched bedchamber, she had asked herself: "Shall I write to him? He told me his name. It was William—yes, William Long. Shall I write a letter to Monsieur Sir William Long, England, and pray him to come and help the poor child? He said he was so kind to ever so many years ago? But who would post a letter for me? If it were discovered, I should be sent to the cachot for a week. And then, he has forgotten me. I only amused him for a moment. He is married and happy. And poor Lily, as she thought this, found herself burning with blushes and choking with tears.

No, she could not give the name of Cutwig & Co., nor of the man with the braid and the beard, and a strange shame and nervousness prevented her named near him whom she yet vaguely believed to be her friend. She told the abbé, with dolorous meekness, that she had no friends, so far as she knew, any where in the world.

"Pauvre petite!" said the Abbé Chatain, taking out the blue cotton handkerchief again. "Well, something must be done for you. Be resumed, after a brief silence.

Lily could tell him that, and eagerly, too. She had been brooding over and elaborating a feeble little scheme for months. "Oh!" she cried, "if Madame would only be kind and merciful to me, she could make me happy, I am sure, at once. It would not be at all difficult. Thanks to the instruction I have received at the Pension—and oh, pray believe that I am very grateful for it—I know enough, I hope, to understake the duties of a nursery governess, or at least I could be an under teacher in a village school. Or I would work at any needle, or wait at table, or do housework, or any thing, if she would only allow me to leave this dreadful place, and be kind enough to tell every body that I am wicked and rebellious."

"You are full of romantic ideas," replied the abbé, pinching and preparing for another flood over Lily's audacious proposition; "but we will hope for the best. Go in peace, my child, and do not cry. I could not well speak to Mademoiselle Marcassin on this topic, and we will see what can be done."

He patted Lily gently on the head, and strode away. And the girl returned to her needlework, and, the first time she met Miss Margold left the Pension Marcassin, a golden ray brought daylight and hope streaming into her soul.

The abbé was as good as his word. An evening or two afterward, while he was playing his modest game of backgammon with Mademoiselle Marcassin, he took occasion to say, as though inadvertently:

"And the little English girl you have secured and cherished, how goes it with her?"

An evil look came over the countenance of the schoolmistress. "How goes it? As with a viper. Speak to me of the gratitude of those blanderers. I calculated that I have lost by that little crocodile at least five thousand francs, of which I shall never see a red lard. And yet I have been a second mother to her."

It was certainly something in poor Lily's favor that she had been blessed with a second mother, seeing what a remarkably unsatisfactory investment the first one had proved to be. The adult, however, in Madame's statement was a pinch of salt, as well as with one of snuff. He knew the Marcassin of old, and was acquainted with her aptitude for magnifying her own merits and depreciating those of others: when she would allow them, which was but seldom, to have any merit at all.

"It is a pity," carelessly remarked the abbé, putting the easier to his chin, as was his wont, before he left the room, "that you should be burdened with this little eat-all and do-nothing."

"It is more than a pity, it is a shame, a scandal, an enormity, an abomination," Madame indignantly acquiesced. "Figure to yourself, my dear abbé, that this most reprehensible young person of fifteen years of age—well grown, too—devours my substance. She undervalues the little patrimony which I hope to be able to leave, some day, to my kindred in Touraine. Such a great girl is not to be kept on vulgar principles."

"That is easy to see," the diplomatic abbé agreed.

"They may keep her who will," the school mistress continued, with well-simulated indifference. "I am sick of the charge, and should be enchanted to be relieved from it to-morrow."

"Would you, then, consent to her departure?"

"Who would pay me my memoirs, if you please?" the Marcassin returned quickly.

"But if you have lost, as you say you have lost by this time, all hopes of payment?"

"That is true," returned Madame, shrugging her shoulders, "but it is well fish in the sea of whales as expect that I shall ever re-enter into my funds."

"And if you placed this embarrassing young creature in some locality of which you were well assured, and of persons in whose hands you could at any time claim her?"

"That is true; but how to find such a locality and such persons?"

"They must be numerous. Could you not obtain a situation for her in a school, half as pitiful as yours, to be its petite prof?"

"She is that already, here: more of one than the other." Madame Marcassin did not specify which was the "one" and which the "other."

"And the convent?"

"Impossible. She is a heretic. The government is infidel and Voltairean. We should have complications with the police."

"But you say that she has no papers, no recognized identity."

"I tell you, abbé," exclaimed the Marcassin, "that she has nothing, save the spirit of the Fiend which animates her. She is as friendless as a mountebank's tumbling child, bought for forty sous at a fair, and passed from one juggler to another."

"Peccavi!" murmured the abbé again; but his voice was pitched low.

"Besides," resumed the schoolmistress, "if she went to another school she might chatter—and—"

She stopped, somewhat confused, and, the game being over, hastily cleared the backgammon-board.

"I understand," the abbé returned, with a nod. "There is much rivalry in the scholastic profession. One always tries to do one's neighbor—when one's neighbor keeps a school—as much harm as is possible. 'Tis pity, for charity's sake, that it should be so. But suppose, my dear and worthy lady, that I was about to find, out of doors, an asylum for this forlorn child—a safe asylum, a respectable asylum, a discreet asylum—whence, from time to time, I should be enabled to bring you news of her, and whence, if the dishonest persons who have defrauded you of your deceased sovereign were ever brought back to better sentiments, and showed a wish to make restitution, you could bring her back. Should such a solution be within the my power of putting quickly into execution?"

"Then, my dear abbé, I should say at once, Take her."

"Is that your determination?"

"You have my word for it."

"Then we will adopt measures in accordance. I shall have the honor shortly of communicating with you on the subject. Not another word, I assure you. I have fears for my head. Well, qualified with this excellent and sensitive thum of the colonies. Have you tasted the Chocolat de Santé, my dear lady? And the Bechamel sauce? No? Nay you positively shall. Regnault. A thousand wishes for your happiness! We will consider the affair of la petite as arranged. Figure to yourself the Monsieur Véron, who makes one fortune by managing the Opera House—what a scandal—and another by selling rough leaving. And yet, I am told, a most excellent person, and devoted to the Church. Yes, I will certainly remember to bring the sixty volumes of the Causerie de France when next I have the honor. One night get the little wardrobe of la petite together. She has none, you say. Well, one must be found for her. Charity is not dead, as you, Mademoiselle, have so triumphantly proved. Once more, dear lady, good-night!"

These remarks were not delivered without a solution of continuity. The abbé's valedictory observations were scattered about the room. He had to swallow another cup of the curious fluid which Mademoiselle Marcassin imagined, with many other French ladies of that period, to be tea. He yielded to friendly compulsion, and partook of another modicum of the colonial liqueur. Then he had to find his umbrella and his shovel-hat, and to press Madame's hand, and to bow over it, and to accept some jujubes for his poor cough, and to suffer Madame with her own fair hands—literally fair, but not cruel, to him—to tie a woolen scarf round his neck, as a defense against the night air.

It was all as innocent, I speak without mental reservation, as sheep-shearing in Arcadia. Nothing could come of it. Both were stricken in years. On both the doom of perpetual celibacy weighed: he, enforced to it by vows: she, sentenced to it by circumstances and by temperament. Yet I have heard that the sun shines sometimes at the Palais Royal; and I have thus a little flirtation at a little flirtation all the world over. Believe me, the Fiend who tempted the good St. Anthony come to him, not in the guise of a ballet-girl, but as a cozy, comfortable spinster of uncertain age, spinster who would have knitted muffatees, and made wine possets, and warmed his slippers, and cut the leaves of his books. Even Madame Bovary would earlier have turned his eyes upward from his tome.

One sigh—one among a thousand frowns—is not much. Mademoiselle Marcassin gave one sigh, and put away the backgammon-board and the thum of the colonies.

"Encore une homme," sighed the Marcassin; and then she froze up again in one block and proceeded to make her mark with ink on the histories, scattering bad marks about her on all the pupils who could be proved to be awake. Five wakefulness was considered a presumptive evidence of the offender having been indulging in prohibited converse.

"A sunday lady, the Dame Marcassin," the Abbé Chatain mused as he sped homeward. "She ores a little, perhaps, on the side of strictness, but those persons are difficult, very difficult to manage. I remember at the seminary what trouble I used to give the provisors' by the régiment with which I marched to the discipline these slumbers have suffered. Hi! Ho. It must be confessed that Mademoiselle Marcassin is a woman who has a character. Oh! her force of character is immense. And she is conscientious. Nevertheless, I must see whether we can persuade Madame de Kergolay to shelter this poor little shorn lamb."

And the abbé went home to bed. He was a worthy soul—although he did sometimes read Béranger's poems on the sly.

"If he had only been born on our side, Monsieur de Béranger," the abbé was wont to say, "what an ally he would have been! What a champion of the clergy he always been than. From the days of M. de Pascal we have never been able to keep the drollery and the wit always on our side. And yet we have educated them all in our seminaries. They have bitten the hand that fed them. If M. de Molière had only written Tartuffe against the Huguenots! His story of fatality. It is true that we have M. de Chateaubriand—but, bah! he is not a lively. That rhum of the colonies was very toothsome. To-morrow is a fat day, and Madame Blaise' (his housekeeper's) turkey will eat a turkey stuffed with chestnuts. C'est énivrant, that turkey stuffed. A little glass of that rhum of the colonies would make a most delicious digestif cafe. Ah! here we are at home. Let us enter.'

It has been said that the Marcassin had enforced celibacy leads to a partiality for roast turkey stuffed with chestnuts. Cut a man off from the flesh and he clings to the flesh-pots.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MORE OF THE ABBÉ.

A VERY few days after the interview recorded in the last chapter the Abbé Chatain had another conversation with Mademoiselle Marcassin. His little flirtation was at its height. It was indeed, trembligly, but purposely, thrown herself in his way), and, putting her on the head again, and he to be at the head, that a change in her condition was imminent. Lily went that day to her needle-work, and her schoolfellows, with the bad-mindedness rife radiant; and at night, nesting in her shabby palliasse, peopled the dormitory with the kind kinds of benevolent ecclesiastics and philanthropic protectors.

Her deliverance came upon her with delightful suddenness. According to the abbé it might be a week or a fortnight before the arrangements that were being made for her behalf could be decided out; but as her good fortune would have it, the very morning after she had received this hopeful announcement, and as she was crouching in her usual Cinderella position at the bottom of the class, the Marcassin herself entered the school-room in full state and presently called Mademoiselle Kerprémiel that Mademoiselle Floris, no longer "la Belle Zealley," but "la petite Anglaise," had been "called to other functions."

"Circumstances," the Marcassin took occasion to say, "of which I am the sole judge, and liberate culpability on the part of Mademoiselle Floris, had rendered her position one of somewhat a painful nature. Her departure leaves a had, and of the painfulest! "Indeed, she might say that her education and sustenance, for very considerable time, had been provided by a person whom it was unnecessary to name." Here the schoolmistress's countenance, or as the Marcassin; the pupils all stared at Lily; and the poor child herself blushed a deep crimson.

"However, in the sad state of affairs had now come to an end. Thanks to the efforts of a worthy clergyman (digne ecclésiastique), an asylum had been found elsewhere for Mademoiselle Floris. In the new sphere to which she was about to be removed she would doubtless preserve a lively recollection of the favors and bounty which had attended her sojourn in the Pension Marcassin."

There were murmurs (rumeurs) of approbation among the scholars; and the head governess remarked, in a low tone,

"If she does not preserve that lively-recollection she is a monster of ingratitude."

"The conduct of Mademoiselle Floris," continued her benefactress, "had not been entirely free from matter for animadversion. The veil of the past, however, might now be thrown over the anguishes—she might say the sorrows—she had caused her instructresses. Mademoiselle Floris left that establishment full of the best sentiments; and she, Mademoiselle Marcassin, was glad to recognize that this young person was calculated in every way to do honor to the Pensionnat in which she had been sheltered."

The young ladies, most of whom had been for years experiences of the daily tasks and punishments inflicted on the Slave-pear of the school, and had grown perfectly accustomed to hear her called wretch, incorrigible, and incorrigible, by the schoolmistress and her assistants, were not in the least surprised to hear this virtual eulogium pronounced on Lily. It was the Marcassin's way. Nil nisi bonum was her invariable maxim, as applied, not to defunct, but to departing scholars. It was a remarkable fact that no young lady, however refractory or stupid she might have been, ever quitted the academy without a glowing testimonial on her conduct and proficiency. The supreme punishment in the Marcassin's code of rules and penalties was expulsion; but she had only been known to expel one single pupil. The dismission of this culprit took place on the first day of the summer vacation; and it was quite notorious that her parents designed to remove her to another school.

The Abbé Chatain did not come himself as the messenger of Lily's deliverance. The welcome emissary was his housekeeper, Madame Prudence. She was a jolly, apple-cheeked old dame, the best cook, and, moreover, the possessor of the best temper, in the quarter. She loved her master, and he returned her very assiduous, and scolded him sometimes; but that, like the running drawer-string provided for him, was all for his good. Madame Prudence was not an admirer of the Pension Marcassin, nor of its exemplar proprietress. "Ces dames!" Madame as "des Mégère." She alluded pointedly to the governesses as "nymphons of the tyrant." Her opinion regarding the Marcassin was that they were a pressed slaves. She had been known to snap her fingers at the entire establishment, in the open playground, on the light of day. There was an old feud between her and the Marcassin; and she did not hesitate to declare aprovos of ecclesiastics, bound to bachelorhood, being regaled by scholastic spinsters with tea, with backgammon, and with hours of the thum of rhum.

The priest's flouskeeper, like the schoolmistress, was unmarried; but both were called "Madame," "pardon," for the reason that to a people who had always retained an infinite veneration and deference toward age there seemed something unfitting in the use of the title to the spinsterhood. "Madame" was the were a less civilized, but a better behaved people, we too used to address our mothers as "Mistress."

On the way from the Pension to her new home on the Quai Voltaire, in daylight, they traversed on foot the streets of the only city in the world worth living in, with which she had made but ten minutes' acquaintance in the course of seven years—Madame Prudence was pleasantly loquacious, and made no secret of her impression that she had been the providential means of rescuing Lily from the jaws of a roaring dragon.

"They would have devoured you there, my child," she said, pitying Lily's form all affectionately as she trotted along by her side. "If I know her aspect of stiff and starched piece of affected tyranny. Ah! is it I who have given her a bit of my mind. It is not I who am afraid of her. A fine woman, Mademoiselle Marcassin, quoi!" The last part of these observations Madame Prudence evidently applied to herself; and she as evidently considered it the "position" in priest's housekeeper to be, so far as respectability went, a much better "ascertained" one than that of a schoolmistress.

"And you were very unhappy, eh, my child," she continued, "down in that hole?"

"Oh, dreadfully unhappy!" replied Lily. "Many and many a time I could have wished to die, only I knew that it was to wicked."

"And no wonder. But we will cure you of you."

"Madame was certainly very strict—almost harsh; but I dare say I was stupid and disgreeable, and gave her much trouble."

"Yes! I dare say you were a fix an instant. M. l'Abbé says that you are a little lamb for meekness and resignation. To me you shall be a little angel. Now the good Madame de Kergolay, whither you are going, has already made up her mind to love you like a bonbon. She is a—but there you will dine well, and when you come to dine with the abbé and me you shall have a taste of my cookery. Madame Blaise is a vrai cordon bourgeoise, my cherished. Are you fond of good dinners?"

"It is so long ago," answered Lily, with a smile, and in involuntary disparagement of the culinary dispensation enjoyed by the inmates of the Pension Marcassin.

"I should think so. I know what those creatures feed upon—the wretched innocents upon. Haricots, haricots, haricots, all the year round, as if you were mules, and only deserved to be fed upon beans. And no dessert. And the chicory! I would not mind if they knew how to cook them; but they don't, the Cossques!" A Cossack was Madame Prudence's synonym for every thing that was mean, base, and cruel. "And the wine, or rather the water blushing at being so villainously adulterated! Ah! the good Madame de Kergolay will make you taste of the good little vintages. You will be so happy as the day is long. You will help Madame at her embroidery, and sing to her, and read stories to her, and play her to sleep; and then the abbé will play backgammon with you. I shall not be jealous, ma mignonne: and on Sundays and feast-days I will come to you, and we will go to the mass together."

"I am a Protestant," interposed Lily, gently.

"A Protestant! que q' c'est qu'ça?" quoth Madame Prudence. "Ah! I know—a Huguenot, a dissident. Well, you must read Monseigneur the Bishop of Meaux upon the Reformation. Ah! the great man Bossuet. And then, my faith, you must go to your temple, and hear your minister. Madame de Kergolay seeks to make no proselytes. Many of her friends are dissidents. I have known a good many honest folks—très gentils même—who were of the Lutheran persuasion. M. l'Abbé is liberal and tolerant. That wicked old giraffe, the Marcassin, is ultra-montane, and breathes nothing but sulphur against heretics. She would make a furious grand inquisitor. Voyons! I can't see why Protestants should burn. Le bon Dieu meant n thing to be burned, except candles and wood for the kitchen fire."

Three months after the abbé's housekeeper led Lily through the streets of the only city in the world worth living in. The modest package of clothing which the Marcassin had provided herself to part with as the wardrobe of Mademoiselle Floris had been sent on before by a commissionaire.

PORTER'S GUN-BOATS PASSING THE DAM AT ALEXANDRIA.

WE give on the first page an illustration of ADMIRAL PORTER'S GUN-BOATS PASSING THE DAM IN THE RED RIVER BELOW ALEXANDRIA. The gun-boats, falling down the river from Grand Ecore to Alexandria, were arrested in their progress by the shallowness of the water at the "Grand Rapids," just above Alexandria. There being but three or four feet of water a long delay was necessary, the army being obliged to remain at Alexandria to protect the gun-boats. The situation seemed a desperate one, but Colonel BAILEY was equal to the task of escape. He at once set the men at work in constructing two dams, for the purpose of throwing the water into the channel of the current, thereby creating a sufficient depth of water to carry over the boats. It was a work of great labor, owing to the rapidity of the current and the scarcity of materials; but after twelve or fourteen days it was accomplished, and the fleet saved. Colonel BAILEY'S skill and energy, in doing and directing the work, have already been recognized by Congress, which has adopted a joint resolution, therefore, tendering him the thanks of the nation for his invaluable services. He has also received promotion at the hands of the President.

Our sketch was made on the spot by Mr. GEORGE SLATER.

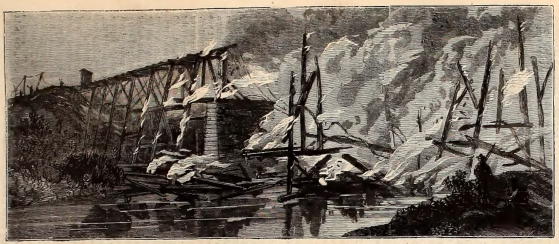
THE GEORGIA CAMPAIGN.

WE continue this week our illustrations of General SHERMAN'S magnificent campaign in Georgia. On page 388 we give a sketch of the BATTLE OF RESACA, fought on the 14th ult. The particulars of this engagement were published in the Weekly of the 4th instant. The attack upon the rebel works was made by Colonel GILES ALEXANDER'S brigade of General MORGAN'S division of LOGAN'S corps on the right, and WOOD'S brigade of STERNBERG'S division on the left. General SMITH led his troops on foot, and General LOGAN was every where present. Experienced army officers who witnessed the engagement represent that the charge of our troops was one of the finest of the war.

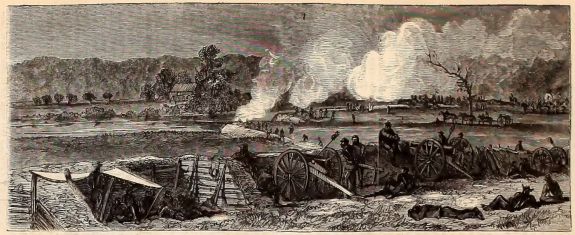
On page 389 we present a sketch representing Colonel ROBINSON'S brigade of General HOOKER'S command saving the Fifth Indiana Battery in the battle at Resaca. Of this occurrence Mr. DAVIS says:

"On the evening of the 14th a portion of General HOOKER'S troops who had remained on the extreme right, were, at a critical moment, turned upon by the enemy, and driven back to the Fifth Indiana Battery. Captain SIMONSON, which held a position of great importance. General HOOKER, without a moment's delay, ordered Colonel ROBINSON'S brigade of General WILLIAMS'S division to charge the rebel line, which was almost upon the battery of the Fifth Indiana. This was gallantly, immediately advancing, the rebels were forced back and the battery saved. No battery was ever more splendidly served. The last of the artillery horses; and the conduct of ROBINSON'S brigade was in the highest degree praiseworthy."

On the same page we give another sketch in which HOOKER'S troops are conspicuous. In his assault on the enemy's works at Resaca HOOKER made steady headway, carrying, on the afternoon of the 14th, until BUTTERFIELD'S division encountered a hostile formidable line. Several attempts were made to carry it and capture its guns, which were pouring a destructive fire into our lines, but the attempt was in vain. The troops fought with great determination, but as often as they advanced upon the hunette the terrible volleys of musketry from the enemy in the fortifications hurled them back in confusion. At last BUTTERFIELD charged forward and took a position under the protecting works of the fort, and near the guns which they could be touched by the men's hands. Here they remained under shelter for the rest of the day, our men picking off every rebel who showed himself above the works. Upon the fall of night HOOKER matured plans for capturing the works by assault, under cover of darkness. The pioneers were brought up; the ends dug out of the works, and the guns drawn out by the aid of ropes, under a destructive fire from the occupants of the works, who were driven out or captured as our troops swarmed in through the opening in overwhelming numbers. The guns were four twelve-pound brass pieces; a number of battle-flags, including those of the Thirty-eighth and Thirty-fifth Alabama, were captured, with over two hundred prisoners. GRANT'S division is entitled to the credit of this novel achievement.



BURNING OF THE FREDERICKSBURG AND RICHMOND RAILROAD BRIDGE OVER THE NORTH ANNA.—[SEE PAGE 397.



SECOND CORPS BATTERIES IN POSITION ON THE NORTH ANNA RIVER.—[SEE PAGE 397.]

THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA—CANVASS PONTOONS ON THE NORTH ANNA RIVER.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 397.]

GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN.

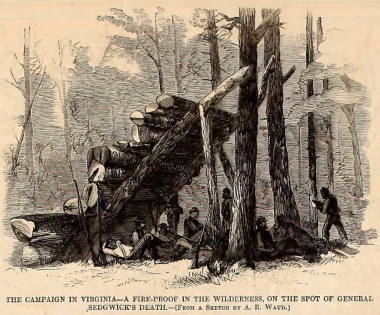
On page 396 we give a series of sketches illustrating recent events in General GRANT'S campaign. The principal sketch shows the Canvas Pontoons laid on the North Anna River for the passage of our troops. Another sketch represents the burning of the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad Bridge over the North Anna. A third sketch shows the Second Corps Batteries as they appeared in position on the banks of the North Anna, prior to GRANT'S flank movement and passage of the Pamunkey. The Battery which appears in our sketch is the Second Maine.

On this page we give three additional illustrations of this campaign. The first is a sketch of a picturesque shelter erected by our soldiers, near the spot where General SEDGWICK was killed, as a protection against shot and shell from the rebel lines. The picture is full of interest as exhibiting what novel methods our soldiers resort to for purposes of defense from the casualties of battle.

The next is a graphic sketch of the disembarkation of General W. F. SMITH'S Eighteenth Army Corps at White House, on the Pamunkey River, on the 30th ult. A correspondent thus describes the landing:

White House was reached at noon; but every facility for landing was found to have been completely destroyed. General BROOKS'S flag-boat was run up to the ruins of what had been the wharf, and made fast. A detail was landed with difficulty, and was soon engaged in replanking the bridge with railroad ties. The railroad bridge, which had been erected by SHERMAN on his late raid, was found to have been completely destroyed by the rebels, and the Corps of Engineers were immediately at work upon it, assisted by the One Hundred and Thirty-ninth New York. Three hours after our landing a great change was effected in the appearance of the place. It again became the White House of two years ago, with the scene of busy life and its innumerable bathers.

The third is a spirited sketch of the FIGHT AT COLD HARBOR on the 1st instant, showing the position of General SMITH'S corps, which bore the brunt of the fight. General SMITH'S troops, though exhausted by a hard march and two or three days of hard labor, fought with the greatest gallantry. The rebels had a strong position on the edge of a dense woods, with rifle-pits and earth-works thrown up; but at the order Generals BROOKS and DEVINS pushed through the woods on their front, and the exhausted men, suddenly imbued with enthusiasm, poured like a tornado to the charge, driving the rebels pell-mell from their works and through the woods. The rebels on our immediate front were of LONGSTREET'S corps, and were, after being driven through the woods, rallied behind their reserves, and led up to recapture their position. With their well-known rebel battle-cry they rushed forward, but were received with so close and murderous a fire of artillery and musketry that they broke and fled in confusion. Again and again they were rallied by their officers, and returned to the charge; but again and again they only returned to be again driven back with greater slaughter. Mr. WIKOFF, correspondent of the New York Times, in going from the front of BROOKS'S division, had his horse shot under him during this engagement. General SMITH and his staff also had several narrow escapes, while some of his general officers, less fortunate, were seriously wounded by missiles from the enemy.



THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.—A FIRE-PROOF IN THE WILDERNESS, ON THE SPOT OF GENERAL SEDGWICK'S DEATH.—[FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.]

DISEMBARKATION OF GENERAL SMITH'S TROOPS AT WHITE HOUSE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

1, 1. Rebel Guns.—2. Rebel Line of Battle.—3, 3. Rebel Earth-Works and Rifle-Pits.—4. Devins's Division charging Rifle-Pits, and capturing 500 Prisoners.—5. Brooks's Division.—6. Martindale's Division.

THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.—FIGHT AT COLD HARBOR, JUNE 1, 1864.—GENERAL SMITH'S CORPS IN ACTION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

Hanoverton
Clarks Gorge
Upper Chanceford
Yellow Breeches Cr.
Yellow Breeches Cr.
Big Mount Holly
Virginia Central R.R.
Yellow Breeches Cr.
Tolpotomoy Cr.
Willis's Church
Old Church
Newcastle
Flying Tree P.O.
Pumpkin Cr.
Jacks Cr.
Appomattox Cr.
Matoaca Road
Appomattox River
Hagerstown
Mechanicsville
Pole Green Ch.
Mount Olive Ch.
Old Church
Cold Harbor
Gaines Mills
New Cold Harbor
Trevilian Br.
Tunstalls Station
Hanover Court House
Hanover Junction
Chamberlayne's
Ashland
Fork Hall
Totopotomoy Cr.
Totopotomoy Cr.
Totopotomoy Cr.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$125 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	40 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches ...	20 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo, Opal, and Jet Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 8 00 each.
3500 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Steam Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Plain Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Stone Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
6000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'nted Holders 4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

(From Juries 3 and 4) at the

International Exhibition,

LONDON, 1862,

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlets, with 80 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

Enameled Chamber

FURNITURE

The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, walnut and chestnut, plain and ornamental, in suits, wholesale and retail. Also Mattresses and Palliasses. WARREN WARD, 771 Canal St., N. Y.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1848)

GOLD PENS,

PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Ag't, No. 22 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.

Brandreth's Pills.

They expel the poisons which threaten life. Every time a sick person is purged by this vegetable remedy, he has less vitiated humors and more life and vigor, as any one can prove by taking a single dose. Persons of spare habit gain flesh and strength while using them. Every time we rest a few days or weeks from the medicine, we make new fluids from our food, which replace the unsound ones that the Pills have caused to be evacuated. Each time we repeat this process, we expel further quantities of impurities, which are again replaced by fluids less and less impure, so that in a short time, by continuing this treatment, we bring back the whole mass of fluids or humors to that state of purity which constitutes health, for Brandreth's Pills only take away humors which are unsound.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold by all the entire pot box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it the Signature in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

MANUAL of Gunnery Instructions for the Navy of the United States. Compiled from the ordnance instructions for the United States Navy, for the use of the United States Naval Academy. One vol. square 32mo, with illustrations, price $1 00 in Muslin. Mailed free. This day published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway.

SOMETHING NEW

IN PLAYING CARDS.

LOVE SCENES.

Designs from French Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-six beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Invoices 50 cents and two red stamps, and send for a sample pack. $2 per dozen. Terms discount by gross to dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 69 Nassau St., New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed, &c. Price $2500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and Philadelphia, by Express, or Under Troops, will be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Great Gift Distribution

OF

Gold Watches, Diamond Rings,

And Elegant Jewelry.

VALUED AT $500,000.

GOODWIN, HUNT & CO.,

Jewelers,

197 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Circular. All letters should be addressed to our Box 5106, Post-Office, New York.

Heads of the Leaders.

The Hon. JOHN BROUGH, Governor of Ohio; Mr. THOMAS BLANCHARD, the Inventor; R. T. TRALL, M.D., Author of Hydropathic Encyclopedia, Hygeian Home, and Health Lectures. Also, THE HUMAN FOOT, its Physiology, Anatomy, and Philosophy. "Ideal Woman." Phrenology, Illustrated by Science of Forces. Heads of Men and Women Compared. Self-Government. The Human Face Divine. Hair and Dress—their Significance. Premonitions of Death, Talking in Sleep. Foretelling Events. Self-Knowledge, Physiology, Physiognomy, Psychology, and much other interesting matter, in the Illustrated PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Only 25 Cents. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

FIELD, NAVY, and OPERA GLASSES manufactured by B. H. HORN, OPTICIAN, 319 Broadway, corner of Fulton St.; also every description of Optical Instruments, Lenses, Spectacles, and Eye-glasses to suit all sights and purses. Send stamp for circular.

D. BARNUM'S

"SELF-SEWER,"

FOR ALL SEWING-MACHINES.

Preserves the Eyes, saves Time and Money. No heating. NO Machine complete without it. Price $1 50, with Directions, sent by mail. Trade supplied at the inventor's headquarters, WILCOX & GIBBS' Sewing Machine Office, 505 Broadway, New York.

D. BARNUM.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES.

For sale by the Adams Press Co., 25 Ann Street, N. Y. Circular free. Specimen Sheets for 3 cents.

Attention Company!

Clerk's Organist, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustaches in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain of injury to the skin. Any person using this Organist, and finding it not as represented, returning me the empty box, can have their money returned them at any time within 3 months from day of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money. Address, A. C. CLARK,

P. O. Drawer 115,

Albany, N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to Dr. Uncle Brant, Box 2631, New York. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Letter of Advice for Ladies.

FIVE ANATOMICAL ENGRAVINGS.

Has information never before published.

Urinal Fluids, a sealed envelope for 25 cents.

Address Box 4652, New York P. O.

CARPET WAP.

WOOL TWINE.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 64 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

A CHANCE FOR POETICAL PATRIOTISM.—A Piece of One Hundred Dollars is offered by the proprietor of Demorest's Illustrated News, for the best words for a song on the Union, Liberty and Universal Freedom in our glorious Constitution. See the particulars in Demorest's N. Y. Illustrated News.

The 10th Army Corps Badge,

in solid silver, $1 50; gold, $8. Also all the various kinds of Badges now worn, by the single one, 100, or 1000. Send for a circular. Address DELEVAN E. MOORE, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustrations, New Mode, Beautiful Braid and Embroidery, Valuable Information, and Seven Full-Sized Patterns, now ready.

The New

16th Army Corps Badge, in solid silver, $1 50; in 18 karat gold, $5 00. Also the new Badge for 10 A. C. at same prices. Badges constantly on hand for every Corps and Division. Silver Buttons $1 each, with Name, Co., and Regt. engraved. Agents will be liberally dealt with. Send for a new circular. R. KEITH, 15 John St., formerly 208 Broadway, dealer in Watches, Chains, Jewelry, Gold Pens and Cases, Jewelry, &c.

THE GOVERNMENT LOAN

OF

$200,000,000.

This Loan is authorized by Act of Congress of March 3d, 1864, which provides for its REDEMPTION IN COIN, at any period not less than ten or more than forty years from its date, at the pleasure of the Government.

Until its Redemption five per cent. interest is to be paid semi-annually IN COIN.

Subscriptions to the Loan are received by the the National Banks in United States notes or in such currency or other funds as are taken by them on deposit at par.

Its Exemption from State or Local Taxation adds from one to three per cent. per annum to its value.

The Rate of Interest on this loan, although but five per cent. in coin, is as much greater in currency as the difference between the market value of currency and gold.

As a Rule, the five per cent. specie securities of all solvent governments are always par or above, and currency now funded in the National Loan will be worth its face in gold, besides paying a regular and liberal percentage to the holder.

The authorized Amount of this loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars. The amount of subscriptions reported to the Treasury at Washington, up to June 4, has been $67,017,950.

Subscriptions will be received by the TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES at Washington, and the ASSISTANT TREASURERS at New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and by all National Banks

which are depositaries of Public money, and all

RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS

throughout the country (acting as agents of the National Depositary Banks), will furnish further information on application and

AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

FOR 75 CENTS.—The Jan., Feb., March, April, May, and June numbers of the ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL will be sent by return post. To secure the PICTORIAL DOUBLE NUMBER, with Physiognomy, Ethnology, Physiology, Psychology, send at once to FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

YOUNG DISTRESS FOR HOT WEATHER, 25c., mailed. Messenger's Improved Lever for thin, violin, 50c., mailed. or clarionet, $1. ORGUES COMPLETE, a musical library of 1200 tunes—violin, flute, or clarionet, $3. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery. N. Y.

THE Summer No. of MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS Now ready, a brilliant display of beautiful novelties, music, elegant fashion plates, seven full size Braiding and Embroidery Braid Sheet, with much valuable information, only 15 cents; or yearly subscription $1, with a premium of a Package of Extra Cut Patterns.

(From of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest will send $1 00, and 2 cts. for postage on the premium, for which please send me package of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little of everything relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the many subjects treated in the work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Piles, Liver, and Kidneys—Dropsy of Digestion, Constipation, Affections of the Throat, Nervousness, Diseases of the Female Organs of Generation, Barrenness, Impotency, Seminal Weakness, Dysmenorrhœa, Sick Headache, Cancer, Paralysis, Heart Disease, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Throw Aside Spectacles, Marriage a Natural Philosophy, The Author Speculates, Marriage as the World, Philosophy of Curious Marriage Customs of a Child-marking, a Chapter for Engineers, Fallacies of Celibacy of values to married and the Married, and thousands of values to married and single, never before, making altogether a curious book for curious people, and a good book for every one; 300 pp. 100 illustrations. To be had of all News Agents. Liberal tables sent free by mail to all applicants, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 50. Address R. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD!"

THE GOLD PEN.—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,

MORTON'S GOLD PENS,

THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—stating the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but arranged in rates to numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmin Points, of the average wear of every one of which we will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are warranted not to last, therefore, not numbered.

THE MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the Gold Writing Pens, and the points are warranted to be of the smoothest, easiest quality.

The Pens are made in three sizes for use, 1 being the smallest No. 3, the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 6 the largest, for Mammoth Gold Pen, for Counting-House use.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs will number 3, 4, 5, and 6, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are Broad, Coarse Business points. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For $0 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 2 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 25, a No. 6 Pen; $2 75 a No. 7 Pen; $3 25 a No. 8 Pen; $4 a No. 9 Pen; $5 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $1 50 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 2 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 00, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50, a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK HOLDER.

For $3 00 a No. 2 Pen; for $3 50 a No. 3 Pen; for $3 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $3 50 a No. 1 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 5 Pen; for $5 a No. 6 Pen; and for $6 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold but such as possess peculiar excellence, both and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "1st Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The "2d Quality" Pens he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity and Good Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens sold in this country.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, as he cannot undertake to describe the kind of pen—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

Pens sent by mail, post-paid, if registered letters are at my risk; and to all who send twenty cents (the charge for registering), in addition to the price of goods, he will guaranty their safe delivery.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $12, of 15 per cent. on $24, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

A. MORTON,

No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

DEMOREST'S N. Y. ILLUSTRATED NEWS, the model newspaper of America, and universally acknowledged as the most graphic and finely illustrated paper now published, combining Music, the Fashions, and General Literature. Sings cogies 10 cents; yearly $4 00, with Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions for one year as a premium. The best medium for general advertising in the country. All communications should be addressed to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 29 Beekman Street.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION

Of Gold Watches, Diamond Rings,

AND ELEGANT JEWELRY,

WORTH 300,000.

WOOD, HOYT & CO.,

Jewelers 195 Broadway. New York.

YOU MUST get the VALUE of your money.

Parties entitling themselves to all cases, and the prizes will be immediately refunded to any party dissatisfied with the articles sent.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for Circular.

Address WOOD, HOYT & CO.,

Box 5726, Post-Office, New York.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For July, 1864, Now Ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00

Two Copies for One Year 5 50

An Extra Copy, gratis, to every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 75 each; or 11 Copies for $27 50.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MONTHLY, together, one year, $6 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months $1 00

One Copy for One Year 3 00

One Copy for Two Years 5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 75 each, or 11 Copies for $27 50. Payment invariably in advance.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements will be charged.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

JUST SO!

FREMONT. "Well, Sir! I am nominated, you see!"
COCHRANE. "Yes, Sir! WE are nominated."
LINCOLN. "Well, Gentlemen; and what then?"
FREMONT and COCHRANE. "Oh! nothing, Sir; nothing—that's all!"

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.
MEERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS,
676 BROADWAY, Near 4th St., N. Y.
Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $5 for sample pipe.

TROPICAL BALSAM
Prepared by Carreno Brothers and Co.
This celebrated and unparalleled medicine, composed entirely of vegetable productions of the Tropics, is daily restoring the most perfect health of manhood to thousands of our young men, who are suffering from the effects of Mercury, or the diseases of Impure Blood, and all other diseases of the direct and delicate organs of the system. Its wonderful power over Secret Diseases, Seminal Weakness, Nervous Debility, Impotency, Sterility, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Diseases of the Urinary Organs, and all Diseases of the Kidneys and Bladder, are startling and unprecedented. Its Diuretic power in Dropsy, Pain in the Back, Kidneys, and along the Loins, is immediate and astonishing. In the more delicate derangements of the female system, in Suppressions, Irregularities, Painful Menstruation, and Whites, it is unequalled by any remedy ever discovered. Explicit directions for use in all these diseases, with hundreds of certificates from the highest sources, will be found around each bottle. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot, 224 Broadway, N. Y. Basket at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. Also, Carreno's Tropical Cologne, a delightful perfume, for the Handkerchief, Toilet, and Bath. Sold by Druggists generally.

Don't buy your Gaiters or Shoes without Fogg's Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the straps. Dealers or manufacturers can obtain Tee Cards Currently, and I will mail sample of two patterns.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

Davis' Pain Killer.

Gentlemen: — Having used your "Pain Killer" myself, and seen it used by others a great many times, in cases of colic in horses, with the best of success, I feel it my duty to say to horsekeeping it as the best medicine for the colic that I have ever used or seen used. For a dose I have generally given about two-thirds of the quantity there is in a twenty-five cent bottle, in a pint of warm milk and molasses.
Yours respectfully,
SAMUEL P. FISHER, of McLean, Ill.,
Formerly of Providence, R. I.

EXCELSIOR FIREWORKS.
FUNSTON & SCOTFIELD, removed to No. 9 Dey St., near Broadway. Public and private exhibitions. Chinese Lanterns, &c. Goods guaranteed best and cheapest.

$1500 per Year.—We send Hoyt's great Book of Secrets, or How to Make $5 a Day without capital, and a diamond point Gold Pen and Silver Extension Case, all for $1. M. YOUNG & BROS., 200 Broadway, New York.

Cherokee Medicines.—Every reader of Harper's Weekly is requested to send their address to us, and we will mail free of postage our 32 page pamphlet securely sealed, giving valuable information. Address Dr. W. E. MERWIN & Co., No. 63 Liberty St., New York.

U. S. Army Agency,

64 Beekman Street, N. Y., opposite Fay Department.
All persons having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.
Attorney of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid:
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in Battle.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

VERMILYE & CO.,

No. 44 Wall Street, New York,
Bankers and Dealers in all Kinds of Government Stocks.
U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,
converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.
The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

Wheeler & Wilson's Highest Premium
LOCK STITCH
Sewing Machines.
625 Broadway, New York.

WARDS SHIRTS

Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge and water.
To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.
From 75 cts. each; sent by mail to any part of the Union on the receipt of 90 cents.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, 367 Broadway, N. Y.

BENJAMIN'S RUPTURE CURE TRUSS challenges the world to equal it in retaining and perfectly curing Hernia, or Rupture. Office, 1 Barclay Street, opposite the Astor House.

Good News for the Army.

Hereafter we will send, post-paid, any of our PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS ordered by soldiers for themselves or friends, giving an Album of the full value of the money sent.
Our Albums have the reputation of being superior to all others in beauty and durability, and range in price from 50 cts. to $20.
Our catalogue of
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS
now embraces about 5000 officers, men and navy, statesmen, actors, copies of works of art, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Our assortment of these is very extensive, including a great variety of views of the present war.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 50 cents, or FORTY FOR $1 00.
Address P. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Metallic Artificial Legs,
Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals.
Patented Jan. 6th, 1863.
Weight only Four Pounds.
Soldier's price, $50; Civilian's, $75 to $100.
1st. I guarantee a fit in all cases.
2d. The measure can be sent, and the leg returned by Express, thereby saving the time and expense of coming to New York to be fitted.
3d. It tastes no more.
4th. It has no unpleasant noise.
I have such implicit confidence in my Improved Metallic Leg, that I will give any one the privilege of returning it if they are not entirely satisfied after 3 months' trial, and I will return the money, less twenty-five dollars. Price from $75 to $100. Send for a circular.
Office and salesroom 491 Broadway, New York.
JAMES W. WESTON.

Remington's
ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

Card Photographs.

A splendid assortment. Catalogues sent free. Address B. W. HITCHCOCK, Manufacturer, 14 Chambers St., N. Y.

ΙΟΔΗΣ.

DR. H. ANDES & CO.'S IODINE WATER is readily absorbed into the system, and passes into the blood, modifying the condition of that fluid, and thus exerts a new influence upon the morbid tissues of the body. With a fair trial it will attest its own excellence in the cure of diseases arising from an enfeebled, vitiated state of the blood, defective nutrition, an impure atmosphere, &c. Price $1 per bottle. On receipt of $5, six bottle delivered free by express to any address. Circulars gratis.
DR. H. ANDES & CO., Physicians and Chemists,
No. 628 Broadway, New York.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums
Purifies and Sweetens the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.
Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.
HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,
215 Greenwich St., New York.

Munro's Ten Cent Novels.—These Books have received a popularity that has since been equaled by any other Publications in the same space of time. Everyone should read them and recommend them to his neighbor. They are No. 1. The Hunters.—2. The Trapper's Retreat. —3. The Inland Highwayman.—4. The Haunted Tavern.—5. The Track of Fire.—6. The Man-Eaters.—7. Charlotte Temple.—8. The Death Face.—9. The Indian Slayer. —10. The Tiger of the Ocean.—11. The Hunter's Triumph.—12. The Ocean Rovers.—13. The Two Guiwichs.—14. Zeke Sternum, the Lion-Hearted Scout.—15. The Scourge of the Seas. For sale by all News Agents, and sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, 10c. each. GEORGE MUNRO & CO., 137 William St., N. Y.

Shults' Ongnent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Gold Watch Free
AND
$15 Per Day, $15

Made sure by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Prizes Lotter New Stationery and Prize Packages, $2[illegible] BE MADE in a few hours by smart agents. Greatest [illegible]-selling business of the age. Each Package contains [illegible] quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Holders, Embossing Dies, Parts Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Ornaments, Household Conveniences, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, [illegible] Pocket Calendar for the Year, Union Designs, Various Methods of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Rich and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., etc., the whole worth MANY DOLLARS if bought separately. Prize each Package ONLY 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid Steel Engraving of Silver Hunting Case Lever WATCH (warranted) presented FREE to each Agent. Persons wanted to establish Agencies in every town and village. Accounts given free. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the world.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order on most unruly. COLORED STONE CHINA DINNER SETS.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the
SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.
Send for a prospectus as below.
VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOOTHING COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 65 cts. per bottle. JAPONICA, OR THE HAIR, ELEGANT, USEFUL, but only harmless restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE HYGIENIQUE, OR DELICATE OIL, TOILE. MASSOLA PHILOCOME, OR EXQUISITE POMADE, 25 cts. One sixth off by the dozen. If your druggist has not these Articles, take no other, but remit with your order to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 115 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

The only concealed "Turn-over" Collar made of metals. Send $1 for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Choker," to C. H. WELLING, 94 Pine Street, N. Y., and receive it by return mail.

What is more to be desired than
A PLEASANT HOME?
Whoever would know the secrets of making home pleasant, should read
HOUSE AND HOME PAPERS,
by HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." These papers are published in each number of the

Atlantic Monthly

and have attracted attention everywhere. They are full of interest and benefit to every household. They will be continued through 1864. Specimens to the ATLANTIC at once, and secure the reading of these invaluable papers The ATLANTIC is furnished at THREE DOLLARS a year, postage paid, or 25 cents a number. Clubs supplied at reduced rates. Send 25 cents for a specimen to DICKSON & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

DRY AND GROUND IN OIL
in several drab shades.
For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.
ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
21 Bromfield Street, Boston, and
Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

The Celebrated CRAIG MICROSCOPE, combining Instruction with Amusement, is mailed, post-paid, for $5 50; with a beautiful Mounted Objects for $8 50; with 24 Objects, $9 50.
HENRY CRAIG,
180 Canter St., New York.

Also, by mail, prepaid, the Bellscope, or Perfected STEREOSCOPE, with a sliding Focus and Field-Piece, accommodating all eyes, for $3 00; with 12 stereoscopic views, $6. A liberal discount to the trade.

MASON & HAMLIN

One	to	Twelve	Steps.	$95 to $250 each.

CABINET ORGANS

An illustrated catalogue free to any address. Address MASON BROTHERS, NEW YORK, or MASON & HAMLIN, BOSTON.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 391.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

BURNING OF THE STEAMER "BERKSHIRE," ON THE HUDSON RIVER, ON THE NIGHT OF JUNE 8, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 410.]

GOVERNOR ANDREW JOHNSON, OF TENNESSEE.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE LATE JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. ALVEY, ASHTABULA, OHIO.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

ANDREW JOHNSON.

ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee, nominated by the Baltimore Convention as the Union candidate for Vice-President—whose portrait we give on the preceding page—was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, on the 29th of December, 1808. When ten years of age he was apprenticed to a tailor, and worked at that trade in South Carolina until his seventeenth year. He never attended school, but acquired a good common education by reading, after his marriage, under the direction of his wife. Having removed to Greeneville, Tennessee, he was elected Mayor of that place in 1830, was elected to the State Legislature in 1835, and to the State Senate in 1841; and in 1843 became a Representative in Congress, serving until 1853. During the latter year he was elected Governor of Tennessee, and re-elected in 1855. In 1857 he was elected United States Senator for the term ending in 1863, and at once became conspicuous for his solid sense and sterling integrity. Upon the disclosure of the plans of the rebel conspirators he at once took high ground in support of the Government, denouncing and opposing with great bitterness and force the whole traitorous scheme. Upon the restoration of Tennessee he was made Provisional Governor of the State, and in that capacity has rendered service of immense value in establishing tranquility and order and defeating the measures of the Secessionists of the State. Governor JOHNSON early saw that slavery was the cause and originator of the rebellion, and, though always in former years a pro-slavery man, promptly took ground in favor of the complete extermination of the system.

"ANDY" JOHNSON, like Mr. LINCOLN, is emphatically a self-made man. He reflects directly, in his wonderful career, the genius of our institutions, under which the humblest citizen may attain the highest honors of the republic.

JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS.

JOSHUA REED GIDDINGS, whose portrait we give on the preceding page, was born at Athens, Bradford County, Pennsylvania, October 6, 1795. In his childhood his parents removed with him to Canandaigua, in this State; and at the age of ten he went with them to Ashtabula County, Ohio. Here he and his family were among the earliest settlers. His father was a farmer, and JOSHUA helped him, studying only in the long winter evenings. In 1812, at the age of seventeen, he enlisted as a volunteer, went to the war as a substitute for an older brother. He was engaged in two actions with the British on Lake Erie. When discharged he began teaching school. In 1817 he began the study of law in the office of ELISHA WHITTLESEY, who was Comptroller of the Treasury for many years. In 1826 he was sent to the Legislature for one term, declining a re-election in order to follow his profession. In 1838 he was elected public life, being sent to Congress in place of Mr. WHITTLESEY. His first motion in Congress was to ask that the enacting clause of a bill for constructing some public improvement in the District of Columbia, on the ground that the people of the District had to ask no favors while they insisted on the maintenance of a slave-market. He became almost immediately conspicuous for his courage with which he attacked slavery, and in all the discussions on this subject in which he took part he took the broad ground that slavery was a mere local institution, which the General Government could not and ought not to acknowledge, and whose force ceased the moment the slave left the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. In 1842 Congress, on the motion of Mr. JOHN MILTON HOPPIN, passed a severe censure upon Mr. GIDDINGS for presenting certain resolutions in relation to the case of the Creole. Mr. GIDDINGS at once resigned his right to defend himself, and the resolution being passed, he immediately resigned his seat, and called upon his constituents to pass upon his conduct. They re-elected him with so little delay that he was absent from his seat but five weeks. He returned with special authority from his constituents to Congress again his resolutions.

Mr. GIDDINGS served in Congress in all twenty-one years. During this time he was known for his constant devotion to the principle of liberty; and it must be said to his honor that he dared to maintain the freedom of discussion which he claimed for himself. He acted generally with the Whig party until 1848, when he worked with the Free Soil party. In 1844 he united with JOHN QUINCY ADAMS in submitting a report in which it was distinctly declared that the liberties of the people and their primary foundation in the truths of Christianity. In 1850 he opposed the second Compromise Measures. By his unceasing opposition to slavery he aroused the bitter personal hostility of the proslavery party. In July, 1850, he was charged with obstructing important papers from the General Post-office. He instantly demanded an investigation, and was entirely exonerated by a committee consisting chiefly of political opponents. In 1859 some telegraph in Richmond published in the journals of that city an advertisement offering a reward of ten thousand dollars to any one who would bring the person of Mr. GIDDINGS to Richmond alive, and a reward of five thousand dollars for his head. In 1860 Mr. GIDDINGS wrote a series of political essays over the signature "PACIFICUS." In 1853 was published a volume of his speeches. In 1858 he printed "The Exiles of Florida"—an important work, full of information on some of the darkest portions of our history. Lately has been published a volume on slavery he had been engaged for some years, which gives a complete account of the slavery agitation in Congress.

As a public man he was pure, honorable, conscientious, and devoted to the principle and practice of liberty. As a writer, his style lacks elegance, and is somewhat crude and rude, showing the marks of early disadvantages in respect of education. As a speaker, he was not eloquent, but forcible, pertinacious, and courageous. In all his acts he showed personal courage and a determination to maintain the right at all hazards.

THE COPPERHEAD.

THERE'S a venomous snake which lurks in the grass,
A slimy, treacherous, horrible thing;
The copperhead bue are his ugly folds,
And he gives no warning before his sting.

But strikes with a secret and sudden dart,
Leaving a poisoned and deadly smart.

In the cool sweet meadows and over the fields,
Mid the tall green shoots and the clover blooms,
He crawls along on his horrid scales,
And through the depths of the forest glooms
This hideous reptile his slow path takes,
The vilest of all the race of snakes.

He basks in the light of the sun by day,
And hides in his narrow den at night
Along with his mate and pestilent brood.
Oh, a loathsome, hateful, unclean sight
Is this slimy serpent, this crawling thing,
With the copperish hide and the deadly sting!

Of late he has taken the shape of man,
As of old took Satan the serpent's form,
Plotting at night in his traitorous den,
And lurking by day in the sunshine warm,
Ready to strike with a secret dart
His poisoned fangs to the Nation's heart.

More dangerous far than an open foe
Is this cunning snake with fangs so keen,
Lying concealed in the darkness grim,
And striving to hide his venomed spleen.
Oh, what shall we do with the hateful thing
To render harmless his poisoned sting?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1864.

THE UNION NOMINATIONS.

THE Baltimore Convention met and organized on the 7th of June, and on the 8th, in one session, laid down its platform, nominated ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON with enthusiastic unanimity, and adjourned.

There was never a Convention which more truly represented the people, and, upon the first opportunity offered, it showed its purpose in the most unmistakable manner. It ignored the watchet its deliberations, or who has read its proceedings, but must feel that it expressed the strongest popular determination for the unflinching prosecution of the most energy efficient measures. Its settlement of the Missouri question, by admitting the radical delegation from that State, and excluding the Blair wing, by a vote of 440 to 4, was the indication that the vast mass of the Union men in the country have parted company with the hesitating and half-hearted, who have been associated with the name of BLAIR. The resolutions, clear, incisive, and full, are to the same result, and leave no doubt in any mind that the "Border State policy," having served its purpose, and a purpose with which we are not disposed to quarrel, is no longer the policy which the people of the country approve. This decision is emphasized by the nomination of ANDREW JOHNSON, a life-long Democrat, who has been educated by the rebel sword straight up to the necessities of the crisis.

OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN we have nothing to change in the sketch we presented in these columns. That he unites perfect patriotism and great sagacity to profound conviction and patient tenacity, and that his conduct of our affairs has been, upon the whole, wise, prudent, and wise, we are more than ever convinced; and that no public man in our history since WASHINGTON has inspired a warmer personal regard we have no doubt whatever that the result of the election will establish. Of ANDREW JOHNSON it is enough to say that he is the man for the country, unless it be Mr. LINCOLN himself, whom the rebels more cordially hate. He fought them in the Senate, when they counted upon his aid, and he has fought them every hour since and with untiring energy. It is pleasant to record, of our personal knowledge, that one of the wisest and best men in the Union Party, who has sacrificed not less than JOHNSON himself, says of the contingency of JOHNSON's succession to the chief magistracy that he is content, and the cause of American Liberty could then not be in safer hands.

THE resolutions of the nominations is what might have been expected of a people which had virtually ordered them to be made. The Copperhead journals, the late supporters of JOHN B. FLOYD & Co., denounce the Convention as a corrupt body; and seeing in the nominations the most tremendous proclamation of the loyal citizens of the United States to all enemies at home and abroad that the cause of the American Union is to be fought out upon this line, they renew their old cry that our liberties have been lost in the effort to maintain them. The red Copperhead regret it, not that liberty has been lost, but that slavery has not been saved. The Union journals which have considered Mr. LINCOLN badly advised, timid, and hesitating, still cordially applaud the platform, which they properly regard as a body of instructions from the people for increased and continual vigor. They are entirely satisfied with the resolutions and ANDREW JOHNSON, but with the Presidential nomination had been left dependent upon the result of the campaign. That is a view of the situation which seems to us peculiarly erroneous, and fraught with the utmost danger. The reliance of every patriot is and must be upon the sturdy good sense and purpose of the people—a faith not to be shaken by disaster, and a purpose which demands that the Chief Magistrate, at such a period as this, shall be tried, and not an untried man.

It is remarkable that journals which we have always supposed were truly and not technically "democratic," because believing in the general wisdom and instinct of the people, while they regret to see Mr. LINCOLN has been renominated, confess that he is beyond any question the man and the choice of the people. We believe it also true for that reason, if for no other, heartily hail the result. If the Baltimore Convention had adjourned to some future day, because the military campaign is not yet decided, its action—which was an utter want of popular confidence in the present Administration, under which that campaign is conducted—would have done more to defeat military operations, and destroy the faith of the country, than any step which could be named.

Fortunately for the good cause, the people differ with these journals. Their cause is not yet, in their own estimation, so desperate as to require them to look for salvation to military prestige, however deserved, or to military ability, however gladly and proudly conceded. This is the loyal people's cause and war. In ABRAHAM LINCOLN they have found their sincere representative. Therefore they have almost universally demanded his renomination, and therefore they will elect him by a conclusive majority.

FREMONT.

GENERAL FREMONT has resigned his commission in the army, and has accepted the Cleveland nomination. In accepting it he has written a letter in which he declares that Mr. LINCOLN has already "seized the people of their liberties against which also JEFFERSON DAVIS took up arms. That we may do General FREMONT no injustice, we quote his words. Among the objects of the Cleveland Convention, he says, "was to bring the people 'to realize that while we are saturated with war, we will with the best blood of the country, in the name of Liberty, we have really parted with it at home.'"

In the estimation of General FREMONT, therefore, the policy of the President and of DAVIS is equal; and if what he says be true, the war is as unholy as ever Mr. VALLANDIGHAM or Mr. BENJAMIN HOUSE declared it to be. No fouler slavery-loving citizen of the United States can be more fairly asked to sustain, by a single dollar or word or act, the Administration which has deliberately overthrown the Constitution and liberty, than to encourage a conspiracy which aims at the same result. The strongest friend of the rebellion, the bitterest foe and opposite of "loyalty," has never offered a plainer and more conclusive reason for immediately stopping the war, and ordering the recognition of the dismemberment of the Union and Government than General FREMONT offers in his letter. If Mr. LINCOLN has overthrown the Constitution in common with JEFFERSON DAVIS, certainly any man may elect with whom he will range himself. If General FREMONT be correct, it is General GRANT's patriotic duty to turn his guns against the WASHINGTON traitor who has really destroyed our liberties rather than against the Richmond rebel who has merely attacked them.

No man has the right, without a knowledge which few can have, to question another man's sincerity. But it is hard to conceive that General FREMONT can sincerely mean us to view, on the one hand, the exercise of an arbitrary authority by the military power of the Government, expressly granted by the Constitution in time of rebellion, as treachery to that Government; or, on the other, to accept an occasional insurrection in its exercise as a form of liberty. We trust that the right of personal freedom is as sacred in our estimation as it is in that of General FREMONT or of Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS; and we can not believe that Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, whose letter is urged upon General FREMONT as virtually the platform of the Cleveland meeting, is prepared to avow that the exercise of arbitrary power may be necessary, and must be allowed at a time like this. His opinion of Mr. LINCOLN after the rebellion broke out the Administration suspended habeas corpus, on the plea of military necessity, justly."

YET that a sense of personal wrong, long brooded, and fostered by unfortunate influences of many kinds, may confuse even a noble and generous mind, history too plainly shows. It remains for us, then, only to deplore that General FREMONT adopts a view of the situation which concedes the destruction of the government as accomplished, and releases every citizen from his obligations. The more direct, the more heroic, course for him, if the cause has fallen beneath betrayal by Mr. LINCOLN and our liberties are lost, as he asserts, would be, not to allow that hoary despot nearly a year to forge our chains more closely, but to unroll the banner of armed opposition at once, and summon all true men to rescue their liberties from the tyrant's grasp.

With what profound sorrow those who have known the name of FREMONT only as the watchword of Liberty and Union now hear him repeating the cry of VALLANDIGHAM and the Copperheads, adopting their extremest position as his own, and those who have known what it is to see the moral fall of a leader almost romantically admired can imagine. If FREMONT had died before the war began his name would always have shone in our history with a lovely lustre, as a symbol of the regenerative principle of American politics. He was not President, the historian would have said, but his name expressed the aspiration of awakening conscience in the people.

What, then, it is asked hereafter, How did he change? the reply will be simple: that, at a time when slavery by force of arms was struggling to overthrow the Government which was the security of liberty, he denounced certain acts of that Government in self-defense as themselves a virtual overthrow of the Constitution, and separating himself in the crisis from the mass of his truest friends, threw himself into the arms of the bitterest enemies of Liberty. Does General FREMONT believe that the gentlemen who are going to the Chicago Convention, and who will support its nominations, are any truer friends of Union and Liberty than those who went to Baltimore and their supporters? Does he not know, or in the heat of passion has he forgotten, that the gentlemen who met at Chicago were the steadiest supporters of that policy against which his name was formerly a protest, and that their political creed and sympathy with slavery are to-day the chief hope of the rebellion? And yet he knows, as we all know, that many of the numerous Chicago men will be glad to see him the candidate of the Convention. Is it because they have come to him, or because he has gone to them? When the New York World loudly applauds him, it is because he is helping or hindering the cause of human liberty? because he is uniting, or because he is distracting, the friends of the Union and of national honor?

BROWNING wrote a poem called "The Lost Leader," whose burden was the universal sorrow over in the hearts of all who have read it with experience. But never, perhaps, will its lines appear to thousands and thousands of young and earnest American hearts so painfully as they do since FREMONT wrote his letter. Was that enthusiasm of the generous youth of a whole nation so despised? Is the saddest of all fates, is the cheer of FERNANDO WOOD, so much sweeter than the trust of unknown multitudes? Was FREMONT made to cease to be the FREMONT of June, 1856, to be the FREMONT of June, 1864?

POLITICAL EPITHETS.

IN his speech at the GRANT meeting Judge DALY is reported to have said that he deprecated the use of epithets and party names in politics, with personal references to "the man beforehand," as applied to certain persons in the loyal States. For ourselves we have used that term for the purposes of exact description. We are engaged in a formidable war for the maintenance of the Government and Union. In its prosecution every power of the Constitution is invoked, and all its forces employed. To suppose that the Constitution is inadequate to the exigency is to suppose that the framers not only in every government, in the nature of things, empowered to save itself, but because the Constitution itself explicitly grants all the necessary power.

That instrument was framed by men fresh from a long and declining war, who understood, therefore, the perilous condition and necessities of war. But they were also men who, from the end of the Revolution to the adoption of the Constitution, had lived under the curse of a vague and weak Government, wanting that supreme sovereign force which in every political society must somewhere be lodged. The Federal Constitution created that national sovereignty. The people who adopted the Constitution surrendered that final authority, taking it, for all national purposes, out of every existing authority, from the political societies known collectively as the United Colonies, and then as Confederated States, and conferring it upon the Union which those people created by the Constitution. To suppose an essentially vital conflict, in time of peril, to the Union, between the National State and the greater Union is impossible. To question the absolute right of that Union to maintain itself by every power and means which in any circumstances might maintain itself, is idle. If there be any purpose in the Union whatever, it is its own perpetuity until it shall be modified by the constitutional methods provided. To resist any other kind of modification whatever is the most solemn duty of every citizen who subject to that Constitution.

Now when an armed attempt at the overthrow of that Union is made, and made under circumstances of the most flagrant and shameless wealth, whoever aids the effort by arms is a rebel and a traitor. Such are JEFFERSON DAVIS and his associates. They plead as their sole justification, not any oppression upon the part of that Union government, but merely the sovereignty of the State as superior, in the discretion of the State itself, to the national sovereignty. The Constitution they declare to be a compact of States, not of the people, from which any State may at will withdraw. Whoever, therefore, encourages that view plainly helps, in the most effective manner, to weaken the fidelity of the citizens of the Union to their government, and affords the utmost moral aid to the insurrection. This aid may be rendered in many ways, but its strongest weapon is the assertion of supreme State sovereignty. This, again, may be done by implication, by insinuation, by sophistry and deceit. Yet in all cases the intention is the same. It is to impair the fidelity of the citizen to the general, and consequently to paralyze the national arm in asserting its supremacy. Under the circumstances, the intention must be judged by its possible result. If a regiment refuses to go into the battle, it must be supposed that it is willing to connive at the defeat of the army.

There is a certain class of citizens of the United States who are in armed rebellion against its authority. They are rebels and traitors. There is another class who deny the right of the Government to coerce or subdue them. These are practically the same, although they may not actually in arms. These are the "peace" men. But there is a third class who, without deliberately denying the right of the Government to enforce its authority, steadily pursue a course which, by sparering the purity of its intention, by sowing the seeds of discord among its supporters, by creating every military mishap directly upon the Administration, and never crediting it with any of the military successes; by insisting upon the universal corruption, by magnifying the rebel resources and successes, by perpetual ridicule of the President and Congress, by personal lamentation for the rebel military achievements, by the incessant assertion of State dignity and State rights, as well as by every poor and mean trick of political partisanship—by each method of this discouragement of loyal men and the triumph of the rebellion.

Of course this is all done under the show of the tenderest regard for the Union and the Constitution, or it would not be so effective. There is an air of profound and candid perplexity in deciding whether, after all, the President is not virtually overthrown the Constitution in his efforts to maintain the Union, which can hardly be intended to strengthen the hearts either of Union voters or of Union soldiers. It is a stealthy, insidious, fatal policy. Every manly heart in the land understands it at once. It is the snake, the asp, and the poison which represent it, are the "Copperheads" or our present political parlance. They could not be more exactly described. Where they are, we will call them by a new name.

PATRIOTISM BEFORE PARTY.

That part of the Union men in the country who have been accustomed to feel that, directly or indirectly, Mr. BUCHANAN'S views exercised some kind of influence with the Administration, and an influence which they sincerely regretted, will read with surprise in Mr. WEED'S last letter these words: "Though always treated courteously by Mr. LINCOLN, my views and suggestions have not concurred with his sense of duty; and from my first interview with the President, at Springfield, to my last in January, I have been of no account."

The confession which Mr. WEED thus frankly makes could be made, doubtless, by every other representative of an extreme policy in the country. The gentlemen, the Senators, who met at Cleveland openly charge the President with a betrayal of his principles, which is a plain admission that they have been, as Mr. WEED, "of no account." Whether these facts imply a misfortune for the country or an incompetency in the Chief which the people must remember. Whether the war would have been more clearly comprehended and more wisely prosecuted if Mr. WEED or Mr. FARRER PULESBURY had been President, is a fact to be left by Mr. LINCOLN, are questions that the election will determine. If we might express an opinion, we should say that Lincoln has justly more faith in the people than Mr. WEED, and more practical sagacity than Mr. PULESBURY. We certainly do not impugn the patriotism or the good faith of either of these gentlemen when we say that Mr. LINCOLN seems to us to have appreciated more correctly than either of them both the significance of the contest and the conditions of ultimate success.

The caustic differences between Mr. WEED and some of his late political friends show, indeed, what every thoughtful man will gladly see, that ancient party bonds are broken. When those who four years ago were denouncing Republicans cordially fraternize with such undoubted old Democrats as DANIEL S. DICKINSON and NATHANIEL P. BUTLER and CASSIUS G. ALVORD, and ardently support for the Vice-Presidency a late slaveholding Southern Democrat like Andrew Johnson, it is clear that those party names have lost their significance, and that the sole bond of Union is a common devotion to the country, and a common recollection that it shall be saved by all honorable and lawful means. It is idle to call a Convention which nominated ANDREW JOHNSON a Republican Convention in any purely party sense; or to suppose that General BUTLER, for instance, will vote for Mr. LINCOLN as a technical, partisan Democrat. It is as idle as to call a Convention in which DICKINSON could have no part a Democratic Convention.

That the war would inevitably produce this result we have always believed, because we have never doubted that patriotism was more powerful among us than party-spirit. The whole history of the last three years has shown that, while the selfish few have clung to party names, the patriotic multitudes have repudiated all party ties. The country. This is seen in the election of Governor CORET of Maine, of Governor BROUGH of Ohio, of DANIEL S. DICKINSON as Attorney-General of New York, and not less so in that of Governor BUCKINGHAM of Connecticut and Governor LOVE of California. Now comes the crowning proof of the strength of the unconditional Union sentiment in one organization—the nomination of LINCOLN and JOHNSON.

COLONEL P. A. PORTER.

In the fierce assault of GRANT'S army on Friday morning, June 3, Colonel PORTER fell at the head of his regiment, the Eighth New York Artillery. The regiment had been long encamped at Baltimore, and went to the front only about three weeks before the action. It was advancing across an open space when a masked battery opened upon it a withering fire, by which the Colonel was instantly killed, the Major dangerously wounded, and many others fell. The news flashed to Colonel PORTER was the son of the late F. B. PORTER, of Niagara Falls—a conspicuous figure in the Free-Soil contests of the last war with Great Britain. The son graduated at Harvard College about sixteen years ago, traveled and studied in Europe, and then settled down, and turned to the enjoyment of an immense property, and the delights of a society of which he was a most brilliant and genial part. Without devotion to any especial pursuit, he amused himself and others by the mere play of his fine powers, until the war aroused and enlisted all his sympathy. He appeared in the Union State Convention of 1861, and was one of the most effective speakers for the war. In the second great call in the summer of 1862 he raised a regiment in his neighborhood and departed for the field. He remained as Secretary of State by the Union Convention of 1863, he declined in a manly letter, saying that he had promised his men and their kindred that he would not desert them. He kept his word in this as in all things. Steady and cheerful in his garrison life, he was not less so in the field, and fell in his first battle.

Like so many others whose names have become precious since the war began, he had all things to live for, and the sacrifice was complete. Brave, gifted, young, well, bound to life by the tenderest ties, his devotion to the cause was the more admirable because of the drawings of blood and association toward the South. But his clear brain and true heart answered the call of patriotism, and his life is added to the costly price with which we buy the unity of our country, and the national peace which shall endure.

THE DOG OF THE REGIMENT.

"Is I were a poet, like you, my friend,"
Said a tanned old sergeant, listening to me,
"I would make a rhyme of this mastiff here;
For a right good Union dog is he,
Although he was born on the wrong side,
And his master fought in the rebel ranks.
If you'll do it I'll tell you his history,
And give you in pay, why—a soldier's thanks.

"Well, the way we came across him was this:
We were on the march, and were getting hot
When we passed a farm-house, deserted by all
Save this mastiff here, who stood at the gate.
This and gaunt as a wolf was he,
And a picture white he was to twixt the bars;
But, bless you! if he didn't jump for joy
When he saw our flag with the Stripes and Stars.

"Next day when we started again on the march,
With us went Jack without word or call;
Stopping for rest at the end of a mile,
And taking his rations along with us all;
Never straggling, but keeping his place in line,
Far to the right, and close beside me,
And I don't believe that there is found,
There never was better drilled dog than he.

"He always went with us into the fight,
And the thicker the bullets fell around,
And the louder the rattling musketry rolled,
Louder and fiercer his growling sound;
And once when wounded, and left for dead,
After a bloody and desperate fight,
Poor Jack, as faithful as friend can be,
Lay by my side on the field all night.

"And so when our regiment home returned,
We brought him along with us, as you see;
And Jack and I being much attached,
The boys seemed to think he belonged to me.
And here he has lived with me ever since;
Right pleased with his quarters, too, he seems;
There are no more hearty or brave at Jack
And he mates ourches except in dreams.

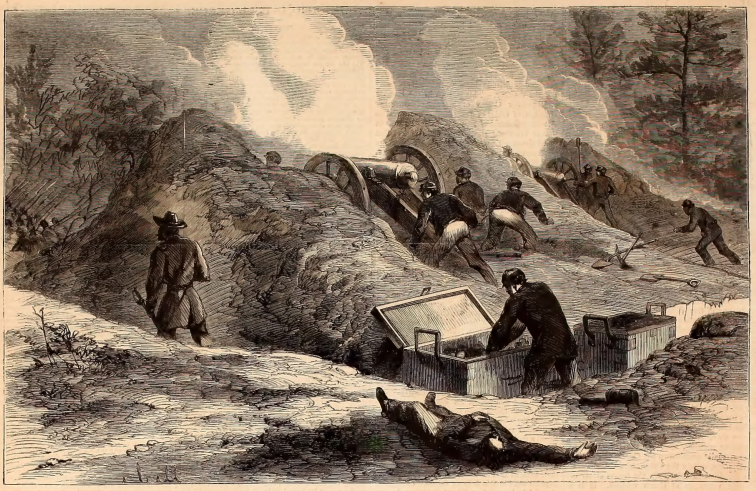
"But the best of all times for the old dog is
When the thunder mutters along the sky,
Then he wakes the echoes around with his bark,
Thinking the enemy surely is nigh.
Now I've told you his history, write him a rhyme—
Some day poor Jack in his grave must rest—
And of all the rhymes of this cruel war
Which your brain has made let his be the best."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

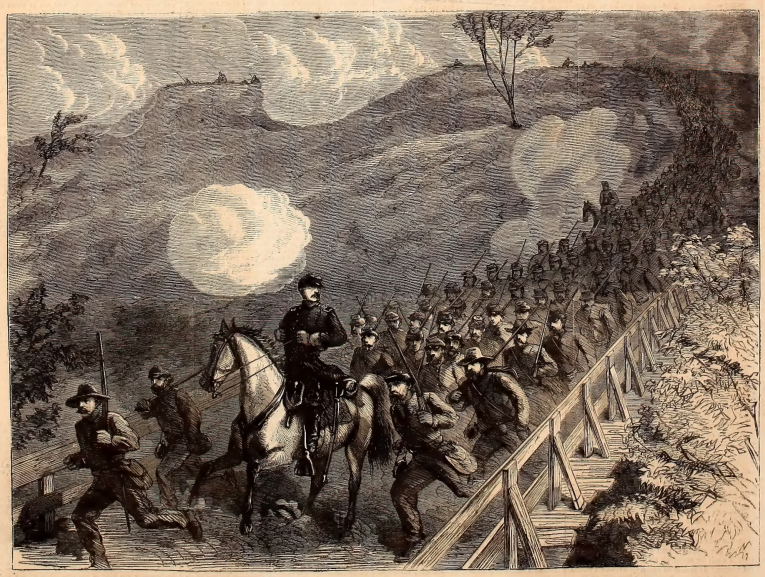
SENATE.—June 8. The bill to amend the act concerning certain private land claims in Arkansas was passed.—The bill respecting Circuit Judges in the cases of their absence, disability, etc., was also passed.—The bill for the repeal of the commutation clause of the enrollment act was taken up, and a letter was read from the Provost-Marshal-General, recommending the abrogation of all exemptions by pecuniary duty upon payment of money, every man drafted to serve or furnish a substitute. The letter of the Provost-Marshal-General shows that of 14,141 drafted men in certain States, 5000 paid the money, the remaining three-quarters of the number, or upon physical grounds, the Government got only 2676—of whom 1641 were substitutes, leaving only 1259 of the 14,141 originally drawn. No final action was taken.—June 9. The bill to amend the act of 1862 was read, and the bill amended, so that drafts hereafter shall be for one year only, and no man shall be subject to draft a second time until the present enrollment shall be exhausted. Deaths of persons drafted from the army cannot be identified in future drafts. In this shape the amendments were adopted.—June 10 to 14 inst.—June 10. Mr. Lane introduced a joint resolution recognizing the newly organized loyal government in Arkansas, and exempting that State from the operation of all proclamations declaring the people to be in rebellion against the U. States. Referred.—Also a new section to his resolutions relating to the recognition of the new State government of Arkansas, to the effect that the resolution shall be in force from and after the acceptance by the people of the State and the President's proclamation of the same. The California Land Claims bill was discussed and passed.—The bill to amend the Appropriation bill was passed as amended, and goes back to the House.—June 13. The following discussion was had on Mr. Lane's resolutions relative to the recognition of the State of Arkansas, and the admission of its Senators to the Judiciary Committee.—The Consular bill was passed.—June 14. The House bill to amend the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho was taken up.—The House bill to grant certain lands on the Lakes was also passed.—The bill to ascertain and settle the loyal claims for property destroyed by the Seminole and Shinnuls grant, was indefinitely postponed. The Senate bill to amend the act to provide a temporary government therein. The bill finally passed. The joint resolution to amend the act to provide for the collection of direct taxes, etc., was adopted to its amendments to the bill concerning the port of Dunkirk, Essex county, and several other bills of a private character were passed.

HOUSE.—June 8. The Senate bill conferring vote power on the Governor of the Montana Territory was passed.—The regulate bill.—The House then resumed the consideration of the Senate bill to amend the act relative to claims to land on private land claims in Missouri, and to allow no person can avail himself of its benefits whose liabilities are less than $1000.—June 9. Mr. Broadhead reported a bill providing for the construction of a line of railway communication between the Pacific States and Washington, and to constitute the same a public highway, and military road, for all purposes. A debate upon it, which was interrupted by Mr. Jenckes calling up the Revenue bill.—June 10. The Senate bill to amend the act, etc.—Mr. Winthrop reported a bill, which was passed, to insure the speedy enforcement of the law prohibiting the carrying of passengers in ships and steam-vessels, usually known as the New York passenger bill.—The bill providing that goods, trunks, carpet-bags, baggage, etc., be sealed, etc., in the States, as in Europe, and to the increase of revenue inspectors to duty in summer, making it a felony to counterfeit seals, etc., was passed.—The House passed the Senate bill regulating the foreign and coasting trade on the Rio Grande.—June 13. Reconstruction and Southern matters.—June 10. The Missouri contested seat (Knox vs. Hall) was decided in favor of the latter, the sitting member, and Mr. Knox, Radical Republican, was admitted by a vote of 77 to 74.—The Dakota contested seat was then taken up, on a resolution declaring that William Jayne, sitting delegate from Dakota, "should continue, in, entitled to the place.—No vote was taken.—June 11. A resolution was passed that the House, in Senate concurring, shall adjourn on the 23d of June.—The Judiciary Committee reported a resolution that the bill providing for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of fraud in the insurrectionary districts be proved March 12, 1863, is not in force.—On a motion for the reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate bill was decided to postpone the further consideration of the subject till December next.—During the remainder of the sitting the House was occupied with the reception and discussion of resolutions in relation to the admission of the Dakota election occupying several hours, and resulting in a decision that Jayne is not entitled to a seat as a delegate from Dakota.—June 13. Mr. Davies made a report, concluding that Mr. Clarke, of Kansas, is entitled to having resigned his commission as Major-General of Volunteers on the 15th of January, 1865, to take effect on the 8th of December, was not by reason of having filled the office disqualified from holding a seat in the thirty-eighth Congress as a Representative from Kansas.—A message was received from the President of December, but that Frank P. Blair be assigned to hold office as Major-General.—The Senate bill providing for the duties thereof from Canada, and discharging the duties thereof from Canada, and discharging the duties thereof from Canada, and discharging



GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—STEVENS'S BATTERY AT COLD HARBOR.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.

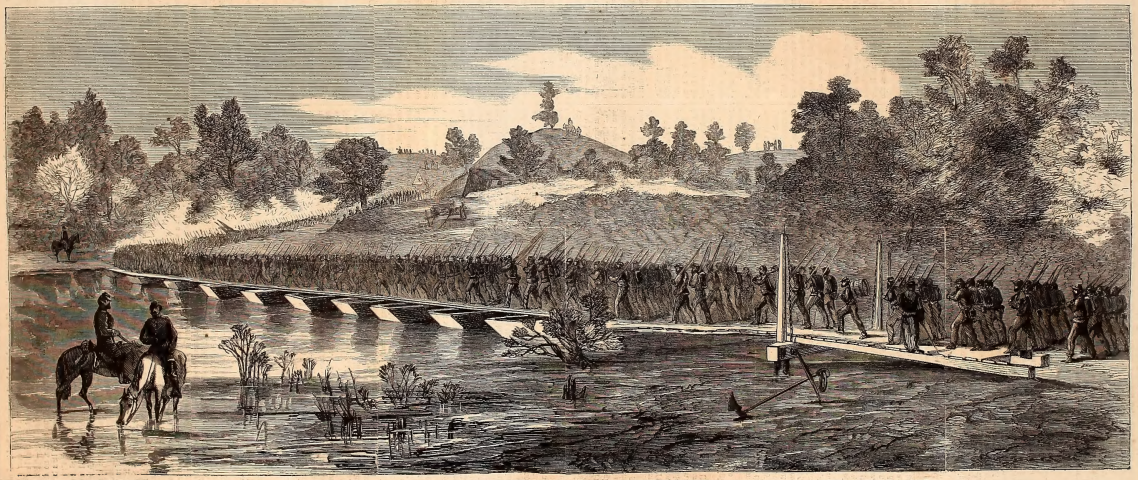
[SEE PAGE 410.]



GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—THE NEW YORK FOURTEENTH HEAVY ARTILLERY CROSSING CHESTERFIELD BRIDGE, ON THE NORTH ANNA, UNDER A HEAVY FIRE.

FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 410.]

GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—GENERAL BARLOW IN FRONT OF THE REBEL WORKS, TWELVE MILES FROM RICHMOND.—From a Sketch by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 410.]



GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—OUR ARMY CROSSING THE PAMUNKEY RIVER AT HANOVER FERRY, VIRGINIA.—From a Sketch by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 410.]

THINGS REQUISITE.

HAVE a tear for the wretched—a smile for the glad;
For the worthy, applause—an excuse for the bad.
Some help for the needy—some pity for those
Who stray from the path where true happiness flows.

Have a laugh for the child in her play at thy feet;
Have respect for the aged; and pleasantry greet
The stranger that seeketh for shelter from thee—
Have a welcome and room, if he asked should be.

Have a hope in thy sorrow—a calm in thy joy;
Have a work that is worthy thy life to employ;
And, all above all things on this side the sea,
Have peace with thy conscience, and peace with thy God.

WHY IT COULD NOT BE.

"BLESS! But is there no hope? He is so young and handsome."

"Ugh! men would insist their eyesight as much, I fancy."

"Oh, surely. But I am so sorry for him."

"Well, what can look to life again. He will live, with care; and, Rose—"

"Yes, Ma!"

"Remember the drops for this new-comer, and don't forget the poor fellow who suffered amputation yesterday, in your admiration for this patient."

"I shall forget no one, Doctor."

"You never do, Rose. I wish I could say the same of all the nurses. Your hands are full to-day."

"Not too full: I can manage."

Then there was no more conversation, and a brisk man's step sounded on the floor, and was away in the distance.

If Roger Hall, lay very still and listened. The fire were the first words I had heard or understood for —how long? I could not tell. The last I remembered was the shot of a battle-field, the rattle of musketry, the roar of cannon, a shell falling at my very feet with an awful crash and glare, then agony, then darkness and oblivion. Where was I? I tried to rise, but could not. I endeavored to stretch out my hands; the left lay powerless at my side; the right I could lift. It fell even a hard pillow and rough blankets. I guessed the truth now: I lay upon a hospital bed, sorely wounded.

And it was night—surely night. All was merciful: it could not be that I was blind. Yet this was darker deeper than any I had ever known before; and the words I had overheard?—no, they were talking of some one else, not of me.

I called aloud. How faint my voice sounded! Its piping tones were like those of some old man.

"Is any one there?"

"Yes."

It was the voice of her whom the other had called Rose—the sweetest, softest, purest voice I ever heard; and it touched my forehead and cheek with such a caress as my mother had been used to give her boy long years before.

Is it night? Why do you have no light? Tell me, is it night?"

I heard something like a sob, and the voice answered,

"It will be night very soon."

"But now—now?"

"Try to sleep," said the voice again. "You will feel better by-and-by."

"Sleep!" I would, like some querulous infant. "No, you must answer me. What is this darkness? Is it real, or am I blind?"

The gentle girl that was by her voice—knelt down beside me. She took my hand in hers. "Pray to God," she whispered. "Heaven comfort you! And think it was for your country, for—"

But I burst into one despairing wail—" Blind! blind! blind!" and her voice died away in sobs. Even in that intensest moment of my agony I felt thankful for her sympathy.

But I turned away from her, and lay silent and motionless for many hours, sleeping, they said; but I heard all that passed, though I did not care that they should know it. I heard that woman's soft step passing to and fro—her softer voice soothing the querulous sufferers upon those pallets which I knew were all about me. At times I heard her quiet answers to the surgeons and doctors, and marked how she kept such accurate remembrance of the thousand directions given her; and soon I fell to wondering who she was, and longing to have her speak to me again. Rose!—it was such a sweet name. But I wondered why they all called her by it, it was so plain to me that she was a lady. It must have seemed more natural that they should say Miss Rose, or Miss—whatever her name was. But she could not be married; people like she was very young. What heroism there was in the devotion of her early spring-time to such cases! What an angel she was, to minister thus to poor suffering men who were strangers to her! And then came a new fancy. Perhaps she had a lover among those wounded men, or a brother. Why I clung to the fancy that it must be a brother, and repudiated the idea of a lover, Heaven only knows; but, thinking of her, I forgot my own misery.

By-and-by a surgeon came to look at my arm, wounded surely above the elbow; and, as I hoped, Rose—it was such a sweet name that I loved to call her by it in my own mind—Rose was to bathe and bind it up again. She did it gently and deftly. Soon she asked,

"Do I pain you?"

"Your touches are so soft that they would almost cure a wound, I think."

"I am glad," she said. "You do not know how pleased I am to hear such words. If I could not be a little for those who suffer I would grieve myself to death, I think;—and at first I used to trouble so at the sight of blood or wounds."

"You tremble sometimes now," I said.

"How do you know?" she asked.

"I felt you. I have been told that the blind hear and feel better than others. I know you trembled when you told me why—why it was so dark to me. You must think me very weak and cowardly to have given myself up to despair in such a dreadful way. I shall not do so again."

"Who could blame you?" she said. "Your loss is very great. I wonder at you for being so quiet now."

And the task was done, my arm rebandaged, and she was moving away.

"You will come back soon," I said. "It is such a relief to hear some one speaking to me out of the dark. Do not leave me long."

"I must do my duty to all," she said; "but I will come to you when I can, be sure of that."

She stopped one moment to put the hair back from my forehead and press a draught of water; and then I lay alone for hours. Until then I had hardly felt; now I began to realize the fact that I had been grievously shaken and shattered. To turn myself required an effort almost impossible for me to make. A great organ seemed humming and droning in the distance. Soon I discovered that it was all fancy—that the sounds were within my own head. The terrible consciousness of the beating of my own heart and the working of my own lungs was, I think, the worst of the whole to bear—even when some intolerable pang called to notice my wounded arm between red-hot teeth and bite it.

I had a bitter disappointment that evening; a coarse-handed, harsh-voiced woman brought me my supper instead of Rose. I could have cried for her, as a child does for its mother, but for shame. Yesterday (as it seemed) a strong man and a soldier, whom no one ever called a coward; to-day a baby, trembling and helpless and fearful! Should I ever be myself again?

Far on the night—for I had heard a surgeon and his harsh-voiced mate that it was two o'clock—I had a joyful surprise. I felt a hand on my forehead, and some one whispered,

"Are you asleep?"

"Nor like to be," I answered. "Thank you for coming again, Miss Rose."

"Shall I stay to you? It is my time for rest, but I am not sleepy."

"Thank you—and God bless you! You are very kind to me."

I had heard the Bible often before; but I never listened as I listened then. Blind and lonely as I lay upon that hospital bed, the good words gave me comfort. If the sweet voice had aught to do with it, God grant that all my years may be as night in loving it. At last I floated on that music into the caves of slumber, and dreamed that I was a little child again, and that angel took me by the hand and led me upward to the gates of heaven.

I might write a great deal more than you would unwilling to read it concerning those days of long-lengthening into weeks—during which strength slowly returned to me, and my wounds so slowly healed. I heard of battles and victories and defeats. Now and then the weak voices of the wounded would mingle in a little hymn, and the dying would be brought to them. At times tidings of the death of some well-known and much-loved officer filled the place with gloom. Some of us had friends there, and were taken from among us; others recovered quickly. Often perfect strangers, able to limp about the hospital ward, came to talk to me, pityingly or in their honest hearts, and endeavoring to cheer me by the fact that others were worse off than I. The greatest consolation was the sad description of a poor fellow who had lost both legs and arms. I think he was invented for my comfort. I am sure I hope so. When I admitted I was better off than this man my comrades went away, rejoicing that I was "cheered up a bit."

Perhaps because my sufferings had been peculiar, all sympathized with me. All were very good and kind to me; but I valued Rose's kindness above all the rest. One word of hers, one touch of hers, made me happy. In my sad darkness I used to lie and picture her step, and voice, and face—the mass of golden radiance swept across my heart, and all was light there. A month from that first day—when I lay upon the hospital bed, helpless and blind, I loved my sweet young nurse with all my soul.

I was getting well. With my arm in a sling, I could grope my way in the warm sunshine outside the hospital-tent, or sit in the cool shadow of the trees.

Convalescent soldiers came to my side to talk with me, and surgeons and officers who came to see their sons. Every day I looked for my own return to their posts again! How I wondered what could be done with the long dark life lying before me! One thing alone could be tolerable—that I must have, or die.

A little longer, and I was better still, and a letter came to me—Rose read it—from my good old grandmother. She was coming to take me home with her. She "could not be married; people like she was very young. What heroism there was in the devotion of her early spring-time to such cases! What an angel she was, to minister thus to poor suffering men who were strangers to her! And then came a new fancy. Perhaps she had a lover among those wounded men, or a brother. Why I clung to the fancy that it must be a brother, and repudiated the idea of a lover, Heaven only knows; but, thinking of her, I forgot my own misery.

By-and-by a surgeon came to look at my arm, wounded surely above the elbow; and, as I hoped, Rose—it was such a sweet name that I loved to call her by it in my own mind—Rose was to bathe and bind it up again. She did it gently and deftly. Soon she asked,

"Do I pain you?"

"Your touches are so soft that they would almost cure a wound, I think."

"I am glad," she said. "You do not know how pleased I am to hear such words. If I could not be a little for those who suffer I would grieve myself to death, I think;—and at first I used to trouble so at the sight of blood or wounds."

"You tremble sometimes now," I said.

"How do you know?" she asked.

"I felt you. I have been told that the blind hear and feel better than others. I know you trembled when you told me why—why it was so dark to me. You must think me very weak and cowardly to have given myself up to despair in such a dreadful way. I shall not do so again."

"Who could blame you?" she said. "Your loss is very great. I wonder at you for being so quiet now."

And the task was done, my arm rebandaged, and she was moving away.

"You will come back soon," I said. "It is such a relief to hear some one speaking to me out of the dark. Do not leave me long."

"I must do my duty to all," she said; "but I will come to you when I can, be sure of that."

She stopped one moment to put the hair back from my forehead and press a draught of water; and then I lay alone for hours. Until then I had hardly felt; now I began to realize the fact that I had been grievously shaken and shattered. To turn myself required an effort almost impossible for me to make. A great organ seemed humming and droning in the distance. Soon I discovered that it was all fancy—that the sounds were within my own head. The terrible consciousness of the beating of my own heart and the working of my own lungs was, I think, the worst of the whole to bear—even when some intolerable pang called to notice my wounded arm between red-hot teeth and bite it.

I had a bitter disappointment that evening; a coarse-handed, harsh-voiced woman brought me my supper instead of Rose. I could have cried for her, as a child does for its mother, but for shame. Yesterday (as it seemed) a strong man and a soldier, whom no one ever called a coward; to-day a baby, trembling and helpless and fearful! Should I ever be myself again?

Far on the night—for I had heard a surgeon and his harsh-voiced mate that it was two o'clock—I had a joyful surprise. I felt a hand on my forehead, and some one whispered,

"Are you asleep?"

"Nor like to be," I answered. "Thank you for coming again, Miss Rose."

"Shall I stay to you? It is my time for rest, but I am not sleepy."

"Thank you—and God bless you! You are very kind to me."

I had heard the Bible often before; but I never listened as I listened then. Blind and lonely as I lay upon that hospital bed, the good words gave me comfort. If the sweet voice had aught to do with it, God grant that all my years may be as night in loving it. At last I floated on that music into the caves of slumber, and dreamed that I was a little child again, and that angel took me by the hand and led me upward to the gates of heaven.

I might write a great deal more than you would unwilling to read it concerning those days of long-lengthening into weeks—during which strength slowly returned to me, and my wounds so slowly healed. I heard of battles and victories and defeats. Now and then the weak voices of the wounded would mingle in a little hymn, and the dying would be brought to them. At times tidings of the death of some well-known and much-loved officer filled the place with gloom. Some of us had friends there, and were taken from among us; others recovered quickly. Often perfect strangers, able to limp about the hospital-ward, came to talk to me, pityingly or in their honest hearts, and endeavoring to cheer me by the fact that others were worse off than I. The greatest consolation was the sad description of a poor fellow who had lost both legs and arms. I think he was invented for my comfort. I am sure I hope so. When I admitted I was better off than this man my comrades went away, rejoicing that I was "cheered up a bit."

Perhaps because my sufferings had been peculiar, all sympathized with me. All were very good and kind to me; but I valued Rose's kindness above all the rest. One word of hers, one touch of hers, made me happy. In my sad darkness I used to lie and picture her step, and voice, and face—the mass of golden radiance swept across my heart, and all was light there. A month from that first day—when I lay upon the hospital bed, helpless and blind, I loved my sweet young nurse with all my soul.

I was getting well. With my arm in a sling, I could grope my way in the warm sunshine outside the hospital-tent, or sit in the cool shadow of the trees.

Convalescent soldiers came to my side to talk with me, and surgeons and officers who came to see their sons. Every day I looked for my own return to their posts again! How I wondered what could be done with the long dark life lying before me! One thing alone could be tolerable—that I must have, or die.

A little longer, and I was better still, and a letter came to me—Rose read it—from my good old grandmother. She was coming to take me home with her. She "could not be married; people like she was very young." What heroism there was in the devotion of her early spring-time to such cases! What an angel she was, to minister thus to poor suffering men who were strangers to her! And then came a new fancy. Perhaps she had a lover among those wounded men, or a brother. Why I clung to the fancy that it must be a brother, and repudiated the idea of a lover, Heaven only knows; but, thinking of her, I forgot my own misery.

By-and-by a surgeon came to look at my arm, wounded surely above the elbow; and, as I hoped, Rose—it was such a sweet name that I loved to call her by it in my own mind—Rose was to bathe and bind it up again. She did it gently and deftly. Soon she asked,

"Do I pain you?"

"Your touches are so soft that they would almost cure a wound, I think."

"I am glad," she said. "You do not know how pleased I am to hear such words. If I could not be a little for those who suffer I would grieve myself to death, I think;—and at first I used to trouble so at the sight of blood or wounds."

"You tremble sometimes now," I said.

"How do you know?" she asked.

"I felt you. I have been told that the blind hear and feel better than others. I know you trembled when you told me why—why it was so dark to me. You must think me very weak and cowardly to have given myself up to despair in such a dreadful way. I shall not do so again."

"They are very clear," she said—" dark brown, as they must always have been; the eyelashes long and dark. Your eyes were not injured externally. I think the doctor spoke of a shock given to the nerves. A stranger would not think you blind."

"Then I do not revolt you? I have sometimes feared I did."

She made no answer. A rustle of her dress, a sense of loneliness I put out my hand, and she was gone. Soon I heard her voice within the hospital.

Two days I waited, hearing her near me often, and never keeping her long. On the third I felt miserably lonely; on the fourth quite wretched: something seemed to have come between us, and, helpless as I was, I could not go to her and make her listen to me as I would once. On the fifth day I found by certain signs that there was a way mount to sit; and a soldier limping by on crutches, I called to him:

"Ask Miss Rose to come here. I am very faint and ill."

The man hobbled away. In a moment the patter of light, hasty feet, and she was there.

"You are ill?"

"Very."

"Is it your wound? Shall I call Doctor B——?"

"Yes, it is a wound; but you only can help me. Why have you deserted me?"

"You are getting well; others have more need of their nurse."

"No, no one has such necessity. I am blind, you know. Rose, you must spare me a few moments; I want to talk to you." I felt for her hand and found it. She laid it in mine. From that I gathered hope. "I must tell you something about myself," I said. "I am a wealthy man. Were I poor, helpless as I am, I could never tell you this. I never felt thankful for wealth before. I am now. Rose, you are very young. Will you be my wife?"

And there came a sob, a gasp, and the words, "It can not be—it can not be," in a sort of smothered wail.

Then I knew how I had deceived myself, how I had hoped for a different answer. Even now it seemed as though she loved me. There was no aversion in her tone, no cold denial, only a sort of despair. I drew closer to her.

"I love you so dearly, Rose," I said; "do not let me go without one word of comfort. If you knew how I feel for you, how in my darkened life you are the light, you would not—you could not—say this to me, Rose? Am I so unsightly a thing that you shrink from me with loathing? Tell me so and I will say no more. Some of us have to bear. Is it because I am blind that it can not be?"

I heard the girl beside me sob. Faintly her voice fell on my ear:

"No, no; it is that which makes it so hard. You force the truth from me; to tend you, to lead you through the valley of night, my heart ask. As you love me, I love you. But God has placed a barrier between us: I can never be your wife."

Suddenly, before she could know of my intention, I had caught her to my heart. I pressed kisses on her lips.

"If you love me there can be no barrier between us," I almost sobbed. "If, blind as I am, you still love me your nothing shall part us."

It was but an instant; the next she was standing by herself, sobbing wildly. Something in the girl's repulse of me had been made me fear to touch her again.

"Oh! if you could see me," she moaned. "If you could see me you would never utter those words again. Your wife! Oh! Roger Hall, it can never be——. God save me!"

What could she mean? What strange import was in those words? I drew closer. Very softly I took her hand. The touch of agony bedewed it; it trembled like an aspen-leaf.

"Rose," I said, "my own dear Rose! I know not what is before me; but I will not return to conformity upon you, it terest to a blind man. You are beautiful to me; and were my eyes opened, and looking upon you I should see some wonderful type of woman's beauty, I should only love you more—as my own dear Rose, my life, is that it?"

"My face is as God made it at first," she said. "It is not as you think. Were it so I would trust you. Oh, Roger, I can't ask me why, but, you Do you think I could speak thus were there any hope, any—" She stopped suddenly, and burst into a wild laugh. "Hope! Is it the hand of God Almighty," she said. "How should I know you did not guess at first, and I could not tell you afterward for shame."

"Are you married?"

"No."

"Rose Peyton, the obstacle is imaginary. You love me; I adore you; no man calls you his own. You shall be mine, I will have it so. This is only fancy, and it shall vanish. Rose, nothing could make me love you less. I say nothing; I swear it before God."

"You know not what you say, and He will forgive you," she answered, solemnly. Then, with a sudden change in her voice, she came close to me of her own accord. She put one hand on my shoulder, her soft hair brushed my cheek.

"Roger Hall," she said, "I am suffering mortal agony. Should you force the truth from me just now I should die. You may learn it. I wonder you have not already from other lips. I can not speak it. A barrier built by the Almighty separates us forever on earth—a barrier of shame and degradation. I want you to think of me always as you do now. Knowing the truth, you would not. I love you; I shall love you forever; and so I say farewell, farewell, farewell! It is part of God's chastisement. Farewell, Roger; may He be your friend; may He lead you and help you!"

Her arms closed about my neck. She kissed my brow, my darkened eyes, my wet cheeks over and over again; and then our lips met, and then I stood alone, grasping the empty air and sobbing—" Rose, Rose, best beloved of my soul, no shame, no disgrace, no blot upon thy life or name could be a barrier between thy heart and mine."

I did not meet her again. The days passed, and I was taken home. No one wondered that I was sad and restless; my misfortune was all-sufficient to account for that, and I brooded at leisure over Rose's secret and my own.

She belong, and she had pronounced my doom.

A helpless thing enough, I lay upon my sofa or sat in my chair thinking of her and pining for her. My wounded arm retained no strength. Darkness was still around me. I had no hope of light. And then months glided on, and Christmas time came, and my cousins and aunts and uncles were coming to my old grandmother's, and there came loving messages for Roger, and in my blindness a wealth of tenderness was poured upon me, and valued far less than it deserved to be. A word from Rose, a message, something she had worn that I could lay against my heart, would have outweighed all the rest.

On Christmas-eve I prayed for death. God gave a stranger answer to my prayer. When I awoke in the morning dazzled and bewildered, I could see dimly, hazily, as through the thickest mist, yet it was sight.

How I thanked Him then! I was a man once more. I could seek Rose. I could look upon her. I could fathom her secret, put my foot upon it, and lay it low by her sorrowful side. I swore to do so. No blemish of face or form or fame should keep her from my arms. To me she was beautiful and pure forever.

There was a jubilee at our homestead that day. Eager was I to be off no longer. Pale and withered arm, over which tears would have been shed once, was forgotten. I forgot it myself. I could see! The world danced; every heart-beat was the light of life more brightly back. Doctors could not explain the miracle, though they spoke expiringly of the "shock to the nerves." My old grandmother said it is "God's doing," and was the wisest of them all. I was at home three days; then I bade them good-by for a while, and went to Fort Rose.

It was a cold day when I reached the camp about the great hospital there, miles from where I had been when I lay there. Those who had known me hailed me with congratulations. An old surgeon started as though he had seen a ghost. It was the one who had spoken to Rose of my blindness.

To him I talked. Of him I learned who were within the hospital, and who were dead or left. Then I asked, tremblingly, for Miss Peyton.

"Miss Peyton!" The doctor paused a moment, and then burst into a laugh. "Miss Peyton Rose," he said; "hard at work as ever. 'Miss Peyton!' Ha! ha! ha!"

Why did he laugh? I did not know—I could not guess.

I went into the hospital tent, and walking among the beds spoke to those I knew, but all the while looked for Rose, and saw no one like her. The surgeon's mirth was there, and a quadroon girl bending over a dying drummer boy; another stout old lady with a pair of crowding eyes. I turned away sadly. Where was Rose? I would wait for her—surely she would come soon.

I sat down near the drummer boy's pallet, and watched him sadly. He was dying fast. The quadroon girl wiped the death-damps from his brow. What! thought I—how could she be here? how could she soothe his pain, her presence comfort him!" Then I looked at the dark face bent over the pillow. It was very kind and pitiful, but beautiful, too, in the beauty of that wronged and degraded race.

Rose Peyton was not pretty! Her face might be scarred, her eyes dim! No matter; to me it would be beautiful! Why did she not come?

The quadroon girl had not yet looked at me. Her liquid black eyes, full of tears, rested on the agonized face of the dying drummer. Suddenly a convulsion came on the boy. The arms were too weak for their task. I could use but one, but I was strong again. I went to the side of the rude cot: "Let me help you," I said. "I will do what I can for you." And the dark eyes turned upon me sudden-ly—eyes changing, frightened gleam. They closed in an instant, and I forgot them; for in that moment we stood in the presence of death.

"He is going," I said. The quadroon girl made no answer. I fancied the scene had turned her faint, for she leaned against a rude table within the tent, trembling in every limb, and weeping at me.

Some water stood near. I filled a cup and handed it to her; she touched it with her lips, but did not speak. I put down the cup, sat down and bent her head upon her hands, and covered it with her kerchief.

I began" to watch again for Rose. Soon I grew impatient. I turned to the quadroon girl. "Can you tell me where to find Miss Rose Peyton?" I asked.

When I spoke to her the girl arose. She pointed to a newly-made mound beyond the tent, and beckoned me to follow her. I began to fancy she was dumb.

She went before; I first close behind her, and it seemed strange to me that she should lead me past the hospital, to the open space in a branch-grove beneath an old sycamore-tree. There she paused. Where was Rose? We two, the quadroon girl and I, were the only living things in sight.

Slowly a great horror was stealing over me. I dared not speak. The girl broke the silence:

"Rose Peyton is dead," she said. "Rose Peyton!

Oh, merciful Heavens! All of mortal agony man could bear and live fell on me in that moment. It was my lovely own voice that uttered those words, the voice that had haunted me so long. The quadroon girl was Rose Peyton.

"I spoke the truth," she said. "God has placed an awful barrier between us. The petted slave-child of a white father and a negro mother! Look mother's shame and sorrow to the grave. Oh, Roger Hall, why did you come here to look upon me? Do you wonder now I could not tell you the truth, having a woman's heart within me, feeling as white women feel; for they did me the great wrong of separating me from my kind, and teaching me, until of their kindness grew an awful curse—the soul of a white woman beneath this black-stained skin. There is no need to bid you forget me now; no need, thank Heaven! no need!"

How hastily she was! Yet her beauty—the and beauty of her race—lay between us like a curse. I heard her voice, loved so deeply and so long. I knew that within that breast a gentle woman's heart beat for me alone. But she was right.

Had I heard Rose Peyton's voice, and, turning, looked upon a woman deformed and scarred, but white, I should have opened my arms and cried, "Hide here; your soul is beautiful, and I love you." But I gazed on that exquisite quadroon, and her liquid eyes and glorious clean hair. Her features, moulded after those of her proud mother, Africa, were veiled by the dusk skin of her mother's race. The Rose I loved was not there for me; she loved no more. I grew faint as in the death agony. There was no scorn of her. I think I loved her still, for I love her now; but God had said it could not be.

Down upon the frosty earth, under the leafless sycamore, I sunk before her. I took her hand in mine, and kissed it.

"God bless you, Rose," I said. "I shall never marry any woman while I live."

She said nothing.

Then I arose and turned away. At the brow of the hill I looked back, and saw the watery sky, the dead sycamore, and the quadroon girl standing under it like a statue.

So I see her in my dreams. So I shall always see her until I die.

And I went from my sight again, and live blind forever; I would give my other arm; I would give wealth, and strength, and all that men value, only not to know the secret Rose strove to hide from me—only not to know that the only woman I ever loved was a quadroon.

OUT OF DIXIE.

IANA PARSON, and my work-shop is a green study. Sitting there yesterday, who should come in but my friend Wells, formerly of Savannah, but for many years of Independence, Alabama! As my last letter from him, full of Confederate hopes, was more than two years since, and as he was then at Nashville buying supplies, about returning home-ward with the purpose never to fight for the rebellion, I had months ago given him up as dead. As he presented himself to my eyes again, thinner, more anxious and care-worn in every feature than ever before, and withal came so suddenly, I was half tempted to entertain the notion that his ghost was the apparition before me.

I was reading in Sir Thomas Browne the following:

"Hermolaus Barbarus was scarce in his wits, when, upon conference with a spirit, he would demand no other question than the explication of Aristotle's Metaphysics. Appion, the Grammarian, that would raise the Ghost of Homer to decide the controversies of the Odyssey, is but frivolous and pedantick use of Necromancy. Philostratus did ill tithe, that called up the Ghost of Achilles for a pedimatic of the Story of the Trojan Wars."

Trojan war be hanged! I'd give more to know about the war in Dixie; and if this is a ghost, it shall tell me what they are doing, and how in Dixie it burns.

It was no ghost, but Wells in the body, though dreamatically gray; and, our salutations over, I assailed him with questions. "When did you get here? Did you ride or walk? Was you running as a spy and shot? How much of an army have you rebels? Are there many of you Union men? Any cotton? What do you eat? Any coffee? Any meat at home? How did you get away? Where—"

"Now," said Wells, "stop your cross-fire of questions, and remain quiet; I'll tell you all, otherwise—"

I subsided.

"I've had a hard time of it. When the storm broke, I determined never to lift a hand against the old Union."

"But how did you act when every one was enlisting or aiding substitutes?"

"I told my neighbors that I owed a duty first to my God, next to my family, and third to my country, if a divided and separate portion of it at war with the rest could be so styled. That was all of the very good patriotism; but being widely known, and having numerous personal friends, I was not much disturbed.

"It is true, on one occasion I heard the rumor that certain individuals at Kingston, our county town, were 'going to hang Wells.' Thinking it wise to bring the matter to an issue at once, I rode over, and riding up to the store at the court-house, in a pretty loud tone of voice, 'Mr. Gilchrist, I hear they talk of hanging me here in Kingston. I have come to see them do it.'

"'Oh,' replied Mr. G., 'I guess they won't hang you.'

"I took pains to be seen generally through the town, and to drop into the principal shops, and heard no more of the hanging.

"As the war went on, I watched the progress of events with deep solicitude, and, resolving to leave the South when I could no longer avoid entering the army, formed my plans.

"'How came you to volunteer?' said I, one day, to a small Unionman formerly overseer to a neighbor. 'Sure, Sir, they compelled me,' was his characteristic reply. I was not to be thus compelled, and so continued on in my usual duties until the present spring, when men over forty-five became liable to be enrolled as conscripts. In fact, had I remained five days longer, I should have been wearing a butternut uniform and a buckle with the eminous inscription, C. S. A.

"It was time to go. My wife preferred to take her chance with friends in Mobile, and to have me outside the lines. A family consultation as to other matters resulted in my finding myself the following morning in Montgomery en route for Richmond. I had an excuse for journeying thus far, and relied upon the good offices of an acquaintance in the Navy Department for my subsequent progress.

"For the Montgomery of to-day imagine all the stores not closed entirely employed as cotton warehouses, streets filled with a motley crowd of paupers and wounded soldiers, and houses and hotels neglected and dilapidated.

"I was dressed in home-made jeans, woven by my negroes, and sewed by my wife, who, fearing I might be reduced to 'short commons' as a soldier I met at Atlanta called them, furnished me with a basket full of cooked provisions. It was hard to get a seat in the cars of the Montgomery and West Point Railroad, which, connecting with the Lagrange Railroad, brought me to Atlanta. I was provided with money as follows:

$1500 in Confederate notes	$1500 Confederate value.
100 "Greenbacks	100 "
20 " Gold	1400 "
	$3000 "

"I left Augusta at daylight in the morning. At the South Carolina Depôt I was hailed by the omnibus driver that I was fortunate to get off on that train, as no more trains would leave for some days except those engaged exclusively in transporting troops and army provisions. This lost word makes me leave a week over the date of return. I lost faithfully stuck to my basket till I reached Augusta; but leaving it a moment there, I found a third of its contents missing, and in the place of the same, and having no room before, behind, or on either side to deposit it, I shared its remaining freight with the hungry soldiers around me. At Kingsville, South Carolina, I had to take the train by way of Columbia and Raleigh, as none but freight trains run on the Wilmington line. The delay here was such a rush for the cars as made it difficult to obtain a place. I was, however, rewarded for this, when the intervening spaces, then the platforms, and finally about a hundred climbed upon the tops of the cars.

"And such cars! Covered with filth I will not describe and would fain forget, broken, shaky, a true protection against wind and rain. Still, how-ever, one rather better on each train, reserved strictly for ladies, and as crowded as the others.

"The rolling stock of Confederate railroads is just now pretty rotten stock, and from Montgomery to Richmond I did not average more than seven miles an hour, usually not over five. At Charlotte, North Carolina, we missed a connection, and found that we could in the course of the day and night make it only thirteen dollars a meal. At Raleigh we missed our connection again, the train leaving for the North too soon for passengers to get across for the town to the " We were thus obliged to remain over " four hours. Having money enough to afford for forty dollars a meal, I dined, and some pro-vender as poor, to keep soul and body together, and went to the Raleigh Hotel an hour and a half before the time to secure a seat.

"It was well that I was thus early, for here the rush was even greater than at the Kingsville depôt. I was a raw, stormy morning, yet a large group of passengers were waiting in the cold. Some of them, A.C.S. officers, had been there all night. Finally, a large body of Lee's soldiers, returning from furlough, having, like the rest, missed the connection, and taken up their quarters in the depôt, appeared, and had eaten what they had brought from home in barbarous style. Disgusted with this, I began to ask me if I knew where he could get something to eat, as he had not had a mouthful of food in two days. I gave him some of the dinner I had bought for two dollars per meal and ten for lodging. One said in my hearing: 'Why, this is right honest, I vow; here's a Confederate soldier who has had dollars a month, and I'll be staggered if I haven't done gone three months' pay and a confounded dollar for lodging, hungry, dirty, and a cripple, too.' He was right, for his bill had been forty-five dollars.

"At last, when the train was ready, the conductor's orders were to let no one go on it who was not in some way connected with the army. We found, however, that by a considerable bribe all could be induced to pack each a proverb South as Kentucky ham-pork has been, and we were consequently crowded as if every thing snatched from those walking or standing near the stations at which we stopped was a much service to the Confederacy. Baskets of provision, bacon, vegetables, waiting to be sent as freight, kegs, half-barrels, and other incongruous articles could be 'smuggled' aboard anyhow. But the most successful and amusing grab-game was played on me. A lad in a good worsted coat, going in Dixie, poor folk bats bringing $100 to $140. Not more than one soldier in five on the cars had one who was started; but many more than these individuals out up to the trick, who, all unconscious of their danger, would walk along the platform. Many knew eyes would be on the alert, and many hands all ready to be extended, when, as quick as thought, a head is bare, and in vain does the injured man demand redress. Indeed, in one instance where a captured hat was returned. Near Petersburg a tall negro marched up and down the platform of a little station, displaying one quite new and very conspicuous. Instantly eyes and hands were ready, and Sambo's wool was his only head-covering. I called to mind Sir Walter's old woman, who, describing a great battle in which some one lost his head, remarked, 'Weel, in sic a great engagement a head was, to be sure, a small matter, but 'twas a sair loss to him, poor man!' If it had been a head instead of a hat Sambo could not have pleaded more earnestly. Oh, gentlemen, it's my hat! my hat! New, Mass', pleez gib my hat. I'se can sing, can dance—I'se play de fiddle—I'se do any thing for dat hat. Pleeze, Mass', gib a poo' nigger his hat."

"His eloquence was genuine if tried by the standard of success, and a Conventicle resulted in Sambo's singing and then dancing, after which he was crowned, and never did Olympian victor more proudly wear his wreath of olive than did happy Sambo that hat.

"I must hasten through Petersburg and on to Richmond. Here I was anxious to remain concealed, and was harbored by a Polish Jew, who entertains spies, smugglers, blockade-run-ners, Union refugees, etc. The most painful part of my subsequent wanderings was the necessity of holding with those who, like this host of mine, said any thing and swore to any thing. Had I paid him enough he would have sworn that I was a Geo. Wash. Hotchkiss Stonewall Jackson. Once out of Richmond, I became a fugitive and a vagabond. Finding railroad transportation for a few miles, I then, with my bundle and staff, without fire-arms, and remaining money carefully secreted, proceeded on my lonely way. I passed thoughtfully over the heights south of Fredericksburg, where was fought its bloody battle; and going down into the city, lodged with a man, now keeping a little tavern, whose stately mansion once was the ornament of Middlesex County, Virginia.

"Soon after crossing the Rappahannock I was in a sheer wilderness. Up to Aquia Creek the country is, so to speak, all roads. No fences, no woods, all having been destroyed by the opposing armies that have swept the whole land clean. I wandered on, following in well-worn cart-tracks, and made a business of robbing deserters from the Army of the Potomac, whom they then turn adrift to cross over to Maryland upon rude rafts of their own construct.

"One of these robbers I thus encountered. He had entered a narrow gorge when I heard footsteps behind me, and, turning, was greeted to the cheerful cry, 'Who are you, and what right have you to be loitering here?' I saw I must be as saucy as he. 'What right have you, and what business have you to stop a man with a Government pass?' The robber, evidently accustomed to be a Confederate spy or official, sneaked away.

"To show the peculiar relation of this region to both armies I must relate another incident. The old mail crosses a small creek before it strikes Aquia Creek. I was walking on the track at this point when I heard a voice in the bushes, and, looking up the stream, at a short distance I discovered a man and woman feeding it on horseback. Hastening on, I hailed the lightest element I went to the ford and hailed the man, offering him a good sum to come over and help me to the ford. To my repeated calls he made no reply, and, though he was met by quite a group on the other side, no one seemed to see me. Finally, looking around again I saw the mated into the stream, which reached to my waist, and soon gained the other shore. On asking the man why he had so suddenly responded, he replied, 'How did I know what yer was? Yer mought be a Union spy, and then if a Confederate scout seed me he'd hang me for a traitor to save the Potomac.' A fisherman for two dollars carried me over the creek, and I was found and searched by the scouts. But on appealing to the owner he utterly denied all knowledge of any such means of exit from Dixie. Thus, through the 'Potomac,' he referred to his brother, who, on being found, declared with a volley of oaths that he had no boat, never crossed the stream, and that he would shoot all evil-disposed people to hem and haw and hesitate if he ever heard of any one else crossing in any way, etc.

"The truthfulness of these solemn declarations came out when, after my giving him money, he took me to a boat before a deserting United States major paid him seventy-five dollars for ferrying him over; while, after waiting four days for a Confederate officer, on a spoil of foul weather, or a foggy night—my vexatious friend produced a skiff and for a five-dollar greenback pushed me across.

"There, up near Fredericksburg, I obeyed a withered order from my pilot, and stepped over the bow to find myself on a sand bar on the Maryland side. I felt my way to the shore, a bluff, at least twenty feet high, met me, and after vain efforts to obtain a more favorable spot wheeze to reach the main land, I was hauled and 'scrambled up the rocky cliff. Making for a distant light, and approaching a house, my progress was stayed by a great bow-legged negro in a fishing-smack to Alexandria.

"How I marched up to the Provost-Marshal's office and told my adventures, how I wept at the sight of the glorious old Stars and Stripes, how I obtained a pass, hurried over to Washington, came near being kicked out of a hotel, hastened to the nearest clothing store, dressed, and was a man again, you must imagine, for I have no more to tell. Ah, as I slept under the first blankets I had seen for two years, I pitied the poor negroes with their wrinkled coverlets!"

To my friend's story I will only add that I begged from him, and now possess, these home-spun jeans, so worn, soiled, and travel-stained; and mean to put them to a good use.

Shall I collect them for the benefit of the Christian Commission?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An Englishman and a Welshman disputing in whose country was the best living, said the Welshman, "There is such noble housekeeping in Wales that I have known where a whole cow has been employed at one breakfast." "Ay," answered the Englishman, "that was because there was nobody but one there."

The late Lord Kelly had a very red face. "Pray, my lord," said Foote to him, "come and look over my gardener—my cucumbers are very backward."

The advice given by an Irishman to his English friend, on introducing him to a Dublin Tipperary row, was, "Remember, a head hit is—"

NEW WAY TO PAY AN DEBT.—A prisoner in The Fleet, sent to his creditor to let him know that he had a proposal to make. The creditor would be for their mutual benefit. Accordingly, the creditor came; and calling to him to hear it, "I have been thinking," said he, "that it is a very little thing for me to lie here, and get you to be my opposite neighbor, and pay you a crown a week. My brother has given me great uneasiness, and I know I never can rest on his account. Therefore, what I propose is this: You shall let me out of prison, and, instead of me, you shall lie here, and pay your enlargement a week, and the other tenpence shall go towards the discharge of the debt."

A very small officer struck an old grenadier of his company for some supposed fault in performing his evolutions. The grenadier patiently took all his cuts, and, bidding it over the officer by the nip, said, "Sir, if you were not my officer, I would extinguish you."

John was thought to be very stupid. He was sent to a mill one day, and the miller said, "John, some people say you are a fool. Now, tell me what you say, and what will you don't know." "Well," replied John, "I know millers keep wet shoes." "Yes, that will do," said they, "what don't you know?" "I don't know whose corn fats 'em"!

E——, taking the portrait of a lady, perceived that when she laughed she showed her mouth full, was trying to make it smaller by contracting her lips. "Do not trouble yourself," said the lady, with a malicious smile, "I will, for pleasure, I will draw your face without any mouth at all."

It was said of one that remembered every thing that he took, but nothing that he borrowed, "that he had lost half of his memory."

A medical student under examination, being asked the difference between hot and cold, answered, "Hot is expansion and cold contracts." "Quite right; can you give me an example?" "Yes, Sir, in summer the days are long, and the days are longer; but in winter, which is cold, the days are shorter."

Happiness grows at our own firesides, and is not to be plicked in strangers' gardens.

SCOTCH SIMPLICITY.—At Hawick, the people used to have their pigs killed, which made a sickening noise in the pavements. A flying old woman had some friends by her bedside, who said to her, "Well, Jenny, you are going to Heaven, an' gin you should see our folk ye can tell 'em how happy we are here." To which Jenny replied, "Ay, gin I ever see them I'se tell them, but you manna expect that I am to gang cheek clashing through Heaven looking for your folk."

"My notion of a wife at forty," said Jerrold, "is, that she should be able to change her, like a bank-note, for two twenties."

A brow-beating counsel asked a witness how far he had been from a certain place. "About four years ago," was the sad six inches," was the reply. "How come you to be so exact, my friend?" "Because I expected some foot or other would ask me, and so I measured it."

"What is light?" asked a schoolmaster of the body of class. A sovereign that isn't full weight is light," was the prompt reply.

A JOINT CONCERN.—A stupid fellow employed in blowing a cathedral organ, said, after the performance of a fine piece of music, "Master, we played very well to-day." "We performed!" answered the organist: "I think it was I performed." "Why," said the fellow, "I am sure the music celebrated three of music was by me." Much the infidel said to the man who, having blown the organ-bellows for a psalm, "Why, you sing!" The fellow popped his head from behind the organ and said, "Sir, I do not sing, no then."

An editor at a dinner-table being asked if he would take some pudding replied, in a fit of abstraction, "Owing to a press of business we are unable to find room for it."

When Chinese sailors are short of food they salt their junk and eat it.

Why is servility like a man who is tired of works of imagination? Because it is extremely sick of fiction.

A lady once asked a gentleman what wit was like. To which he replied, "Like your lobbyright's bottle of ant-acid—poison-out of the reach of children." Being too much puzzled about, loss all its flavor and becomes insipid.

"You don't understand your business, Boniface. Dy'e you never have a gentleman stop with you before?" "Yes, Sir, I've had a dun."

Editors ought to be able to live very cheap—they s. bored for nothing.

As an old sot, when asked how he felt during a recent severe gale which he encountered at sea, and during which he had been obliged to remain below, replied, "Pretty much as simplicity." Why, I thought, what will the poor fellows think of next?

"Humble as I am," said a bullying sporter, "I still remember that I'm a member of the magnificent republic." "You are indeed," said a by-stander, "and a vulgar one at that."

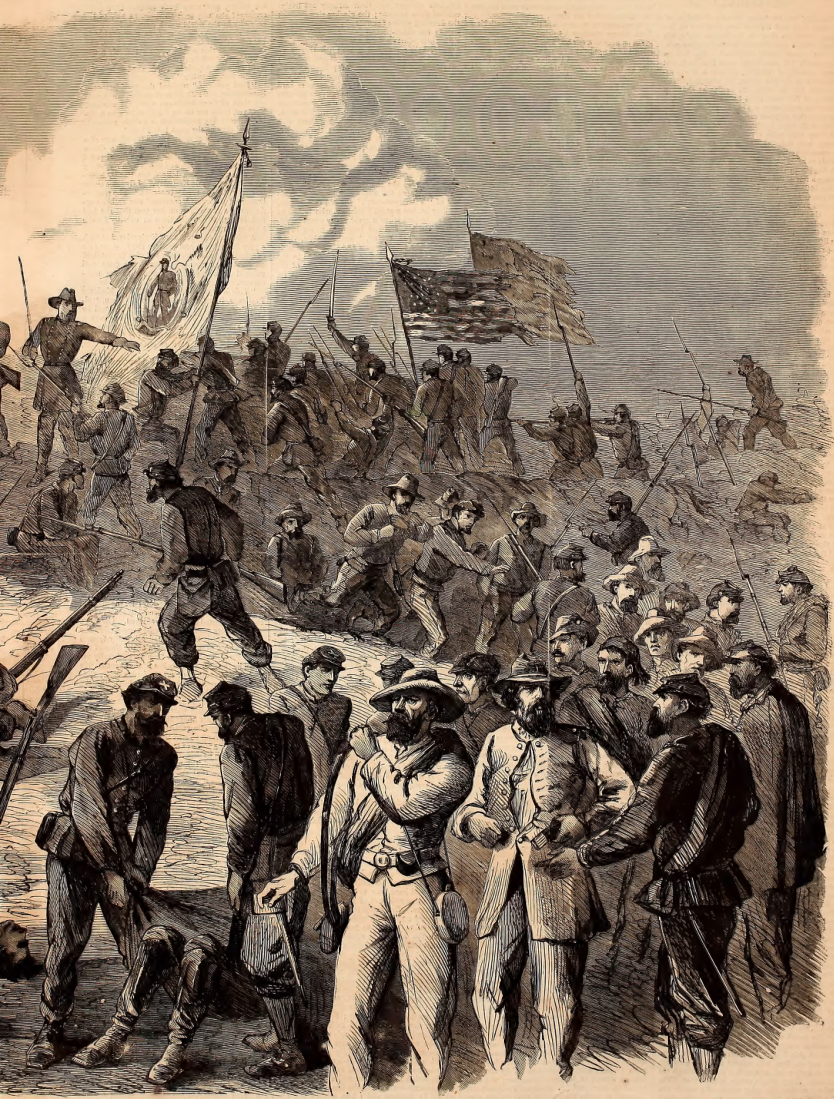
In a large company at dinner, Bruce, the African explorer, related some extraordinary statements were at the first thought to be of the Munchausen class, was relating the most wonderful things. Among others when coffee was asked him what musical instruments were used by Abyssinia? Bruce hesitated for a moment, and then said, "I think I saw one tyre there." George Selwyn whispered to his neighbor, saying, "Yes, and there is one less since he left the country."

When a lady returns the presents she has received from her lover, is she supposed to include a return of his affection?

"I once saw a regiment of negroes on parade," said a traveler, "and when they came to the right front, with the whites of their eyes all turned, it looked just like a chalk mark."

"THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD."—We should like to hear the sentiments of the schoolmaster's wife on the subject of her husband being so often abroad.

GENERAL GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—GENERAL BARLOW CHARGING THE E



NEMY AT COLD HARBOR, JUNE 1, 1864.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 410.]

BURNING OF THE STEAMER "BERKSHIRE."

THE new and handsome steamer Berkshire, of the New York and Hudson line, took fire on her passage down the river on Wednesday night, 8th instant, when a short distance above Poughkeepsie, and was almost totally destroyed. She had on board nearly 150 passengers, some live-stock, and a large quantity of freight. As soon as it was ascertained that she was on fire, the pilot immediately headed her for shore, the engine at the time working at full speed; but before she struck the mud all the woodwork was one vast sheet of flame. The scene that followed baggars description. Men frantic with fear; children crying (and it is said that there were over a number of little ones on board); men shouting, the flames crackling, and the passengers jumping overboard, formed a scene terrible to behold. Furniture of every description was floating in the water, some of the pieces upholding a few of the unfortunates beings.

One little boy, with his grandmother, was in a state-room, and when he heard the alarm he endeavored to open the door of his room, but could not. He then managed to get out of the window, and tried to save his relative; but so close were the flames that he had to drop overboard to look to his own life. The lady was probably suffocated.

One of the most heartrending scenes in this terrible disaster was the case of Mrs. HANFORD. On ascertaining, her danger she seized her babe and her daughter, and jumped overboard, having her husband standing on the stern of the vessel. After she got in the water she was compelled to relinquish her hold on little ones, and left them behind her. A man with his child in his arms, who was in the water close by her, seeing that the mother was in the act of sinking, seized hold of her and helped her up; but, alas! in doing so he lost his own child.

In all some forty persons perished. The pilot and engineer remained at their posts until the boat struck the shore. Nineteen bodies have been recovered from the wreck. There is not a vestige of the wood-work of the Berkshire above water-mark that has not been destroyed, with the exception of a portion of the starboard wheel-house. Both smoke-stacks have fallen. The walking-beam and other portions of the machinery are still standing. The after-part of the boat, from the paddles to the stern, is entirely submerged. Twenty bodies are supposed to be there.

The fire originated in the lamp-room, and was caused by the explosion of a lamp. The rapidness of the fire was caused by the large quantity of hay on board becoming ignited as soon as the fire burst from the lamp-room, which might have been put as well been so much alkoled as regards combustion.

The Berkshire was a first-class steamer, and was built at Albany last Spring. She made one or two trips to New York last fall to test her machinery; but she was not permanently placed on the river until this spring. Her engines were taken out of the hull of the South America, but it was enlarged and made more powerful.

Our sketch on the first page gives a vivid view of the steamer at the time of the calamity.

GENERAL GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN.

WE continue this week our sketches illustrative of scenes and events in General GRANT'S great campaign in Virginia.

On page 412 we give a view of the position near Cold Harbor, June 2. Our artist, A. R. WAUD, furnishes the following explanation of this sketch:

"At this point the Second and Sixth Corps join. One of Gibbon's brigades (McKEAN'S, Second Division, Second Corps) appears on the left of the picture, massed under a crest. In the foreground are the Nineteenth and Seventeenth Massachusetts, etc. To the right of the house is the old Jersey brigade of the Sixth Corps, which has been of service since June 3, and they leave the army with an unsurpassed reputation. The lines these troops hold have been taken from the enemy, and are now more than a hundred yards from the rebel front. The smoke on the extreme left marks the position of a section of SEYMOUR'S battery, while MERCY'S battery occupies the fore-ground. These and other batteries at this point soon silenced the enemy's artillery, while small-bands in reckless predicament made the rifle-pits, among which the dead and wounded lay thickly."

THE LAST FIGHT OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RESERVES is illustrated on page 412. The Reserves were attacked by Early's corps, which came out of the woods, covered by artillery, and in line of battle swept down upon CRAWFORD'S command. At first some of the regiments gave way, but soon rallied, and the brigade seen in the fore-ground stood its conspicuous gallantry under their commander, COLONAL FISHER. The rebels were repulsed, and retreated in disorder. General CRAWFORD and staff were close to the house there on right. A rebel shell set it on fire, and it was consumed during the engagement.

On page 405 are sketches showing the troops of General BARLOW in front of the rebel works, and the passage of the Pamunkey at Hanover by the army in its advance from the North Anna. General BARLOW'S position on the front, where this sketch was taken, was twelve miles from Richmond. Mr. WAUD says:

"The sketch was taken from the Sheldon House, a mansion nearly two hundred years old, built of imported glazed brick, and occupied by a lot of women and children, who refused to leave, although fifty or sixty rebel cannon-shot passed through the building. They sought refuge in the cellar. The works seen from this point consist of a double row of rifle-pits ev the crest above the stream called Toleptatomy, with epaulements for guns, not more than fifty yards away. The guns, flags, and men are distinctly visible from this mansion."

The crossing of the Pamunkey has been fully described in accounts of the forward movement. The river is deep, muddy, and thickly fringed with wood. The ferry-master at Hanover sank his boat on the approach of our forces.

In reference to the sketch of the Fourteenth New York Heavy Artillery Crossing the North Anna, given on page 404, our artist writes: "After HANCOCK had crossed the North Anna, BURNSIDE was ordered over to connect the line of battle. To do this he had to cross the river by the Chesterfield bridge on the Telegraph road, Ox Ford. The rebels had a fine range on this bridge, and a 6-gun battery played it all day, whenever troops appeared upon it. As the columns double-quicked it over shell would burst right about them, covering the men with dirt and splinters, and the ground, and wounding a few of the soldiers. The crest from which our batteries are represented replying to the fire was captured by the rebels from our own BIRNEY'S old brigade, to which the Ninety-third New York Volunteers have been assigned. The assault and capture of this position is considered by the most dashing incidents of the campaign. The rebels were so severely handled that they did not time to burn the bridge. Many were captured and some drowned at the place."

In the battle of Cold Harbor, June 1, STEVENS'S battery, belonging to the Sixth Corps, was so near the rebel lines that the soldiers nicknamed it "Battery Insult." The artillery fire caused a most aggravating manner, and was an excessively dangerous spot to be seen in. After a discharge of the canon hundreds of bullets would be heard from the embrasures and around the earth-work: occasionally round shot would batter down portions of the sand-bag, and wounds, more or less, and often fatal, were the consequence. It will be noticed, in our sketch on page 404, that the rebel embrasures have been taken off the carriages, and placed in trenches dug for their security.

The pictures on pages 408 and 409 illustrates one of the grandest charges of the war—that of BARLOW'S Division in the Battle of Cold Harbor, June 1. General BARLOW was in a field-work on the left of Army. A correspondent of the Times thus describes the charge:

"Barlow and directed that his attacking brigades should, previously to the assault, be moved out, and formed just in front of the picket line. We were thus obliged to wait for half a mile, through woods and over open intervals, before we reached the point of attack. Indeed, the last portion of his front where the right of MILES'S brigade joined with the left of HOLMAN'S was not completed until he brilliantly carried the famous salient in the lines of intrenchments, planted in a field-work and turned the artillery got over and into the enemy's parapet, capturing his guns (four light 3-inch rifles), his colors, and five or six hundred prisoners, about three hundred of whom were secured by myself and my personal staff. The left attacking column, in fact, was just turning the enemy's guns on the retreating rebels, when the order to withdraw came from the second rebel line appeared advancing. BARLOW'S brigade—almost annihilated, not used to fighting—could not have held their own under conditions the least short of demoralization. But the officers and men of the brigade themselves avenged its limits. It was not merely the overwhelming force that drove them back, but the numbers of the that they had so fear—but the position they had gained placed them at the mercy of the rebel batteries, and gave the rebel artillery the opportunity for a deadly enfilading fire. Against this, they fought with the determination of two of their chief commanders. BROOKS and BURNES, "made of marrow of iron." Both were severely wounded, and all the organizations had suffered fearfully from an unequaled loss of officers. The brigade held what they felt back, bringing with them the prisoners they had taken and a captured flag—but not the enemy's colors, but back, but not to their original position; to a position far in advance of where they had held, and effectively could not more than fifty yards from the enemy."

The following is the account our artist writes: "This sketch represents a portion of the line at the time when they had captured the first line of rifle-pits, and were about to advance upon the second. The regiment is the New York Seventh Heavy Artillery. Some of the men are seen over the embankment endeavoring to fire. The rebel captured guns upon them, under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel MORRIS, Colonel PORTER having been killed in the charge. The rebel prisoners in the picture are seen rapidly divesting themselves of their accoutrements, and hastening to the rear to the disarming of the captured. Near them some soldiers are moving the Colonel in a blanket; and above a captured flag with the Virginia State arms emblazoned upon it, is carried in by one of our soldiers."

QUITE A LORD.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXIX.

LILY IS ACTUATED AT HOME.

ONCE more Lily traversed the up-hill pavement, and marveled at the great rolling turbulent gutters in the roadways: gutters which in those days often bore on their bosoms the carcasses of defunct cats and dogs, that rolled past, swift and supine, toward the Infinite reserved for the beasts.

Once more she saw the clumsy oil-lamps slung on ropes cross-wise in the streets, and smelled the odor of the melons and peaches, and the quicker aroma of the grapes from the fruiterers' shops. The new way by back streets, where there were few brilliant shops, full of gold, and silver, and jewels, and rich dresses, and beautiful pictures. But to the timid little heart just escaped from her throldlom, the narrow, dirty streets of old Paris were more attractive. Here, in the narrow, full of wet partly-cooked spinach, like green mortar, in the green-grocers' shops; the giant pumpkins at the doors, which, when cut in half, and closing a voluptuous mine of golden squash and seedfulness within, that looked like the heads of grim Pyrrin warriors stricken off by the two-handed swords of doughty Crusaders; the eggs boiled in cochineal (as Madame Prudence explained) to make their shells red; "c'est pour distraire l'œil, mon enfant;" the long strings of cramp little sausages; the fat hams, which, ingeniously truffled, as though they had corns defiant of the skillfulest chiropodist; the other wonderful preparations of pork at the charcutiers'; the butchers' shops, with their marble dressers and gilt iron railings, and their scraggy but lively-colored show of meat; the glaring sign-boards; the dazzling show of pewter pitchers in the wineshops; the ticket-porters dozing on their trucks, with their shirt-collars open, disclosing their hairy, vein-encrusted necks; the throng of little boy-soldiers with vacant faces and red legs; of priests in shovel-hats; of policemen with cocked hats and canes; of mustached old sergeants, very like the two Fates who came to card wool at the Pension, trolling monstrous barrows full of fruit or vegetables; the water-carriers with their pails; the alert little work-women, with their work in bags, whisking away with their skirts thrown over one arm; the wonderful poodle-dogs with tufted tails and curling manes, like noble lions; the smaller growth; the liquorice-water seller with his pagoda at his back hung with bells and banners, and his clean pewter mugs ranged in straight tin rings; the man who sold the jumbles, and the man who sold metal tops; the wandering glazier with his cry of "Victor——!" the old clothesman, no Jew he, but a stout Christian, who looked as though he had spent a good many years roasting in Galilee, and had begun to waver in his faith somewhat, crying, "Vieux habits, vieux galons!" the cane-bottomer and black-guard little boys in torn blue blouses, who splashed in the gutters, or made faces behind the backs of the stout housekeepers; all had charms for Lily. She could not help remembering that each of the surrounding objects—animate as well as inanimate—was intensely dirty, and that the atmosphere was heavily laden with tobacco smoke; but the entire spectacle was charming to her unaccustomed eyes.

By-and-by, in the wane of the afternoon (for they had walked leisurely, and Madame Prudence had met several acquaintances, the majority bearing large baskets from which the heads of cabbages protruded, or the heads of fowls dangled, and who were manifestly of the culinary calling), they crossed the great roaring boulevard——and the housekeeper told Lily it was an ocean of wickedness, and to be avoided, save on feast-days, when the good people came out in a body to it, and entered a maze of streets much wider and cleaner, but much quieter. There were few shops, but many white walls, resting to streets waved for trees, and relieved only by jalousied windows and heavy porte-cochères. "Ah, mon enfant, mon bijou bien Aff looked older; but then all was as still and as gloomy as the stark and sepulchral suburb of Saint Philippe-du-Roule.

"Does the good lady——does Madame de Kergolay——keep a Pension?" she asked, nervously.

Madame Prudence nodded her head. Lily was quivering within her own, and patted it again, reassuringly.

"Courage, my child!" he said, with a merry laugh. "Why, we have not the boldness of a guinea-pig. We have come to Madame de Kergolay—a baroness, mind you, of the old stock, and not one of the day before yesterday—for a lady of quality had told me of her, and had ascertained position in society. She has had misfortunes, cruel and bitter misfortunes; but misfortunes are sacred, and suck the blood of young children, she would stand and sell matches at the corner of the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin. Courage, my child: suck their blood! That is what the Marcasin does. She is a real Count Upolski!"

A considerable period had apparently elapsed since Madame Prudence had perused the works of Dante. However, knew quite as little about Count Ugolino as the housekeeper did; and the assurance that Madame de Kergolay did not keep a school was sufficient for her.

The baroness lived in the Marais, in one of the tallest and oldest houses of that tall old quarter. It was a very large house, too—almost as great a rarity in Paris as a stone house is in London. The entire mansion, indeed, with the exception of the portion which Madame de Kergolay took care to inform Lily belonged to the baroness; but she let it out in flats to respectable tenants, and reserved only one floor, the third, for her own use.

CHAPTER XXX.

IN THE MARAIS.

IF Madame de Kergolay had lived on a third floor in London, the altitude of her dwellingplace would have been accepted as prima facie evidence of the impoverished circumstances. But indigence, in Paris, does not necessarily correspond with the number of stairs you have to mount to your abode; and, although the baroness's apartment was an inside one, it was spacious, comfortable, and even elegant.

Madame Prudence was short-winded, and, as she toiled up the staircase, uttered sundry invectives against a certain "Satané" asthma which troubled her. The Abbé Chatain would not have failed to reprove her for using so naughty an adjective; and of this eventuality Madame Prudence seemed dimly aware. But the fat woman's handing she objurgated the asthma with hated breath, and spotprophied it only as a "Cosaque." But she was very glad to rest for a while on the penultimate flight, while Lily gazed with admiration through an oil-de-bœuf casement on the vast panorama of slated roofs and chimney-stacks which stretched around and beneath her. The sweetly-savored smoke from the wood fires curled in delicate violet hue against the clear blue sky; and the distant melody of a piano—played not as a practice, but for pleasure, for the instrumentalist caroled a lively ditty as he sang—came and smote her very sweetly on the ear. It was a simple matter to be pleased with, yet Lily felt as though she could have clapped her hands, and sung back again. Poor little creature! she had seen so little, as yet, of the only city in the world worth living in!

"I should like," she said, in airy prattle to her new-found friend, "always to live here, and look through that window. See, there is a woman hanging out linen on a roof. Oh, if there were only some birds! There used to be birds at Dijon, formerly."

"Bird yourself," rejoined the good-humored housekeeper. "Silly little chatterer, you'd soon get tired of your bird's-eye view. Till warmer. Yes, yes, there are better things to be seen within. Come! my respiration is a little restored. We will ring at the good lady's door."

A lively piece of sculpture, in the likeness of a horse's head, hung at the side of the door, covered by the side of a door whose central panel exhibited a brass plate, and thereon, in very spiky and attenuated black letters, the words, "Madame la Baronne de Kergolay." Lily felt a slight tremor when she read "baronne." The remembrance of a former "countess" rather conducive to a conviction on her part that she had had enough to do with titles of nobility for the term of her natural life.

A withered old man, very diminutive, but with a very large head, and perhaps the thinnest pair of spindle-shanks ever seen out of a museum of anatomical preparations, opened the door, and ushered in a hospitable manner at the newcomers.

"This is my brother Thomas," said Madame Prudence, introducing the little old man, "although you will oftener hear him addressed by his little name of Tom Sablons. He is twenty years older than I, but in his youth was a fickle gruillard. Even now if fait des farces. He is as spiteful as a dart, as strong as Hercules, and sain comme mon œil."

Thomas, otherwise Vieux Sablons, grinned in extraordinary fashion at these praises of himself bestowed on him that, in the mind of the timid, some fear might have arisen respecting the personal appearance of his superior and younger. This time, however, no divorce between the upper and lower portions of his head took place. Vieux Sablons grinned into a smile, he and the outer door behind the visitors, and ushered them into the hall of the pavement.

Lily remarked that Thomas's large head though quite bald on the summit, and very scanty on the temples, had on his thick locks and ears, was plentifully powdered. He wore, moreover, earrings: at which, I take it, an English Jeamer would have been astounded. But it was addicted. He was habited in a green livery coat, short in the waist, and shorter in the tails, shortest of all in the unconsidered point of view of the cuffs, and ornamented with a shoulder-knot of tarnished silver lace. It was a coat, indeed, in an Louis the Fifteenth trance, was well-nigh declared. Thomas's waistcoat had fallen likewise into disuse, and his yellow leather breeches in the first that is seen without being yellow; for the original hue of the nankeen which formed its texture had undergone various modifications, washings. His green velvet nether garments likewise suggested to the observant spirit that they had originally formed the covering of the stalwart calf or thigh of the First Empire, which had been very liberally set upon the bones and limbs of Paligo-ware, relieving with distended fin its way through life, like one of poor Bernard's perch through a dish.

"Is that your coat before the assembly of notables met," whispered Madame Prudence, with a humming footman at Versailles Schoss. He has worn l'épée au côté—the sword by his side. Ah, the glad days!"

Anon they had passed through a cheerful dining-room with the usual floor of inlaid wood, light chintz hangings and furniture, and plenty of mirrors. At each of the three windows there was a glittering cage, and in each cage a canary was singing.

"I like it, it is better than the staircase," quoth Madame Prudence, shyly.

"Indeed, indeed, when they came to the next room, the saloon, where the mirrors had richer frames—all tarnished, though—and where there were more cages, no more of birds in a cage, and a beautiful globe full of gold and silver fish, and some stately pictures of ladies in hoops, and gentlemen in velvet and swords, and one older portraits of cavaliers in slouched hats and curled mustaches, and dames in ringlets and point lace, where the furniture was of dark carved wood, with elaborate cushions and backs in rather faded silk.

"All Madame's doing," whispered the housekeeper. "She is an angel at her needle, but they were all put together by the spinner of the quarter. The old furniture was broken to pieces; the mirrors and the pictures my brother saved; there's not a portrait without a bullet-hole or the gash of a knife in it, carefully mended; not a looking-glass frame but the glass itself has been smashed. What you see is nearly all that is left of the chateau of Vieux Sablons."

Again they went on, until Thomas, lifting up a heavy drapery of old tapestry veiling a door, tapped discreetly at it. His large head disappeared within the hangings, but speedily withdrew it, and turned it toward the visitors with a reassuring grin.

"Madame will receive," he said. "She is not saying her brevisry. Go in, my children."

Lily observed, as he retired, that, although he was upright as a dart," the gait of Vieux Sablons was very feeble, and he hobbled.

Madame Prudence seemed to divine the girl's thoughts.

"Yes," she said, with pleasant pride. "Thomas is of a certain age. He is no longer in his first youth. He is eighty, and for seventy-five years, man and boy, has been in the service of the family. But he is agile. Oh! he is alert. Ma parole d'honneur, I think he could dance the gavotte as well as Monsieur Vestris."

But here Madame Prudence was inwardly reminded that priests' housekeepers have no right to be critical on the execution of so mundane a performance as the gavotte, and she was for a moment covered with confusion. She muttered, however, something about the old thoughts that had come into her head through the presence of young people, and, pushing aside the drapery, led Lily in.

They found themselves in a neat smiling little room that was half boudoir and half bedchamber, the walls hung with antique tapestry in which shepherds and shepherdesses, brave with ribbons —for their very crooks and the necks of their sheep were hung with the particolored products of the loom—were grinning as affably upon all comers as Thomas, cycles Vieux Sablons. Their smiles had somewhat faded from the effects which years agone had been fixed in perpetual exclamation by honest fingers now feebless in the tomb, but they continued to grin valorously. And though there had really never been a quiche au Arcadie, though the real names of Daphnis and Phillis had not been Colin and Margot, who had pined in rags and penury, and fed on black bread and chicken that was scarcely fit (wild grass), while the beaux in wigs had been wiving cuirasses to the belles in hoops at the ball-roofed château yonder. As though the Arcadian had never been burnt down by Corydons and Phillises infuriated by famine and oppression. As though there had never been a guillotine erected in permanency at the Mairie, a decreased population, a broken crook and the Reign of Terror. And the shepherds and shepherdesses went on smiling, in a third floor in the Marais, as they had once smiled in the great hall of Vieux Sablons.

There were more birds in this room; and their diversified twittering was, to tell truth, somewhat embarrassing to the newly-arrived stranger. One soon grew accustomed, however, to a riot which at first blush is the most incoherent. There was a dwarfish coffee-colored pug-dog, too, of the breed called "griffon"—a beast with a human beast with a red leather collar hung with bells, and a face like that of a negro pugilist (who had lost the fight) with a thought the small end of an opera-glass. This pet and treasure yapped and jigged about the room, and at first seemed inclined to attack a hostile assailant in the shape of Lily's ankles—dear me! how very late in the day I am in telling ya that our solitary one had begun to bark, and that they were now one and shrieked—but was soon recalled to order by a small voice; a voice which addressed him now as "little tyrant," and now as "little cherished one."

On a cushion of tambour-work, which was moved about as the sun's rays affected different strips of the flooring, couched, grave and magisterial, with a frill of fur like an Elizabethan ruff round his neck, a monstrous Angora cat. It was said, long ago, that no human being could ever have been so vain as Monsieur Vestris; but the impenetrable sagacity of the Angora's countenance would have reduced the melancholy, wig, seals, and all, to idiotcy by contrast. The Angora cat's name was Mirifion.

In this interior there was a handsome circular table of marqueterie, laden with books, with flowers, with medicine-work. There were cunning little grass cushions to admire and the feel and the heat of the fire, which, notwithstanding the warmth of the weather, was crackling on the polished andiron of the roomy chimney. Then a fan-of above there was a bed: looking more, however, like a state ottoman: with a delicately adjusted counterpane of quilted crimson silk.

By the work-table, a screen before her eyes, in a low, cozy chair, reclined a feeble old lady, whose hair was like undressed, but highly bleached, flax; whose lineaments seemed to have been cut in ivory; whose complexion was soft and clear as virgin wax. Her hands, Lily noticed, were as white as the Marcasin's; but they were shrunk, gentle hands, innocent hands, hands that closed on when they were clasped in prayer, but opened only to give something away. She was clad in gray silk, and a kind of laced kerchief was tied under her head. She wore spectacles, and she had not a tress of her head; but she looked, for all that, very like a saint.

"Kiss her, my child," whispered Madame Prudence.

Lily trembled all over; and, she scarcely knew why, her eyes filled with tears. She, by an involuntary movement, she crept down to her knees, and took the lady's hand, which was soft and glossy, and, holding it between her own, gently kissed it.

The lady disengaged her hand and patted the brown curls nestling by her.

"And so you are to be my little pet bird," she said, in a low yet silvery shrill voice. "We are very good friends already, I can see. Monsieur l'Abbé has told me all about you. You have nothing to fear here, Lily Floris."

To Lily's inexpressible delight the lady spoke English—her own pure, sonorous, native tongue; at which Madame Prudence, not understanding a word, looked on in highly critical admiration.

Madame de Kergolay smiled at the girl's ill-concealed astonishment.

"Don't be afraid," she continued; "this is not a Parisian Anglaise. You are surprised to hear me speak your language. Well, it is partly mine. I am English by descent, though not by birth. My grand-nephew, whom you will see some of these days (the wretch), is English head to foot. Yes; I come of an English family—have you never heard of the Greyfaunts of Lancaster? No, you are too young—but I was born in France. My father was exiled in the '45 for his attachment to the true king, and I was brought up by the English Benedictines—ah! the good sisters—in Paris; and when I left the convent I married Monsieur de Kergolay." She sighed and looked up, and, as a portrait supported on a little easel near her. It represented a handsome gentleman with powdered locks, but with a long mustache, who wore a white uniform coat with blue facings, and the cross of St. Louis at his button-hole.

"Yes," the baroness murmured. "He was the bravest captain in his regiment, and the bravest gentleman in all Brittany. Nay, I libel them: the Bretons are all brave, and there is none bravest."

She was given to ramble sometimes in her discourse, and an unusual flow of volubility was succeeded by a silence somewhat blank. Madame Prudence beckoned Lily nearer.

"We will leave her a little while," whispered the good housekeeper. "Monsieur l'Abbé is always at a great age. Figure to yourself, my dear: eighty-six. She is weak, but ah! she has the courage of a Monquetaire Gris in her."

"She is a very beautiful old lady, and I am sure she is good," said Lily, timidly.

"You are right, little seer," returned the housekeeper, tapping the girl familiarly under the chin. "Beauty has its own charm. Now it is a lantern, very clear and pellucid, through which her beautiful soul shines. The child says well: we must be asked for questions on the great voyage. Her papers are all in order. Do you know what M. l'Abbé Bernardin confessed the martyr king, gave her absolution himself when, with six of her old governesses, the Benedictines, she was conducted to the Tuesday tumbril that was to convey her to the scaffold? And it was only by a miracle she escaped.

"Poor lady!" murmured Lily. "How beautiful she must have been!"

"Beautiful!" repeated Madame Prudence. "Ah! her head was gone through rude trials. Fire and famine and slaughter, insult and torture, captivity, exile, poverty—all these have gone with the exception of her graceless grandson, she is left quite alone."

"Why, I am quite alone too," quoth Lily, simply.

"Poor little lamb! I didn't mean to hurt your feelings. There is a fold for you, remember. Madame la Baronne will love you very dearly, and Vieux Sablons will take as much care of you as though you were a child of his own. As Mirifion the cat, and I will come and see you whenever I can spare half an hour; and, bless my heart, here is Babette, the femme de chambre, who will show you the little room that is to be yours. Now, you will be happy, and you must bid you good-by, or my dear abbé will think I am lost."

And Madame Prudence, confiding Lily to the care of Babette, who was a homely woman of middle age, with a port-wine stain on her face, was as good as her word, and left them.

Babette took Lily into a charming little bedroom, all ruffling in white dimity draperies. Ah! no different from the beautiful bed in Marcasin's. She showed Lily a coquettish little closet, where her own and the baroness's clothes were arranged; and then, to the girl's great astonishment, the homely Babette sat down on the bed and began to cry.

"Don't mind me," she said in French, wiping her eyes. "I'm not going to hate you or to be jealous of you. It is the heat, perhaps, and the heat of the fire, which, notwithstanding the warmth of the weather, was crackling on the polished andiron of the roomy chimney. "It is fair-off above there was a bed: looking more, however, like a state ottoman: with a delicately adjusted counterpane of quilted crimson silk.

"Charitable?" she resumed. "She's a saint. I don't think I am a bad woman, but I am the lowest of the low, a creature at shame, la dernière des dernières;" and she began to weep afresh.

Lily did her best to console her, but the most efficacious balsam to be applied to a wounded spirit seemed, in the case of Babette, appeared to be the doubling of her fist again. She brought it down with more force than ever upon the bed.

"Look you well here, little one," she exclaimed. "This house has more mercy in it than the Hôtel-Dieu—than Bicêtre—than any house on earth. My man, my husband, it is very certain was a villain—Claude Gallifet, called Claquedents. An abominable man. Do you see that scar on my forehead? That was where he knocked me down with his adze, as a butcher knocks down the beef-gras. Observe it well. The blow went through my skull as though it had been of paper. Do you see this gap in my mouth? That is where Claquedents knocked three of my teeth down my throat. My breath is almost as short as Madame Prudence's. But I have no asthma. I pant because Claude jumped on me, and broke two of my ribs. But I loved that man there. Do you understand?"

Lily was bewildered, and knew not what to say. She hazarded a guess.

"If he was bad," the woman continued, "I was bad. If he was a robber, I was a receiver of stolen goods. I tell you I loved him. Well! If he did commit the burglary by night, I helped him. I made the skeleton keys for him, and hid the slippers, so that he should not be heard. Ce n'est pas moi qui l'ai conseille de tuer la bourgeoise," she muttered, in a lower tone, and she sighed, and looked at Lily, and breathed hard.

The girl was shuddering.

"The bourgeois and me did," Babette went on, gloomily. "Otherwise, Claquedents would have been guillotined. Well, they sent him to London for life—for life, mon enfant—to a high-cap, and chained to another villain. N'en parlons plus."

"I was tried with him," she resumed. "They were merciful to me because I was a woman, and I had had two years' seclusion. I came out of prison to do what? To starve. 'Get up,' said the police one day. 'Lie down,' they cried the next. 'To live, go there; where are your papers?' I had none, and no bread. I tell you I had no bread. They would not take me in at the hospital. I was strong, they said. I should had a child. That died while I was in the prison. I begged. I really found a child and put it on to the Pont des Arts to drown myself. The Abbé Chatain met me. He gave me money for a loaf. He told me to come to him. I was received in an institution where saints such as she gather together wretches such as I. I worked night and day. What could I do better? Good God! I never stole any thing but when I wanted bread, or when my man told me. At last I came here as femme de chambre. I am the care of the plate. I could strangle Madame, she is so helpless in a chair, when I put her in bed. Vieux Sablons does not know my story. The Dame Prudence, even, only knows from the Abbé that I have a child. Nothing more. I will tell you—because you are young and have been miserable—think of me, and bless God that you never came there, like me.

"And your husband?" Lily said, lifting her great eyes in wonderment to the woman's face.

"Speak not of him to me," she returned. "If he were to escape, or to be released, I declare that I would kill myself. I live here safe and sound, and I know that we should be at the Dépôt of the Préfecture again for robbery. You will never hear from me again, and never from me. Go! I see you are good. I am not about to be jealous of you." And Babette got off the bed, smoothed her flaxen head-dress, and, out of fat, and very composedly proceeded to fill the ewer from a large brass pitcher.

When Lily was alone she ventured to open the wardrobe, and found that the mean and patched apparel she had brought from the Pension Marcasin had been supplemented by a store of linen, morning wrappers, and other feminine gear, which, to her unaccustomed eyes, appeared unprecedentedly magnificent. There was little finery among the stock; there were neither silks nor satins; but the kindly Cinderella the few drawers seemed to contain the treasures of the Indies. She had never seen such nice clothes since the well-regretted afternoon when Cutwig & Co. fitted her out.

Presently came Vieux Sablons with a tap at the door, which, as his semblance was given as usual, that Madame would again receive her. She followed him, timidly, but with a happy reliance gradually growing upon her. Every thing told her that in this house she had nothing to fear.

Madame de Kergolay bade Lily come very close, and kissed her on the forehead.

"I am a cross, fanciful old woman, my darling," she said, "and constant pain makes me cross and irritable sometimes. When I scold you (which will be rarely, I hope), you must smile and kiss me. When I scold Vieux Sablons he rubs the buttons of his coat with his sleeve; which reduces him, formerly he used to whistle, but I prohibited that, as an impertinence. And now you are to know, my little child, that I love feet, and tell me every thing about yourself. I need not ask you for the truth. It is written in your face."

It was indeed. The girl drew the stool close to the old lady's chair, and, her brown curls nestling among the draperies of her protectress's cold, in artless simplicity, the short and sorrowful story of her life. There were no startling incidents, no romantic episodes. It was a mean, commonplace little tale: but Madame de Kergolay shed tears as she listened to it.

"You have been very unhappy, my child," she began, when Lily had ended. "Let us pray that there may be no more, and that the future time is coming. In His inscrutable wisdom and mercy, the Almighty is often pleased to afflict most sorely those of his creatures who seem least deserving of his anger. You have had, indeed, to suffer two most terrible deprivations. The father to protect, the mother to cherish and fondle you! Ah! poor little lamb! my heart bleeds for you. But we must see what a feeble, bedridden invalid can do to console you; yes, we must try to make you as happy as the day is long."

"There is only one thing that I am afraid of, Madame," faltered Lily.

"And what is that, my child?"

"If the lady—the strange lady—the one who was called countess—should find me out? If she went to Mademoiselle Marcasin's, and discovered where I was! Oh! it would be dreadful!"

"Foolish little thing! After devoting you so long, it is not probable that she will care to inquire about you. If she be indeed your mother, she must be a short and hard-hearted—a scandal to her sex. But I can not believe that any mother could be so inhuman. No, no; she must be some wicked and intriguing woman, who, to further bad designs of her own, has been endeavoring to alienate you from your real parents. Let us think no more about her. Justice, divine or human, must, sooner or later, overtake a creature so abandoned. Let us indulge in hopes, rather, that some day the two gentlemen who placed you at the school at Clapham, and both of whom must have been your father, may be met with. But, until they do come forward, and under any circumstances, you are not the less to be my dear adopted child."

They had much converse that afternoon; and an impertinent little alabaster clock on the mantle-piece had proclaimed, in a voice very much resembling the barking of a dog with the hiccups, that it was six o'clock, when Vieux Sablons (who had bestowed a fresh sprinkling of powder on his bald pate in honor of the occasion) announced that Madame was served, and that dinner was ready.

Madame, alas! could not walk to her evening meal; but as she obstinately refused to be treated as much like an infant as to be served in her bedchamber, she was slowly wheeled in her chair to the salle-à-manger. The six o'clock dinner was one of the few that had been left to the everyday world; and, whether she dined alone or in company, the ceremonious announcement of the banquet was made by Vieux Sablons, and her modest repast was served up in the apartment specially provided for the purpose.

The dinner was a very simple, but a very nice one. They had a soup with bread in it, a little of the gravy from the broth with a sharp sauce, a dish of dishes of vegetables, a roast chicken, and some cream cheese. The only evidences of luxury were in the wine, which was a rare and odoriferous Bordeaux, and in the dessert, at which a magnificent melon made its appearance. Every thing pertaining to the service of the meal was scrupulously clean, and of originally costly material, but every thing had already been worn out. The table-cloth and napkins were damask, but worn to the cord, and as elaborately darned as a Paris Sabbath-day's stocking. The wine was rich, but rubbed to the last degree of thinness. The dessert porcelain was old Sèvres, but cracked and riveted in many places. The melon, indeed, in fact, from the napkin-holders to the salad-bowl, seemed to have undergone some terrible mystery, but to have been mercifully spared the wreckers' hands, and carefully put together again.

Vieux Sablons waited on footman and butler and valet-de-mal. He solemnly drew the bottle of Bordeaux, and presented the encrimsoned cork on a battered silver salver of ancient pattern, which who examined and dismissed it approvingly, saying that the good Haut Brion showed, as yet, no trace of deterioration. He carved the chicken with a silver knife and fork in a very imposing manner, and brought on the two silver sconces containing lighted wax-candles, which, with an air worthy of a sacristan, or of a gentleman of the chamber to the Great King.

Lily had been pretty well in a third floor of the Marais, both, little ma'amselle?" he remarked, with his accustomed complacency, as he lighted Lily to her chamber.

The girl said that every thing was beautifully comfortable.

"With regard to comfort," replied Vieux Sablons, slightly piqued, "I don't care about it. I know it is, in these days, a fetish. I consume me not. It belongs to the revolutionaries. I inflicted to the style. Do you approve of it?"

Lily hastened to assure him that she regarded the style as perfect.

"That's all, then," returned the latter, "and the ancient servitor, nodding his head in grave satisfaction. "We are as troisième, it is true, but still we perform our functions as though we were they were performed before the evil times. The bulk of our fortune, alas! we have lost, but we contrive to make ends to keep up—as to the crumbs. You see that our forks and spoons are still of silver."

Lily had noticed that.

"The days have been," Vieux Sablons continued, "when I have had to be here as a servant Madame and her guests entirely off silver, ay, and off silver-gilt. But what would you have? On accounts of revolution has ruined all. The Gauls triumph. Poor France!"

"Poor Madame de Kergolay!" murmured Lily, softly.

"You are right, my child," said the old man. "We keep up our style, and there is that scamp of a grand-nephew, and Madame is as angel as the poor, and all upon ten thousand francs a year. And twenty-four of Vieux Sablons alone are once worth a million."

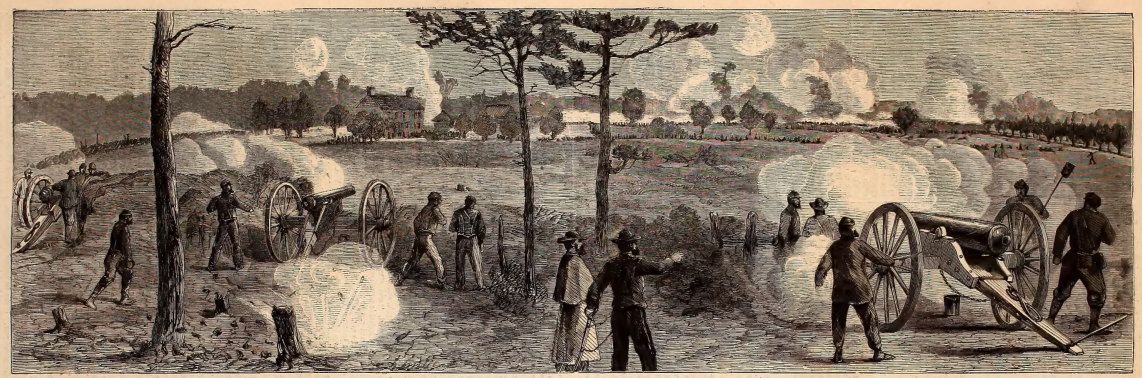
"A million!" echoed Lily, who had scarcely ever heard of so large a sum of money.

"A million! Tra l'ho say it to you. Now we are reduced to ten thousand miserable francs. The appointments of an employé, youl! But I tell you what," the old man, in his thin pipe, continued, clenching a trembling hand; "the day that I see those lands begin to fall us, and Madame says, 'Vieux Sablons, we must sell the silver, and also with one of those pieces of cheese,' I shall have no bread to give to my poor,' that day I will beg, that day I will thieve for the benefit of France!"

"But Madame would be angry," Lily gently pleaded.

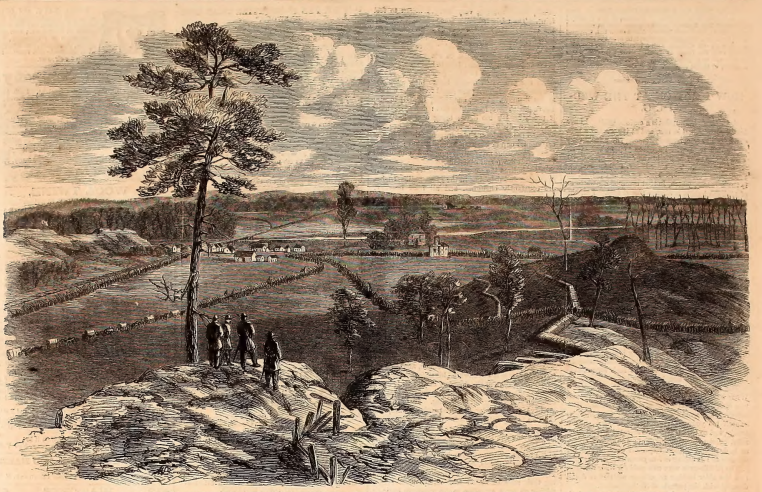
"Very well, very well. I have another resource. I will go to a bureau de remplacants and sell myself as a substitute for one drawn in the conscription. That is a thousand francs. France always wants men; and I am strong—oh! I am strong yet. Good-night, little ma'amselle."

Poor Vieux Sablons! He was nearly eighty, and could not have made, I fear, a very stalwart grenadier.



GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—THE POSITION AT COLD HARBOR, JUNE 2.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 410.]

GRANT'S GREAT CAMPAIGN—LAST FIGHT OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RESERVES.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 410.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—OUR ARMY ENTERING RESACA, GEORGIA, ON MAY 16, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

WE give on this page a picture of GENERAL SHERMAN'S ARMY ENTERING RESACA, GEORGIA, on the 16th of May, from a sketch made by T. R. DAVIS from the rebel fortifications. The columns on the left of the picture are the troops of General HOOKER; those of the centre, General PALMER'S command; and those winding down on the far right, the corps of General LOGAN.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

WITH the return of June all the light descriptions of dress material have been restored to their wonted favor in the Parisian world of fashion. Muslins, foulards, poplins, and light silks come in for an equal share of popularity. Violet still retains its sway; and violet, light green, black, white, and havannah will be the "couleurs de predilection" throughout the summer. Deep flounces are to be given up for the time being; if any flounce, only a very narrow one can be permitted at the bottom of the skirt. The corsages vary much in shape. Small bonnets have succeeded to the highly-elevated and richly-ornamented chapeaux. Some of the latest novelties in the way of bonnets are without the ordinary bavolet, a floral ornament replacing that portion of the capricious article of toilet. It is now quite the mode to wear a small lace veil—the loup, as it is called, descending as far as the nose.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Dark blue poplin robe, trimmed with black passementerie ornaments. The corsage is cut in the style known as the Corsage Impératrice, without seam. Lilac crape bonnet, covered with black tulle, and ornamented with lilac marguerites beneath the front edge.

Fig. 2. Carriage Dress.—Slate-colored moire antique robe, trimmed with violet ribbon, fastened at intervals by bows of the dress material; the sleeves are similarly ornamented. Rice chip bonnet, edged in front with a trimming of black lace, and provided, on one side, latticed with a violet bow and green leaf; a small bouquet of green leaves is also placed upon the violet silk bavolet.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE, 1864.

Fig. 3. Dress for a Watering-Place.—Robe of gray moire, which is needless to describe, as the principal feature of this figure is the Mistletoe mantle, composed of ribbons, lined with taffeta. The body is cut trimmed with bows, and, forming a pelerine, falls over the shoulders, and sweeps out of doors with a bonnet. With the hood raised over the head, as shown in our illustration, this mantle will be very convenient for evening rambles in the country, or at the sea-side.

HOW I GOT ON AT THE WEDDING.

A CHINESE MARRIAGE is a curious affair. I have lately participated in one, and as it serves as a type of the ordinary ceremonies among the middle class of Cantonese, I will introduce you to the scene. Two of the chief actors in the affair are particular friends of mine. The elder is Mr. Pun-fat, and the younger is Pun-wing. Their father is dead. Pun is the surname, which, in that common contrariness of Chinese habits, is always placed first. Fat, the elder brother, is married, and rejoices in a son and heir, who nonetheless condescends to allow me to carry him in my arms without crying, and calls me Mr. Chin-chin. Fat has also a baby-daughter; but children of that sex are not counted by the Chinese.

It chanced that Fat one day, while ruminating on the fortunes of the family, and lamenting, probably, the ill-luck (or doom of fate) which robbed the sex of his second child, bethought him that his younger brother, Wing, ought to marry. Accordingly, probably (but not of necessity) that aqueous-living Wing with 'this happy idea which had struck him so suddenly, he set to work to find a suitable lady to present as a bride to his young brother. In negotiating these matters it is customary to employ middle-men (or women), who set forth the attractions of the several eligible maidens to the fallen who come within their mediatory influence—or, in other words, whose income and style of living recommend them, the middle-men, to seek for suitable husbands for their daughters.

The selection being made—by Fat, of course—Wing was then informed of the state of affairs, and was directed to make necessary preparations. He, however, had no objections to marry—he thought himself too young, had no means of supporting a family, and so on, all of which objections were overruled by the elder brother, Fat; and finally Wing, as in duty bound, gave respectful obedience to the dictates of Fat acting in loco parentis.

The middle-men were now paid for their services, and the elder brother negotiated matters of detail directly with the parents of the bride-elect.

The day appointed for the wedding approached. Presents were constantly interchanged. Furniture and decorations were bought or hired for the occasion. All was bustle and excitement. Invitations were sent round; complimentary cards and letters of course were received.

The day arrived. Fat's house was decorated with gilt and tinsel. Huge scrolls, on which were inscribed quotations from the classics or other works, and which had been presented by the invited guests, adorned the walls. Small orange-trees were placed about into the grand hall, and paper dragons and mock-ship animals of the same material vied with each other in hideous ugliness. At last the time came a procession went along the streets. Half a dozen ragged boys, with failed red clocks making scarce any appearance, were the rags and tatters of the affair; the bare legs, led the way with tinsels and fifes. Gilded chairs, borne on men's shoulders by means of poles, and containing ornaments, fruits, cakes, sweetmeats, etc.; more ragged boys with music and flags; still more boys, gorgeously dressed, but far more effectually concealed; red and gilt, noise and clatter, rags and faded finery (hired for the occasion), pass along the streets. This is the ingredient-portion. A huge sedan-chair, one mass of gilded carving, brings up the rear. In this the bride is carried. She is conveyed from her father's house, and carried blindfolded to the of her future husband, attended by some of her relations and save the youngest male adult member of the family.

The procession halts, commingles with the crowd of sightseers, and amidst no small confusion, bustle, and noise, the bride alights from her sedan, enters the house, and, for the first time in her life, beholds her future husband. Her younger brother, who brought her, leaves immediately, and, except an old servant, she is left with her, for she is left alone in the midst of strangers, and is at once conducted to her bedroom, arrayed in bridal costume. In the room while the guests have arrived. They, of course, are all of the sterner sex; nevertheless, etiquette requires them to visit the bride in her own room before they make any return; they choose as to her personal appearance. "What beautiful feet she has! what superb teeth! what exquisite eyes!" And while these remarks are making she stands bowing to her guests, raising her folded hands to her head, her arms supported by a female servant on either side. All day long guests come and go.

For my part, I had made up my mind to go through this part of the proceedings in person, though I did not like the idea. I learned beforehand that a cup of tea would be handed to me, and had carefully practiced the right pronunciation of a few complimentary words, which it would, I knew, be the rule of me to omit before drinking the tea. It was evening. I screwed up my courage, repeated my complimentary words to myself, and boldly entered the small bedroom in company with several Chinese, who, some to have another look at the bride, and some to have my awkwardness, crowded in behind me and filled the doorway.

The bride stood and commenced bowing to me. Being a very nervous man, this was rather a formidable attack. What could I do? I made a bow, and then looked to Fat for help. "Oh, Fat!" said I, "do tell her to sit down—tell her not to bow to me. Say something very pretty and polite to her, and say it is from me."

Fat smiled roguishly, raised his voice, and addressed the fair bride. I could not have spoken a word of Chinese at the moment, I was so confused. It was a close, warm evening. The room was very small, very crowded, very hot. I began to feel faint. Then I heard Fat's voice above the din of the crowd. He had "a polite speech to make in my name." Then I heard him say in Chinese, every word of which I understood, "Here is the honorable foreign Sa——" come to see you. He is a great and important man; how to him; knock your head on the ground to him" (imagine my horror when she prostrated herself before me). "Show the foreign gentleman your pretty feet" (she did so, to my dismay). Then, addressing himself to me, Fat said, "Sir, look at her face: don't you think it pretty? It's too dark: bring a candle;" and holding a dirty candle to her countenance, he dragged me to take a closer inspection. After the ceremonial cup of tea was handed to me; but instead of uttering my prettily-prepared compliment I gulped it down and made off to—bed.

All this time the guests, some thirty in number, are eating and drinking in the great hall. Dishes are constantly changing, and all have breath. The utmost good feeling seems to prevail; all are conducting polite to each other; there is a sufficiency of ceremony to preserve decorum, and yet all is sufficiently informal to make all feel at home.

But where is the bridegroom, Mr. Wing, all this time? He left him at the door receiving his bride. After that he participates in none of the festivities, but walks about in the garden, seeing that his guests are well served, bowing to the doorway every one who goes, and from the doorway every one who enters. He, poor fellow! eats his plain everyday meal alone. He does not touch the viands on the guests' tables at all, but is polite, kind, and very tired he looks. Fat, too, has had a hard day's work. He has to bow and scrape to every guest, and with his younger brother has to run the neighboring cook-shop keeps the tables well supplied. Only he has this advantage over poor Wing, that he may sit down when he likes, and that the wine gives him an artificial strength, and a spurious sparkling of the eye, which his unfeasted brother lacks. Wing has to keep perpetually on his feet; nobody as each guest comes and goes, the constant din of welcoming thing but refreshing. Fat has a clock all have separated for their respective homes, and the Pun family retire to rest.

The next day the festivities are renewed; but instead of the gentlemen paying their visits to the bride's bedroom, she comes out when all are seated at the tables, and is handed on the guests' laps for her husband's friends. They, unmannerly fellows, pay little attention to this ceremony, but go on eating their nuts, or ratier their drier noises-seeds, paying as much attention to the prostrate bride as to any piece of furniture in the room. Then a son of my father, however, I could not stand this—or rather, I could not sit. So I rose on my feet, and begged them to rise. The example was at once followed my example, and intimated their lordly satisfaction at the homage paid, by saying to the bride, "You are pretty enough, but have no etiquette; you must get up."

A third day's festivities, with some slight difference in the ceremonies, completed the wedding arrangements of Mr. Pun-wing. That the bride and bride's parents are satisfied with the match, there is nothing whatever of each other until the weddingday, is the proper etiquette. But I believe they have commonly know each other by previous arrangements than they profess to do. And what do you think they have instead of bride-cake? A roasted pig! It is sent by the bridegroom to the bride's parents and other friends, just as we distribute our much more delicate, though not more digestible cake. But there is more meaning in the pig: the non-receipt of it by the bride's parents causes them society that some great misfortune should befall their daughter.

The scene at the bride's parents', for two or three days before the wedding, more resembles the preliminaries of a funeral. Every body, especially the bride, is weeping; and if they can not weep a sufficient quantity, hired weepers are engaged, who fill the house with their lamentations, and perform their part so well that any one not knowing that they were only shamming would think their hearts were bursting with grief. Tears flow from their eyes, and their sighs and groans are incessant. This state is supposed to represent the grief of the daughter at parting from her parents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-advance System, by which he commenced, and still carries on his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the owners of all other Gold Pens have put a Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, but adapts to many

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination safely; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, postage only excepted.

Reader, you can have an effusing, and yet a reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens, and at a trifling cost, compared with Patent Pressure Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one, see "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in next column.

Emancipation Proclamation.

Agents wanted in every county to sell the Sheet Picture of the Proclamation, the finest Public document ever issued in the U. S. Inclose $1.00 and three stamps for sample copy. Address

A. RIDDER, 485 Broadway, New York.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."

THE GOLD PEN.—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS.

THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—setting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but are suitable to size in numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE BABY SIZE SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen

These are Well-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Platinum Pointers. The average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are warranted to last, and, therefore, not unchangeable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. MORTON, Number" and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted by the Subscriber against accidental accidents.

The Numbers indicate size only. No. 1 being the smallest, No. 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket. No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the counter.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Numbers 4, 5, 6, 7, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are broad. Coarse Business points. The engravings show various styles of Nibs.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For 62 75 c. No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For 50 c. No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality.

For 38 c. No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For 25 c. No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 4th quality.

For 25 c. No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 4th quality.

For 25 c. No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION GOLD HOLDERS, OF EQUAL QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK HOLDERS.

For $2 00 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen; for $2 75 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 50 a No. 7 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen; for $6 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st quality" are pointed with the very best Iridium Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold with less than superfine points which will suit the closest scrutiny one dollar.

The "2d quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The 3d quality" is the medium shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity and Good Writing Qualities the very best common Gold Pens made and sold heretofore.

In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that, previous to the commencement of the National Machines, he could not have made as Good Writing and Durable Pens for $5 00 each, as he can Gold Pens bearing his Trademark.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the Name or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

All communications and orders by mail letters are at my risk: and must also send twenty cents (the charge for registering). In which case the price of goods ordered, I will guaranty their safe delivery.

Parties sending $5 and over will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

All letters which contain a 10 per cent. will be allowed to some of $11, of 15 per cent. on $20, and of 30 per cent. on $40. Orders for less than one dollar not attended to.

Address, A. MORTON,

No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

DEMOREST'S N. Y. ILLUSTRATED NEWS, the model newspaper of America, and universally acknowledged the largest and most and finely illustrated paper now published, combining Music, the Fashions, and General Literature, will be issued on the first day of July next, with Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions for one year as a premium, to all its subscribers, for general circulation in the country. All communications should be addressed to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

American Manufactures.

THE

Bishop Gutta Percha Company,

The only American Manufacturers of Pure Gutta Percha, Vulcanite Photograph Wire, for Submarine Cables; Office Wire; Electric Covering, and Material for Mining and Blasting Use, &c.

Respectfully inform their American friends and their customers, the Trade generally of the United States, that they are fully prepared with ample means and material to furnish all the

SUBMARINE & OTHER TELEGRAPH WIRE

Now required for the Various Cable Services.

That may be required for use in this country, and on terms that will insure satisfaction to the purchaser. Apply to SAMUEL C. BISHOP, General Agent of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company, 491 Broadway, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

SYLVESTER GRAHAM'S SCIENCE OF HUMAN LIFE.

Among the many subjects treated in the work are the following: Organization, Temperaments, Hereditary Descents, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Flies, Liver, and Fluid, and Digestive Organs, Consumption, Diseases of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Female Organs of Generation, Nervous Complaints, Sensual Weakness, Epilepsy, Salt Rheum, Cancer, Paralysis, Diseases of the Heart, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Throw Aside Spectacles, Marriage and Sexual Philosophy, the Curious Marriage Customs of the World, Philosophy of Elopements, Philosophy of Child-marking, a Chapter for the Married, and a thousand of values to married and single, never written before, making altogether a curious book for curious people, and a good book for every one; 600 pages; 100 Illustrations. To be had of all News Agents. Contents tables sent free by mail to all applicants, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 50. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 1,130 Broadway, New York.

FIELD, NAVY, and OPERA GLASSES, manufactured by E. H. HORN, Optician, 312 Broadway, corner of Walker St., of every description of Microscopes, Telescopes, Spectacles, and Eyeglasses, at wholesale and retail. Send stamp for Circular.

Attention Company!

Clark's Conguest, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustachios in a few weeks upon the smoothest face, or no money back. Any person using this Conguest, and finding it not as represented, by returning two of the empty packets, can have their money returned them at any time within six months from day of purchase. Price $1.00, sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.

Address, A. J. CLARKE,

P. O. Drawer 115,

Auburn, N. Y.

CARPET WARP.

WOOL TWINE.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HALSTED, 74 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

A CHANCE FOR POETICAL PATRIOTISM.—A Prize of One Hundred Dollars is offered by the proprietor of Demorest's Illustrated News, for a song or for a song on the graciousness of Liberty and Universal Freedom in our glorious Country. See the particulars in Demorest's N. Y. Illustrated News.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The only original fashion monthly, with elegant illustrations, New Music, Beautiful Bridal and Embroidery, Valuable Information, and Seven Full-size Patterns, now ready.

Price 15 CENTS.—The Jan., Feb., March, April, May, and June numbers of the ILLUSTRATED PERSONOLOGICAL JOURNAL will be sent by return post. To secure the PICTORIAL ANNUAL Remember, Phrenology, Psychology, Physiology, Psychology, send at once to FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

THE Summer No. of MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR of FASHIONS NOW Ready.—A Splendid Number, with beautiful novelties, music, elegant fashion plates, seven Full Size Patterns, Fine Bridal and Fashion Sheet, with valuable information, only 15 cents; or yearly subscription $1, with a premium of One Dollar's worth of EXTRA PATTERNS. (Form of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest will send a pattern of 25, 50, and 75 cts. for postage on the premiums, for which please send me your Mirror of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND KNITTING.

ALL KINDS at BARTLETT'S, 347 Broadway, N. Y.

$12 WATCHES. $12

An elegant Watch, set in very heavy Silver Case, of substantial workmanship, open face, stem wind, and set movements, pure white dial, and steel polished hands, warranted to keep correct time. Price only $12.

THOS. AMES & CO., 389 Broadway, N. Y.

New Sheet Music for the Pianoforte.

The Sword that my brave boy wore. J. G. Clark, 30. That I'll be true to you. J. G. Clark, 30. Oh! I shall be known above. J. G. Clark, 30. Do they pray to me in Heaven? Bateman Family, 30. Tony Pastor's Song in the old Camp Ground. Hutchinson Family, 30. Tony Pastor's Comic Song, as adapted to the pictures of the Cottage by the Sea," 30. Music Store Window. Medley Song and Chorus. Hutchinson Family, 30. Each post-paid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Soldiers of the Union.

We have something that will amuse and instruct you, which we will send to you, free of postage, on receipt of your address. Direct your letters to

WM. RAY & CO., P. O. Box 4737, N. Y. City.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and everywhere else, in the most lucrative business now before the public. Address (or apply to T. & H. GAUNTLOW, 126 Broadway, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS: or, SABBATH READINGS. A Series of Discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By CHARLES OSBORN, Pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in the City of New York. With Portrait. 1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

GUIDE-BOOK OF THE CENTRAL RAILROAD OF NEW JERSEY, and its Connections through the Coal Fields of Pennsylvania. With Maps and Views. 12mo, Flexible Cloth Binding, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. For Vol. VII. 8vo, 75 cents.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS. Part II., in Harper's Magazine for July, just ready.

NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS: or, Sketches of a Girl's Life. By SARA PAYSON WILLIS (FANNY FERN). Author of "Ruth Hall," &c. 1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

BARBARA'S HISTORY. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "The Ladder of Life," "The Story of Certain Lives," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SPKE'S AFRICA. JOURNAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE. By JOHN HANNING SPEKE, Captain H. M. Indian Army, Fellow of the Geographical Society, Knight of the Royal Order of Francis Joseph of Austria, &c. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Rachel Ray," "Doctor Thorne," "Dorker Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "The Three Clerks," "The Warden," "Barchester Towers," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75. Paper, $1 25.

LYMAN BEECHER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CORRESPONDENCE. Autobiography, Correspondence, &c., of Lyman Beecher, D.D. Edited by his Son, CHARLES BEECHER. With Two Steel Portraits and Engravings on Wood. In two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth. Vol. I. Price $1 75. (A New Edition just ready.)

ANNIE WALKLIGH'S FORTUNES. A Novel. By HOLME LEE, Author of "Sylvan Holt's Daughter," "Kathie Brande," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WIFE'S EVIDENCE. A Novel. By W. G. WILLS, Author of "Notice to Quit," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c.,

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $125 00 each.
100 Gold Watches ..... 70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches ..... 40 00 each.
300 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches .. 18 00 each.
1000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
1000 Gold Band Bracelets ..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " " ..... 2 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches ..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches ..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Jet, and Pearl Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops ..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops ..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sets of Bosom Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Pain Rings..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
2000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
2000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
1000 Gold Hunting Case M'ntoilet 4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 50 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all an equal chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying for and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

539 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

(From Juries 9 and 40 at the

International Exhibition,

LONDON, 1862;

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

Enameled Chamber

FURNITURE

The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, waiters and chamber, plain and ornamented, in suits, wholesale and retail. Also Mattresses and Feather Beds. WARREN WARD, 371 Canal St., N. Y.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1849)

GOLD PENS,

PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. 243. D. BARD, Ag't. No. 28 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.

$50 TO $100 PER WEEK.—AGENTS WANTED to take orders for DR. ROSENBURG'S Acknowledged Standard HISTORY OF THE SOUTHERN REBELLION, by O. J. Victor, indorsed by the President, Cabinet, Governors, Bancroft the Historian, &c. Vols. I. and II. now ready. Also, to take orders for Victor's HISTORY OF AMERICAN CONSPIRACIES, from 1760 to 1860. For the fastidious and aristocrats of the War, and for our EXCELLENT ENGRAVING OF GEN. GRANT, send for circular of terms, &c. Address EDWARD F. ROYES, No. 13 Spruce Street, New York.

The Graefenberg Company's

ULTHE CATHOLICON (Sarsaparilla).

An infallible cure for "Female Weakness," and all diseases complaints of women.

Price $1 50 per bottle. Five bottles for SIX DOLLARS.

The GRAEFENBERG VEGETABLE PILLS

The best Pill in the world for family use, and for all Bilious and Liver complaints. Price 25 cents per box.

Address all orders to

J. F. BRIDGE, M.D.,

Resident Physician GRAEFENBERG COMPANY,

No. 139 William Street, near Fulton, New York.

Sold by Druggists or DEALERS everywhere.

New Vocal Music.—"Angel Mary," "How softly on the brimmed heart," "Sweet Evaline," "Norah Deane," "The Blue and the Gray," "Mary Dear," "I am willing to wait," "The Beautiful Angel Bird," "I can't forget," "Evelynne," "My Jamie is a Soldier Brave," "The Dying Soldier Boy," Wallace. "When Dear Friends are parted," "Give this to Mother," "The pure, the bright, the beautiful," "Golden Dreams and Fairy Castles," "If you've only got a Mustache," "There's no such Girl as mine," "Ritter Times are coming," Foster. "How goes the Money?" "Oh! My Little Angel," Eastburn. "Our Comrade's Grave," "The Dying Volunteer," Dayton. "Land of the Brave and Free," Florence. "Blind Girl's Lament," Dutton. "Braid and Chess and Kiss-es," Dodo. "Flirtation," Winner. "Virgie Lindy," "Darling Dot-ett," "Meet me Dearest Gentle Annie Dott," "Glowing Star of Gentle Evening Dusk," Gumbert. Tim Green, or "I've a Guinea to Spend," Chamberlain. Price 30 cents each. "Jessie's by Dazling" and "Tambourine," Father Rent. 40 cents each. "Song of the 35th Regt.," with Vignette, 75 cents. Piano Duetts, 50 cents each. Mailed free. Publisher, HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

Violin Strings for Hot Weather, 25c., mailed. Musicians' Omnibus, 100 tunes for flute, violin, fife, cornet, or clarionet, $1. Omnibus Complete. A musical library of 1500 tunes—violin, flute, or cornet, $3, mailed. FREDERICK ARTHUR, 298 Bowery, N. Y.

To Patentees.

Patents! !—Valuable English and American Patents, for sale, manufactured, or on royalty. Terms moderate. Consignments respectfully solicited. Address Sayder & Walter, 239 Broadway, N. Y. Reference, Hon. H. R. Jones, Esq., Chemical Bank; J. W. Kirby, Esq., Metropolitan Bank, N. Y.

NEW and Valuable Discovery, what everybody needs. Agents wanted everywhere. Superior wages guaranteed. Address stamp for particulars sent to any one on receipt of 10 cts. C. J. MARTIN & CO., Box 3074, Philadelphia, Pa.

American Gold Pen Co.

Manufactures of GOLD PENS AND PENCIL CASES of every description. Sole Manufacturers of the CELEBRATED Angular Nib Gold Pen.

AGENTS WANTED throughout the country. EXTRA inducements offered. Large discounts made to the trade. Send for our descriptive CIRCULAR. AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO., No. 209 Broadway, N. Y.

U. S. Artificial Leg Depot, 625 Broadway, N. Y., Endorsed by U. S. Claimants, U. S. Surgeons, and all who have used Leg. Soldiers gratis, or its value applied on the Amputation Ball and Socket Jointed Leg, which has lateral motion at the ankle like the natural one.

DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Surgeon, Examiner.

For instructions address DR. BLY, at nearest Depot.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month for a new patent Rubber Comb. Sample sent Free. Oriental Bazaria, and 12 other articles. 19 circulars free. Address JOHN C. HOLLAND, Chicago, Illinois.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force hair to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face; will cause whisker or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of money. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Asthma Cured.

Relief guaranteed in Ten Minutes, and a permanent cure effected by the use of "URTICA ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from six to twenty years' standing cured by this remedy in a few days. Price $2. Sent post-paid to address, by S. C. URTIAN, 25 South Eighth St., Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Corporal, Sergeant, Drummer, Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games with them. Sent, postage paid, on receipt of 50c. Add The usual discounts to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY, 14 Chambers St., N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

Turnip Seeds.

We desire to remind

Dealers in Seeds

Of the near approach of the season for sowing Turnip and Ruta Baga. We shall be able to offer a large supply of all the approved varieties, and beg to be observed,

1ST EVERY GRAIN THE PRODUCE OF 1863

Bloomsdale.

We have not, and shall not have an ounce of Imported Seed.

Our Turnip Seed Circular, with particulars of interest to Dealers in

SEEDS,

will be mailed to all who apply.

DAVID LANDRETH & SON,

Nos. 21 and 23 South Sixth Street,

PHILADELPHIA.

"The Sweetest Music ever Written."

Howe's Scenes of Scotland, containing about 175 of the Songs of Caledonia's Songs and Ballads, including those of the Affections, Sentimental, Patriotic, Historical, Military, Political, Comic, and Miscellaneous Songs. Arranged for the Piano or Melodeon. Large size fine paper well bound. Price $3. Sent by mail.

ELIAS HOWE, 193 Court Street, Boston.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Rullers charged low rates.

The Arm Telegraph.

Best method of answering at great distances. Pamphlet, 10 Cents. Sold by T. G. KONVALDEN, Astoria, L. I., near New York.

A Universal Medicine.

By what we eat, by the air we breathe, or by the water we drink, we can be made sick; or by fatigue, or from debility induced by heat, because these effects end by producing impurity of blood. To regain health we must purify the blood by the organs of the stomach and bowels; these organs must be cleansed in the regular performance of that duty which nature has assigned them, and should there be any impediment, to what does experience point?

TO BRANDRETH'S PILLS, which can not be surpassed, and which surely restore the bowels to the regular performance of their duties.

The dyspeptic, the bilious will find them a treasure of health, and those who may be sick will find in no other way—take Brandreth's Pills and be cured.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. Brandreth in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

50,00 Agents Wanted.

Great Sale of Jewelry, Watches, Chains, Lockets, Gold Pens and Cases, Rings, &c.,

Valued at $800,000. Also Head-Quarters for ARMY BADGES.

H. B. WARD & CO., MANUFACTURING JEWELERS, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Send for wholesale illustrated circular.

FACTS.

It is well known that an important percentage of the life that flesh is heir to, arise from poisons taken into the stomach with the food and unessential refreshments. Burnett's Fruit Extracts are free from poisonous oils and acids, and are perfectly healthy.

SOMETHING NEW

IN PLAYING CARDS.

LOVE SCENES.

Designed from French Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Excites 50 cents and two red stamps, and send for sample pack. $5 per dozen. Liberal discount by gross to dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 60 Nassau St., New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $3500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Eagle Gas Stove Works.

Sumner Cooking Stove.

GAS the CHEAPEST FUEL.

BOIL, BROIL, ROAST, BAKE, TOAST, and do IRONING.

SEND FOR DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE.

I also manufacture

COAL OIL STOVES

for COOKING and HEATING.

Sole Manufacturer of the EAGLE GAS STOVES,

474 Broadway, N. Y.

Ladies' Letter of Advice.

FIVE ANATOMICAL PLATES.

Has information never before published.

Sent free in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.

Address BOX NO. 4,000, NEW YORK POST-OFFICE.

"GET THE BEST."—A Colored Likeness of "UNconditional Surrender" GRANT, Price 25 Cents. Published by New York Agency, 17 & 19 Nassau St., N. Y.

The Printer's Devil. This handsome illustrated literary and miscellaneous Family Paper will be sent on trial, to any part of the United States, during the biennial prize of 25 cents. Address

"PRINTER'S DEVIL," 113 Fulton St., N. Y.

3,500 UNION ENVELOPES.

Embracing all the varieties which time and money could procure, arranged in four volumes, bound in half calf, are offered for sale.

Address Box 204. Post-Office.

TROY, N. Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY,

DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York,

Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free.

For particulars address, or send for Circular.

PATENT SPRING HORSES, CANTERING HORSES, REVOLVING ROCKING-CHAIRS, PATENT SPRINGS AND TOYS, in LAWLIS STABLES, 559 Broadway, directly opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

DEAR READER, if you are a reader, do not fail to read the story about the KERADYNE that in the "Feminine" No. 2. You can read it over three, four or six times, and nearly roll your sides, and laugh and cry, and cry and laugh each time, especially if you have some one to laugh with you—it is worth more than the most costly dinner. Sold everywhere at 10 cents.

Halleck's Napoleon.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

By Baron Jomini.

General-in-Chief and Aid-de-Camp to the Emperor of Russia.

Translated from the French, with Notes,

By H. W. Halleck, LL.D.,

Major-General United States Army, author of "Elements of Military Art and Science," "International Law and the Laws of War," &c.

IN FOUR VOLUMES, OCTAVO,

with an

Atlas of Sixty Maps.

Price, in cloth and sheep binding, $28. This day published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Copies sent by mail on receipt of price.

The Rev. Charles E. King

Will send Free of Cost and the Prescription with which he successfully treated, while in charge of the Venezuelan Mission Hospital, upward of one hundred cases of CONSUMPTION in the first, second, and third stages.

The remedy is equally adapted to the treatment of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and all affections of the Lungs Throat, and Air-Passages; while it speedily invigorates the enfeebled Nervous System, and energizes the debilitated functions of the Stomach, Liver, and Bowels. Address, with stamp,

Rev. CHARLES E. KING,

Station D, Bible House, N. Y.

Patients should bear in mind that in all disorders, but especially in consumption, THE MILDER SEASONS ARE THE MORE FAVORABLE TO CURE.

THE ART of imitating Foreign Brandy and flaunt of Gine from pure Spirits. You can manufacture Liquor at a trifling cost. Full directions sent free. All Dealers, Hotels, and Druggists should have these reliable receipts. Sent on receipt of $1. Address James E. Mason, Practical Chemist, Pt'keepsie, N. Y.

The Greatest Thing of the Times.

Send for a Circular. J. E. BOURQUIN & CO.'s Travelling Catalogues, which contains the most extensive list of Jewelry, in lower prices, that has ever yet been offered to the American public.

N. B. Catalogues sent free on application. Great inducements to Agents. E. J. BOURQUIN & CO., Dealers in Jewelry, 191 & 193 Fulton St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE FUNNIEST GETTING FAT WITH SUCCESS. —10,000 sold in one day. Everybody and his wife, including his wife's relations, are digesting our fun with a gusto that makes the pockets of the publisher laugh and grow fat, thrive, flourish, and yet there is room. Second edition now ready.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine the new Combination Sleeve Holder. Sent by mail for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 179 Chatham Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For July, 1864, Now Ready.

CONTENTS:

THE DRUMMER-BOY'S BURIAL.
ILLUSTRATION.—The Burial.
SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.—V. LAKE CHAMPLAIN.—CAPTURE OF ENGLISH GUN-BOATS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Scene of the Battle on Lake Champlain.—Arrival of Reinforcements.—Alexander Macomb.—Moore's House, Champlain.—Sampson's Stone Mill at Champlain.—Stone Church, Beekmantown.—Platt's Residence.—Up the Saranac, from Fort Brown.—United States Hotel, Plattsburg, in 1814.—Arrest of the Spies, Plattsburg.—Macomb's Monument.—Fort Pickering, near Stockade Island.—Interior Flag.—Cobb's House.—Half-Moon Battery, Castles.—Blake's Residence.—Crosby's Wharf, Dunham.—Residence of Judge Bailey, Castles.
COAL AND COAL-MINING.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Miner at Work: Old Manner of Working.—New Manner of Working: Coal-Cutting Machine.
LAURA AND HER HERO.
SOUNDINGS.
With Twenty Eight Illustrations.
HOW IT HAPPENED.
BOOMED TO MUSIC.
THREE YEARS.
THREE DAYS IN MONTGOMERY.
ONE OF THE NOBLE.
MY BOY.
THE UNKIND WORD. By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."
ILLUSTRATION.—The Cottage in the Highlands.
DENIS DUVAL. By WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

CHAPTER VII. I Escape from a Great Danger.
CHAPTER VIII. The Last of Calais.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—At Rodger's—Last Moments of the Lord de Ternant.—Directions for the Defense.
THE FORTUNES OF WAR.
BY HOOKS AND CROOKS.
OLD LAMPS FOR NEW.
THE HOUSE LONGINGS.
OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS.
CHAPTER V. Bella's Bower.
CHAPTER VI. Cut Adrift.
CHAPTER VII. Mr. Wegg looks after himself.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Bird of Prey.—Witnessing the Agreement.
THE CONTRAST.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Ruinous Prices.—A Juvenile Colossus.—Specimen of Humor.
FOUR EXPERIENCES IN WALTZING.
With Four Illustrations for the Eye and Ear.
FASHIONS FOR JULY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Morning Toilet.—Home Dress for the Country.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 50
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten.
Any Back Number can be had at 10 Cents each.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, one year, $5. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2.75 each or 11 Copies for $27 50. Payment invariably in advance.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar per line inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

ABOUT THE SIZE OF IT.

GENERAL GRANT. "Well, and what if it should come to a Kilkenny fight? I guess Our Cat has got the longest tail!"

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

FOLLAE & SON,

MEERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS,

676 Broadway, New 46 st., N. Y.

Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $5 for sample pipe.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE ONLY OFFICIALLY ENDORSED PORTRAIT OF

Lieut.-Gen. Grant.

It is the only perfect likeness, and is pronounced by numbers of his Staff, "the General to a T."

Beautifully engraved on steel. Price $2.

Sent, post-paid, in protected wrapper, on receipt of price. Address C. B. RICHARDSON, Publisher, No. 596 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents wanted in every town.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,

Manufacturers of

GOLD MEDAL

Grand and Square Pianos,

Baltimore, Md.

Certificates of excellence from Thalberg, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.

Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion, N. Y.

Card Photographs.

A splendid assortment. Catalogues sent free. Address B. W. HITCHCOCK, Manufacturer, 34 Chambers St., N. Y.

VERMILYE & CO.,

No. 44 Wall Street, New York,

Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,

converted for one year, Bonds of 1881.

The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

U. S. Army Agency,

61 Bleecker Street, N. Y., opposite Pay Department.

All persons having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.

Bounty of $100 60, in the following cases are now being paid.

SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.

VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharges can be sent by mail.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

DRY AND GROUND IN OIL

Is several shade shades.

For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.

ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

Books for the Season.

Beadle's Dime Guide to Swimming.
Beadle's Dime Base Ball Player for 1864.
Beadle's Dime Book of Cricket.
Beadle's Dime Drill Book.

Men of the Time.

No. 3. Lives of GOVS. HOOKER, &c.
No. 12. Life of Maj.-Gen. John C. Fremont.

Beadle's Dime Song Book. No. 14.

FATHERLAND, CONTINENTAL.

Contains a very interesting and popular list of Songs. All the new and good things are in it, selected from the copyrights of the principal music publishers, by exclusive contract.

All Hail to Ulysses.

Corporal Schnapps. When will my darling Boy return.
Kissing on the Sly. The Corporal's Musket.
I never had a Mean. Brother, tell me of the Battle.
Just after the Battle. The old home by the hill.
Maggie Moore. Do day on Liberty's cousin'.
People will Talk. I can not find time go, my boy.
Whoever can be he? Farmer Stubbs' visit to N. Y. City.
Tote on the Way.
Will you wed me now I'm home?

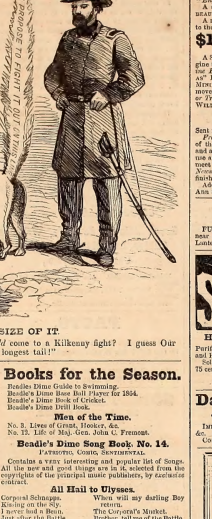
And Forty more of the most popular Songs of the day.

Ten cents each. For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Liberal reduction to Agents.

BEADLE & CO., Publishers,

118 William Street, New York.

Agents wanted, to sell a new book just published, PEN PICTURES OF THE WAR. Send for a circular to LEDYARD BILL, 19 Spruce Street, N. Y.



HUBBEL & CO'S

CELEBRATED

Golden Bitters

A SUPERIOR TONIC,

And Unequaled Remedy for

DYSPEPSIA,

Heartburn & General Debility

As a stimulant they are not to be excelled. Bold in their action upon the system, but certain in their operation. Everybody praises them. Druggists recommend to bitters gentlemen they hold. For counteracting Malaria and as a Preventive against Fever and Ague they are unrivaled.

GEO. C. HUBBEL & CO.,

Manufacturers and Proprietors,

ILION, N. Y.

Copyrighted Secured.

Shults' Ongucut, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or no pay. Pamphlet. Sent postpaid, for 60 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, guaranteed time, cut hands, "English Movements," and correct time-keeper.

A single one sent free by mail in neat case, WITH A BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $8

A NEW SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$15 European Timekeeper. $15

OR, COMPASS WATCH.

A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Genuine English Jeweled or Nickel Movements," "M. J. Tobias" Independent Action, Self Balance, and has a NEAT MINIATURE COMPASS sunk in the cap and attached to the movements, making it a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time-keeper, "unwavered one year." WILL STAND ANY, and is an

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch,

Used by the British Army Officers.

Sent free by mail, in elegant MOROCCO CASE, for only $15.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British Army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct timekeeper; and for beauty and fine finish they are equal in appearance to $100 watches."

Address, CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Importers, 38 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

EXCELSIOR FIREWORKS.

FUNSTON & SUFFIELD, removed to No. 9 Dey St., near Broadway. Public and private exhibitions, Flags, Lanterns, &c. Goods guaranteed best and cheapest.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums.

Purifies and Sweetens the Breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.

Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,

215 Greenwich St., New York.

Davis Collamore & Co.

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety.

COLORED STONE CHINA DINING SETS.

AMERICAN STEEL COLLARS

PATENTED

APRIL 19TH 1864

Enameled "snow white," linen finished. Beware of "spurious imitations." None reliable unless pointed. Mailed on receipt of $1. HANBERT, 79 Nassau St., N. Y. Discount to the Trade.

What is more to be desired than

A PLEASANT HOME?

Whoever would know the secrets of making home pleasant, should read

HOUSE AND HOME PAPERS,

by HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." These papers are published in each number of the

Atlantic Monthly

and have attracted attention everywhere. They are full of interest and benefit to every household. They will be continued through the year. Subscribe to the ATLANTIC at once, and secure the reading of these invaluable papers The ATLANTIC is furnished at THREE DOLLARS a year, postage paid, or 25 cents a number. Clubs supplied at reduced rates. Send 25 cents for a specimen to TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

Gold Watch Free

AND

$15 Per Day, $15

Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large Size Stationery and Prize Package. $25 can be made in a few hours by smart agents. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains four quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Blotters, Inkstands, Ladies' Parts Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, Gents' Pocket Calendars for the Year, Union Designs, Yankee Notions of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Bits and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., etc., the whole worth MANY DOLLARS If bought separately. Price each Package ONLY 25 cents each. Wholesale rates to Agents very low. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid SOLID GOLD or SILVER HUNTING CASE LEVER WATCH (warranted) presented rare to each Agent. Parties wanted to establish Agencies in every town and village. Accounts given free. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. HILL & CO., 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the world.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD CO.

OFFER FOR SALE

1,000,000 Acres of Superior Farming Lands,

IN FARMS OF

40, 80 & 160 Acres & Upwards at from $8 to $12 per acre.

THESE LANDS ARE

NOT SURPASSED BY ANY IN THE WORLD,

THEY LIE ALONG THE WHOLE LINE OF THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD.

FOR SALE ON

Long Credit, Short Credit or for Cash.

THEY ARE SITUATED NEAR

TOWNS, VILLAGES SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES.

FOR ALL PURPOSES OF AGRICULTURE,

The lands offered for sale by the Illinois Central Railroad Company are equal to any in the world. A healthy climate, a fertile soil, and a market for all the farmer can raise, are the chief elements necessary to success in the business of the farmer; growing wealth upon the means of independence.

ILLINOIS

Extending 385 miles from North to South, has all the diversity of climate to be found between Massachusetts and Virginia, and varieties of soil adapted to the products of the former, and the wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco fields of the latter; and in the entire portion of the State in the richest known, and produces the finest corn, wheat, sorghum and hay, which latter article during the past year, has been highly remunerative. The rearing of stock by the nutritious grasses, which flourish with tropical luxuriance. The Illinois Central Railroad, in its progress from the northern to the more southern portion of the State, produces the best of winter wheat, tobacco, flax, hemp and fruit. The lands will further benefit are liberally fostered, and have the rotting effect, tobacco, cotton and the manufacture of sugar from the sorghum cane. The State of Illinois is hereby surpassed by any State in the Union.

IS MADE EASY.

PRICES AND TERMS OF PAYMENT.

The price of land varies from $7 to $12 and upward per acre, and they are offered on long credit, on short credit, or for cash. A deduction of 6 per cent. from the above prices will be made where a payment of one fourth of the purchase money is made down, and the balance in one, two, three and four years. A deduction of 10 per cent. will be made where purchases are for cash. Profit derived from greater fertility can be thus saved.

Forty acres at $10 per acre on long credit, interest at six per cent. payable annually in advance; the principal in four, five, six, and seven years.

Cash payment		Interest.	Principal.
Payment in one year		$24.00
"	two years	24.00
"	three "	24.00
"	four "	15.60	$160.00
"	five "	9.60	160.00
"	six "	3.00	160.00
"	seven "		160.00

Full information on all points, together with maps, showing the exact location of the lands, will be furnished on application in person or by letter to

Or the same term, on short credit:

	Interest.	Principal
Cash payment	$19.20	$20.00
Payment in one year	12.80	80.00
" two years	6.40	80.00
" three "		80.00

The same farm may be purchased for $320 in cash.

EXAMPLE.

Illinois Central R. R. Co., Chicago, Ill.

LAND COMMISSIONER,

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VIII.—No. 392.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS / $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GEN. ROBERT EDMUND LEE.

GENERAL ROBERT E. LEE, Commander-in-Chief of the Rebel Armies, whose portrait we give on this page, is unquestionably a consummate master of the art of war. That superiority, indeed, was acquired at the expense and under the patronage of the Government he is now endeavoring to destroy; but this does not alter the fact. His career, prior to his desertion of the flag of the country, may be briefly stated. Born in 1808, he was regularly educated at West Point. In the Mexican campaign he served with the Engineer Corps, and was twice promoted for gallantry. At Chapultepec he was severely wounded. In 1852, while holding the rank of Major, he was appointed Superintendent of the Military Academy; but three years afterward he was sent to Europe with M'CLELLAN, then a Captain, to study the proceedings of the French and English armies in the siege of Sebastopol. About that time he was advanced to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second Regiment of Cavalry, and this was his position when he traitorously forsook his country and entered the rebel service.

General Lee, now in his fifty-sixth year, is six feet in height, erect, well-formed, and of imposing appearance; has clear black eyes, dark-gray hair, and a heavy gray beard. He is plain in dress, wearing a black felt hat with a narrow strip of gold around it, and a plain Brigadier's coat with three stars on the collar. He is said to be popular with his army, but the conviction is growing that in General GRANT he has met his match; and the confidence now entertained in him is not, probably, as great as formerly. In the present campaign he has displayed great tenacity and skill in the management of his army; but in all the elements of strategy GRANT has proved more than his equal.

The photograph from which our engraving is made is one taken by Messrs. MINGUS & COWELL, of Richmond, which bears the stamp of its legal registration in 1863, "in the District Court of the Confederate States for the Eastern District of Virginia."

GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

We continue our illustrations of General SHERMAN'S campaign in Georgia, which is only second in importance to that of General GRANT in Virginia.—On pages 424 and 425 we present a stirring picture of the REBEL ASSAULT ON GENERAL LOGAN'S POSITION in the battle at Dallas, May 28. The first attack of the enemy was made upon General HARROW'S Division, and a portion of the incomplete earth-works on the extreme front were carried by the assailants and a part of a battery captured. This success, however, was but momentary: WALCUTT'S Brigade immediately charged, driving back the enemy and recapturing the battery. The assault then became general. General LOGAN, seeing the importance of the crisis, dashed along the lines with words of cheer and encouragement, and in a few minutes his troops were swarming over the works and rushing resistless down upon the now retiring foe. The rebel assault was made by CHEATHAM'S, BATE'S, and WALKER'S divisions of HARDEE'S Corps. The men said they were told the assault was to be made upon a negro brigade and a few hundred-days' men. Their loss in the assault was 3000 men. Our picture shows General MORGAN L. SMITH'S Division on the extreme left, General OSTERHAUS'S Division next on the right, and General HARROW'S on the extreme right.

On page 421 we give a sketch, showing GENERAL HOOKER'S ESCORT CHARGING THROUGH THE WOODS, and opening the battle near Dallas, May 25. In approaching Dallas this corps marched in three columns, General HOOKER being with the centre column, under the command of General GEARY. Just as the head of the column reached Pumpkin Vine Creek a few shots were fired by a small force of rebels. The escort under Captain DUNCAN dashed across the bridge, which had been fired but not consumed, and a sharp skirmish ensued, the rebel force (of cavalry) being driven back until the ammunition of the body-guard was exhausted. Then a charge was made, led by Captain DUNCAN of the escort and Colonel FESSENDEN of General HOOKER'S staff. Just at this time the head of General GEARY'S column came up and was soon heavily engaged. Thus opened the battle of Dallas. Before night of the same day the commands of Generals WILLIAMS, BUTTERFIELD, HOWARD, and PALMER were all in position.

Another sketch, illustrative of the same battle, is given on page 428. It shows General WILLIAMS'S Division of HOOKER'S Corps driving the rebels through the woods. Colonel ROBINSON'S Brigade is on the left, General REGER'S in the centre, and General KNIPE'S on the right. On page 420 we give five sketches, showing the scene of several important events in SHERMAN'S campaign. One sketch shows the Eighth Missouri Regiment of LOGAN'S Corps reaching the railroad bridge at Resaca on the 16th of May. The enemy having evacuated Resaca on the night of the 15th, our advance was made at dawn by General LOGAN'S Corps, and Resaca very shortly entered by the Eighth Missouri, the men dashing through the town toward the bridges. The railroad bridge was destroyed, together with the old wooden bridge just fired by the enemy. The rebels had departed so quickly that they had left a caisson on the bridge, and four guns in a small earth-work near by.—Some of the soldiers went on to the bridge and threw into the water the planks already on fire. Of the towns of which our artist gives sketches he writes as follows:

"Adairsville is a small hamlet on the Dalton and Atlanta Railroad. Woodlands, as the magicians it, is the residence of Mr. DAIMSLEY, an Englishman who has made some money in this country, and has since the commencement of the war been a purchasing agent for the "Confederate Government."—A fight skirmish took place on the afternoon of 18th directly in front of the house, in which the Colonel of the Second Pennsylvania was killed by the Brigade of Colonel WILDER. This Colonel was a very gallant man, and was only killed because he would not surrender. Kingston, like the railroad towns of the South, has few houses. Since the battle of Chicamauga it has been used as a hospital. The inhabitants having been removed further south, it is now the last station on the railroad, and is likely to be the scene of much activity."

On page 426 we give a topographical Map illustrative of General SHERMAN'S campaign since the capture of Resaca. After that event the army crossed the Oostanaula River in two columns—one column, under HOOKER and SCHOFIELD, crossing just below Resaca; and the other, under M'PHERSON, THOMAS, and BUTTERFIELD, at New Echota, a little to the left of RESACA. This latter column separated itself into two after crossing the river, THOMAS and BUTTERFIELD moving on the left, and M'PHERSON on the right flank; while in the meantime HOOKER and SCHOFIELD kept the centre, moving toward Kingston, along the line of the Chattanooga Railroad. The rebel line of defense, stretching along the line of the railroad connecting Rome and Atlanta, north of the Etowah River, not being able to resist this combination, was broken up.—Kingston and Cassville thus came into our possession, though not without some sharp fighting. As a matter of course, Rome was no longer tenable by a rebel force. After resting for a few days and obtaining fresh supplies the Etowah was crossed, and Dallas—in the rear of which JOHNSTON was intrenched—was made the objective of the new lines of approach. Altoona Pass, through which the Western and Atlantic Railroad runs to Atlanta, was taken by our cavalry; and this success, together with the victory of May 28, forced the rebels to adopt a new line of defense covering Marietta, along Lost and Kenesaw mountains. On the night of June 18 this line was partly withdrawn, but still covered the advance to Marietta.

THE REBEL GENERAL ROBERT EDMUND LEE.

THE LUMBER-MEN OF MAINE.

THERE were shouts in the crowded street,
And a martial music-strain,
And banners waved, and loud drums beat,
As the men of the city came out to greet
The lumber-men of Maine.

A thousand strong and more
From the woods and streams came they;
From where the Kennebec's fountains roar,
And the swift Penobscot twists the oar,
And Passamaquoddy Bay.

Strong knights of the axe and pole,
Kings of the raft and saw,
In brawny limb and dauntless soul
By the breath of the forest air made whole
And the use of nature's law.

They marched with a steady tread
Toward the front of death and pain,
Where the splintered stumps of the trees were red,
And the rivers waited to raft the dead
Of the lumber-men of Maine.

And a thousand more forsook
The axe and the setting-pole,
And the forest camp by the swollen brook,
And in squads the vacant places took
To keep the town ranks whole.

Dusty and hot and worn
The regiment came to-day,
With a tear-dipt all soiled and torn
And a dozen footless heroes borne
Behind on a rumbling dray.

Through the city's double tide
Slowly they marched again,
With a blank, indifferent, manly pride
That made them tell as they marched beside
The throng of common men.

But a hundred strong and three
They come from the battle-plain;
The others will never fall the tree,
Or sing and dance, when the raft floats free,
With the lumber-men of Maine.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1864.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN made a speech on the late dedication of the Battle Monument at West Point, in which he laid down the platform upon which he is to be nominated, if at all, by the Chicago Convention. It is significant as an indication of the present feeling of the shrewder but smaller part of the politicians who are hoping to return to power under the name of Democracy. We say under the name of Democracy for two reasons. In the first place, the unbreaking opponents of the natural rights of man have no philosophical claim to the name Democrat; and, in the second place, as a party name, it belongs quite as much to ANDREW JOHNSON, DANIEL S. DICKINSON, BEN. JAMES F. BUTLER, and thousands more, as to HORATIO SEYMOUR, AUGUST BELMONT, JAMES BROOKS, and their friends.

The speech of General M'CLELLAN shows that the shrewder part of the gentlemen who depend for success upon the name Democracy, understand that the people intend the war to continue until the rebellion is subdued. Unless, therefore, they are utterly outnumbered they will construct a war platform at Chicago, and place General M'CLELLAN, their only available man, upon it. But they must look for his support to all the disaffected and peace men in the loyal States. The followers of VALLANDIGHAM and FERNANDO WOOD must be induced to vote for the candidate. Now, if there be any truth in our political axiom clearer than another, it is that the majority of those who since the war began have voted for what is called a Democratic candidate are against a Union candidate, as, for instance, for MR. SEYMOUR in Connecticut and MR. VALLANDIGHAM in Ohio, would stop the war upon any terms, however humiliating, if they could. If, then, the combination of all the elements of opposition could succeed in electing the Chicago nominee upon a war platform, his policy as President must be the distinctive policy of all who vote for him. Is it unfair to say that the common ground of that opposition—on the first choice either of the left wing or the right, but the common ground—is negotiation in some form; some arrangement, some adjustment which, as they assert and assert, will be "honorable" both to the United States and the rebels?

The necessary results of the election of General M'CLELLAN, therefore, even upon his own platform, are easy to foresee. For who are the men who would come into power with him? They are the SEYMOURS, the WOODS, VALLANDIGHAM, LONG, COX, and company. They are the men upon whose success at the ballot-box the rebels declare that they count next to their own victories in the field. They are the men in whose ranks are the apologists of the rebellion, and the steady opponents of all the measures proposed for its overthrow; who declare the rebels invincible; who prophesy only woe and ruin to the country from a continued prosecution of the war; who are constantly deploring the lost prosperity of the nation, and deprecating what they call an unnatural and fratricidal strife. They are the men, in a word, among whom are those who supply the material for the malignant correspondence of the English papers, and cheer the rebel heart with the hope of a divided North.

The peace men are not the shrewdest part of the Opposition, but they are the most logical and the most numerous. They do not prefer General M'CLELLAN as a candidate, they would rather take VALLANDIGHAM, or HORATIO SEYMOUR. But they will yield to the nomination, knowing that a candidate like M'CLELLAN will increase the chances of success at the polls; and that if by that means he could be elected they and their policy would succeed to power. Would not the election of Judge WOODWARD, as Governor of Pennsylvania have done so? Would there be a terrible disaster to the Union cause? Would his policy as President be less disastrous? Yet were not those men, and FERNANDO WOOD, and VALLANDIGHAM, with all the Copperhead papers, equally, with the leading rebel papers which frankly expressed their hopes of a "DEMOCRATIC" success, ardent supporters of Judge WOODWARD?

No sincere Union man can forget these things. No observer of our history for the last three years can suppose that the national integrity or honor are safe in such hands. The Chicago Convention could not be adjourned. For the adjournment would be only a plain confession that the managers see no man in the country who seems to them to have even a remote chance of defeating the Union nominations before the people. It would be a confession of doubt and dismay which they would not dare to make. The Convention will meet, and it must choose between an open "posse" candidate and a war candidate. If it adopts the former, he will never be heard of again. If it takes the latter, no man can avoid General M'CLELLAN, for whom many of the delegates are instructed. If it nominates him, he will be supported by the Union men of every shade. The practical question, then, for every sincere Union man, will be whether he wishes to sit as a feast of which these gentlemen are the hosts?

It is vain to say that General M'CLELLAN is not a peace man. In a war so vital and tremendous as this, every man must be strongly for it or strongly against it. He must strike the enemy every where and every how. He must comprehend the dangers and consequences of the struggle, or he can not adopt a policy which will at once win the victory and secure it. His heart must be loyal as well as his hand. He can not, on the enemy which brings to the contest every force of every kind at his command will inevitably defeat him. This ground he must take, or else insist upon open the best possible terms. These are the only two logical and tenable positions in this war. But to stand between, to qualify and hesitate and palter, and then, with a reluctant sword in one hand and an olive branch in the other, a foe who is smiting with both hands, to ignore which of the two will fail to comprehend the scope of the war, is to invite at once defeat and derision. There is no conceivable case in which a general of the United States could be engaged, in which he would confront a foe so desperate and so disdainful of conciliation as this; and, consequently, there could be no war in which it would be more absurd by his imperative duty to weaken that enemy wherever he could touch him, and pursue a policy which would secure permanent peace and success.

It will be for the people of the country to decide, when General M'CLELLAN shall be nominated, whether his sentiments, opinions, and the attitude and antecedents of his supporters justify the expectation of overwhelming vigor in the field or heroic sagacity in the Cabinet.

A POLITICAL EVENT.

THE pressure of our own public affairs naturally distracts our minds from more than a cursory observation of the important political events in Europe. Among these the late speech of MR. GLADSTONE must be classed; for it is a plain declaration by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a member of the Government, that the suffrage should be so widely extended as to include a great number of the non-voters in England. But upon the principles which MR. GLADSTONE lays down, the movement can have no stop short of universal suffrage. "What I would state," he says, "is this: every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness, or political danger, is morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution."

He would avoid sudden changes, but the goal is clear. If that is to be the rallying cry of the Reform party in England it will reform the British Constitution altogether. MR. GLADSTONE thinks otherwise. He says that it will only infuse new vigor into what he calls "the young and flourishing British Constitution."

But by that Constitution British political society consists of three recognized classes, and one not recognized. The King, Lords, and Commons are the three recognized classes, and the great body of the population, the poor working class, is the one unrecognized. This last is numerically overwhelmingly the largest, and when you begin to admit one of them to the suffrage, it will be very difficult, under any plea of "political danger," to exclude another who is equally fitted. Then you have practically a government of the people, and the inevitable and proper result will be the peaceful elimination from the system of special privilege. If MR. GLADSTONE the profoundest, or merely the most good-natured, of British statesmen? Does he really foresee the tendency which MACAULAY long ago described, of a struggle between Parliament and the people, and does he skillfully suggest this as the beginning of a policy which shall avoid it; or is he only dangerously struck with the fact that one man is allowed to vote and his equally competent neighbor is forbidden?

The remarkable British London journals are evidently surprized, and even startled, by MR. GLADSTONE'S speech. What security does he offer, they ask, that the class which is numerically strongest will not obtain complete control of the Government? Clearly none, for there is none to offer. But the answer sees, what so many observers see, that the legislation of England is really conducted now with regard to the supposed wishes of the great multitude of non-voters. A year ago, in April, Lord PALMERSTON sneered, in Parliament, at the idea of asking a change in the British neutrality laws to favor the United States. Six months afterward Lord RUSSELL, at a public meeting in the Provinces, said that such a change would be asked for if the people were found ungrateful to keep England from a war with the United States. And the reason he gave was, that he believed more than half of the English people were favorable to our Government and its cause. That was reason enough for his Lordship. So at this moment the Queen, out of regard for the memory of her deceased husband, and of the fact that the future King of Prussia is her daughter's husband, refuses to take the Danish side in the present war. But the heart of the English people is with Denmark; and it remains to be seen whether, under some pretense, the Queen may not vacate the throne.

In truth, as a wise European remarks, monarchy is undermined in Europe. With the general enlightenment of the people, which increases every day, the cumbrous and foolish forms of despotism, however modified, must inevitably disappear. The divinity which doth hedge a king is gone, when men may buy his coat photograph for a penny, and see that he is merely a dull gentleman in common clothes. When the constant effort has enjoyed the moments of the supreme prerogative, it began to strip off the royal robes; and when it is conceded that his Majesty will not be a sovereign, what becomes of him when all the drapery is removed?

So great was the excitement and even alarm produced by his speech, that MR. GLADSTONE has published it as a pamphlet with a preface. Opinions are divided as to the significance of the preface. But as the author says that he published his speech as he had delivered, and published it to "the discerning consideration of the reader," its meaning remains to us unchanged.

MR. GLADSTONE'S position may therefore be properly called a political event. He has hardly the personal qualities that make a popular idol. He is fastidious, reserved, and a scholar. Those are certainly not disadvantageous qualities for any leader. But there must be added to them a personal magnetism, a profound conviction of the heart, and a fervor which the tone of his preface shows that he does not possess. The leader of the future of England must be made of sterner stuff than MR. GLADSTONE.

ROBERT EDMUND LEE.

"IF General Lee is defeated," recently said a relative of his, "he will seek death upon the field." That is only natural. Few men in history have made a truer and unhappy a mess. Educated by his country, and sworn to defend her flag, he lingered and lingered until he could make his treachery effective, and then drew his sword against his country's life and his own honor.

It is no excuse to say that he considered Virginia his sovereign State, and that his State bid, in his opinion, the right, under the Constitution, to secede. The plain question for him was: "Can I honorably desert the flag I have sworn to defend, merely because it may lawfully become the flag of freedom and justice?" For even if it were not clear that there may be an honest difference of opinion as to the constitutional right of secession, can there be any doubt whatever of the honor of asserting that right by civil war when no oppression is alleged?

It is the fashion among English writers to call LEE a great General. He is credited with all the results wrought in the Virginia campaigns by the skill and rapidity of STONEWALL JACKSON. But since the death of that General no success, except the repulse at Fredericksburg, has attended LEE'S army. During the present campaign he has been steadily outgeneraled by GRANT, whom LEE has not ventured to meet in the open field since the Friday in the Wilderness. We do not complain of this. He knows where he is safest, and he does right to stay there. But when the question is raised of the comparative military genius of GRANT and LEE it is only necessary to compare the invasion of Pennsylvania last year with the present campaign in Virginia.

LEE is naturally praised in England, for he is the enemy of his own country, which England hates. His success in repelling GRANT would be hailed by monarchical and aristocratic Europe as a victory over republican principles and the power of the United States. He is useful to England, as BENEDICT ARNOLD was. The newspapers praise him, but every noble man in that country must regard him as they would regard an officer of their own army who should head a revolt because the Government was growing more humane. The success of LEE will be known in history solely as the military chief of a conspiracy to destroy the freest and best of governments for the purpose of protecting and perpetuating human slavery.

THE "INAUGURAL PLEDGE."

THE assertion that MR. LINCOLN made an "inaugural pledge" not to be a candidate for re-election is simply untrue; and we hope that no man whom the people of the United States think fit to intrust with the Presidency will ever make so foolish a pledge. The only allusions made to the subject in MR. LINCOLN'S inaugural are these:

"Yet, with all this scope for precedent, I now enter upon the same task, for the brief constitutional term of four years, under great and peculiar difficulty."

If this a pledge that, if the people called him, he would not enter upon another constitutional term of four years? Again he said:

"While the people retain their virtue and vigilance no Administration, by any extreme of wickedness or folly, can very seriously injure the Government in the short space of four years."

Is this a pledge of any kind? We can not see that these are all the passages in the inaugural address which refer to the subject.

NEWS.

THERE are certain worthy gentlemen who inform us that General GRANT has more enemies than he had supposed. General LEE counts for something in the list; but the true foe with whom the Lieutenant-General is contending is—the President of the United States! It is not LEE or DAVIS who plot delays and impede the progress of the army in Virginia, but it is MR. LINCOLN, who is reached that the Richmond shall not be taken. General GRANT may march and countermarch, may assault and bombard; but it is all to no purpose while the enemy's veto-fiat takes care to prevent his success. Does the gentle reader ask why the President hinders the Lieutenant-General? Because he fears, they tell us, the people, for they will not be re-elected if GRANT takes Richmond or defeats LEE.

So also in Georgia, of course. It is not JOE JOHNSTON who is "drawing SHERMAN on"—not at all, it is MR. LINCOLN. He has but one purpose, and that is to prolong the war. He wishes to entangle SHERMAN about Atlanta; so that the struggle may be protracted, and a grateful country, not yet satisfied with the results of the war, may re-elect him to the Presidency. If GRANT should happen to defeat LEE —if Richmond should fall—if SHERMAN should capture the whole army, never to be reunited—then the American people, justly indignant with an Administration which had made GRANT a Lieutenant-General, and had supported SHERMAN in his too triumphant march, would at once rebuke that Administration by refusing to re-elect it. If the war continues, the delighted people will surely approve the Administration. If it ends, they will repudiate the President in disgust! So nauseous these worthy sages; and we hope that nobody is so credulous as to suppose that, in merely echoing the rebel journals in this as in their other views of the war, they really believe what they say.

UNKNOWN HEROINES.

WHILE the soldiers fight and fall, and their names are hailed and remembered with lasting sorrow and gratitude, let us not forget that there are other heroes whose deeds will not be so widely known, who, forsaking home, and friends, and all the bright promise of life, devote themselves silently to the work of healing and charity, and who, in the midst of scenes the war has committed to our charity, and who fall unknown and unmourned, except by the few hearts which have followed them with sympathy and admiration.

Miss MARY E. SHEFFIELD, of Norwich, Connecticut, died lately, at Memphis, of disease contracted in her self-sacrificing labors as a teacher of the National Freedman's Relief Association. Her work was performed with unfaltering fidelity among the poorest and most destitute of her fellow-creatures. Her measure of human duty was not the applause of spectators, but the suffering of her brethren, and the true sorrow at her loss is in the hearts of those who have love to give and nothing more.

The war has developed a national character that was not suspected. By fire and steel and terrible contest the young men of the country have been cast into soldiers and heroes. But few know how constant and unreserved are the offers for a service that has no outward glory or even mention from the sisters of those young men all over the land. Wherever the army has opened a path they have walked in it. Angels of mercy, and peace, and sur-lightenment, they follow the advancing lines of bayonets. Their work is little heeded: their names are unrecorded; but there is a Book of Life in which those names are deathless; for those women early heard and obeyed the divine whisper, "Whose doth in unto the least of these my little ones, doeth it unto me."

PRICES AND INVESTMENTS.

FINANCIERS of the Copperhead persuasion are as unreliable as politicians of the same school. Both aim at the same goal by different roads. The one wishes to weaken the Government by crippling our armies, the other by depreciating our funds. The favorite text of the disloyal financiers just now is Prices and the Currency. "Prices," they say, "are not really high; it is the Currency which is low. For a dollar you can buy now as much as you ever could." They regard gold as the one fixed thing around which every thing else revolves. The truth is, that gold, like every thing else, fluctuates in value in accordance with the law of demand and supply.

Prices are high. Every man who has any thing to buy or sell, no matter whether it be food or clothing, gold or labor, knows this and acts accordingly. That these high prices are caused in part by the increase in the amount of the currency is true. But this is only one cause out of many. No matter what the medium of making exchanges, prices in times of war must always be high. And that for the simple reason that the demand for every product of the soil is increased, while the supply is diminished. War draws the farmer from the plow and the mechanic from his bench. It also changes the direction of labor. The shipwright, who formerly built clippers for commerce, now builds Monitors and Ironsides for war. War is also, of necessity, wasteful. An army of a million men must of necessity consume more than twice as much as a million would at home. War prices are therefore high prices, by a law just as inevitable as that of the attraction of gravitation.

War prices always have been and always must be high prices. If every dollar of paper currency were destroyed to-morrow, and only specie used in payments, prices would be high. A redundant currency increases this evil, but does not create it. The production of the currency of the country has now reached its highest point.

To the general advance in prices there is but one marked exception, and that is the bonds of the Government. They are cheap now, for the simple reason that the exigencies of the war have made them abundant. Thus the war credit of the nation must be dear, because the supply will be cut off. The man who invests his capital in them does not make a good investment, because they pay a fair Interest and are more secure than any thing else can be. But he also has a hundred-fold chance in Government bonds has really a mortgage to that amount upon every acre of land, every mile of railway, every ship, house, wagon, every article of industry, real or personal, in the land. He has, moreover, the right to collect the interest. Government does that for him.

It is a great error to suppose that great capitalists alone have an interest in saving Government stock. Every man who has any surplus, however small, should own it. If he owns none he is a debtor to those who do, and his property in every shape is mortgaged for that debt. If he owns this stock he is so far a creditor, and holds a mortgage upon every other man's property. In the long run these mortgages will cancel each other; and our national debt, so far as it is held by ourselves, will be paid off from the accumulations of past and future years. But the man to whom the nation owes nothing will have to pay his share of the interest and receive nothing; while the man who is a creditor of the nation receives interest as well as pays it.

Government bonds at present prices, or at prices which are at all likely to prevail during the war, are in every way the best investment obtainable. Every man who wishes to avoid the evils inseparable from high prices should invest a portion of his surplus earnings or capital in Government bonds.

HALL'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

MR. C. F. HALL has just set out upon a second exploring expedition to the Arctic regions. Only two or three days before his departure he finished the revisal of the proof-sheets of the narrative of his first expedition. The work will be published shortly by HARPER & BROTHERS, in one large volume, profusely illustrated. The immediate object of this expedition was to gain information of the fate of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN and his companions. Mr. HALL sailed from New London, Connecticut, on board a whaling vessel, in May, 1860. He went absolutely alone, provided with the barest outfit with which any man ever undertook such an enterprise. He was almost about twenty-eight months, during two entire winters, in the Arctic regions. During a great part of this time he lived with the Esquimaux, adopting their habits and modes of life; he acquired a ready mastery over their language, and established the most friendly relations with them. On his return he was accompanied by ESTERHIO and his wife TOOKOOLITO, two remarkably intelligent natives, who go with him in this second mission. Although the special object of the first expedition was not attained, Mr. HALL practically demonstrated by his own experience that white men, by adopting native modes of life, can exist in the Arctic regions with no more danger to life and health than at home. He has also also that the Esquimaux have accurate traditions of the events which have occurred among them for many generations. Many of FRANKLIN'S men were in the prime of life, and he assumes that there is a fair probability that some of them may be still alive, even after the lapse of fifteen years; or, at all events, that by search properly directed, authentic information may be gained of their fate; and as they would be likely to have left written accounts of their proceedings, that these may be recovered. He undertakes the present expedition under the auspices of merchants and men of science, by whom he has been provided with every thing necessary for its prosecution. He will proceed at once to the region where FRANKLIN disappeared. He expects to be absent three years. Whether or not he succeeds in accomplishing the immediate object of his expedition, he can not fail of making important additions to our knowledge of the Arctic regions. Even in a purely practical point of view the enterprise is an important one; for there can be no doubt that the whales, seals, and walruses which abound in the region will furnish products of no inconsiderable value. In every aspect, philanthropic, scientific, and commercial, Mr. HALL'S enterprise is deserving of the sympathy and liberal encouragement which it has received.

A NURSE'S STORY.

IT was at Memphis that I saw one of the most affecting scenes in my whole experience as nurse. Some men came up one day to the hospital and told me that a boat had just come from Vicksburg, loaded with wounded, in a very suffering condition. I had no one of my own at work with me at the time, save a young girl, a daughter of one of the wealthiest and once most prominent men of the vicinity—as accustomed by her position to luxury.

This girl—Olive Lancaster—of course I can not give her real name—had, from the beginning of the war, befriended Union soldiers, greatly to the disgust of her family, who at once disowned her, not only, however, continuing to love her, but even to admire her.

She had been educated in a Northern school, and she told me sometimes of a young Northern cousin, upon whom she had lavished the wonderful love with its I fancied—for her cheek took a richer carmine when she talked of him, and her eyelids drooped, as if to veil the light of her eyes—that I could see from him more than any other Northern association she had to remember. Several times I received letters from her father's house, and made her a tender and efficient nurse of our loyal defenders. I also knew her forcibly-fed mother, for I met her face among the wounded who came to us.

She was very beautiful this Olive Lancaster. The circumstance under which I knew her was enough in themselves to make her lovely in my eyes, but she was naturally beautiful indeed. It was RAILROAD DEPOT AT RESACA, GEORGIA.

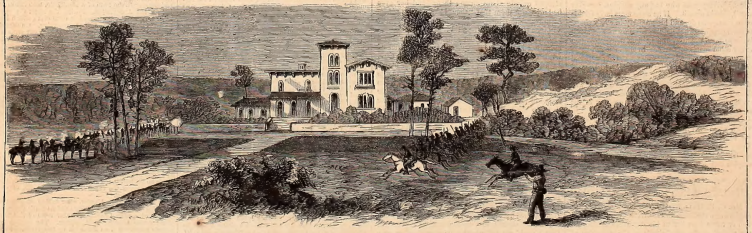
ADAIRSVILLE, GEORGIA.

KINGSTON, GEORGIA.

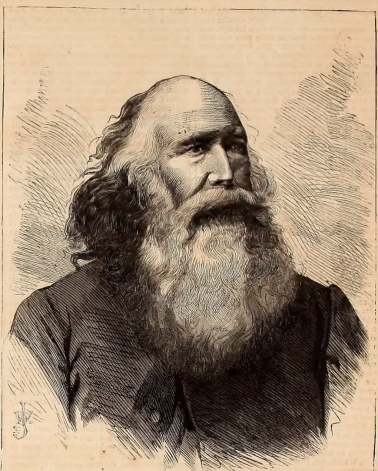


WOODLANDS, GEORGIA.

BURNING THE RAILROAD BRIDGE AT RESACA.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.—FROM SKETCHES BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

"FIGHTING JOHNNY LOGAN."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. S. MORSE, HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA.]



THE LATE REV. GORDON WINSLOW.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN.

GENERAL LOGAN, whose portrait we give on this page, was originally known to the public as a member of Congress from Illinois, and in that capacity was intimately associated with the DOUGLAS school of politicians. When secession was first threatened, LOGAN said that "the men of the Northwest in that case would with their swords cleave their way down the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf of Mexico." It happened to be Mr. LOGAN's privilege not only to witness but to participate in the execution of this threat. He resigned his seat in Congress at the outbreak of the war, and having raised the Thirty-first Illinois Regiment, became its Colonel. He behaved with great gallantry at Donelson, where he was quite severely wounded in the thigh, but yet retained his post on the field; on the surgeon's urging him to leave the field, he simply ordered that his wound be attended to secretly, and then addressed himself again to duty, arguing that he had fired twenty-two rounds since his hurt, and that he could fire at least as many more now that the wound had been dressed. The next month he was made a Brigadier-General; and in the autumn, when the Army of the Tennessee was reorganized, he was appointed to the command of a division with a Major-General's commission. Afterward, in all of GRANT's campaigns in the West, he was one of the ablest of the General's division commanders. General LOGAN, in the late advance of M'PHERSON's command on the Dallas, and particularly in the repulse of the enemy on the afternoon of the 28th of May, has given fresh proofs of the heroism which has distinguished him in all previous campaigns.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—GENERAL HOOKER'S ESCORT CHARGING THROUGH THE WOODS.—FROM A SKETCH BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

REV. GORDON WINSLOW.

REV. GORDON WINSLOW, D.D., whose portrait we give on page 421, and who fell overboard from a Sanitary Commission steamer on the Potomac, on the 7th of June, and was drowned, was born in Vermont in 1808, prepared for Yale College at Andover, Massachusetts, and graduated at that institution. Soon after his attention was drawn to the Episcopal Church, and he became rector of a church in Troy, New York, and subsequently in Annapolis. Afterward he was for many years rector of St. Paul's, Staten Island, and Chaplain of the Quarantine. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed Chaplain of the Fifth New York (WARREN'S) Zouaves, and accompanied that regiment in all its trying scenes until Bull-Run battles. He was then promoted for his bravery, and his services gained for him high credit and honor among the troops. He was then sent on the Sanitary Commission, and when his regiment returned last year he was appointed Inspector of the Army of the Potomac. His efficiency and valuable services will not soon be forgotten.

Dr. WINSLOW possessed a fine social nature, full of good heart and noble soul. His traits of character were remarkably well blended. All his motives and plans were of a high and noble order. At the time of his death he was accompanying his son, Colonel WINSLOW, of the Fifth New York Zouaves, who had been severely wounded.

The photograph from which our portrait is made was taken by GARDNER, corner of Seventh and F streets, Washington, District of Columbia, to whom we were recently indebted for the fine picture of MR. LINCOLN and his Secretaries.

THE ESCAPED SLAVE AND THE UNION SOLDIER.

SURELY not the least interesting of the varied war-pictures which we present to our readers this week will be the sketches on page 420, which depicture of a negro slave, who fled from Montgomery, Alabama, to Chattanooga, for the express purpose of serving in the army of the Union; the other, a picture of this same negro, endowed for the first time with his birth-right of freedom, and allowed his proper honor in his then and now duty—that of fighting for the nation which is hereafter pledged to protect him and his. Are these not affecting pictures which are here presented to us? On the one side, the poor fugitive oppressed with the weariness of two hundred long miles of overtravel, a journey interrupted by a thousand necessary precautions, and harassed by timid suggestions of a far more horrible than death if he were recaptured; with his meagre covering of rags about him; and on the other side, the soldier crowned with freedom and honor. Can we not at length have faith in that heroism which has been so gloriously illustrated at Wagner and Olustee and Petersburg; and which, in the face of the Fort Pillow massacres, yet offers itself afresh in the person of a poor fugitive, who, from the heart of the enemy's country, gives himself, at the risk of death or of a torture worse than death, to a cause simply because it is inevitably associated with the problem of his freedom?

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXXI.

PEACE.

LILY'S life in the Marais was, for six months, peaceable, and uneventful, and happy. One day was like another, but all the days were quiet and cheerful, and their passed swiftly by. Lily rose at eight, and took Madame de Kergolay her coffee and milk in her bedchamber. Lily read to her, over her own breakfast, the news from Paris; with your individual which was permitted to penetrate into the establishment: the Legitimist Gazette de France, which Madame de Kergolay in her very violent politician, but her convictions were firm. The rent had long since been forged into steel. She spoke of Napoleon as "the too celebrated M. de Bonaparte." Whenever she alluded to Robespierre she was with a shudder, but without invective. She called him "that miserable man." Louis the Sixteenth was to her always "the martyred King." Marie Antoinette Madame was not very enthusiastic about—her career, she observed, was "perpetually troublous;" but she regarded the Duc de Berri as the victim of perfidy, and the Duchesse d'Angoulême as a saint. The house of Orleans, then regnant in France, she named with sorrow, but without asperity, as "the ingrates of the cadet branch." She seemed (with one exception) to bear no malice toward any of the deplorably famous characters of the revolutionary epoch. As Talleyrand did, she always spoke of the philosopher of Ferney as "Monsieur de Voltaire." She gave Mirabeau his title of comte, and admitted the greatness of Camille Desmoulins and the patriotism of Madame Roland. But if ever the name of Jean Jacques Rousseau were mentioned in her presence, her cheek flushed, and her voice trembled with indignation. "The vulture in dove's feathers!" she was wont to cry. "The sentimentalist who wreathed his murderous poniard in fine phrases. The philanthropist who would not have children whipped, and yet sent his helpless babes to the Foundling Hospital!" And for poor cruel Jean Jacques there was no charity to be expected from the Baronne de Kergolay.

About ten o'clock the lecture of the Gazette de France was concluded, and Lily was allowed to enjoy what was to her a most delightful privilege. She went out to market with Babette, the homely Breton cook. At first she had prevailed with this woman were of a slightly embarrassing nature. Babette seemed to be under a continual nervous apprehension lest Lily should think that she was jealous of her, but the girl's gentle and unassuming manner probably created confidence in the housekeeper's mind, and before a fortnight was over she told Lily that she loved her next to Madame de Kergolay. The convict's wife was zealously but unaffectedly pious; and she never went to market without going to church for a few minutes.

When Lily returned from market it was nearly noon, and the déjeûner à la fourchette, or midday breakfast, was served. Once or twice in the afternoon she worked at some of the marvellous tasks of embroidery which were always on the frame, and she read to Madame de Kergolay. Novels were not entirely banished from the good lady's reading-table, but the Revolutionary novel was, it need not be said, proscribed; the wild productions of the romantic school were likewise unadmissible; and the baroness had probably never heard of George Sand or of Paul de Kock. But the genteel fictions of M. le Vicomte d'Arlincourt, and the decorous novels of M. le Vicomte de Chateaubriand, in French, with Walter Scott and Miss Porter in English, were considered worthy of entry, and were listened to with complacency by Madame, and absolutely devoured by Lily.

After this, if the day were fine, came a walk. In her youth, perhaps, Madame de Kergolay had the unholy fascination exercised by the streets of Paris, by means of which, during the reign of the "well-beloved" and peculiarly abominable Louis the Fifteenth, the police preserved quiet over the Pare aux Cerfs were recruited. At any rate, Madame would never permit her protégée to go out alone. For years, confined by a painful and hopeless malady to her bed and her invalid chair, she had seen little of the world but in the Marais; but she recognized the necessity for regular exercise in Lily's case. Sometimes Babette would accompany her young lady on the hours' walk on the quays or in the Champs Elysées. Sometimes Vieux Sablons was commanded to escort her. Lily preferred the walks to the advantages accruing from the protection of this faithful domestic. Vieux Sablons was a slave to the exigencies of his office. Although with great difficulty he had been dissuaded from wearing, upon occasions of full dress, his three-cornered, the silver-fringed cocked-hat which had been specially made for him when the emigrants returned in triumph to their native country in 1814, he insisted on carrying a portentous cane, with a gilt copper knob and two pendent acorns, and in this state he would walk behind Lily for a time to time as he walked, somewhat after the manner of the beadle at St. Germain des Près during an ecclesiastical procession. The consequence was, that the gamins, or little blackguard boys of Paris, who delighted to make it a matter for impudence and cruel acumen by the youths of any other capital in Europe, were accustomed to laugh at Vieux Sablons, to call him "Marquis de Carabas," "Micromegas," "Polichinelle de Louis Quatorze," and the like, and to follow him, hooting and jeering, and occasionally casting mud and stones at him after the unhappy toy frequent fashion of democratic and illtrained typicality. And these circumstances, peculiarly lending to "explications" between Vieux Sablons and the blackguard boys, it was not easy this human stick took somewhat too vivacious a part, a tumult was more than once the result, when Vieux Sablons had implored assistance from with the sergents de ville, not devoid of reference to a visit to the nearest post or guard-house. Vieux Sablons experienced similar rude pleasantry in escorting the "little m'amelle," as he called Lily—she was always to be little—but his style stood in his way, and the urchins would persistently suffer him to confront the perils of the little blackguardism.

Lily and Vieux Sablons, then, used to walk to the Champs Elysées, and there the latter would passively sit, while Lily contrived to get a good bracing walk almost every fine day. At least twice a week Madame de Kergolay would look to pay her respects to the baroness, and then it was she who would officiate as Lily's chaperon. Often, too, the Abbé de Kergolay would, but ecclesiastical etiquette forbade that worthy man to be seen in the street with a young lady. Once, when Babette and Lily were walking in the garden of the Luxembourg, they came upon the Abbé in his way, and the latter would pause to breviary. He rose in haste as they approached, and, blushing scarlet, walked away. He probably warned Babette, who came to the same to the Marais, against "compromising" him. Poor Abbé Chatain! He, too, was a slave to duty.

Once, also, when Lily and Madame Prudence had ventured beyond the Triumphal Arch at the top of the Champs Elysées, and were wandering through the then ill-tended thickets of the Bois de Boulogne, they came upon the entire Persian Marcassin undergoing the dolorous relaxation of the "promenade." The girls were all rigidly watched by governesses and sub-governesses, and bad marks were plenteously distributed for such offenses as not keeping step, or turning the head over the shoulder to gaze at a quack's platform, or a Punch's show; while, for a wonder, at the end of the procession marched the terrible Mademoiselle—the Marcassin herself.

She eyed her former pupil and victim narrowly, and with an evil countenance, as, trembling in every limb, and feeling herself turn white and red by turns, Lily passed. The Marcassin had got well rid of the unprofitable scholar; she had a bold upon her, in case her friends should ever be reinstated; and yet she experienced a kind of cold rage at the thought that the girl had slipped through her fingers. It was so easy to remain by oneself who had no friends. It was so facile to torment the child who dared not complain. The Marcassin was vexed that, in a moment of weakness, she had permitted the abbé to take away the little English girl. Indeed, she was angry with the abbé altogether. He did not cause so frequently as he used to come. He spent most of his leisure time in the Marais. He cared no more for the cure. He consulted the pictures of the Baronne de Kergolay too often and too warmly. As for Lily, he spoke of her goodness, her meekness, her docility, in a manner which, according to Mademoiselle Marcassin, was perfectly sickening. "Ce bonhomme d'abbé radote sur les maunders," quoth the stern-minded school-mistress. "I must seek out another director for the Pension Marcassin."

However, it was true that she had lost her prey, and was content to glower at the girl as she saw her, happy and prosperous, and with the glow of health upon her cheek, in the governesses, talking of the cue from the Marcassin, surveyed Lily and her companions with supercilious sneers, but private comments failed to harmonize with the public recognition they had bestowed on the exprisoner.

"She has been adopted by a duchess," one whispered.

"A duchess; bah! by a poverty-stricken old emigrant baroness out of the Vendée, rather. A baroness of the Empire, I'll avil bet, probably. My father was out in the Bocage. He was a Bleu. He knew all ces gens-là, and had four Kergolays shot in one day."

"It is no matter. La petite looks very well. She is not amiss, la petite."

She was not amiss. Affectionate and obedient little thing, and it went to one's heart to have to punish her when she had committed no misdeeds, merely because she was in the power of superior authority."

"Well, she is out of the lion's den.—Will you walk straight, Tavernier l'Aînée, and refrain from using your fingers as castanets, or shall I report you. Ah! that little girl during the sitting promenade, to Mademoiselle Espréménil, for ultimate reprimand and correction by Madame ?"

The mistress of Mademoiselle Tavernier, the elder, who was a ... muscular young Christian indeed, and always scandalizing the proprietors of the genteel establishments in Mademoiselle Marcassin, drove Lily out of the minds of the governesses, and half a minute after the schoolmistress had passed by, she was forgotten by all save the Marcassin. But the Marcassin remembered her very well.

Madame Prudence had not beheld this little scene unmoved. She had, it will be remembered, acted as fiend with the schoolmistress; and, deliberately spitting on the ground, with certain solemn expressions of disparagement and defiance, she had turned her back upon Lily, and walked on at a quick pace.

Lily did not fail to tell Madame de Kergolay, when they returned home, of her little adventure. The baroness deemed it her duty gently to chide the young housekeeper for her intemperance of language toward Mademoiselle Marcassin, but added the expression of a hope that she had not been hurt.

"With a thousand reverences toward yourself, Madame la Baronne, and begging pardon for having spoken in the language of the people to which I belong, and against the canons of Christian charity which have been taught me by M. l'Abbé Chatain, I must sincerely wish that Mademoiselle Marcassin did hear what I said. Too long have I repented of my cause this dear innocent child; and the stories which the abbé has told me of her cruelty and tyranny have made me long, at other time, burn even with the desire of tearing her wicked old eyes out."

"That would be very wrong indeed, Madame Prudence!" said the baroness when she spoke. "We should forgive all our enemies, even as we hope to be forgiven."

"I humbly ask pardon," replied Madame Prudence with a low courtesy; "and I will pray for Mademoiselle Blutbrands this very night; but I should like to pass a little quarter of an hour with her nevertheless."

"And I assure you, repressed Lily, "that I forgive her. It was nothing, perhaps, but temper."

"It was nothing, perhaps, but choux-fleurs à la sauce. Pardon my confidence and afterward, a good-humored banter (but not in the baroness's presence), to Lily. "Your little angel has told me (I tell you that woman was made of marble. Marble! Lava of a volcano rather. Some years ago it was all but been boiling and red-hot, and now it is turned into stone."

The dinner-hour on the third floor in the Marais was generally at five o'clock. The table fare was always simple; but the style, on which Vieux Sablons so prided himself, was never lacking. Twice a week there was a banquet. She did not expect Lily to do the same, and even endeavored to dissuade her from following her example; but the girl thought in her simple heart that it would be selfish not to abstain from meat, as her friends did upon meagre days; and besides she thought the sorrel soup, the fish, the vegetables, and omelets which Babette served up on non-flesh days, very nice and succulent. On Sundays and feasts they had generally some little extra delicacy—a poulet aux pommes, or a turkey stuffed with chestnuts.

After dinner came, on visiting evenings—that is to say, when Madame "received" on Tuesdays and Thursdays—a few very old gentlemen, and a few very old ladies. They all seemed to have been shipwrecked, to have been knocked to pieces like the porcelain dessert services, and put together again. The Vidame de Borne was somewhat old. He carried his living not as a teacher of English, a language he had acquired during the emigration. The Comte de Panurein had been a bonnetgazette grit. He was glad enough now to do back-work for a bookseller in the Rue St. Jacques. Monsieur de Fontanges had been a Knight of Malta. How he managed to earn a crust of bread now was not precisely known. It was a delicate subject, and was never talked about. Madame Prudence, indeed, once hinted to Lily that the "poor dear man," as she called him, had been compelled to accept a post in the orchestra of a theatre, and played second fiddle at the Odéon for a hundred francs a month.

The ladies were as antique and as dilapidated as the gentlemen. They were all baronesses, countesses, or plain mesdames, but all of noble birth; one, Mademoiselle de Castesanne, was a commander-in-chief maid, who had been a bawd. They were all miserably poor, hiding their heads in cheap boarding-houses, or cheaper garrets, or pining on the miserable pensions of the civil list, allocated by the government for the support of the decayed Bourbon aristocracy, and the spare bedroom of which were supplemented every year by a grand ball at the Hôtel de Ville. The entertainments which they had on one occasion. She had an income amounting to the magnificent sum of twenty-five pounds a year. If she could only manage to raise it to forty (a thousand francs) they would receive her as a nun in one of the gloomiest and rigidest convents of the Faubourg St. Germain. It was not a bright prospect, but poor Sister Anne gazed at it wistfully from the tower of her spinsterhood. To be allowed to have your head cut off, and to wear black serge and a veil; to be permitted to sleep on the boards, and scarify oneself with a horse-hair vest, get up in the middle of the night to repeat the lamentations of Jeremiah, and subsist chiefly on stale bread and black radishes, and scourge yourself twice a week! Well, there are ambitions of various kinds, and Mademoiselle de Castesanne's ambition extended no further than this. But she was deficient in her qualifications. Fifteen pence per annum, and her long-covered bins was unattainable. It is a practical age, indeed, when mascération costs twenty, and the penitent of the period actually expects a novice to come prepared with a compact sum in the Three per Cents.

These poor old people could not paid a feeble, fluttering court to Madame de Kergolay. She had lent—that is to say given—most of them money; she had sent them new clothes and bonnets, and they accorded her a sincere and awful homage. Of all the victims of the drama of revolution none had suffered more deeply than the Baronne de Kergolay. She was almost a martyr. She had set upon the step of the scaffold. She had been in the tumbril. Her hair had fallen beneath Sanson's shears. Her husband, her father, her dearest friends and kinsmen, had been drowned in Robespierre's red sea. She said once, in sad playfulness, that she had almost as much blood in her body as Marat, and her head had been sewn on again.

The entertainments at the Marais were not costly. Vieux Sablons, in connection with the yellow wax-candles in the silver sconces, provided all that was requisite in the way of style. For the rest, there was a little weak tea. The guests brought their own snuff, and what more could they want? They paid their little compliments, vented their meek complaints against the ungrateful government of the cadet branch, recalled dates of their small sconces, and sometimes indulged in railery, or drifted into discussion. When, at ten o'clock, the last bit of tea was made up; and at ten o'clock all took their leave, and the establishment on the third floor went to bed.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A SCAPE-GRACE.

SAID Vieux Sablons to Lily Floris, one morning—it was in the sixth month of her residence in the Marais:

"Little m'amselle, to-day there is 'bonnance.'"

"I don't quite understand you, Vieux Sablons. Bonnance! What is that?"

"True, I am an animal. Madame would pull my ears for talking to you in so rude a manner. Madame always speaks English, and I expect her domestics to observe good style in their language. I mean, that to-day there is a festival, a holiday, a fête."

"And why, Vieux Sablons? It is not a fête-day of your birth."

"Little puritan m'amselle! What do you know about our feasts or our fasts either? Though, for the matter of that, you insist upon making meagre whenever Madame does. But this is a secular holiday. The Scape-grace is coming."

"The Scape-grace! Who may he be?"

"Ah! you will find out soon enough. The scamp—the brigand—the ne'er-do-well—the good-for-nothing."

Lily turned hot and faint. Who was coming? She recalled the horrible story of Babette's husband. Was the convict expected?

"There!" exclaimed Vieux Sablons, goodhumoredly, as he observed the girl's agitation; "I am a brute, a buffalo, a rhinoceros to terrify you so, little m'amselle. One would think I was announcing the advent of Le petit homme Rouge—the little Red Man who was wont to appear to Bonaparte. It is only M. Edgar Greyfanut, Madame's graceless grand-nephew, who is coming."

"A-a-h!" murmured Lily; and it was a long drawl — a-a-h."

"Don't be frightened. He will treat you as a child. Monsieur can only spare time for the grand dames of the Faubourg St. Germain. Monsieur even disdains to break the hearts of the grisettes in the Latin Quarter. Oh, Monsieur is very precious of his nobility."

"He is noble, then?"

"Is he not Madame's grand-nephew? Does she not come of an ancient and illustrious stock? But he has none of the Kergolay blood in him. He has nothing to do with the old manor of Kergolay — and, between you and me, little m'amselle, I don't think much of his nobility, for—"

"What, Vieux Sablons?"

The old man had come suddenly to a stop. He resumed, now, in some confusion: "What an imbecile I am! My tongue is always running away with me. I was going to say that I mistrusted his nobility because he is an Englishman. I can not endure them, those sons of Albion! Why has he not a De before his name? Monsieur Edgar Greyfaunt! That sounds neither more nor less than the name of a bourgeois. But I forget, bless me! I am, that Madame herself was of Britannic origin, and that every thing belonging to her, even in the remotest degree, must be noble."

"And I, too, am English, Vieux Sablons," remarked Lily, sadly.

"But you are not noble," returned the old man, simply.

"I don't know. I am Quite Alone."

"It is not your fault, little m'amselle. An enfant trouvé may be the descendant of Henry Quatre. You have speaking of Edgar. The prodigal grand-nephew has condescended to announce his intention of paying us a visit. It is six months since Monsieur deigned to set his foot beneath our humble roof."

"Why does he stay away so long?"

"Why? He professes to be very fond of his aunt. He can come often enough when he wants a bill of five hundred francs paid. Monsieur has been away sketching, forsooth, and visiting the grand seigneurs and the grand dames at their châteaux. He despises the poor tradesdown aristocracy of the Restoration. Nothing will suit him but the mushroom barons of Philippe, the newly-fledged peers of France, the marshals who, the day before yesterday, were drummer-boys. He visits the corps diplomatique. He is hand-in-glove with the Duke — He is a favorite with bankers' wives. Oh, Monsieur is a man of fashion, he pet of the clubs and the Café Anglais. Et tout ça n'est qu'un peintre. He is only a painter with a half-furnished studio in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs, and if it were not for the goodness of Madame, his grand-aunt, he would starve."

"Vieux Sablons," interposed Lily, gravely, "you are talking scandal. If Madame heard you, she would be very angry."

"Well, you are right, little m'amselle. I have no right to make observations; I, who am merely a valet de pied placed in waiting in the chamber since our establishment has been reduced. Old Rococo, Monsieur the prodigal relation, Yes, I am old, and feeble, and cocoa. I know nothing, save to preserve the traditions of the grand style we used to keep at Vieux Sablons, and to love, and serve Madame; and if I survive her, my only wish is to be buried in the vaults of Kergolay, and the manor-grave, at night angles, at her feet. The old nobility used to grant such privileges to their faithful servitors."

Lily was sorry that she had made incurred for two big tears were coursing down his parchment cheek. M. Edgar Greyfaunt was, evidently, no favorite of his. But his devotion to the lightest behests of his mistress got the better of his own personal feelings, and he resigned himself to the task of killing the fatted calf in anticipation of the arrival of the prodigal grandnephew.

It was a very busy day. The invalid was agitated, as she always was when Edgar was expected. She was tetchy, almost cross, and Lily had to follow out the recipe of smiling upon her, and kissing her a great many times before answering. The marketing during the morning was prodigious. Babette missed her outdoor onions. The famous turkey stuffed with chestnuts was procured as a piece de resistance. The dessert was on a sumptuous scale. Madame Kergolay by special permission from the Abbé Chatain, came to help — and with the assistance of sundry little copper stew-pans, and a red brick stove, with charcoal, concocted delicacies of so overpowering and titillating an odor, that the subtlety of the aroma penetrated even to the bower of Madame de Kergolay, who, smilingly, speculated as to whether it was the concoction of pigeons, or the salmi of partridges — ed' both of which Edgar was very fond—and Madame Prudence was cooking.

As for Vieux Sablons he rubbed and polished the plate until it seemed in danger of disappearing utterly under the influence of excessive attrition. Lily was told that she was not to do any thing, and was even scolded by Madame de Kergolay for offering to arrange the dessert; but she took refuge in the corner of the dining-room to deck the dining-room table with flowers, and display the napkins in symmetrical shapes, and fit little frills of cut paper to the candles.

Vieux Sablons whispered to her about five o'clock that there would be Champagne at dinner, and also Chambertin.

"It is the grand vin, the famous vintage of 1827," he added. "Madame has only five bottles of it left. Only imagine! What extravagance! But she would discuss thousands in his Chambertin, if it were possible, and she had them."

M. Edgar Greyfaunt came to dinner, but he came late. It was twenty minutes past six before he condescended to ascend the staircase and pull the horse-hoof attached to the silken cord. But had he come at twenty minutes past midnight he would have been welcome. It was not the slightest misfortune of Madame la Baronne de Kergolay that she literally idolized her graceless grand-nephew.

He was arrayed in all ceremonious form, and with two lighted candles, by Vieux Sablons, triply powdered for the occasion.

"How are you, my ancient?" Lily heard him cry out in a loud ringing voice in the vestibule.

The same inimitable madness. Vieux habits vieux galons! What a prodigious old manservquin it is. At the Italiens, mon cher, thou wouldst be invishable as lackey to Prince Piccamara."

He was speaking in French, confidently and fluently, but with a broad Saxon accent. He then'd and thou'd Vieux Sablons, not affably, but superciliously, and whenever he called him "my," or "thy," the old domestic, who was only accustomed to endure that familiarity from the lips of his mistress, bowed humbly, but visibly shuddered.

Monsieur Edgar Greyfaunt was ushered into the presence of his relatives, and he took on one knee with a becoming grace enough and pressed her hand to his lips. It was the homage of aristocrat to aristocrat. But when he rose he tossed his head aloft and threw an insolent look around as if to compensate for the act of humility he had just performed.

The compensation was almost gratuitous. There was no one in the room except Lily, and his head'or look insolent but a poor little English girl.

When his grand-aunt had folded him to her breast at least twenty times; when she had kissed his forehead, his cheeks, his eyes, his lips, over and over again; when she had smoothed his hair, and pressed his hands between her own white palms; when she had bidden him to stand away from her a little that she might better regard him; when she had recalled him to remembrance of the last time she had called him her darling Edgar, her hope, her pride, her sole comfort and stay in old age—she unbought herself that they were not alone. Alone, and that there stood one present who was. She held out her hand to Lily, and calling the trembling, frightened little girl, she proceeded to present her to M. Edgar.

"This is Miss Lily Brown," she said, in English, "a little English friend of mine. She is very good, and quiet, and useful, and I love her, very dearly. You must be kind to her, Edgar, and not at all sarcastic, for she is very young and timid."

Edgar cast Lily a bow which was accompanied by a nod, and supplemented by a sneer. It seemed to say, "You are infinitely beneath me, my young friend, but I condescend to agree in I will condescend to be civil to you." The nod shrunk, but the sneer remained, from his bold gaze. In the remotest corner of her heart the trembling little fingers of her soul were already beginning to hate him. Why had Madame had she possessed to bow down to worship? And how many of us are there who prostrate themselves every day to worship we actually think them gods?

Edgar Greyfaunt was eminently handsome. They were alike in there: the trappings, and gewgaws, and flounces, and furbelows of man's costume that drive artists to despair and to drink. He was tall and shapely, and his nose was aquiline, and his teeth were white. His hands and feet were small, and he had a head carried in rich luxuriance over his broad white forehead. Nature had provided him with every luxury. All the accessories and adjuncts of beauty he possessed. None of the trifling adjuncts, the absence of which the cunning eye of a woman discerns that a dire defect exists in the whole

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—THE REBEL ASSAULT ON LOGAN'S POSITION IN THE BATTLE AT DALLAS, MAY 28, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

A TOPOGRAPHICAL MAP ILLUSTRATING GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE ON ATLANTA, GEORGIA.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE NAMES OF THE DEAD.

EVERY day the names we read
Of the heroes who have sealed
On the bloody battle-field
Freemen's faith in freedom's creed.

Dearest names of common phrase
Known around the board and fire
Ere the lips began to tire
Of life's tangled, wordy ways.

Names that in the past have hung
Like far-lighting, steadfast suns;
Known and unknown and uncouth ones,
Strunge unto our Saxon tongue.

Names whose sounds were madly hurled
By the waves on Norway's reign;
Names that have been battle-flags
To the armies of the world.

Names that Onian's numbers rolled
Round the stormy Hebrides;
Names that lunged the southern seas
In the misty days of old.

Crabbed names like unhewn stones
From some shattered Gothic dome;
Names with which imperial Rome
Silenced conquered nations' groans.

Each has held some music breath
In its smooth or rugged sound;
Some sweet tone with each is bound
In the slieuteus of death.

Oh! they are the sacred names
Which the harangue of the free
Gives to immortality
On a fairer scroll than Fame's.

BEHIND THE ORGAN.

How long have I pumped at church organs you want to know? Well it's over fourteen years at the very least. How be fifteen. Ay! more now. Long enough, patience knows: for it's pretty hard work blowing an organ in hot weather.

Have I known many organists? That I have—a precious set of scallywags most of 'em are, too. Why here, in this very church, I've blowed for nine or ten.

Which do I like best? Why the light ones of course. Can't bear at all those heavy, noisy, blustering players. Give me the lighty, pretty, refined sort. They don't need so much wind and make twice as good music.

Will I give you some of my experiences? Tell you what I've seen in choirs, do you mean? Well as to that there ain't much worth talking about, such as there is you're welcome to it. Shall I begin when I was a boy? Well, I will.

My father was sexton of a little country church at Stillwater, on the Hudson, and got fifty dollars a year for sweeping out the place. Of course he didn't take him much of the time off his work, and then he used to get so at doing the sweeping after school hours. So it was precious little trouble to him. The church stood alone, on the top of a little elevation familiarly called Zion Hill. We were Episcopal. The Baptists had a big square meeting-house nearly opposite, and the Presbyterians a bigger one on the other side with a steeple. We had no steeple, to be sure, but to make up for it we had a square tower with little gingerbread woodwork on the top, and painted pinnacles on the corners, with a lightning-rod on each. Besides this we had a big clock that faced four ways. It had not gone for five years excepting once when to wruck and ruin; and so when you looked at it from the north it was half past four o'clock, while on the south it was a quarter to one, and east and west, however, agreeing between themselves that it wasn't very far from eight, though they couldn't say just to a minute, you know. Besides, the east face had lost one of the hands, which, naturally enough, interfered with its accuracy.

To cap all, we had a bell, a genuine old bell, which had been brought from New York and given to the congregation by a rich old maid, who was buried in the grave-yard ever so long ago, with a grave-stone big as a gallows, and ten acre long time she bore. We rang the bell a great deal, and were very proud of it: especially as it served for all the other congregations who had no bells of their own; so when we rang, the Methodys and Baptists and Presbyterians would begin to fix up and say, "Come! There's the Pikserpil bell. We must be again!"

Have I ever blown in other churches? Of course I have. I was two years in a Methodist church, and a year with the Dutch Reformed—and they're no better than Presbyterians, you know. They pay well, I must say that for them, and don't want near so much wind. It's our long Pikserpil chants that's so wearin' on the organ-blower. And as to the Te Deums! it almost does me over. I always think it's laziness on the part of the minister when it's rung instead of read; and if there's any thing I do despise it is laziness.

Our congregation at Stillwater was very large. I think there was always a scarcity of worshipers because there were so few men of any kind in the church. They used to say in Stillwater that it was dangerous to go into the Pikserpil church, for any one man seen there two times in a year was sure to be elected a vestryman; if he attended four Sundays following, he was a warden the very next Easter.

We had a few quite stylish families, who came in carriages and brought gilded prayer-books with them; and we had a poor Englishman and his wife who never paid any pew-rent; and there were, too, a few pretty girls from the Miss Wilkinses boarding-school, who used to come in a string, and had a big square pew near the pulpit. In the afternoon the young men from the Baptist and other churches used to hang about our door till the Wilkins girls passed in.

In those days I used to blow the organ for glory, and never dreamed of being paid for it in cash. Our organ—the only one in the village—was deemed quite an extensive affair, though, bless your soul, I've blown others since then half a dozen times bigger. It had five stops and a few pedals. Jim Schoolmaster, Mr. Birch, played it till he died. Then Miss Haughton, one of the Wilkins girls, took to playing; and the name Sunday I took to blowing. Right glad I was of it too, for all the Sunday-school scholars envied the blower, and would very humbly beg for a chance to help him pump." I wish to goodness some one would only offer to help me pump nowadays!

It was a small organ, and needed precious little wind and muscle to fill it; and there was a piece of lead sliding along a groove which told me when to stop blowing. Yes the name on the first Sunday, without thinking, I let the wind escape several times, with no awful thunder and quavering sound, that was natural enough to a new beginner. Miss Haughton, however, made no allowance for me, and snapped at me below stairs in a very irritable and unpleasant manner. Then she sent one of the singers to reprove me; for she was too fine a miss to speak to me herself. It was in her first Sunday at organ-playing, and, to tell the truth, she didn't know any thing more about her part than I did about mine.

In those days I was a Sunday-school scholar, and pretty well up in my ten commandments and my catechism and my collects. Besides all these, I knew the fourteenth chapter of St. John by heart, and could say off at least a dozen hymns. So I had, you see, a good bringing up, and always expected to be a regular church-going man. But I never dreamed of playing the organ for nothing but the organ.

From my little nook there, any way, I could see what was going on in the choir, and I used to often wonder why the singers whispered and talked so much, and why they never looked at the sermon; not that I listened to it myself, but then I had a vague notion that the duty of grown-up folks was to pay the strictest attention to the minister's discourse, and enjoy it too. Yet the choir folks only chatted and laughed, and made books and munched candy. I have since found out that this is what choir folks do in all churches of both countries and city.

Miss Haughton was as beautiful as a picture, and by-and-by it seemed to me a great pleasure to blow the bellows for pretty white fingers to play upon. Those fingers! How soft, white, and delicate, with nails ringed as delicately as if they were each a little finger-nail to be seen with the sermon entertaining a pearl, and the other an emerald. Once I had the wind up quite out of the bellows for the admiration of those rings I should buy her were I only rich.

She had a pretty little face, shaded, or rather lighted, with golden curls; and her mouth closed over wonderfully beautiful teeth. After playing the voluntary she took her end of the hymn-book, a full range of my view; and I would sit all the time gazing at the girl-organist, never thinking of the congregation. In the psalm-singing she was generally away at a great rate, though I got the repeats out of being a very attentive listener.

Those summer Sundays I don't think I shall ever forget. The church windows used to be open, and the breeze flirted in and out with the scent of the fields. A bird would now and then light on the window-sill, butterflies would float in and make a race of the organ and blow-boy, and on one occasional busy bee would create a sensation by buzzing around for a while in the hurry-scurry of a great rate, as if he really could not waste any more time in such a place. A few fans stirred half idly in the body of the church, handkerchiefs on the minister's soft voice fell gently on the ear as he half read, half intoned the old familiar prayers.

In a few weeks I used to hear the bellows I of our organ to perfection; and I took the more pains because I knew it pleased her mind that I was not right to worry Miss Haughton by any failure on my part.

Miss Haughton, to like flowers, and usually carried a little nosegay to the church. I noticed this habit and it occurred to me to get some of the flowers that I knew she would like and make a bouquet for her. But though it was very easy to get the flowers, it was very hard to get rid of them. I was too bashful to think of presenting them to her myself, and so unusually shy that I could not even get a boy to do it for me one single day, too shy to even lay them at her feet. So they withered.

The next Sunday I devised an ingenious plan, and going to the church long before the time for service, laid my flowers, bunch of roses and violets on the key-board of the organ. Miss Haughton was a little late that day, and hurried past me too much to notice any thing. Nevertheless, I was too bashful to peer around the edge of the organ and see the manner in which she observed my little offering; but determined that when I got my wages I'd see her hold the flowers in her dear hand. She was unusually kind to me that day, partly spoke to me one of the singers with a word and look as if she suspected him of what I had done.

I repeated my performance the next Sunday, and again the flowers—my flowers—were in her hand. This was satisfaction enough to me for that day; but the next Sunday I thought I would venture, and I dreamed of daring to tell the beautiful girl what I had done, but I only wanted to feel myself or my name, at most way nearer to her; so on the back of the largest rose I the next Sunday scraped a few pole letters—they were R. A. B., which, you know, stands for my own name, Robert Andrew Burns. The letters were so small that no one would notice them, and so badly carved that few who did notice them could make them out.

She entered as usual, and was hidden from me by the angle of the organ; and the lessons, the prayers, and the responses were longer that day than ever; as to the music, that was always too short, for then she was playing, and so I could be of use to her, and could even think that I was helping her. After the psalm she took her old place in the choir, and with my bouquet in her hand. The largest rose—pure white, while the others were red—I could easily distinguish from where I was; and I had twirled the stem on the outside, so that the carved initials must rest against her finger as she held the rose. And I sat in delightful quiet, knowing that the white, delicate fore-finger was touching the letters R. A. B.

And as the minister got to his "fourthly," when suddenly my happiness was all destroyed. One of the singers, Mr. Jabbs—how I hated the man, before a chorus of "Oh, be joyful" commenced, I rose and blowed—"I am not to be humbugged! young fellow in the township, and kept store on his own account at Medgville Corners on the Schaghticoke road—he had observed my present to her, and whispered—

"Has not Miss Haughton one little leaf to spare for her friends?"

"Certainly, Mr. Jabbs," replied she, with a readiness that made my heart sink, "take any one you want."

"Only the one you select for me," said he, with a look and a nod to make you jealous, I'll let you have the best."

Then she took the white rose—the rose with R. A. B. on the stem—pulled it out from the others, and smilingly handed it to Jabbs. The wretch took it with a broad grin, and actually had a minute later was squeezing the stem carved only for her gentle fingers.

I would rather have had it crushed under foot—have it trampled upon with scorn by her, than have seen it for an instant bloom out triumphantly from the left lapel of Jabbs's coat. On Sunday out, I doubled the poor flower itself, for it seemed as if I caught at once to have withered at the hateful change.

The next Sabbath I cut the letters R. A. B. on one of the smaller stems, and again Jabbs was on hand begging for flowers.

"Now," said Miss Haughton, "last Sunday I gave you the best I had, so to-day you must put up with the second best." She muttered, like a grinning ape, that any thing was valuable coming from her, and accepted with an elaborate smile the little red rose on which I had bestowed such care. Again the hand hand of Jabbs pressed the letters R. A. B.

On the Tuesday following my father called me, and I felt as if I was shot when he said he had a letter for me from Miss Haughton. After the first shock I became very busy in me. Perhaps she wanted me to punish that Jabbs for impertinence, and at the idea I grew bold as a lion; perhaps I had been found out in my worship of the flowers, and she had sent me an angry order to stop such work. The latter view of the case seemed the most natural to me, and I trembled as I was to be reproved and dismissed from the organ-loft. I was to be publicly put to shame for having wronged for the expensive crime of carving my initials on flower-stems. Well, how could I expect any thing else?

"Here, Bobby," said my father, "just read it for your self and see what it is." And so I took the note with a trembling hand, and read it, thus:

"MR. BURNS.—The rector thinks it best for me to practice on Tuesday afternoon as organ, and if your boy Bob can blow the organ for me he will be paid for his trouble.

"SARA P. HAUGHTON."

It was a relief, and yet a disappointment. She evidently had no idea who had brought the flowers.

As no hour was mentioned in the note, I was at the church at two o'clock, and punctual to a minute o'clock. She came about three, and with her Julia Jabbs. I always did despise those Jabbses—the whole family of them.

"Oh, Bob, I'm glad you're here!" she said, with a sweet smile, as she passed in. "Can you come every Tuesday afternoon?"

"Yes, ma'am, and if I can't I'll be sure to have some other boy to my place. I'll see there's always somebody here."

"Well, any one you please. As long as there's somebody here I don't care who it is."

This last reply almost made me cry, it was so indifferent—so cold.

The next Sunday Miss Haughton came alone. Was Miss Jabbs coming? I asked. No, Miss Jabbs had company and couldn't come to-day. I blessed the company.

After playing an hour, Miss Haughton stopped and said, "Bobby," said she, "in a bantering way, very charming and lovely, "some one of the singers has been having flowers on the organ for a week past, I think. Now, Bob, don't say to any one I asked you, but tell me if you know which one it is."

I was horribly frightened, but stammered out that perhaps the gentleman wouldn't like me to tell.

She blushed a little, and then said in a would-be careless way,

"I don't suppose it was Mr. Jabbs."

"Yes, it was," I quite impetuously. "It couldn't have been Jabbs."

"How do you know it couldn't have been Mr. Jabbs?" she asked, pretending that I was a baby in my rage I had omitted. "If you didn't see any one do it you have no right to say it wasn't Mr. Jabbs. There, Bob, that will do. I see you don't know any thing more about it than I do. Now, go and blow the organ, please."

The next Sunday I placed a larger bouquet than ever on the organ, and in it were two tiger-lilies that I had begged from Mr. Kinney Creek. I had taken the five miles walk before breakfast to get them. They stood like a bit of red flame among the pale white roses.

She was more smiling to Jabbs that day than on any day before; but she refused to give him a single flower. "The good angel," she said, archly, "who brings them to me would be jealous."

She so little suspected that her good angel was Bob Burns the bellows-blower.

That Sunday afternoon during sermon I had my chin in my two hands, and gazed in idle satisfaction at the back of her head. What a beautiful bonnet! thought I, seeing it was bare; but the minute after I reproved myself for imagining that it could be half good enough for our own beautiful lady organist.

So I sat there dreaming and thinking. What if there should come to me at that moment a radiant fairy who should say, beckoning to me, "Robert Burns, come hither!" and I would go, and she would touch me with a wand, and I should be suddenly arrayed in resplendent garments—say circus tights and spangles—and the fairy should beckon also to a beauteous maiden and say, "Sara P. Haughton, organist of the Stillwater Pikserpal Church, come hither!" and should place the hand of the beauteous maiden in mine, and bid us both to enter a chariot (not as large, to be sure, but quite as handsomely gilded as that which carries the band and leads the caravan in the great American circus), and we should start off, and horses with human manes and wings should guide us upward quite to the clouds, meanwhile the good people of Stillwater all looking on with mingled awe and admiration, and these Jabbses in a state of horrible despair, tearing their hair and gnashing?

And then, after much riding in the clouds, we should descend in a beautiful island where were numerous trees bearing miscellaneous by large ripe oranges, baked sweet potatoes, and Pecan nuts; with the which I, in my capacity of Good Angel, should fill a large pack basket to offer to—

A sharp tap of the bellows signal reminded me that Miss Haughton was at the organ, that the benediction had been said, and that I was to provide wind for the closing voluntary.

Week after week passed on. Autumn came, and it was hard for me to find flowers; then I had to content myself with a few fern leaves; and soon after, finding even those good enough, I had to cease my offerings. On Tuesdays, quite regularly, Miss Haughton came to practice, and I was on hand to blow. Now and then she offered to pay me; yet refused to take any thing but her thanks.

So the winter passed, and with the first of spring the beautiful lady found on the organ key-board two violets and three little white crocuses—my first flower-offering of the season. The next Sunday I prepared a richer gift, the result of a visit to Kidney Creek.

That morning my mother, at breakfast, said to me in an old-hand way,

"Well, Bobby, will lose Miss Haughton soon."

"Lose her! Why, mother, what do you mean?"

"Why, boy, don't you know she's going to be married?"

"Married!"

"Yes, to be sure! Married to Mr. Jabbs, Law sakes, I saw it myself in all the county news."

With my richest, my last offering, I went slowly to the church. I felt like one who has met a great misfortune, but who does not comprehend how. I went to the organ-loft, opened the organ, and when I got the bellows to work I placed my fairy gay colors were sparkled with dew-drop—or tears.

There was a rustling of silk beside me. I looked around, and there was Miss Haughton, looking sad and kind, but not surprised.

"It is you, Robby," she said, "it is you, then, who are the angel of the bouquets of flowers."

I said nothing, but turned my eyes away; for she was looking at me sweetly, earnestly, and I felt that she knew better than I did myself what those flowers meant.

"For ever a poor, Robby, all last summer and all this spring, you have laid these here;" and she pointed to the flowers; "you brought them so kindly, so faithfully, and I never knew it."

I turned to her. "You hoped that some one else had brought them?"

She hesitated a moment, and then said, frankly,

"Yes, Robby, I was happy in believing it was—perhaps you will know why—but last Sunday he confessed to me it was not; and to-day I come to find out who it is, and I see it is, Robby, a dear friend whom I never half appreciated."

To hear her call me her dear friend—to feel that she meant it—took away all bashfulness or fear on my part. We sat down in the choir. No one was in the church, and the morning breeze—the fragrant spring zephyrs—came in through the open windows with the birds chirped over the hills.

She took the bunch of flowers, and I asked her to give me them. Pulling out the roses that were about to pass it to me, when the letters R. A. B., carved on the stem, caught her eye. The awkwardness of the carving was apparent, and I felt her simply and truly my old fancy—how often I had hoped that her dear hand would touch my initial letters. That wish was passed from my mind when the first early attendant was heard entering the church I felt that dear friend—for such a new could truly call her—with one long pressure of the hand, and resumed my old place at the organ bellows. She did not occupy her old seat in the choir that day.

A few weeks after they were married. It was quite a grand affair. A professional organist came up from Troy, and nearly exhausted me by his noise—"Wedding March." As the bride went out of the church she gave one glance at the organ-loft that I knew was meant for me.

Next cards and cake were left at our house next day, addressed to "Mr. Robert A. Burns," and making me for the time an object of almost awful importance in the eyes of my younger brothers. The card read as follows:

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Jabbs.

SARA P. HAUGHTON.

With it came also a little package containing a white silk handkerchief. On one corner was embroidered a large red rose, and on the stem were the letters R. A. B.

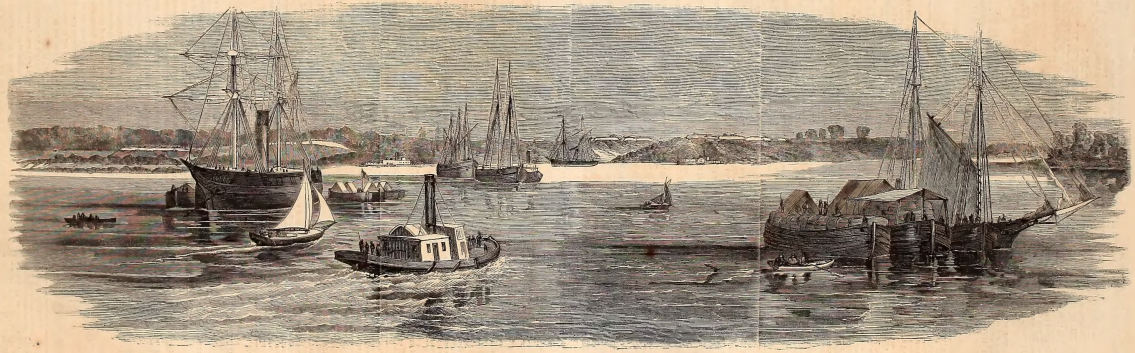
I know whose hands worked the symbol and the initials; and I know who yet keeps the handkerchief among the dearest treasures of his life.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.—GENERAL WILLIAMS'S DIVISION OF HOOKER'S CORPS LEAVING THE KENESAW STREET THROUGH THE WOODS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE ESCAPED SLAVE.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY T. B. BUSHOP.—(SEE PAGE 422.)

THE ESCAPED SLAVE IN THE UNION ARMY.—(SEE PAGE 422.)

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—THE PONTOON BRIDGE OVER THE JAMES RIVER, ABOVE FORT POWHATAN.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 419.]



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—FORT POWHATAN, ON THE JAMES RIVER.—SKETCHED BY A. T. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 419.]

ON GATHERING WILD ROSES.

THE flowers that in our pathway spring,
These are rejected—
The blessings every hour may bring
These are neglected:

But blossoms blooming up on high,
Beyond our reach, against the sky,
For these we pine, for these we sigh.

To seize some tempting distant spray,
Waving above us, far away,—
We crush what in our footpath lay.

Those common things, we heed them not,
To be despised is sure their lot,
Trifles but made to be forgot!

But oh! those lovely far-off things,
To these, to those, my spirit clings!—
Oh, had I but an angel's wings.

So far away beyond the earth,
Beyond its woe, beyond its mirth,
And triumph in a heavenly birth!

'Tis thus we yearn and strive in vain,
Crushing our pleasures into pain,
Till they can never bloom again.

VIGOROUS DOING.

"YOU remember what Carlyle says: 'Needful work is to be vigorously well done.'"

"Yes, and that other axiom also, 'Faint heart never won fair lady.' But the mischief is to get one's courage to the sticking-place."

"Pshaw, man, you're not a coward. Didn't you lead the forlorn hope at Dumbton?"

"That was child's play to storming the citadel of a woman's heart. For that, one needs an entirely different sort of courage."

Charlie Stanton smiled. He knew Al Travers was as brave a man as ever drew a sword, and with his coarser nature he couldn't at all understand this fine sensibility that cowered before a woman. He would have gone about love-making just as he went to work in a battle with that battery of his which nothing had ever yet been able to withstand. The way to accomplish a thing, he was in the habit of saying, was to go at it hammer and tongs, just as if that was the only thing in all the world to be done, and the greatest bore the only mortal of which in which to do it. He might not have succeeded to that way, in winning his suit in the court of Cupid as he would in that in the camp of Mars, but that was his theory, and he would have stuck by it come what might.

Al Travers was a man of a wholly different constitution. He was brave, brave as a lion; he could face any danger without blanching; but he could not stand before sober Minnie Nelson, could not tell her the thought of his heart any more than he could pluck down the moon under which he had so often walked with her along the green homestead lanes. His heart was dumb, his tongue motionless, whenever he endeavored to approach the one subject which, more than all others, engrossed his thought. And to make the matter worse, other suitors were crowding forward for Minnie's hand, and he could not tell at what moment, ignorant of his real thought, she might make her choice among them and slip forever from his grasp.

This fear of his was greatly deepened when, one day, a week or so after his talk with Stanton, Bob Archer, meeting him on the street, said,

"What's this about Minnie Nelson and Ed Bowlby? I thought you were the accepted in that quarter."

Al's face whitened. "I don't know what you mean," he finally said.

"What, haven't you heard how Bowlby has purchased him a house, and has given out that he is to be married, and how he is a daily visitor at old Nelson's, spending whole hours there every morning, while he runs down town to air your reception room?"

Al had heard some whispers of Bowlby's intimacy with Minnie, but he did not dream it had gone as far as this. But if he had purchased a house, and was really going to be married, why it could not be with any one, of course, but Minnie Nelson.

Archer left him after some further talk, and with a troubled face he walked on. So, Ed Bowlby, he had lost her at last. He might have won her, no doubt, but for this weak cowardice; now he was defeated; and he ground his teeth at the thought.

But, after a while, it occurred to him that possibly it was not too late; that perhaps there was a mistake somewhere. His face brightened and his step grew lighter as the fancy took hold upon him. He would go and see her, at any rate; maybe he could learn the truth.

Minnie was at the piano as he came in. A blush came into her face as he entered, but she held out her hand in cordial welcome. Then, cheerily,

"Where have you been all these years? You haven't visited us in an age."

He answered, haltingly,

"It was only three days ago you gave me right here this flower." And he pulled a withered rose from his button-hole.

The flush on her face deepened as he held out the little flower toward her. Why, poor blind fool, did he not see it?

Presently he added, the rose still lying in his hand—she did not seem to care to take it back—

"But I suppose you don't much miss one out of your many friends, you are so thronged with worshipers? Besides, you have of course just now something more pleasant to think about than idling, worthless fellows like me."

There was a faint tinge of bitterness in the words that did not escape the listening Minnie.

"What do you mean?" she asked, gravely, the smile fading from her face.

"Ah, Al! how are you? Minnie, good-morning." It was Ed Bowlby who spoke, stealing in silently from the hall.

Al may, may be sure, was startled, but Minnie answered with a smiling look. Al saw it, and was puzzled the more. But it was provoking that just when he was on the point of discovering the truth he should be thus interrupted. So, very soon excusing himself, he went hastily away, leaving Bowlby in full possession of the field. "It is true, after all," said Al, as he dashed along the streets; "her face grew brighter for my coming, and not the room. It's all up with Captain Al Travers."

But was it? That night, sitting alone in her little room, Minnie Nelson talked to herself in this wise: "I wonder what he could have meant? What is it he imagines I am so engrossed in? Oh, if he only knew how I long to know from his own lips that he cares for me! Sometimes I think there can be no doubt, his manner is so tender and kind, but then, just when he seems on the verge of a confession, he grows strangely reserved, and I am left more in the dark than ever. If he only knew!" Then, after a while, "But he shall never know from any hint or action of mine. I'll be as cold and reserved as himself." And with that resolution Minnie shook off her reverie, and very soon was asleep—dreaming all night long, spite of her resolution, of Captain Al Travers, who wouldn't tell his love.

A week passed, and the Captain was summoned to return to the field. In all that time he had not seen the object of his thoughts and dreams. He, however, called every day, must see her, come what might—it might be for the last time; even though he trembled at another, it was only proper to say good-by.

He called. The lamps were not yet lighted, and a gentle twilight filled the room. Minnie Nelson sat looking from the window out upon the lawn. Somehow, as he saw her sitting so pensive and thoughtful, Al's courage failed him again, and he came to her knee it his lips had said:

"I have come to say good-by, Miss Minnie."

Did Minnie forget her brave resolution not to hint or sign to indicate the desire of her heart? "Yes," she said, a deeper shadow fall upon her face at that simple greeting?

He saw it, and a wild flutter, like a stormy wave, broke over his heart. He saw it, and was elated.

Minnie's answer came at length, in tones by no means fully controlled—

"Are you sudden in your departure?"

"Duty calls. I have been loitering here at ease while my fellows in the field are all suffering hardships I have no right to shun." Then he added, with a sort of savage delight, "There is death there in the front, but death is not the saddest thing in the world."

She looked into his face with a pained expression.

"You are in a somber mood, Captain. Must one, be sadder to a man or woman, with life just dawning into bloom, than death?"

"Sometimes, perhaps—the hopeless pursuit of objects it is agony to lose—these are among the world's saddest things."

"But is any object unattainable?" she answered, a blush driving away the shadow from her face. "Are there impediments in the way of a brave soul, and ends no energy can reach? Did you not storm and capture Donelson in the face of the seeming impossible?"

She stopped short. Had she not betrayed herself? Where was her boasted reserve?

He caught the meaning of her words—they had hope for him, though she had designed it not. But was she not the betrothed of another? What did it all mean?

He was silent a moment. Then his cowardice melted in the white heat of a sudden, fierce, jealous passion.

"What is facing death in battle," he cried, "to facing rejoice at the hands of the woman you love?"

It was out now—he could not retreat. He saw in the deepening flush on cheek and forehead that she understood all his meaning. He dashed on, passionate to the last:

"What is death to me, Minnie Nelson, if you say to me here, 'Begone!' when I say 'I love you more than my own life and soul?'"

She looked up, with a strange light in her eye.

"But if I do not say begone, what then?"

You can imagine the replies. Your own heart will tell you better than words of mine. At last he had gained Captain Al Travers, and the task that was needful to him had been vigorously well done, and victory had crowned the effort.

He was happy, and yet he had not—not until he had seen Ed Bowlby married to Minnie's pet cousin, Maud Vinton, and had heard the whole explanation of Ed's intimacy with Minnie for her cousin's sake—the sweet, shy little cousin, who, in her timidity, had left with the more accurate Minnie the management of the whole affair, that it might be kept as sly as possible. He went a-field, but sunshine was in his heart and on his life. And in all coming battle days thoughts of the dear one who awaited his coming at the war's close have strengthened and sustained him; and now that he has the stars of a brigadier on his shoulder he rejoices in the honor only for her sake, dreaming the while, as the days go on, that, if God will, he will yet enjoy some day, in peace and rest, the full fruits of his Vigorous Doing.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Asthma Cured.

Relief guaranteed in Ten Minutes, and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years standing yield to its influence. Price $1. Sent post-paid to any address, by S. S. UPHAM, 93 South Eighth St., Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold as cut prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the country, at the same price, postage only excepted.

Reader, you can have an enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High-Pressure Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one, see "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in this column.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send (free of postage, mail, or otherwise, as directed), a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always-Ready Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; for $1, the Excellent Pen. These Pens are numbered, but correspond in sizes to numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 Pens, below.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excellent Pen.

These will be found the Best Writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmin Points, the average wear of every one of which will be equal to the wear of a Steel Pen; all others are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name of "MORTON," "Extra Number," and "A Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted by the Subscriber to be Iridosmin.

The Numbers indicate size only: No. 1 being the smallest, and No. 10 the largest of the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and made only of Iridosmin.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are liberal, Coarse Business points. The engravings are to the size of the Nos. and Qualities.

GOLD PENS, WITHOUT CASES.

For $0 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 25 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 a No. 6 Pen; $2 75 a No. 7 Pen; $3 25 a No. 8 Pen; $4 a No. 9 Pen; $5 No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME PENS IMPROVED, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $1 50 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK HOLDERS.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen; for $2 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 7 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 8 Pen; for $5 a No. 9 Pen; and for $6 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which shall not be cheerfully exchanged or made good.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him heretofore in the year 1860.

"The 3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to durability, Elasticity and Good Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Gold Pens, he does not have to say that, previous to operating his New and Patented Machinery, he could not have made so Good Writing and Desirable Pens, for the price, had the Gold been furnished gratis.

Parties ordering wont in all instances specify the Number, Size, Quality, and "Quality of the Point Wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether a Holder, Case or Pencil.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk. I add to all who send twenty cents (the charge for registering), in addition to the price of goods ordered, a set of Gold Pen Cleaners, Free of Charge.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. and, for clubs of $50 and upward, of 15 per cent.—$24, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

Address, C. A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

Turnip Seeds.

We desire to remind

Dealers in Seeds

Of the near approach of the season for sowing Turnip and Ruta Bags. We shall be able to offer a large supply of all the approved varieties, and ask to be observed.

EF" EVERY GRAIN THE PRODUCE OF 1863

Bloomsdale.

We have not, and shall not have so choice of Imported Seed.

Our Turnip Seed Circular, with particulars of interest to Dealers in

SEEDS,

will be mailed to all who apply.

DAVID LANDRETH & SON,
Nos. 21 and 23 South Sixth Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustrations, New Music, Embroidery and Basket-Work, valuable Information, and Seven Full-Sized Patterns, now ready.

FIELD, NAVY, and OPERA GLASSES manufactured by B. H. HORN, Optician, 212 Broadway, corner of Fulton St., also every description of Microscopes, Telescopes, Spectacles, and Eye-glasses to suit Weakness and Age. Send stamp for circular.

Albums for the Army.

Our New Pocket Album,

holding sixteen pictures, and sold at

Fifty Cents,

is the cheapest and best Pocket Album ever offered to the public.

Sent by mail to any address, post-paid, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

SAMUEL BOWLES & COMPANY,
Photograph Album Manufacturers,
Springfield, Mass.

THE SUMMER No. of MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR of FASHIONS Now Ready.—An elaborate display of beautiful novelties, music, elegant fashion plates, seven Full Size Patterns, an elegant Braid design, with much valuable information, only 25 cents; or yearly subscription $1, with a premium of the Model of Little Fanny Fretwork. (Form of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest will then forward $1 00, and 2 cts. for postage at the premiums, for which please send me your Mirror of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in St. Army, and everywhere else, in which locality has not been known. Honorable and to the. Address or apply to T. & H. GAUGHAN, 116 Broadway, New York.

Attention Company!

Clark's Corporal, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustache in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without injury to the skin. Any person using this Corporal, and finding it not as represented, by returning one of the fact, can have their money returned them at any time within 3 months from date of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.

Address, A. C. CLARK,
P. O. Drawer 118,
Lockport, N. Y.

CARPET WARP.
WOOL TWINE.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

A CHANCE FOR POETICAL PATRIOTISM.—A Prize of One Hundred Dollars is offered by the proprietor of Demorest Illustrated Monthly for the best words for a song on the guarantees of Liberty and Universal Freedom in our glorious Constitution. See the particulars in Demorest's N. Y. Illustrated News.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and the Hospitals occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 60 Broadway. Rates charged low rates.

$80 A MONTH! I want Agents at $80 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Everlasting Pencils, Gold Pens, and 30 other articles. Send stamp for circular. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

The 16th Army Corps Badge,

in solid silver, $1 50; gold, $3. Also all the various kinds of Badges now worn, by any Corps in the service. Send for circular. Address

MOORE, 398 Broadway, N. Y.

The New

16th Army Corps Badge, in solid silver, $1 50; in 18 karat gold, $3; sent by mail free for 50 cents. Badges constantly on hand of all the old and Invisible Orders. Address H. F. DU BOIS, Jeweler, No. 335 Canal St., New York. Engraving done to order. Send for circular. Also, Du Bois's Block, formerly 305 Broadway, dealer in Watches, Jewelry, Gold Pens and Canes, Jewelry, &c.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own homes. Thousands can realize a Hundred Dollars Weekly.—No capital required except those found in every household; profits 100 per cent. Business supplied as fast. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent by return mail on receipt of two postage stamps.

Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; or, SABBATH READINGS. A Series of Discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By Caleb Dickinson, Pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian Church in the City of New York. With Portrait. 8 vols. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

GUIDE-BOOK OF THE CENTRAL RAILROAD OF NEW JERSEY, and its Connections through the Coal Fields of Pennsylvania. With Map and Wood-cuts. 18mo, Flexible Cloth Binding, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. Part VII. 8vo, 50 cents.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS. Part II., in Harper's Magazine for July, just ready.

EF" Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$115 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	40 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches ..	18 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Jet, and Enamel Em. Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Jet, and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys.....	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....	2 00 " each.
3000 Sets of Sleeve Studs.....	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Plain Rings.....	2 50 to 5 00 each.
4000 Stone Set Rings.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
4000 Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'nt Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

203 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

(From Juries 3 and 6) at the

International Exhibition,

LONDON, 1862;

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1860, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR THE GREAT DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlets, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

Enameled Chamber FURNITURE

The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, walnut and chestnut, plain and ornamental, in suite, wholesale and retail. Also Marseilles and Pallisaine. WARREN WARES, 377 Canal St., N. Y.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1845)

GOLD PENS,

PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of PEN and PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Ag't, No. 32 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.

Special Notice to the 100 DAYS MEN.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD'S CAMP AND OUTPOST DUTY. Camp and Outpost Duty for Infantry, Standing Orders, Extracts from the Revised Regulations for the Army, Rules for Health, Hints for Soldiers, and Duties of Officers. By Daniel Butterfield, Major-Gen. Vols., U.S.A.

☞ An invaluable pocket companion for every officer and soldier.

☞ It is in compact, portable shape, easily carried in the pocket.

☞ It has been highly recommended by Major-Generals McClellan, Sherman, Hooker, Rosecrans, Hunter, Kearney, Sickles, Banks, Whipple, Brigadier-Generals Geary, Robinson, Prof. D. H. Mahan, of the West Point Military Academy, and many other distinguished officers; and has been approved and ordered by the War Department. It gives valuable instruction for Duties of Officers of the line and staff, for non-commissioned officers, and for the health of soldiers. No officer or soldier should be without it.

Forwarded by mail to any address, post-paid, on receipt of 60 cents in currency.

To Clubs of Regimental Officers or Soldiers, Sutlers, &c.

5	Copies to one address	"	"	"	$2 75
10	"	"	"	"	5 50.
15	"	"	"	"	7 50.
20	"	"	"	"	10 00.
30	"	"	"	"	12 00.
50	"	"	"	"	20 00.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, N. Y.

Barnard's Review of McClellan.

The Peninsular Campaign and its Antecedents, as developed by the Report of Maj.-Gen. Geo. B. McClellan, and other Published Documents, by J. G. Barnard, Lieutenant-Colonel Engineers and Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and Chief-Engineer in the Army of the Potomac on the organization to the close of the Peninsular Campaign. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, with map. This day published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

WAR MAP of RICHMOND

AND

Surrounding Country.

Showing REBEL FORTIFICATIONS from the latest and most authentic surveys, compiled and drawn by Lieut. Barnard. Price 50 cents. For sale and published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

New Song.

"Dreaming of Home."

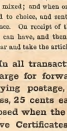
The words are beautiful and touching, just suited to the present time. The music is admirably adapted to the words, simple, sweet, and the song may be played by any body having even a slight knowledge of music, while it is worthy of being performed by the most proficient. Price 25 cents. Copies sent free on receipt of price.

Address W. A. PONTE & SON,

541 Broadway, New York.

LEE & WALKER,

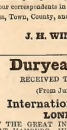
173 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.



$6 000 Agents Wanted.

Grant sale of Jewelry, Watches, Chains, Lockets, Gold Pens and Pencils, Army Badges, &c. For $1, you will send a solid silver Shield (pure coin), or either Army Corps, Division or Co. Tin, with your Name, Regt., and Co. handsomely engraved thereon; and for $1 50 we will send a new Artillery, Battery, Cavalry, Infantry or Pontonier's Fin, engraved as above. Send for wholesale and retail circular. S. M. WARD & CO., 193 Broadway, N. Y.

"Triumphant Mechanism."



"Enameled Percenia," Snow White, "superby linen finished." To the tourist, military man, and civilian, it is the utmost importance. "A solid linen imitation." Mailed on receipt of $1. JEANERET, 76 Nassau St.—N. B. Liberal discount to the Trade.

Letter of Advice for Ladies.

FIVE ADDITIONAL ENGRAVINGS.

Has information never before published.

Sent free, in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.

Address Box 4652, New York P. O.

The Surest and most certain remedy for Bleeding, Itching, Blind, Internal or Rowel Piles prepared from the bark of the Sweet Gum Tree. This is the only remedy ever before offered to the public for the cure of Piles. A few bottles should be put in every family. Sold by Druggists generally.

Prepared by the Uvilla Medicine Co., No. 11 Cedar St., New York, and sold by all druggists. Price Forty Cents.

New Music, just issued by Firth, Son & Co.—La Chasse Aerienne, or Song of the Starr, by Wm. Taylor, price 50c. Reminiscences of Faust, in 3 Nos., by Wm. Taylor, price 50c each. Home Fireside Polka, by Wm. Kipp. G. Mander, and Dedication to Florence Nightingale, by Wm. Kipp; Sultan, or Sweet Mother I'm Going now, by Wm. Kipp; price 50c. Sweet Home of my early days, by Mrs. Perkins, price 25c. Gems in the Air and Bye, Romanza, by H. Millard, price 25c.

Any of the above sent by mail on receipt of the markes price, to FIRTH, SON & CO., 4 Cooper Institute, N. Y.

No Wash or Preparation. No trouble or entangling the Hair; but a beautiful brown or black color at once by using Buckwell & Warner's Colorific. Now and Best. Try it; you will use no other. Druggists general Depot, 9 Dey St., N. Y.

Beautiful Pubic Moustaches, 50 cts and $1 each. Send stamp for circulars. Address C. W. Pelle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine. Sample package sent free by mail for 20c. Retails at $2, by H. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Canal St., New York.

AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO.

Manufacturers of Gold Pens and Pencil Cases of every description. Also Manufacturers of the celebrated Angular Nibbed Pen.

AGENTS WANTED throughout the country. Extra inducements offered to agents wishing to make it their business. Send for our descriptive circular. AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO., No. 209 Broadway, N. Y.

THE GOVERNMENT LOAN

OF

$200,000,000,

This Loan is authorized by Act of Congress of March 3, 1864, which provides for its REDEMPTION IN COIN, at any period not less than ten or more than forty years from its date, at the pleasure of the Government.

Until its Redemption, five per cent. interest is to be paid semi-annually IN COIN.

Subscriptions to the Loan are received by the National Banks in United States notes or in such currency or other funds as are taken by them on deposits at par.

Its Exemption from State or Local Taxation adds from one to three per cent. per annum to its value.

The Rate of Interest on this loan, although but five per cent. in coin, is as much greater in currency as the difference between the market value of currency and gold.

As a Rule, the five per cent. specie securities of all solvent governments are always par or above, and currency now funded in the National Loan will be worth its face in gold, besides paying a regular and liberal percentage to the holder.

The authorized Amount of this loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars. The amount of Subscriptions reported to the Treasury at Washington is $70,000,000.

Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, and the Assistant Treasurers at New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and

By all National Banks

which are depositaries of public money, and all

RESPECTABLE BANKS AND BANKERS

throughout the country (acting as agents of the National Depositary Banks), will furnish further information on application, and

AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Agents and Sutlers Wanted to sell "The Rebel Rout," a thrilling book on the War, just published by CHALLEN, 1203 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

A FACT.

DR. T. MEWBY, of Boston, was cured of baldness of seven years' standing, by the use of Barnett's Cocaline.

Fremont Campaign Medal.

OF NEAT AND BEAUTIFUL DESIGN, to be worn as a BADGE OF PARTY FEALTY by all the supporters of GENERAL FREMONT for President.

Will be ready on July 1st. Send in your orders at once.

TERMS: Single Medal, 50 cents; per dozen, $4.00. Liberal terms to Agents. Address JAMES J. W. EVERETT & CO., 111 Fulton St., N. Y. City. Box 4174.

Mosquito Nets, Palmer's

Hartwell's & Roebuck's

Mosquito Canopies.

G. L. & J. H. SELTY, 389 Broadway.

THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for July.—Vol. 40, begins with a Double No., now ready, containing Portraits, Characters, and Biographies of leading men, living and dead, such as HAYDON, SEDGWICK, WADSWORTH, HASTINGS, MERRILL, President of Columbia, S. A., the DUDE GRADATOR, with Portraits, Characters, and Biographies. Also, Synopsis of the the RACES; PHYSIOLOGY, the LAWS of LIFE and HEALTH; PHRENOLOGY, with Specimens of Phrenetic PHRENOLOGY, and Signs of Character; PHYSIOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; and much other matter, to be found in no other publication. It is a handsomely illustrated Monthly, with Ninety-six pages of solid reading. Terms, Three dollars per year, sold at 30 cents, or $6 a year, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Manhattan Life Insurance Company,

No. 81 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

Organized 1850.

CASH CAPITAL AND ACCUMULATION OVER

$1,500,000.

The triennial dividends of profits of this company has resulted in a bonus or addition to the policy of more than 30 per cent. on the whole premium paid.

The dividends are paid in the life-time of the assured, thus adding largely to pay future premiums.

POLICIES are made incontestible after five years from date, for or on account of error, omission, and misstatements in the application, except as to age.

ANNUITIES are granted on favorable terms.

HENRY STOKES, President.

C. V. WHITE, Secretary.

J. L. HALSEY, Act'y Sec.

S. N. STEBBINS, Attorney.

THE FINNEST GETTING FAT WITH SUCCESS.—10,000 sold in one day. Everybody and his wife, including his wife's relations, are dispensing our fun with a gusto that makes the pockets of the publisher laugh and chink. Letter, Label, and Pat there to cover. Second edition now ready.

Tightness of THE CHEST.

We sneeze, a slight, thin, sharp, fibrous matter comes from our nose; we have heaviness of the head, great oppression of the chest, some tightness, and a little tenderness in the region of the lungs. Now, stimulus must be given to this state of facts, or inflammation of the lungs or congestion may take place, and death be with us before we are aware.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS,

Say two, four, or six, according to age, sex, and constitution, must be taken. They may produce freely; drink warm drinks while the fever lasts, and as a diet eat plenty of good Indian meal gruel, or chicken-broth with plenty of rice in it. By this treatment, in the second or third day, the disease will be cured. This complaint is going the rounds, and will be followed by dysentery and diarrhœa, but they will be cured by the same process. The wise will have Brandreth's Pills where they can be easily had and at once, following them by the directions, safety and health will follow.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the many subjects treated in the work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Skin Diseases, Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, and Diseases of the Stomach, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Nervous System, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Epilepsy, Sexual Weakness, Impotency, Sexual Wastings, Hysteria, Spermatorrhœa, Leucorrhœa, Diseases of the Womb, Sterility, How to Become the Sight and Three Ands Spectacles, Marriage and Sexual Philosophy, the Human Marriage Customs of the World, Physiology of Expectants, Philosophy of Child-marking, a Chapter for the Married, and a thousand of values to mankind and single, never written before, making altogether a curious and useful work for families, and a good book for any one; 400 pages; 100 illustrations. To be had of all News Agents. Any person wishing to sell should ask address agents, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

DEMOREST'S N. Y. ILLUSTRATED NEWS, the most popular Journal of America, and universally acknowledged the most graphic and finely illustrated paper published, consisting, besides the Fashions, and General Literature. Single copies 10 cents; yearly $4 00, with Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions for every year as a premium. The best medium for general advertising in the country. Advertisements should be addressed to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 39 Beekman Street.

Printing Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 33x51. Price $2500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N. Y.

DEAR READER, if you are a reader, do not fail to read the story about the KNOBBIES IN the "Funniest" No. 1. You can read it over three, four or six times, and nearly split your sides, and laugh and cry, and cry and laugh each time, especially if you have ever come to laugh with you—it is worth more than the most costly Novel sold everywhere at 30 cents.

SOMETHING NEW

IN PLAYING CARDS.

LOVE SCENES.

Designed by French Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of course no chaste, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Sealed in neat wrapper, post-paid, on receipt of sample pack. $5 per dozen. Liberal discount by gross to dealers. H. L. HOWELL, 66 Nassau St., New York.

Violin Strings for Hot Weather, 25c., mailed. Musicians' Omnibus, 700 tunes for flute, violin, fife, cornet, or clarionet. Gumaelin Complete, a musical library of 1500 tunes—violin, flute, or cornet, $2; mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 205 Bowery, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—We will sell a Splendid and Improving of Abraham Lincoln, size 22x28. Send for circular address for Specimen. Very large terms to Agents. Also the largest and best assortment of Steel Portraits, Battle Scenes, Illustrated Lithographic Portraits of Washington Guide for the Albino, New Business Sign, the United States Army Diploma Price Reduced. Send for circular to JOHN GIBSON, 32 Beekman street, N. Y.

WANTED EVERYWHERE, good reliable Agents for a pleasant, honorable, and profitable permanent employment, and can't a liberal inducements. Catalogue, and full particulars, sent free on application. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers St., N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT HAIR? ILLUSTRATED, Pamphlet will inform them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face; without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. P. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau St., N. Y.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND MACHINES.

ALL KINDS at BARCLAY'S, 46 BROADWAY, N. Y.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR

1864.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten.
Single Numbers, each 25 cents, or 11 Copies for $2 50.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MONTHLY, together, one year, $5 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	4 00
One Copy for Two Years	7 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 75 each, or Eight for $27 50. Payment invariably in advance.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements after reading matter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

THAT'S WHAT'S THE TROUBLE WITH JOHN C.

MRS. COLUMBIA. "Tell me, DOCTOR, what is the matter with him? Do you think his Brain is affected?"

DOCTOR JONATHAN. "Oh! no, my dear MADAM; it's only a rather aggravated case of Sore Head!"

BOOTS & SHOES.
THE LARGEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY
GOOD BOOTS SHOES &c &c
FOR LADIES, GENTLEMEN, BOYS & CHILDREN
AT BROKAW'S
BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUMS
No 575 BROADWAY & No 150 FULTON ST

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.
MERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS,
602 Broadway, Near 4th St., N. Y.
Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $6 for sample pipe.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,
Manufacturers of
GOLD MEDAL
Grand and Square Pianos,
Baltimore, Md.
Certificates of excellence from
Thalberg, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.
Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 35 cents, or Forty-six Views for $1.00.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Good News for the Army.
Hereafter we will send, post-paid, any of our PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS ordered by soldiers for themselves or friends, giving an Album of the full value of the number ordered.
Our Albums have the reputation of being superior to all others in beauty and durability, and range in price from 50 cts. to $50.
Our catalogue of
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS
now embraces about 5000 officers, army and navy, statesmen, actors, copies of works of art, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Our assortment of these is very extensive, including a great variety of views of the present war.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address H. G. Bates & Co. 277 W. 23d St., N. Y.

A Sure and Easy Road to French.
Munro's Elementary French Grammar,
On a new method, containing the words most in use, with their pronunciation and signification. It is unsurpassed as a class-book for schools and colleges, and for soldiers, sailors, travelers, and all who are their instructors, it is worth fifty times its price. For sale by all Booksellers and News Agents, and sent, post-paid, on receipt of price—merely nominal—10 cents.
GEORGE MUNRO & CO., 17 William St., N. Y.

BENJAMIN'S RUPTURE CURE TRUSS challenges the world to equal it in retaining and perfectly curing HERNIA, or RUPTURE. Office, 1 Barclay St., opposite the Astor House.

Border and Revolutionary Story.
Beadles Dime Tales Nos. 1. to 10.
Edward S. Ellis. Editor.
The Illustrated articles thus far are as follows:
No. 1. Kenton's Terrible Ride. Mrs. Austin and the Boatman, and young McKown. Murphy saving the Fort.
No. 2. Johnson Boys killing their Captors. Joe Logsdon's Fight with an Indian. Gen. Morgan's Prayer.
No. 3. Sweetland's Hunting Adventure. Henry of Monroe's Brigade. Linda's Twenty-five-Mile Race. Meid Pitcher at Monmouth.
No. 4. Tecumseh Saving the Prisoners. The Young Scribed. Horseshoeing on Pyramus. The Mother's Trip.
No. 5. Captivity of Jonathan Alder. Moody, the Refugee. Women Defending the Wagon. Leap for Life.
No. 6. The Chieftain's Appeal. The Implacable Governor. Mrs. Sheehan at Mooney's Creek. Brady's Leap.
No. 7. Minnesota Massacre. Stephen Bull Hung by Tories. Mrs. Palmer and Putnam. Kenton Saving Boone.
No. 8. Wetzel Saved by his Dog. Benedict Arnold Insulted. Mad Ann, the Huntress. Concealer's Talk.
No. 9. Frontiers, the Virginia Samson. Howard Saved by the Indian Girl. Hughes Killing the Turkey. Hamilton Saving his Cloth.
No. 10. Mgumaainty of Bob-o-nees. Women capturing the Hessian. Battle of Bloody Brook. Heroic Dog.
Ten Cents each Number. For Sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Liberal Terms to Agents. Send for a Catalogue of BEADLE'S DIME BOOKS. BEADLE & CO., Publishers, No. 118 William Street, New York.

SOMETHING NEW.
FOWLER'S ADDING MACHINE, for proving large columns of figures, is the greatest wonder of the day. Send for circular. Address
ADDING MACHINE CO., 218 Broadway.

U. S. Gov. Artificial Leg Depots,
655 Broadway, N. Y.; Rochester, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where the Government furnishes the U. S. Artificial Leg to Soldiers gratis, or its value applied on the Anatomical Ball and Socket-Jointed Leg, which has Several motions the adaptable like the natural one.
DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.
For instructions address Dr. Bly, at nearest Depot.

U. S. Army Agency,
44 Bleecker Street, N. Y., opposite Pay Department.
All pensions having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.
Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid:
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in action.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT
DRY AND GROUND IN OIL
In several fine shades.
For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.
ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT
Hardens and invigorates the Gums
Purifies and restores the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.
Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealer. Price 75 cents per bottle.
HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,
218 Greenwich St., New York.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway below Broome St.
IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGLISH AND GLASS to order or retail trade.
COLORED STONE CHINA DINNER SETS.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris.
Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

Card Photographs.
A splendid assortment. Catalogue sent free. Address D. W. HAVERSTICK, Manufacturer of Chromotes 58 C. N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, stemwind, dial, cut hands, English Movement, and correct time-keeper.
A single one sent free by mail in neat case, with a BEAUTIFUL CHAIN FOR $1.
A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the Army. Send free by mail, for only $7.

$18 European Timekeeper. $18
OR, COMRADE WATCH.
A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Genuine English Jeweled or Nickel Movements," "M. J. TOBIN" Independent Action, Self Balance, and has a NEAT IMITATION COMRADE sunk in the cap and attached to the movements, making it a "Correct Guide" to the Holder or Time of Day, and a perfect keeper, "warranted one year." WILL SPEED ANY, and is sent

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch, Used by the British Army Officers.
Sent free by mail, in elegant Morocco Case, for only $18.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "If it is not over $100 and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated Times says, "Correct timepiece; and for beauty and finish they are equal in appearance to $100 watches."
Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Importers, 38 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

Gold Watch Free
AND
$15 Per Day. $15
Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Selling Gift Enterprise and Prize Packages. $25 CAN BE MADE in a few hours by smart agents. Entirely new combination of Gift Enterprise. Each Package contains large quantity of Sheet Music Materials, Gold Pens, Pencils, Holders, Sets, Jewelry, Patent Fruit Jar Fasteners, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsake, Household Companions, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, Gents' Pocket Calendars for the Year, Union Badges, Names of all Kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Rich and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., the whole worth many times what it bought especially. Price each Package 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid SOLID GOLD or SILVER Hunting Case LEVER WATCH is presented presents to each Agent. Persons wanted to establish Agencies in every town and village. Accounts open Free. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements. Fee. & C. RICARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y., Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the world.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the
SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.
Send for a prospectus as below.
VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, Vinaigre Antiseptic, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 and 65 cts. per bottle. JAPONICA, for the Hair, $1. ESSENCE, Certain, but not Poisonous, restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE PHILOCOME, THE DESIRABLE OIL, 25 cts. MAGNOLIA PHILOCOME, THE EXQUISITE PERFUME, 75 cts. Or the whole of the above, if your druggist has not these articles, will be sent by mail with circular and price to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 113 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

MASON & HAMLIN
One to Twelve Stops. $95 to $550 each.

CABINET ORGANS
An illustrated catalogue free to any address. Address MASON BROTHERS, NEW YORK, or MASON & HAMLIN, BOSTON.

Don't buy your Gaiters or Shoes without Fogg's Patent Lever Buckle.
They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can obtain them from Currency, and I will send sample of two pattern.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

VERMILYE & CO.,
No. 44 Wall Street, New York,
Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.
U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,
converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.
The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

Prepared by Caswell Brothers and Co.
TROPICAL BALSAM,
Known as infallible for the speedy cure of diseases of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest, Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Pain in the Side and Back, Rheumatism, Sore Throat, Quinsy, Diphtheria, Scarlet Fever, Measles, Typhoid Fever, Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, Female Weakness, Irregularities, Suppressions, Whites, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Nervous Headache, Neuralgia, Hysterics, Dizziness, Fits, Spasms, Sick Stomach, Sick Headache, Indigestion, Loss of Appetite, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Cholera Morbus, Cholera Infantum, Colic, Kidney Complaints, Dropsy, Gravel, Stone in the Bladder, Retention of Urine, Incontinence of Urine, Bleeding of the Kidneys, Pain in the Region of the Kidneys, Pain in the Small of the Back, Pain in the Limbs, Pain in the Joints, Pain in the Back, Pain in the Chest, Pain in the Side, Pain in the Stomach, Pain in the Bowels, Pain in the Head, Pain in the Face, Pain in the Teeth, Pain in the Ears, Pain in the Eyes, Pain in the Nose, Pain in the Mouth, Pain in the Throat, Pain in the Lungs, Pain in the Heart, Pain in the Liver, Pain in the Kidneys, Pain in the Bladder, Pain in the Womb, Pain in the Bowels, Pain in the Stomach, Pain in the Back, Pain in the Chest, Pain in the Side

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VIII.—No. 393.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CAPTAIN J. HENRY SLEEPER.

CAPTAIN J. HENRY SLEEPER, who commands the Tenth Massachusetts Battery (and whose Portrait we here give, together with a sketch of the Battery), is a Bostonian by birth, the son of Hon. JACOB SLEEPER, a well-known citizen, and one of the members of the Governor's Council with General BANKS and Mr. ASHMUN. Captain SLEEPER is twenty-three years of age, and has been in the army from the beginning of the war. He entered the service as First Lieutenant in the Fifth Massachusetts infantry, one of the first regiments to respond to the call for troops, and won praise from his superiors for coolness and bravery in the first battle of Bull Run. When his time was out he returned home, but almost immediately joined Captain PORTER'S First Massachusetts Light Battery as Lieutenant. With this battery he made the entire Peninsular Campaign, and was noticed every where for dashing bravery, skill as an artillerist, and coolness under fire.

When new batteries were to be raised, he was called by Governor ANDREW, on the recommendation of the division and corps generals under whom he had served, to assume command of the TENTH MASSACHUSETTS BATTERY. This battery was largely recruited from among the hardy seamen of Marblehead, Lynn, and other small ports of the State; and sailors are famous as artillerists. He drilled his battery carefully and consistently, and when it came into active service it gained at once a reputation for activity and brilliancy of execution.

In the present campaign SLEEPER'S battery has served with the fighting division of the fighting corps of the Army of the POTOMAC, BIRNEY'S Division of HANCOCK'S Corps. It was one of the very few batteries which would not be denied even in the Wilderness battles, but managed by sheer hard work and determination to take part in those terrible actions, when most of the artillery could not be brought to bear on account of the dense woods. By its conduct then and ever since, the battery has gained the sobriquet from the corps of "the saucy battery." The Times correspondent writes of it the following incident of the great fight at Cold Harbor:

"About nightfall a desperate charge was made by the rebels upon our extreme left, where a number of batteries of the Second Corps were in position. In front of these guns, and below their level, was an open field. Rather more than half-way across this space ran our line of breastworks—at this point not more than one hundred yards from those held by the enemy. Every thing was perfectly quiet, mutual respect for each other's fire preventing unnecessary exposure. Suddenly a perfectly deafening volley of musketry was delivered from their works, accompanied by the dismal howling which, in Dixie, has superseded honest cheering, and out they came piling over the breastworks, sad for a short time having things just as they wanted them. Their success was very short-lived, for in a moment SLEEPER'S Tenth Massachusetts Battery, ADAMS'S Rhode Island Battery, Sixth Maine Battery, and others, were pouring canister into them in so effective a manner that they were forced to protect themselves in front of our breast-works, from which, later in the evening, they were expelled. They must have lost more than a thousand in this 'forlorn hope' of a charge."

The New York Evening Post, copying this account, added:

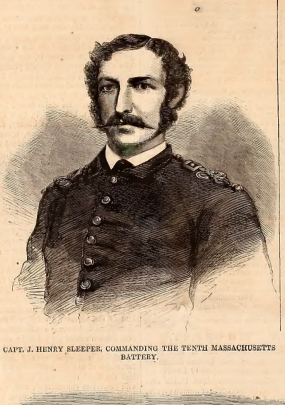
"The Tenth Massachusetts Battery, commanded by Captain J. HENRY SLEEPER, is one of the best in the service. It has been engaged seventeen times since our army crossed the Rapidan, and was one of a very few batteries which managed to get into the fight of Thursday and Friday at the Wilderness. It has come to be called the 'saucy battery' in HANCOCK'S Corps, of which it is part. A private note from an officer of the battery, dated last Thursday, says: 'Our battery has two hundred and fifty yards in advance of any other battery on this line, and the position it has held—with the enemy about one hundred and seventy yards in front—for five days, against two night and three day assaults.'"

Captain SLEEPER is but an example of what qualities the events of the war have developed in many of our young men of wealth. The only son of wealthy parents, before the war broke out he bade fair to lead a life of mere enjoyment. But when the sons of Massachusetts were called to arms, he at once devoted himself to the service of his country. He soon showed that he possessed the qualities needed in a commanding officer. His battery has been repeatedly mentioned in general orders, not only for its conduct under fire but also for its constant good order and efficiency.



CAPT. J. HENRY SLEEPER, COMMANDING THE TENTH MASSACHUSETTS BATTERY.

GENERAL ALEXANDER HAYS.

GENERAL ALEXANDER HAYS, who was killed in one of the first battles of the present campaign in Virginia, was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, about the year 1823, and entered the United States Military Academy at West Point during the year 1840. He graduated on the 30th of June, 1844, standing No. 20 in his class. He was a class-mate with his corps commander, General HANCOCK, and also with General PERSIFFER F. SMITH. On the 1st of July, 1844, he was appointed a brevet Second Lieutenant of the Fourth United States Infantry; and on the 16th of June, 1846, was fully commissioned a Second Lieutenant of the Eighth Infantry. He fought during the Mexican war, and was brevetted from May 9, 1846, First Lieutenant for gallantry, etc., at the battles of Resaca de la Palma and Palo Alto. On

SLEEPER'S BATTERY.—[SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1864.

THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER.

WE print below the letter of the Committee of the National Union Convention informing Mr. LINCOLN of his nomination, and the President's reply. His unanimous renomination by a great popular assembly after three years' administration of the Government is the most honorable and substantial approval of the general policy of that administration. The reply, therefore, is clear, simple, and dignified. The President neither explains nor defends his policy. It has been open to the country, and the country is content. Having been duly faithful and wise in the past, and understanding the infinitely difficult circumstances of his position, loyal men do not fear to trust him for the future.

The single explanation which the President makes in his reply is in regard to the resolution of the Convention upon the French monarchy in Mexico. That resolution expressed in the strongest terms the popular jealousy of all foreign complication, intervention upon this continent as menacing our peace and independence. The President replies that, while fully concurring in the resolution, he ought to prevent misunderstanding by saying that his executive action upon the subject will be unchanged "so long as the state of facts shall leave that position pertinent and applicable." In other words, he does not propose to go to war with France under present circumstances, nor idly threaten to go to war. His position is the true one, and is unified one for the Government of the United States.

The President pays a just and touching tribute to the soldiers and sailors whom neither he nor the country can too heartily honor. And like all that he says or writes, this letter will command the instant and only more hearty approval of the people whom he serves so faithfully and well.

NEW YORK, 14th June, 1864.

Hon. Abraham Lincoln:

SIR,—The National Union Convention, which assembled in Baltimore on the 7th of June, 1864, has instructed us to inform you that you were nominated with unprecedented unanimity for the Presidency of the United States, for four years from the 4th of March next.

The resolutions of the Convention, which we have already had the honor of placing in your hands, are a full and clear statement of the principles which inspired the action, and which, we believe, the great body of Union men in the country heartily approve. Whatever differ ences existed in the national gratitude to our soldiers and sailors; or the national scorn of compromises with guilt, and consequent dishonor; or the patriotic duty of union and success; whether they approve the Proclamation of Emancipation, the Constitutional amendment, the employment of former slaves as Union soldiers, or the solemn obligation of the Government promptly to redress the wrongs of every soldier of the Union of whatever color or race; whether they demand the inviolability of the public faith of the nation, or offer the national hospitality to the oppressed of every race; upon the main issue presented by the Alitaitic and Pacific oceans; whether they recommend public economy and honest taxation, or assert the fixed popular opposition to the establishment by usurpation of a foreign monarchies in the immediate neighborhood of the United States, we believe that these and every other political trust who approve unreservedly the views and policy so indicated in the Resolutions,—and who will support them with the heartiest of profound conviction.

Believing with us, that this is the people's war for the maintenance of a Government which you have justly described as of the people, by the people, for the people, we are very sure that you will be glad to know, not only from the resolutions themselves, but from the singular harmony and unanimity with which they were adopted, how warm is the popular welcome of every measure in the prosecution of the war, which is at once vigorous, humane, and unfaltering at the national purpose itself. No right, for instance, is so precious and sacred to us as the human heart as that of personal liberty. Its violation is regarded with just horror, and universal jealousy. Yet in this hour of peril every faithful citizen submits this, the very stake of national existence and the common welfare, to the chances of war; as the Constitution prescribes in case of rebellion, he sometimes summarily constrained, seizing only such persons as assist the rebellion, and extend to the least detail, that absolutely necessary power shall not be lacking for its speedy exercise.

We believe, Sir, that the honest will of the Union men of the country was never more truly represented than in this Convention. Their purpose was better to make the terror of armed rebellion a fact in the field, and the security of permanent peace and union by liberty and justice under the Constitution. That these results are to be achieved amidst cruel perplexities they are fully aware. That they are to be reached only by cordial unanimity: ensured is undeniable. That good men may sometimes differ as to the means and the time they know. That in the conduct of all human affairs the highest duty is to determine, in the angry conflict of passion, how much good may be practically accomplished, is their sincere persuasion. They have watched your official course, therefore, with unflagging attention; and amidst the bitter taunts of eager friends and the fierce denunciation of enemies, have never-ing to fear for some, now too slowly for others, they have seen you throughout this tremendous contest patient, cagacious, faithful, just; leaning upon the heart of the great mass of the people, and exhibited to be moved by its mighty pulsations.

It is for this reason that, long before the Convention met, the popular instinct had plainly indicated you as its candidate: and the Convention, therefore, merely recorded the popular will. Your clearness and rarest power your unswerving fidelity to the cardinal principles of American Liberty and for the American Constitution. In the name of that Union and that Constitution, we earnestly request your acceptance of this nomination; fervently commending your continued life and you, as Chief Magistrate, with all its trans ons who, on sea and land, are faithfully defending the flag and the principles of equal rights, to the blessing of Almighty God.

We are, Sir, respectfully,

Your friends and fellow-citizens,

WILLIAM DENNISON, Ohio, Chairman.
JOSIAH DRUMMOND, Pennsylvania.
THOMAS E. SAWYER, New Hampshire.
HERALEY BARLOW, Vermont.
A. H. BULLOCK, Massachusetts.
A. M. GARDNER, Rhode Island.
S. E. BURNELL, Connecticut.
G. W. CURTIS, New York.
W. A. NEWELL, New Jersey.
HENRY JOHNSON, Pennsylvania.
A. B. SAUNDERS, Delaware.
W. L. W. SEAMONS, Maryland.
JOHN F. HUME, Missouri.
G. W. HEY, Kentucky.
J. P. TYTUS, Ohio.
CYRUS M. ALLEN, Indiana.
W. BRODSELL, Illinois.
J. F. ALEXANDER, Michigan.
A. W. RANDALL, Wisconsin.
A. OGDEN, Iowa.
THOMAS SIMPSON, Minnesota.
JOHN BIDWELL, California.
THOMAS H. PEARNE, Oregon.
LEROY KELLOGG, Nevada Territory.
A. C. WILDER, Kansas.
M. M. ALLEN, Nebraska.
P. C. GREVES, Nevada.
A. A. ATOCHA, Colorado.
A. S. PADDOCK, Nebraska.
VALENTINE LAWRENCE, Dakota.
JOHN A. NYE, Colorado.
A. B. ARMSTRONG, Arkansas.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1864.

Hon. William Dennison and others, a Committee of the National Union Convention:

GENTLEMEN,—Your letter of the 14th instant, formally notifying me that I was unanimously nominated by the Convention you represent for the Presidency of the United States for four years from the fourth of March next, has been received. The nomination is gratefully accepted, as the resolutions of the Convention—called the platform—are heartily approved.

While the resolution in regard to the supplanting of republican governments by monarchies, I continue, is fully concurred in, there might be misunderstanding were I not to say that my action upon the resolutions in relation to the action of France in Mexico as assumed through the State Department and intimated in the Convention, among the measures and acts of the Executive, will be faithfully maintained so long as the state of facts shall leave that position pertinent and applicable.

I am especially gratified that the soldier and the seaman were not forgotten by the Convention, in the honorable mention and will be remembered by the grateful country for whose salvation they periled their lives.

Thanking you for the kind and complimentary terms in which you have commended the nomination and other proceedings of the Convention, I remain myself,

Your obedient servant,

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

THE great Anniversary returns, and finds the sons of the revolutionary leaders gathering the august and eternal principles of Liberty for which their fathers fought. The Union and Constitution which the courage of those patriots become identified with freedom for all men; and to maintain the Union is to secure the liberty of the people, and to defeat the wicked treachery and factious aristocracy which made the salvation of their special privilege the pretext for destroying the common government.

It is not necessary to refresh our remembrance of the exact principle of the Revolution, because it is still pleaded as an excuse for the rebels. They declare that they are fighting to defend LORD CLARENDARE, after declaring that his lordship's confession of mind upon the subject of it to belligerent Americans, unanswered, fell instantly into a still more melancholy muddle. Earl RUSSELL says:

"Only a few years ago the Americans were in the habit, as we have been, of celebrating the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, and some eminent friends of mine were invited to make eloquent and stirring orations on those occasions. I wish, while they kept up a useful memory, they had also kept up a correct memory of those fellow-countrymen who went to put the principles of 1776 into operation as regards themselves."

Now what were the principles of 1776? They were mainly these, that governments rightfully exist by the consent of the governed: and that when the consent of the population is alienable, and legal redress is hopeless, a people may take up arms to obtain relief by force. British taxation without representation was an unendurable blow at the root of all civil liberty in the colonies. They remonstrated, struggled, tried and petitioned for redress; and finally, for want of redress; and then armed, and fought, and liberated. The argument was complete. The British Constitution provided no other remedy, and revolution was justifiable.

Now, if his Lordship will give ear, the plea of the rebels is not oppression—for until they rebelled they were themselves the Government. They have never pretended that they were injured by a single act of the Government of the United States against which they have risen. They have consequently never sought redress. But, stripped of all subterfuge, they saw that the great mass of the people were opposed to the further extension and strengthening of the system of human slavery upon this continent, and so—unwilling that the consent of the people should be the basis of the Government—declaring that each State was and always had been sovereign, and might secede when it pleased, they caused armed States to declare their secession; thus asserting as a grave principle of political polity a pretense which could not be even pleaded for a moment in any individual agreement.

It was a rebellion, his Lordship will remember, against a Government which exists by the consent of the governed, and in which the voice of the majority signifies that consent. The rebels do not pretend that they are a majority of the people represented in that government, but only of a certain part of the people; as if a majority in Yorkshire should rise against the British empire, and then plead the necessity of the consent of the people to the government. Who are the people under the Government against which the rebellion is directed? They are plainly a majority of all the citizens, not the majority of a sectional minority. There is indeed no more justification for the rebellion upon the right of the people to be governed by their own consent than there is for an insurrection in any street of London against the lawful municipal authority. The rebellion is the repudiation of the principle of popular consent as the rightful source of government.

The rebels have with Mr. CALHOUN their father, have indeed long asked, "what shall protect the minority from the tyranny of a majority?" The answer is plain, the general welfare. The whole American system proceeds upon the ground that an intelligent people knows what is best for its general interests much better than any single man, or body of men, or section of country can know. Its claim is not that it is absolutely perfect, but that, in view of human nature and of all that is history, the rule of an intelligent majority secures, upon the whole, greater justice to every individual and a higher average of general well-being than any other form of government that has been tried.

His Lordship, and the other skeptics of the popular capacity for self-rule and abroad, may assert that ours is not a purely Democratic Government or rule of the simple majority. They will remind us that ours is a mixed system, to which other elements as individuals are parties. But his Lordship will not forget that the people of this country, who are the primary source of political power, have been confirming a portion of that power upon the States themselves by the supreme sovereignty to the United States. The United States is not a league or a confederacy or a partnership, but a Union. The precedents of Greece and of the Middle Ages in Italy, of the Batavian republic, of the Hanseatic League, and of the German confederations, indeed, all precedents whatever of confederated States hitherto known are of no value in considering the American Union. Our fathers had seen the crumbling and shadowy and ineffective confederacies of ancient and modern times. They had the fatal defects of their own enemy and powerless confederacy, and, warned by the inevitable perils of any League of States in which the majority could, had any constituting veto, it rejected them all. The American Union blended separate States into a nation, with every national prerogative and power. By Union we mean Nation. To be a Union man is to be a national man. To save the Union is to save the nation.

The plea of absolute and final State sovereignty, which is made the excuse of this rebellion, is a plea expressly invented for the purpose of justifying rebellion. It was a sophism intended to confuse the minds of an ignorant and prejudiced part of the population. States and nation, or union, are twin forms under which the people choose to exercise their power. Behind both are the people, and the same people. Evidently they do not mean that any number of them shall assert a radical opposition upon the ground of their action as a State. They assert, as they feel, their solidarity. South Carolina is a room in the house which shall not and can not be erected into a separate dwelling.

With his Lordship's permission the inexcusable confusion of Lord CLARENDARE's mind has extended to his own, and he could as legitimately excuse a London pickpocket for resisting the English law by the principles of '76 as justify a larger rebellion against the laws of another country upon the same ground. A fleet of pirates are as much murderous outlaws as one cut-throat. The means and method of subjugating them into obedience to the law must be proportioned to their numbers, their determination, and their resources. Consequently in the case of the rebellion has been proportioned to the form and operations of war. But the armies of GRANT and SHERMAN are still doing only the work of a national police. They are enforcing the laws. They are maintaining the will of the people. Among the hot hills of Georgia and in the blazing front of Petersburg they are asserting the original American doctrine, the principles of 1776, that governments exist by the consent of the governed, and that the natural rights of all the people shall not be destroyed by the furious passion of a few.

OUR LOSSES IN THE CAMPAIGN.

A FAVORITE trick of the enemies of the Government is to whisper with mysterious shrugs and starts that our losses in GRANT's campaign have been "awful," "murderous," "unprecedented." Indeed, if we should rely upon the truth of some of the absurd stories told by country Copperheads, whose desire of our defeat is stronger than their fair arithmetic, GRANT would now have about 15,000 men left. Unfortunately, a correspondent of the Tribune, writing from the Army of the Potomac on the 14th of May, in the wild excitement of the tremendous battles, said that our losses so far were 40,000 men, and this number was enormously printed among the headings of the army news in the Tribune of May 12. This report was instantly seized upon as inspired by rebel sympathy, and the apostles of "peace" immediately threw up their eyes and hands at such fratricidal slaughter. The story was sent by them to their friends abroad; and in his late speech at the British House of Lords, LORD CLANRICARDE stated that in the opening of the contest 40,000 had been sacrificed. Such rumors are pernicious, and the more so that it is perfectly easy to circulate them with an air of defying contradiction.

Will those, therefore, who are so ready to hope or to fear that our loss has been disproportioned to such a campaign calmly reflect that on the 11th of May General GRANT informed the War Department that his list in killed and missing had been overstated, and that on the 23d of May SECRETARY STANTON announced that the army was in high spirits and more completely equipped than when the campaign opened; while on the 27th of June, after the reverse at the Weldon Railroad, one of the episodes that occur in every victorious campaign—Assistant Secretary DANA announces that the rebel force is not more than two-thirds of GRANT's, that our losses during the previous week were unimportant in a military view, and that there are 10,000 rebel prisoners in our hands. There is official information that our loss in killed from the Rapidan to the James was not more than 4000, the casualties of every kind at about 25,000, and the deaths of the wounded about 2000, or from four to five per cent. Of the wounded a large proportion are only temporarily disabled.

These facts should be borne in mind, as also the ease with which stories of disaster are magnified and distorted. That the army of Grant is maintained by a and loss of life and wide bereavement and desolation is but too true. But it is no less true that the particles who are striking at the common parent are themselves terribly shattered, and that the hand which holds them now is one they can not hope to shake off. And grant a speedy end to this necessary war in the triumph of the nation and Liberty over rebellious slavery! But by every drop of human blood shed for us we are consecrated to the accomplishment of the purpose which makes the war holy.

THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.

WHILE RICHMOND is not taken there are those who declare General GRANT's campaign a failure. That his object was and is to capture that city and to destroy LEE's army is undoubtedly true; and equally so that he has not yet succeeded. But that is failure, his campaign has failed exactly as the rebellion has failed. That counted upon cotton, European support, and the demoralization, party-spirit, and division of the North, as inducing it to accomplish a revolution without a serious struggle. It has been utterly disappointed and baffled. For three years it has been wrestling with its strength, its will, its spirit, its prospects, and its territory have alike diminished. Are any of the gentlemen who proclaim GRANT's failure ready to acknowledge that of the rebellion? No; they are not. They inform us that the rebellion is virtually successful. The ground of the assertion is that it is still fighting. But if such reasoning proves that LEE has succeeded, how can it prove that GRANT has failed? He has not taken Richmond, and the Confederate flag is not flaunted from that point is still disputed. Neither contestant has wholly succeeded; neither has entirely failed.

But viewed merely as a military movement how do the facts appear? GRANT crossed the Rapidan, hoping to route LEE's army and advance upon Richmond. LEE fell upon GRANT's flank, hoping to destroy him, and advance upon Washington. After two days' fierce fighting GRANT forces LEE back, or LEE, seeing he had himself upon the Rapidan, retires to Spottsylvania, his second line. GRANT tries LEE's position there and then flanks him. LEE falls back on his third line at the North Anna, flanks him and LEE retires to his fourth line upon the Chickahominy. GRANT tries that position, and then flanks him again, forcing LEE to meet him at Petersburg. Now did not LEE prefer to defeat GRANT isolated upon the south bank of the Rapidan, fifty miles from Richmond rather than to meet him at Petersburg fifteen miles from Richmond close to his best base and with a fleet and BUTLER's intrenchments to support him? If LEE has had GRANT just where he wanted him, was it in the Wilderness, or at Spottsylvania, or the North Anna, or the Chick-shominy, that he wanted him? for the remark has been made of each successive position. That he has him at Petersburg just where he wanted him has not yet been asserted, but in the last movement of GRANT, LEE was as utterly outgeneraled as POPE was by STONEWALL JACKSON in the summer campaign of 1862.

The generalship of LEE in this campaign consists in a timely but baffled attack upon GRANT'S advancing column at the Wilderness; from that day, Friday, the 6th of May, a continuous falling back to intrenchments in consequence of the swiftness and surprise of GRANT'S combinations. These was indeed nothing else for him to do, but to do it shows no remarkable generalship. If LEE had advanced instead of GRANT and had fought away from Culpepper to Warrenton, and from Warrenton to Manassas, and from Manassas, swinging round across the Potomac, were now threatening Washington from Bladensburg, we should hardly have considered that falling steadily back under such flankings was an illustrious proof of great generalship upon the part of GRANT. But if, when LEE swung along GRANT'S flank and crossed the Potomac, GRANT knew nothing of it, but prepared to meet him at Alexandria, the best possible thing for us to do when LEE turned up at Bladensburg would be to say that now GRANT had him just where we wanted him.

This was precisely the case with LEE. When GRANT disappeared from before his Chickahominy lines he did not know it. When the day broke and showed him that GRANT was gone, he sent out his skirmishers for several miles. When he found that he was out of the presence of GRANT'S entire army, he hastened to meet him upon the north bank of the James, and while he was forming his line there, GILLMORE GRANT, by one of the most daring and triumphant military movements in history, had crossed the James River, and lifting his army out of the deadly swamps of the Chickahominy, had planted it upon the pleasant, open country around Petersburg, resting directly upon the most accessible base, and flanking the Union front. Manifestly the best thing for the rebels and their Northern friends to say, under the circumstances, is, that at last LEE has GRANT just where he wanted him.

Further developments of this most exciting campaign will doubtless rapidly appear. As yet it is simply undecided. To call it a failure at this point is as much as to call the rebellion a success. The campaign is a failure exactly as that against Vicksburg was until Vicksburg fell; exactly as every enterprise fails until it succeeds.

A SOUTH CAROLINA ODE FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY.

A few weeks since we published part of the following ode, attributed by a correspondent in New Jersey to the late HON. THOMAS S. GRIMKE of South Carolina. It was not written by him, however, but by the late REV. SAMUEL GILMAN of Charleston. Originally written for the Fourth of July during the war of nullification, we gladly reproduce it, after thirty-three years, for the Fourth of July during the civil war of secession. The friend who sent it to us remarked that this ode has kept out South Carolinian, at least, true to the Union.

UNION ODE.

COMPOSED FOR THE UNION FETE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Written July 4, 1831.

Air—"Stars who have set" Wallace Hill."

Hail, our Country's natal morn,
Hail, our expanding kindred-born,
Hail, thou banner, not yet torn,
Waving o'er the free!

While this day in fetal throng
Millions swell the Patriot song,
Shall not we thy votive throng
Hallowed Jubilee?

Who would sever Freedom's shrine?
Who would draw the fratricidal line?
Though by birth on one spot he mine,
Dear is all the rest.

Dear to me the South's fair land;
Dear the mountain-bounded land;
Dear New England's rocky strand;
Dear the Lakelet West.

By our altars, pure and free;
By our soil's unbought fertility;
By the Fast's dread memory;
By our Washington;

By our common kindred tongue,
By our hopes—bright, buoyant, young;
By the ties of country strong,
We will still be one!

Fathers—long ye built in vain!
Ages!—mark ye droop again!
Mock'd—defeated—for ruinly chain
Blessings sent by slice!

No! Receive our solemn vow,
While bends the Heaven we bow,
Ever to nourish, as now,
Union, Liberty!"

NEW BOOKS.

AMONG the most important of the new books is the "Savage Africa" of MR. W. WINWOOD READE, republished by HARPERS. It is a most interesting addition to their library of books of discovery and adventure in Africa. BARTH, LIVINGSTONE, SPEKE, ANDERSSON, BURTON, DU CHAILLU, WYLDE, WITH CUMMING, BALDWIN, and READE, tell us all that is now known of Africa, and they are all included in the HARPER'S African series. MR. READE makes his bow in this manner: "If I have any merit, it is that of having been the first young man about town to make a bona fide tour in Western Africa: to travel in that agreeable and salubrious country with no special object and at his own expense; to sleep in the virgin forest; to flirt with pretty savages, and to smoke his cigar among cannibals." This preface he dates from "the Conservative Club;" and his African journey was evidently made in much the same spirit as the Norwegian and Far West journeys of other more young Englishmen, whose gaunt sleeve is not satisfied with the round of London life, but feels in its blood an impulse of the old Vikings and explorers. MR. READE writes himself a fellow of the Geographical Society of England, and a correspondent of the Paris, which may be considered his credentials as a traveler. His course was partly that of DU CHAILLU, and was confined to the western coast. His book is extremely interesting, and his speculations, fortified by facts of observation, upon the origin, character, and capacity of the negro, whom he has a very unnecessary and amusing contempt, are extremely suggestive. He has a surprising, quick, clear-sighted, he sees every thing that is to be seen if he does not think all that is to be thought. He holds, for instance, that a fat, making the slave-trade a crime is "brutal and absurd." But a clever dandy of the Conservative Club lounging through savage Africa must have loved his little paradoxes. It is not as a thinker, or statesman, or poet that MR. READE is to be considered, but as a keen and lively observer. He has not yet forgot the Club and his manly qualities come to this play, he is our most entertaining companion of travel. His style is flowing and lucid. He is never a bore either with philosophy or pedantry, and his publishers have made a handsome book of it.

"Cousin Phillis" (HARPER & BROTHERS) is a delicate little love story, attributed by the London papers, without denial, to MISS ANNA THACKERAY, writes with the facility of one who writes for her own pleasure, and the grace of one who writes not unworthy of her father's daughter. It is legitimate fiction, an entertaining book for the cars or for a morning by the sea.

"President Lincoln's Administration," by HENRY J. RAYMOND (DERBY & MILLER), is an admirable summary of the official career of MR. LINCOLN. It contains his important State papers and messages, and is a most convenient political hand-book of the times. It is also a monument to the honorable ability of the President, whom the friends of JEFFERSON DAVIS characterizes as "a joker," with the same propriety that a weaver would have contemptuously called CROMWELL a man with a wart on his nose.

Under the title of "Pulpit Ministrations," the HARPERS publish two stately volumes of sermons by DR. GARDINER SPRING, who has been many years a modern New York clergyman. They are discourses upon Christian duties and doctrines, and we commend them also to the hearty sympathy of the large religious communion of which the Doctor is an illustrious ornament.

MR. PARTON'S "Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin" (MASON BROTHERS), is an elaborate work; but the copious treatment is justified by the unparalleled charm of the subject, for the lives of few men are more interesting and instructive than that of FRANKLIN'S. MR. PARTON'S delightful sympathy with his theme, his patient research, and his lively and picturesque style, and his conscientious habit of situating his mind with all accessible information, have enabled him to write what will become the standard biography of the most American of men.

The Guide-Book of the Central Railroad of New Jersey (HARPER & BROTHERS), is an illustrated hand-book of that line, from Jersey City, through the Valley of Wyoming, and the picturesque coal region of New Jersey, one of the most delightful and interesting summer trips from the city. It may be accomplished in three-days, or in a week, or in a longer time, and we do not know that any other book shows him exactly where and how to go, and what to see. It is a trip which, if better known, would be much oftener taken.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM THE NAVY AGENT.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I am loath to ask that the public will form an opinion unfavorable, in regard to myself and my conduct of the Navy Agency at this port until, in the first place, the charges now offered I am accused of by the Government; and until, in the second place, I shall have had an opportunity to confront me, as well as the charge made already by MR. SAVAGE, himself a prisoner in Fort Lafayette and charged with those identical treasonable crimes, can be submitted to judicial investigation.

In the mean time I deny most positively that I have in any way or manner wronged the Government or any private person; I assert in the most positive manner that I have discharged my duties as Navy Agent with the strictest honor, and, with the utmost care and fidelity. And I entreat all men in this community to believe this until the contrary is proved. I have, I think, a right to ask this, as one who has spent years in this community in the service of his country, and who has always maintained a character without stain or reproach.

I. HENDERSON.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE—June 22. The House bill authorizing negotiations with the Indian tribes of Oregon for relinquishment of certain privileges was passed.—The bill to prevent military interference in elections was passed, with an amendment allowing the presence of military in the vicinity of the polls to repel armed enemies of the United States or to preserve the peace.—The Senate bill to amend the law passed authorizing continued transfers of men from the Army to the Navy; giving twenty-five thousand dollars as compensation to the officers and crew of the gun-boat Essex for destroying the rebel ram Arkansas; appropriating two hundred thousand dollars for the establishment of a navy yard and depot at Cairo; providing for the punishment of those who aid or encourage desertion, and for the relief of officers and crews of vessels wrecked or sold in the service.—The House joint resolution relative to the appointment of one part of his counsel for holding the Jacksville Fortress and Dictator was, after some debate, adopted without amendment.—Resolutions were also adopted calling on the President for the report of the Commissioner of Emigration and for any correspondence in the expulsion of negroes.

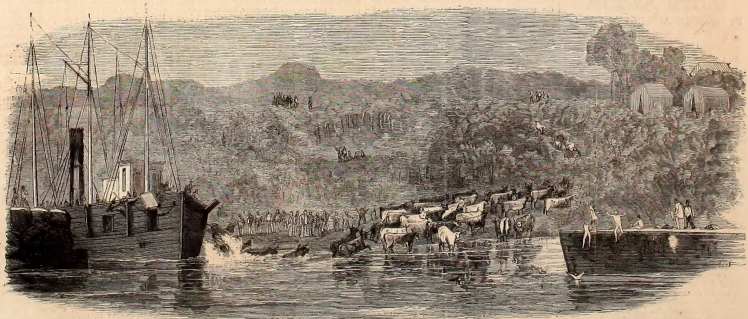
June 23. The House Post Route bill and the bills remitting duties on the importation for Sanitary Fairs and providing compensation to officers and soldiers for property sacrificed while in the service of their country were passed.—The House joint resolution making provision to aid the delivering of the correspondence for payment of soldiers in the Western departments was adopted.—The bill to repeal the Revenue Act was passed by 71 to 61 and reconstituted in 1860 was passed by a vote of 77 to 12. The bill levying taxes and equalizing the House was taken up.—DAVIS addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the amendment, which he characterized as a surprising, quick, clear-sighted, he sees every thing that is to be seen if he does not think all that is to be thought. He holds, for instance, that a fat

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.—TRANSPORTATION OF HANCOCK'S CORPS ACROSS THE JAMES AT WILCOX'S LANDING.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WARD.—[SEE PAGE 462.]

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL HAYS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL F. C. BARLOW.—[SEE PAGE 445.]

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—A VIEW ON THE PAMUNKEY.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 442.]



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—LANDING OF CATTLE FOR THE USE OF THE ARMY.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 442.]

MAP ILLUSTRATING GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE BLANK HEART OF THE SCAPE-GRACE.

EDGAR was left to enjoy the remainder of his Chambertin alone. He did ample justice to it, and was further privileged to smoke his cigar—a favor not extended to any other male visitor. It was perhaps as well, for the sake of peace and quiet, that the baroness did not "receive" when Edgar favored the establishment with his presence. To tell the truth, he rather alarmed the feeble old ladies and gentlemen who composed his grand-aunt's social circle. He was a little too boisterous, and a little too insolent; and the old ladies and gentlemen, who were high-spirited, albeit feeble, declined, sometimes with considerable warmth, to bow to his dictation. But to his aunt he must always be Lord Paramount. She invariably deferred to him. He could never be in the wrong. Was he not her grand-nephew, the only being upon earth left to remind her of her English kindred?

The outbreak of the great French revolution had found Madame de Kergolay young, beautiful, and the wife of a nobleman of ancient descent and great wealth, distinguished in arms, and high in his sovereign's favor. In the haughty province of Brittany there was no statue better tended, and no chateau more stately, than belonged to the Kergolays of Vieux Sablons. The baroness bore her husband two daughters. They were destined to mate with nobles of as illustrious a line as their own. The revolution came sweeping down like a crimson deluge on society, and all was engulfed beneath its waves. M. de Kergolay emigrated, leaving his wife and infant children concealed in a convent in Paris. The manor-house of Vieux Sablons was sacked by the revolutionary troops, taken by a band of Chouan peasants, besieged, captured, its defenders slaughtered, itself at last gutted, fired, and demolished from basement to coping-stone. The convent in which Madame de Kergolay and her daughters had taken refuge was suppressed by the Convention, and the nuns were driven forth with blows and insults, some to perish of starvation, many to die on the Place de la Révolution. The Baron de Kergolay left the emigrant camp of Condé in disgust, and sought his wife in Paris. He was discovered, flung into the Conciergerie, and guillotined. Her husband's brothers, and scores of her relatives and friends, had already undergone the same fate. Her widowhood was yet green upon her when she, too, was arrested and cast into the Abbaye. There, after a short time, both her children died of malignant fever. The smell of so much blood, the poor woman said, choked them. When Fouquier Tinville denounced the femme Kergolay before the revolutionary tribunal, she was half frantic, and a feeble fitter subject for a cell as Bicêtre than for the judgment of a criminal court. But she was condemned to death nevertheless. The revolutionary tribunal did not stick at trifles. All was fish that came to the net of terrorism. The Baronne de Kergolay was arraigned in the fatal camisole, and was mounting the cart which was to convey her to the scaffold, when the fall of Robespierre obtained for her a temporary reprieve, ultimately enlarged into a pardon. But she was not the less a proscribed and ruined ci-devant. She herself used to describe how she had begged for alms on the Quai des Orfèvres. After a period of unutterable privation and destitution, a friend found her out and stealthily helped her. That friend was her former footman from Vieux Sablons, Thomas Prudence. He had prospered, and grown wealthy even. The shipwreck had cast him, too, on the waves, but he had been strong and buoyant, and battled with them, and, clinging to spars and hen-coops, had been saved. A portion of the sequestrated manor of Vieux Sablons was bestowed upon him by the Convention. He was looked upon with horror by the loyalist peasants as an acquirer of the national domains. Half a dozen attempts were made to assassinate him. He took army contracts, and waxed rich, and was hated by the Chouanerie. His house was decorated with fragments of the rich furniture and fittings of the chateau of Vieux Sablons. He was a staunch republican. He contrived, however, to furnish his old mistress with funds enabling her to reach England, and during her lengthened residence there, from 1796 to the fall of Napoleon, nearly twenty years, he conveyed to her no less a sum than ten thousand pounds sterling. It was like a mere trifle, he said—a wreck, a windfall—but it was all hers. Nay, he took advantage of the peace of Amiens to freight a sloop at Nantes with the articles he had saved from the dismantled château, and send them to her whose he still called his châtelaine and benefactress.

Madame de Kergolay went down into Lubcaben and abode for a long time at Preston, much beloved and respected by the old Catholic families in those parts. But the race to which she herself belonged, the Greyfaunes, she believed, decayed and almost extinct. One nephew, a country gentleman with estates mortgaged to their last rood, she discovered. The son of that nephew was Edgar Greyfaunt, who was born just before Waterloo.

When all was over with Napoleon, the Baronne de Kergolay, who had been living on the interest of the money sent her by Thomas Prudence, and who had even managed to put by some twenty hundred pounds of savings from her income, returned to France. It was not long before she heard of Thomas. The collapse of the Empire, which had restored her to society, had ruined him. On the profits of his army contracts he had started a cotton manufactory. He might have become a second Richard Lenoir; but peace came, and Manchester, all prohibitive and protective enactments notwithstanding, poked its nose of smoking brick into France, and Thomas Prudence was ruined. Madame de Kergolay hastened to the succor of the man who had saved her from starvation. But Thomas was old, and wanted little. "I am sick of commerce," he said. "My failure is a punishment for having taken contracts under the usurper, Dianire! how the rouleaux used to roll in, though! But that is all over now. I am growing old and foolish. Let me come back to you, Madame la Baronne, and be your footman. Promote me to be your butler, if you like. I have my old livery still by me, and I will serve you as faithfully as I did in the days when you were the Châtelaine of Vieux Sablons."

"You shall be my friend and adviser in the evening of my days," cried Madame de Kergolay, clasping the old man's hand.

And so, indeed, Thomas Prudence, otherwise Vieux Sablons, was; but he would never consent to divest himself of his livery, or to consider himself as any thing but an attached and favored menial of the proud house of Vieux Sablons.

In this light—the menial light—without the attachment or the favor, the octogenarian was regarded by the gentleman young gentleman now sipping his Chambertin and smoking his cigar. This high and mighty prince, precisely as he thought it the most natural thing in the world that his grand-aunt should spoil and idolize himself, deemed it a matter of course that Vieux Sablons should be his very obedient, humble, obsequious, and contemned servant. A hundred times he had heard from his grand-aunt the story of the old man's devotion and self-sacrifice. He thought that a very natural thing too. He knew perfectly well that every sou the baroness possessed had been given to her by the wornout lackey; but he treated him with calm and disdainful insolence. "Well," he would sometimes acknowledge, when remonstrated with by his grand-aunt for some unusual act of contemptuousness toward the ancient servitor, "perhaps he had at one time rendered some sort of service to the family. But it was ever so long ago. Besides, it was his duty; and the romantic kind of gratitude was only possible in virtuous dramas at the Gymnase." I wonder what would become of the world if acts of duty such as Thomas Prudence had performed were only possible in virtuous dramas at a six-hour?

One most salient characteristic of Edgar Greyfaunt would be overlooked if it were omitted to mention that he entertained a profound contempt for the people among whom he was domiciled. He went into French society, and of the best, because his relationship to Madame de Kergolay opened to him doors of doors in France, while his English reputation would have been quite powerless in like regard in the country of his birth. He spoke French fluently, because he had been brought up at the College Louis le Grand; but no protectionist farmer had ever a livelier dislike and heartier contempt for the French than Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt. He held the Greyfaunts of Launcaster to be infinitely superior in point of extraction, manners, and style, not only to the Kergolays, but to all the Rohans, Noailles, Condés, or Montmorencys in the Libro d'Oro of France. As, however, it was only by allowance his grand-aunt made him that kept him from starving, he resigned himself to his lot, and contented himself with abusing and despising at the people in whose midst he lived. "I have a turn for drawing and painting," he would remark to any English exquisite who for the time to time met in Paris; "and so, as a gentleman must do something in a profession, and there are no field-sports worth having, and the Church is impossible, and Literature as smelly and vulgar, and the Bar low, I mean to set up a lady to place me with Delaroche, who lets me do what I like, and makes much of me. In France, you know, it is the custom for men to go into society. David, the scoundrel, was a buvon; and so was Gros; and they give the plentiful loan of crosses and red ribbons. A fellow doesn't mind going in for art if he's looked up to, and is decorated, and goes to court with all that kind of thing. But it wouldn't do in England, you know. I should be obliged to go into the army or something of that sort, and keep the paint-pot dark." After which profound exposition of the proprieties Prince Greyfaunt's exquisite friend would quite shake his head very sensibly, and that so long as he remained in that confounded hole, meaning Paris, it was just as well to spoil canvas as to do nothing at all. But he must never forget, they told him, what he owed to society, and that Edgar was (meaning his grand-aunt) died, and cut up well, he would return to his native country, live as a gentleman should, and keep the paint-pots very dark indeed.

Prince Edgar had come to the end of the second reign, and Madame Chamberlin too, if he had taken his coffee, his petit verre, and his chasse. It was nearly ten o'clock. On his condescending visits the valet of the Marais were prolonged until eleven, and it now occurred to him that he might join the ladies. "There will be no more than the abbé prosing away as usual," he remarked, with a yawn, "but I suppose I must endure him." Presently a new smile came over his face as he thought that he had spoken of Lily as one of the "ladies." Who was the little thing? He would ask Victor Salbons.

"A protégée of Madame la Baronne," replied the servitor, with a low bow.

"Charity, I suppose?" continued the young man.

"The usual charity and benevolence of Madame la Baronne," replied Thomas, laying respectful emphasis on the words.

"And I should say that does not consider that her charity has a tendency to eat her natural heirs out of house and home. Upon my word, her house is a receptacle for the lame, the halt, and the blind. I do believe that half the people who come here are no better than a pack of old paupers. My friends call this Grand Hôpital de Mendicité. Who is that Babette, for instance?"

"Charity," repeated Victor Sablons, "but a very excellent and faithful servant."

"As you have been yourself, no doubt, my most exemplary Victor Sablons," said Edgar, as he lazily rose. "I wonder where my aunt picked up that little English girl. You don't know?"

"No, sir," responded the ex-contractor, tellingly, with the purest intentions, a deliberate falsehood.

"Out of the gutter, I presume. My aunt is not particular. She prefers rags to ermine. The little thing is passable. What do you think, hey?"

"Monsieur is good enough to say so."

"She is more than passable, most respectable fox. Have you any kissing about you in the pantry?"

"I respect my mistress and benefactress, I respect youth and innocence, and I respect myself," said the old man, in a low voice.

"The first two know all about it as an old story. The second is youth and innocence's affair. The third concerns yourself, and is no very important matter. Well, I will go and see the little thing, and draw her out. Upon my honor she is a great deal more than passable."

And flinging his napkin on the table he condescended to strroll into the drawing-room.

"Monsieur Edgar Greyfaunt," muttered the old servant, as he clattered to and fro with the paraphernalia of the table, putting every thing in its place in cupboard and pantry, "you are a gentilhomme; and the grand-nephew of my beloved mistress; and clever, and handsome, and very fashionable; but, upon my word, I think you have no more heart than this empty bottle."

He was holding the flask of Chamberlin in his hand. There was just a drain of the rare old wine left, and he poured it into a glass and drank it off, and smacked his thin old lips. "Although but dregs the drain was generous, and gave him courage for a bolder thought.

"And, upon my word, Monsieur Edgar Greyfaunt," he concluded, "my private opinion is, that you are a very finished scoundrel, and will come to a bad end."

A little after eleven o'clock the Prince lighted a cigar and went down to see the Angelus.

"How much money has he asked you for?" said the abbé, as the door closed behind Edgar.

"Five thousand francs," replied the baroness, putting her handkerchief to her eyes. "Poor dear fellow, he says he will be ruined if I consent to raise that sum by Tuesday next. Dear abbé, you must go to-morrow to my notary."

"And you have but ten thousand francs a year. Madame la Baronne, this misguided youth will be the ruin of you."

The Abbé Chatain was quoting the room with long soft strides, but a most melancholy visage.

"Let him be ruined," he resumed, hulting. "Better that he should ruin than you, than your widows and orphans, than your beggars and penitents. Let him suffer. It may do him good."

"Lily did not hear this lugubrious conversation. She was in bed. By the time the abbé had departed she was asleep, dreaming of Edgar Greyfaunt.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

POOR LITTLE LILY.

Woe for the wife of a man who is a woman now. She woke up the next morning, and was loved the following night.

Had any one come to her, and said, "Lily, you are in love," she would have denied the impeachment, have repudiated the charge. She would have pleaded that she knew nothing about love; that all she had read had been fables, and based but few persons talk about love; that she had been quite Alone all her life, and, in default until very recently of the Bunnyrabbit, had had no love her, was ignorant of the precise manner in which affection, although directed toward another object, should be manifested.

Woe for the little woman! She loved the Scrape-grace nevertheless.

Love came to her as he smirking Cupid with purple wings to fetter her with shackles made of wreaths of roses. Love came to her as young shepherd, as in the tapestries in the baroness's chamber, with flowers in his wig, and ribbons to his crook. Love came to her with a kiss, and against her little bed, and said, "I am here; and, henceforth, you must be my slave and bondservant."

She was too weak to battle with him. She was too candid to deny him. She was too good to tell a lie to herself, and call love liking. She acknowledged him, bowed down before him, and gave herself up to him, a submissive, truthful captive.

It seemed to be a love to which there had been no beginning. It was there when she woke up in bed. Marriage—she thought never entered her head. Passion—she knew not what passion was. To be beloved appeared to her almost a hope that he whom she loved would ever return her love, or even know of it. Love was more the silken chain side of the love of a child for her doll; and from the sublime to the ridiculous there was, as a rule, but one step. Love was a mysterious affection on an object which was, to her, inanimate and unconscious; to pour terms of affection into and out of her mirror because it reflected her face over breathless lips, to cherish an image which, without, is only paint, and varnish, and scraps of ribbon; and, without, is a mere glass plate, this is what the child does with her doll; and this is what Lily Floris did with Edgar. To call Edgar Greyfaunt, who she had built up in the corner of her soul. A spruce Fetish, forsooth. A golden calf, or one of those idols of the old Marwest Dutch metal. A curled and oiled Mumbo-Jumbo; but she worshiped it in secret, and with a devouring adoration. Edgar was to her a dreary childhood, been given more dolls to play with, she might not, perhaps, have been so ready to fall in love with the first male creature whom that was called Edgar Greyfaunt.

Do you reproach her for falling in love at first sight? Silly girl! Do you age, and loving as she did, usually do so. The prudent virgins are vaccinated, and take their chances of love in the mildest form; albeit, on them, often, in middle life, the disease falls again with appalling virulence, and kills them. The Edgar Greyfaunts catch the infection at once, and have it hot and strong; and happy are those who get over it, and rise again, cured, but unscarred by love.

Besides, is there any love at first sight? One doubts it. Is not the love at first sight coeval with the object that is to be beloved merely the realization of an ideal that has been nourished in the heart for years? Is not Edgar, even as it though she had always been thinking of Edgar Greyfaunt ever since she was a child, and now he had come. She had always loved, and would always continue to love him.

Had there been two parties to this amorous action a third might have interposed in the suit. An interpleader might have arisen in the shape of jealousy. Lily would have dreamt of a rival, feared her, hated her perhaps; for as it is in the power of Love to mollify and sweeten all evil thoughts, so it is unhappily within his attributes to turn all that is good into poison and venom. But Lily was plaintiff, defendant, counsel, attorney, judge, jury, usher, and audiency all in one. She stated her own case, and replied to herself. She summed up herself, and herself gave the verdict, and herself delivered the verdict. It was always to the same effect: that she loved Edgar Greyfaunt.

But he, handsome, gifted, courted—did he love, was he beloved by, another? Well, Lily thought upon this sometimes, and trembled, and her heart swooned within her. But she was not much distressed by the thought. Love is so far merciful as not promptly to insist on the unknown eventuality. If the young who love in secret suffered the torture of four without intermission they would go out and drown themselves. If a man of threescore years and ten, who loves Life, were to be imminent, were always dwelling upon death, he would never be able to eat his dinner. Oblivion for the mind is as necessary as rest for the body, and is as beneficently meted out to us. Labor and thought without surcease, would be intolerable.

The spiteful magician Love has the art of making all things appear as they are not; and has been reviving for that trick ever since he made the Fairy Queen enamored of the weaver clown that had the jackass's head instead of his own. Old age, for thousands of years before that, maybe, he worked the same rascally spell. Love can transfer, transfuse, transmute, conjure. He leaves just enough of ruins up the slave to cock's feathers, give the wolf sheep's clothing; and transforms the ass into a duke, the pumpkin into a goose-girl, the pumpkin into a coach and six, and the Beast into Prince Azor; quite as often, before now, the Beast is a Beauty at the end of the chapter, only Beauty is stricken by Love with color-blindness, and mistakes rusty black for gold-embroidery. To Lily Edgar Greyfaunt was at once (but it was all conjuring) invested with the most lovable attributes of the most lovable person in creation. He had sat by her side at the dinner, and kissed her when she left the room. Of course, he loved her, in an arbitrary little parliament, an act for transferring stock; and under this act all the love standing in the Million Love, in the name of Will, Sum Long was handed over to Edgar Greyfaunt. Then she pled Pelion upon Ossa: she buttered the fat pig; she gilded the refined gold; she smothered her idol with roses. She gave him all the love she felt for the school-mates who had been kind to her, and for the Bunnyrabbit, and for the hood-hearted folks at Cutwig & Co.'s; for the very courier on board the steamer who had treated her with "piggolate." And lastly, she bestowed upon the vacuous inane Fetish (oh! but he was so handsome!) all the immeasurable love she should have felt for the parents who had neglected and abandoned her. Was there none love for Madame Kergolay, for kindly Madame Prudence, for the homely Babette, for the cheery Victor Sablons, for the good priest? Well perhaps there was some love for them; but would you have? When the Houses of Parliament are all ablaze, who thinks of the ethereal fluid that caught fire in the second floor back in the Horsefery Road?

So pale one morning, overpowering love did she give the handsome Fetish, that he might have staggered and sunk under the weight. He appeared, however, to support the burden with ease, and he known all about it, the handsome brute would not have understood it.

But the fact was that he were well banked up. The furious little furnace consumed its own smoke. It found no vent in sighs and moans, in melodious love-songs, in slender glances, in passionate letters, in sickly poetry (the which Lily would have written many estimable lines and lasses from the commission of suicide; the chief advantages being that, once in love, any idiot can write poetry, and that when one has written a hundred and thirty stanzas, and duly corrected them, they can always be torn up and crammed down the fire, if there be no one to speak to, and no one to write to, about her love. A dim paralyzing consciousness came sometimes over her, warning her that she was not duly about the place—the housekeeper, the old lackey, the priest, the Bunnyrabbit—and that, in such cases, the fitting edge would be equivalent to her condemnation to death. And so, nothing short of the rack and the thumb-screw, or the ordeal by fire and fever, would have made her confess that terrible word of fatefulness.

What could the poor child do, then? Let concealment, like a worm in the bud, prey on her damask cheek? Let it eat. Her love was dumb and concerted concealment. It had been engendered of a sudden, like a mushroom, and never best in a cellar. It was a modern, and a timid and silent love. It would have died for very shame had it been dragged into the open air. Its organization preyed by no means on Lily's cheek. It made her happy. It was company to her. Good and generous as the simple child were among the few she had been mercifully thrown, Lily could but feel that they were strangers to her. But now she had this love, and she was no longer Quite Alone.

The love must have some vent, however, or the heart-carvings would have cracked. There was an old harpsichord in the salon, playing on which she had often lulled Madame de Kergolay to sleep. Before the brilliant performer, for her music-lessons had been few and far between, and her practice had been furtively snatched from the most unfavorable seasons, and the hours of confinement and punishment, at the Pension Marcasin. But Lily had a quick ear, an adroit finger, and a pretty taste. There was a pile of old pigtail music on a cabinet by the harpsichord —mandrigals and cantatas, ballads and complaintes—from "Vive Henri Quatre" to "La belle Gabrielle," from "Charmante bergère, n'aimerais-tu?" to "J'ai vu Dorinde; elle me sourit." Lily had learned to play these fusty charming productions—to know even something of Gluck, and Rameau, and Grétry. And sometimes even she ventured to sing in a low tender voice some ballad, Italian or French, that Madame de Kergolay loved. She found herself now drifting from the decorous stream of grave music into a turbid ocean of voluntaries and capriccios. It was her love. Love was streaming from her heart, and down her fingers and arms, and from her fingers on to the ebony and ivory of the keys. The baroness told her that she was fast becoming a brilliant player. The old woman sighed that she could not afford to buy her a piano-forte. She declared that she would have one. The Abbé Chatain suggested a seraphine. None of them knew that it was Love who was the music-master.

And then, in the privacy of her little chamber, she would strive to draw and delineate the features of the beautiful Fetish. Her fingers were unused to the pencil, and she gave up the attempt disconsolately. But in a bunch of flow—s she could see his likeness; his face came forth among the crackling sparks on the hearth; his profile undulated in the pattern of the wallpaper; it curled in the smoke from the housetops. It was wreathed in the fleecines of the summer clouds.

Once or twice, in the Luxembourg Gardens, she detected herself tracing the letter E with her parasol in the powdery gravel. But Prudence being with her she hastened to efface the letter and make diagrams of monstrous creatures with impossible heads and portentious crooked hats. Yet it seemed as if the letter E could never be rubbed out. Do all she could it was there visible as that of the Pyramids.

At home she was less cautious Poetry, indeed, she eschewed, and, as has been said, she had been taught to write by rule. Lily had found herself scribbling his name one day all over a blotting-pad. It was "Edgar Greyfaunt," or "Monsieur Edgar Greyfaunt," or "Captain Greyfaunt," or "Le Chevalier Edgar de Greyfaunt," or "Le Comte Edgar Raven de Greyfaunt-Launcaster." Then she stopped; but why not have gone on to prince, or king, or kaiser? Had Edgar seen the blotting-pad in its enormous vanity would have had stomach for them all.

This is the way in which girls go on. Poor Lily indeed!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SEA-FIRE.—When it is a fishing-boat in danger of sinking?—When it has got a fissure in it.

FICKED UP AT FUSOM (AFTER THE EVENT).—Why should Napoleon the Third be called the first three barrel?—Because none of them were scratched.

"THEY'RE always giving things different navigations from what they ought to write to have," said Mrs. Partington to Ike. "In my opinion what they call the new rolgia is calculated to do a great deal of promotion."

LOST!—A small lady's watch with a white face; also two ivory young ladies' work-boxes. A mahogany gentleman with a cane-seat and a small player, belonging to a young lady with a silver mane and tail.

A QUESTION FOR "CONS."—Is a "flying joint" usually compassed by a "busy pushing"?

LITERARY.—The "Woman in White" did not first appear in "Black-wood."

WHO REQUIRE SLEEP MOST.—Women require more sleep than men, and farmers less than those engaged in any other occupation. Editors, negatives, and telegraphers operators need not sleep at all. Lawyers can sleep as much as they choose, and keep out of mischief.

SCHOOLMASTER. "How many kinds of axes are there?" Lively Boy. "Two, Sir. Broad axe, battle axe, tom-axe, tithe axe, axe of the Apostles, and axe my father?"

SCHOOLMASTER.—"Good, go to the top of the class."

WHY ought women to be employed in the post-office?—Because they understand how to manage mails better than men.

CHIT-CHAT.—Naturally women talk more than men. The learned Buxtorf informs us in his "Hebrew Lexicon," that the Hebrew word for a woman is derived from a verb signifying talk; and it was, perhaps, from a dim idea of this derivation that the Athenian seed their temples with votive baskets of chit-chat.—it could not be gossip, for there were no females in the temples—and the Romans erected a goddess, for Adam and Eve to assume themselves were not the first created pair, and to establish Ugly Rumor as their sister.

NOTES FOR THE PHOTOGRAPHIC SOCIETY.—"Distance lends enchantment to the view."

Vermonters live to a great age, as is well known. There are two men up there so old that they have forgotten who they are, and there are no neighbors living for them to remember.

PICK your cases in as small a space as you can, so that you can carry more comfortably in each hand.—Sydney Smith.

A SENSITIVE club lately discussed the important question, "Which is the best knowledge of daybreak in the result of observation or instinct?"

Sometimes the sadness which generally prevails among the company at a wedding breakfast is of a ludicrous incident. An Irishman who had been invited to the wedding party of his master, was asked to give the toast usually given by the eldest of the company, and accordingly rose and said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I'm sure you could wenture," and "Yes," said the delegate. "I'm sure you could wenture, and there's all of us, of which one and all, we would wenture there, he wanted sorra a bit. Then doctors are not allowed to walk into your shop, but you must wait to be sent for in a way right. Your brother he after reading whether I'm living or dead."

The following dialogue is said to have taken place recently between a married couple on board a steamer: "Are you comfortable in that corner?" "Quite, thank you, my dear." "Then you have plenty of room for your feet?" "Quite sure, love." "And no cold air from the window by your ear?" "Quite certain, darling." "Then, my dear, I'll change places with you."

"Pops," said a little boy to his papa the other day, "are no sailors sorry, very small sorry?" "No, my dear," returned the father: "what leads you to suppose that they are so small?" "Because," replied the young lady, "I read in a newspaper of a sailor going to sing in his watch."

What is equal to raising pinchbeck?—Hailing omnibuses.

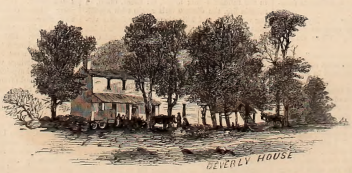
QUARLES MILL, N. ANNA R.

REBEL REDOUBT ON THE NORTH ANNA

CONSTRU

SOLDIERS IN RIFLE PITS NEAR CHESTERFIELD BRIDGE N.A.RIVER

CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS LAID OUT FOR BURIAL.



BEVERLY HOUSE

ONE OF ENVEL

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.—From Photogr

TING A MILITARY ROAD.

BURYING THE DEAD.

JERICHO'S MILL AND PONTOON BRIDGE (L. ANNA R.

A COUNCIL OF WAR. AT MASSAPONAX CHURCH.

BRADDOCK'S COACH. GUINNESS STATION, VA.

DEAD REBEL SOLDIER. PINE FURREST (D. MAY.

'S SOLDIERS.

BETHEL CHURCH.

APHS BY GARDNER, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—[SEE PAGE 442.]

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

LAST week we presented before our readers a sketch of the pontoon bridge over which a portion of General GRANT'S army effected a crossing just above Fort Powhatan. We add this week on page 436 another sketch illustrating the PASSAGE OF THE SECOND CORPS AT TUNSTALL'S LANDING, three miles below. The crossing at this point was effected by transports. The main interest of this sketch, however, centres in the group of general officers who are witnessing the operation from the shore. Among these General GRANT'S presence is easily detected by the "inevitable cigar:" the General is complacently resting in his saddle, surrounded by his aids and members of his staff. Near him General HANCOCK is seated, enfeebled by his old wound, and unable to take the field; and further the river stands Inspector-General BARNARD, an old man with gray hairs, who has served in all the great Virginia campaigns.

Another sketch on page 437 represents THE LANDING OF CATTLE FOR THE USE OF THE ARMY. The transports lie moored near the shore, the gangway opened, and the cattle then pushed out, falling one over another in all sorts of ludicrous positions, disappearing two or three at a time, but always rising and making their way to the shore. The bank is usually lined with soldiers weeping and shouting at the discomfort of the animals.

From these we turn to the series of pictures on pages 440 and 441, gained from photographs, and representing scenes of vivid interest connected with the progress of GRANT'S army from Spotsylvania Court-House to the North Anna, and a description of these we follow the order of time.

The pioneers of the CONFEDERACY were up in back to May 19th, when EWELL made his desperate attack on our right, but was repulsed with the loss of nearly two thousand men. These dead bodies were found after the battle near Mrs. Alsop's, at Pine Forest, and were carefully buried by the First Massachusetts Heavy Artillery.

BURNELL HOUSE was the head-quarters of General WARREN on May 20, and BETHEL CHURCH of General BURNSIDE, May 21.

If we turn now to the central picture of the series we find ourself before us the officers of the army holding a COUNCIL OF WAR AT MASSAPONAX CHURCH, on the 21st of May, the army being now fairly on its way southeastwardly from its former position. General GRANT is sitting on a bench at the right, with his back to the tree, smoking.

BRADFORD'S MILL represents a relic of the past century found at Guinea's Station.

The captured rifle-pits are those taken by BURNSIDE in the night from near Chesterfield by Taylor's Bridge, on the North Anna. This bridge and the bridge in the far cover which our troops crossed the North Anna. Federal soldiers are sitting in the trenches. The REBEL REDOUBT is a work captured by our forces in the same neighborhood.

In addition to the above there are other pictures—no representing our engineers constructing a military road to Jericho Mills, on the North Anna, another giving a view of these mills as seen from the south side, with a canvas pontoon bridge thrown across the river, a third giving a view of WHITE QUARLES MILL.

These pictures are all printed from photogr taken on the field by GARDNER, of Washington, to whom our readers are already indebted other similar favors. Of course it is impossible to photography to lie, and we may therefore and these portraitures as faithful to the minut features of the original scene. By the picture are given of the Confederate dead we are brought face to face with scenes which are the daily incident of a soldier's life. It is doubtless true of both armies that the continual recurrence of such scenes tends to harden the soldiers' sensibilities; but this indifference is in a great measure prevented by the mechanization which is daily so tenderly given by these same soldiers to the dead and wounded of the enemy.

We give on page 437 A VIEW ON THE PAMUNKEY. This river was lately the base of supplies for GRANT'S army, and was covered with a vast flotilla of transports.

UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER.

"CRYING again, Maggie? Why what on earth ails the child?

Miss Semantha West had just come in from the garden with a basket of freshly-gathered peas, and a mammoth sun-bonnet swinging from her arm, instead of being efficiently under said arm, and she is the nature of sun-bonnets to be. She was one of those women from whom one instinctively receives the impression that they ought to have been born mea—a tall, raw-boned female, with a step like a grenadier, a bass voice, and a very perceptible mustache bristling upon her upper lip. However, Miss Semantha was an old maid—probably because no gentleman had ever yet mustered courage to address her matrimonially.

Altogether different was the slender girl who was drooping listlessly over a bit of needle-work in the shadow of the morning-glories, whose blue cups tossed to and fro at the window. Maggie West was twenty years younger than her tall sister, and as dissimilar as is a blush rose from a stalwart sunflower: gentle and shrinking, with hair that looked as if it had been dipped in sunshine; and hazy, wistful eyes, whose brown light trembled like the waters of a babbling spring. She did not look up at the spinster's resolutely-propounded question, but only bent closer over her work.

"I know how it is!" exclaimed Miss Semantha, setting down her basket of peas with an emphasis that sent the silver-green pods flying over the table in all directions. "You're just a-pinin' your life away arter that good-for-nothin', shilly-shallyin' fellur, Harry Winder. That's what's you're a-doin'!"

"Semantha!" pleaded Maggie, shrinking back among the morning-glories.

"Don't tell me!" ejaculated Miss Semantha, clasping her hands behind her back, man-fashion, and striding up and down the room, while her gray eyes flashed grim determination. "I know how matters is goin'. He's playin' with you, off and on, jest as suits his conveniences. And I'd like to know what good sage tea, and tansy drinks, and new milk afore breakfast's goin' to do you, as long as this business goes on?"

"But, sister, I know—that is, I think—he loves me."

"Why don't he say so, then, like a man, instead o' playin' fast and loose? T'ain't so in my day. If a man liked a gal he said so, and they got married."

"Wait, sister—only wait," urged Maggie, faintly. "It's only a little while since he began to come here.

"Only a little while, eh? It's time enough for you to grow as white as a sheet and as thin as a shad! Where's all your color, I'd like to know? Why don't you have some spirit, and refuse to steal a gal's heart away with his fine talk, and his poetry, and his gay uniform, and then toss it from you like a broken plaything?"

Maggie West shuddered as if her sister's hand had touched a raw nerve.

"Perhaps he has not made up his mind yet," she faltered.

"Then it's high time he had," said Miss Semantha, nodding her head. "I wish I was a man! I'd call him out afore you could say Jack Robinson, if he was a Lieutenant forty times over! I'd strut about with twice as many shoulder-straps stickin' to him! And I don't know but what I will, as it is. I'll call and tell him to his face, handing forward a rusty rifle that hung above the clock, sole relic of the departed Squire West's Revolutionary days. "I'll be off!"

"Semantha!"

"For of all things," went on Semantha, "I hate a man—especially a commissioned officer. I'll tell you what, Maggie—I think it would be a good thing to ask him what his intentions is!"

"Oh, sister! not for the world! Promise me—please promise—that you won't!"

And Maggie clung to her masculine sister with a face of pitiful entreaty.

"Well, then, I won't. But I'll be even with him some way—that I'm not!"

Miss Semantha sat down to shell her peas with an iron resolve in her face that made poor Maggie tremble.

Ten minutes passed away, measured by the slow ticking of the clock, the ripple of yellow sunshine along the kitchen floor, and the monotonous rattle of peas into the tin pan on Miss Semantha's lap; when all of a sudden that lady brought her clenched hand down on the table with startling decision.

"I've got an idea!"

"An idea!" repeated Maggie, somewhat bewildered. "Tell me what it is!"

Miss Semantha shook her head inexorably.

"I won't tell anybody, sister. I'll tell you what

"Oh, that's it, is it?" And then he laughed.

"Garry, how many times this summer have you served me just this shabby trick for a girl's pink and white? Ah, Garry, Garry, which is it—the head or the heart—that is so soft?"

Garry King, who usually laughed with the laugh against him at his sudden fervors of admiration, at this moment gnawed his lip a little uneasily. He could hardly have told why himself. Hendrick went on lightly chaffing him in his accustomed manner, to which the young fellow at last replied, in some haste:

"But, Hendrick, this is really an uncommon face. If I should find myself in the presence of a statue or a picture of such divine loveliness I should feel hushed into silence; at least I couldn't go on talking pellmell in the face of it. How much, then, may I be allowed to feel in the presence of the human reality?"

Hendrick, passing, looked again at this landed loveliness. For the life of him he could only see a very pretty girl with fair hair, who stood beating her foot impatiently as she waited. Even at this moment the carriage for which she waited swept up the drive. She, too, down the steps of the house, gave a critical glance at the turn-out before she entered—it was a dainty little pony-phaeton—and gathered up the reins with a practised hand. But the high-stepping, nettlesome pony pulled at the bridle uneasily. She turned his head with a quick motion of her wrist, and he began forthwith to fret, bound, then began backing and writhing his neck—a slim, arched neck, with a beautiful black mane, flowing. The groom came running forward, but with an alarmed face, at this juncture.

"Go away!" she said, sharply, never moving her eyes from the pony. Thus ordered, the man moved off, but still with an alarmed expression.

"If I had kick'd over the dasher, sure, if she tries to manage him that way!" he exclaimed to the two gentlemen who had stopped their walk at this symptom of insubordination and danger.

The delicate face of the lady was pale, not with fear but determination. Once, twice, she struck the animal's head a firm tight pressure upon the reins, and a low, sweet-toned call upon his name, to conquer. She might have succeeded, but a glimpse of the scarlet waist waved over his ears added a new element of fear and unmanageableness, and the next second he was raising his hind feet with an ominous movement—the next moment he would have kicked "right over the dasher, sure," if Garry King had not leaped down the steps and seized the bridle, holding him with an iron grasp close at the mouth. And the pony's eyes by this time showed fear and danger, and sprang out, not forgetting even then a proper "Thank you," though she did not oast a glance at the young man himself. "If you will have kindness to hand me my parasol, I'll be obliged to you," she said, regretfully. The groom here approached.

"It's him thinks, Miss, he wants the blinders you see, for he ain't used to bein' widout 'em. I thought when you told me to leave 'em that I would make him steady, he's such a frisky little creature."

She nodded her head in acquiescence, and went on talking, sometimes in a soft coaxing way to the animal, and sometimes asking questions of Garry, never thinking of casting a look at him, so absorbed was she in the pony. In a little while, having put under her magnetism of touch and voice, the "frisky little crayther" became quiet, and turned his head to her caress. It was then for the first time that she glanced up into the young man's face. She did not remove her eyes at once, but thanking him in a tone with more fervor in her tones, she seemed suddenly pleased and interested and surprised. As they stood then the pony was now in danger of being forgotten, but the voice of the groom recalled her.

"Are you goin' to thry him again, Miss?"

She answered by patting her foot upon the low phaeton floor. King bent eagerly forward.

"But do you think it quite safe?" he asked, anxiously.

"Quite, oh, yes, thank you;" and again she met his earnest eyes, and the color began to come back into her cheeks. He lifted his hat as she drove off, and, as far as he could see, watched the little turnout and its occupant with much unclouded look. Indeed why was out of Selim's sight, and he trolled along in good order, under the fearless guidance of Miss Aveylles.

It was quite early in the morning that all this occurred, in fact only a few people about to witness the scene, to King's relief, who had suddenly grown so sensitive; but Hendrick was there with his laugh and his chaffing. He came up smiling gayly as the phaeton disappeared down the avenue.

"I say, King," he began, in a mock confidential tone, "did you ever see a stone at that pony's eye, or do some other mischievous thing as he came up; it's turned out remarkably, I must say."

King answered good-humoredly, but there was effort in it; and Hendrick at last thought—he had the grace not to say—"I declare I believe the fellow's actually struck!"

II.

"THERE she is now."

"Who?"

"Grace Aveylles." And the first speaker flung down his morning paper and ran out to meet her.

A chorus of feminine voices welcomed her.

"We were talking about you, Grace; angels unawares, you know."

"Is this a P. P. C., Grace?" said another.

"A P. P. C.?" wonderingly.

"Why, didn't you say last night that you thought Newport very dull this summer, and that you were going to the mountains with the Wills?"

She remembered, and answered, frankly.

"I really had forgotten. Last night it did seem dull; but to-day the sun shines so brightly, and there seems to be a great many more people here."

She really thought so, though she had scarcely met a soul on her drive.

"Any new arrivals at the hotel?" questioned one upon this.

"Yes, I think the house is filling up."

And she had breakfasted in solitary state!

And when she went back, there upon the piazza still walked Garry King, quite alone now; and I suppose she thought the lonesome colonnade most satisfactorily occupied. He ran down at her approach, for there wasn't a servant within view, and at "light of him a pretty blush flushed into her cheeks. It was entirely out of the way, I know, for a stranger who had never been formally presented to those about his servant; but here was that impatient Selim prancing and pawing, and what was to be done? To be sure, he might have summoned one of those idle bell-boys, who were playing pitch-and-toss within hearing, but he didn't; and the impulse that prompted him to go himself was certainly not taken amiss by Miss Aveylles, for she spoke laughingly of her adventure, thanked him again, and then they discovered that they had some mutual friends, and at once they seemed like old acquaintances, and she knew that his name was Garry King.

"That's what I call quick work," said Hendrick to himself, observant from his post.

You laugh, Mr. Hendrick, but there are some rounds that are deep and lasting, though swift as thought. You do not believe that you can see them and smile over this adventure of Garry King's, but you will believe it. Garry himself could not have explained to you what it was that he felt annoyed at Hendrick's chaffing, or why he had never felt annoyed before. He found out sooner than Hendrick, however. Perhaps a week later Garry, at him as a few mornings after, he stood in the door of the hotel and saw Miss Aveylles come driving up with the same Selim and Van Veet. Yes, it was the old, old story—the story that poets and romancers have written over and over again. But looking at young Van Veet, there came more than the throb of jealousy which discovered his heart. There was the suggestion of what a fussy coxcomb they were. It was for such men as Van Veet to win this delicate and costly rose; not for him, poor and unlikely to succeed. Then, as he saw the groom hold her horse, as he saw her eyes light, her color bloom. What if—if all, what then? Garry King, remember, you are not too proud to become a pensioner upon a rich woman's bounty? And going in, away from the sight of such doings, he said to himself:

"What am I, that I should love her,
Save for fleeting of the pain?"

Garry King was not the only young man of the world, gay, easy tempered, and easy living; and if you had told John Hendrick that he entertained this unworthy, unmanly feeling—envy, pride, John would have scouted the intimation as the veriest nonsense, and have roared with laughter at the idea.

"What, Garry King, the gay bugger, letting a fortune slip out of his hands for sentiment? Not he would have said. "Garry has too much sense."

This was John Hendrick's estimate; and then we John Hendricks are mistaken.

But it was the flavor of true nobility in Garry King that made this possible: a deep, sweet vein of unusual sentiment, that ran under all things through—in some finer action than was common—a character that was ordinarily accepted as not lofty or unusual.

It was this noblesse oblige, in a finer and truer sense than it often seen, that kept him silent in the days that followed.

He walked with her on those delightful cliffs, in sight and sound of the beautiful sea, the music of those waves seem full of fond and yearning voices. He strolled with her through those lovely bueselves, "Garry King," and he had called them, or he took long morning drives beside her, when they listened to the birds and talked of all things under the sun that young people talk of. All things save one. Garry King never spoke of his love, though many a man with less delicacy would have gathered hope and courage from that beaming face that lighted at his coming.

But he was very happy, and with Grace Aveylles as well.

Lifting her eyes from the writing upon the plates, from the uncut Selim to the unknown face, she did not know that she had met her fate. She only knew then that there was a new light that glowed her in the face. But "she looked at him as one who awakes." The past was a sleep, and her life was now. And something the friends about them saw of all this.

"It will be a match," said Hendrick, between bluffs of his pipe.

And young Van Veet scowled and sneered in answer, "that it was a fine thing for King, certainly."

And still the days went on, and the denouement for which they waited did not come. And still the days went on, to the last—the very last. It was September; and they met upon "the yellow sands" that morning for the last time before parting. The next day Garry and Miss Aveylles were coming running down from her bathing-house, her goldmist hair spreading out like a pennon, and her white face smiling, she met Garry King on the terre. He held out his hand. They had not met since the day before yesterday, which was a matter of wonder in these last days.

"Shall I go in with you?" he said; and there was something sad and inscrutable in his eyes as he said it.

They went in together, and between the breaking of the waves there were scraps of conversation.

"Shall you come to Newport next year?" he asked.

"Next year?—who knows what will happen by next year?" and she gave a little start, which ended in a laugh.

"But in the mean time you will be leading a gay life, Miss Aveylles: you will not wish for Newport."

"In the mean time? Well, I dare say. And you, Mr. King, what do you propose to do with your time in a whole year?"

"I am going to put it to some better use than I ever have before."

"Eh? what?"

"I am going to throw up my appointment and have done with clerkships. I am going to join my uncle in New York, and buy cotton and sell it, Miss Aveylles," he replied, rather vehemently.

She looked at him in amaze. What did she know about clerkships, about buying and selling cotton? What ailed him to talk in this way to her?

He caught the puzzled look. "I am going to try my hand at making a fortune," he said, smiling, still with that inscrutable pain in his eyes. "I am a spectator, you know, not a brilliant caveallier—a young don, like Howard Van Veet."

What did she know of poverty and the bitterness that it brought to him? Nothing. She had never felt it; she had never known the worth of money. Pondering delicately upon what he meant, she said, as one follows without knowledge the lead of conversation,

"You will you do? Send out agents? Don't they call them cotton factors? When I am down at Aveylles I hear now and then a word about it: but I have so little interest in such things; my uncle, who is my guardian, looks out for every thing. We have miles and miles of cotton lands."

She spoke innocently, but he felt miles and miles away from her as she spoke, separated by those waving cotton lands.

"Suppose I am my own agent, my own factor, and come tangraating to your doors at Aveylles; will you receive me?" he asked, with a bitterness that could not be overlooked.

She fixed a glance of indignation upon him.

"Mr. King, I suppose you mean to mock me by doors. Mr. King, you will be welcomed. It is not like you to insult never has been, as Aveylles, to refuse hospitality."

She understood enough to make her indignant, not enough to make her lenient. As she answered thus a great wave came breaking over them. When it rolled away she shivered and turned shamefaced. It was the suggestion of a fussy coxcomb of reproach. As he saw her a few moments after, looking cold, stately, and pale, in the carriage, he felt half ashamed of his passion, and going up, with a forced smiling, as if all along he had only been in jest:

"You will not forget your promise, Miss Aveylles?"

But Miss Aveylles was not so easily turned from an impression. She replied gravely, not angrily, and answered as gravely, and with meaning:

"I never forget promises, Mr. King, nor those who do not keep them—nor friends."

And this was the last, the very last. He saw her glittering hair, glistening with the sea-bath, streaming like a banner as she rode away.

And that night, when he called for a final good-by, it was to find her in the midst of a gay group, to whom she dispensed impartial smiles. The very last, and the end of all that charmed summer.

It was the summer of 1860. We all know how every thing wore a different aspect in the summer of 1861; how many summer plans were frustrated, and summer homes left untold. Miss Aveylles did not find her way to Newport that season, and Garry King did not succeed in getting a chance to ride in pony phaetons, or bathe with some sea-nymph in the surf, or even to buy and sell cotton in the New York market. Garry King by this time had enrolled himself in the service of his country.

III.

"AND MISS AVEYLLES?"

"Miss Aveylles is stanch as steel."

"Who is she, and what is Miss Aveylles?" and a figure in a mist of lace and gold hair swung round a column wreathed with oleander.

"Miss Aveylles, Miss Aveylles? What were you saying about her?"

"That you were as stanch as steel."

"Does Major Gerrit doubt it?" Major Gerrit made gallant protestations to the contrary.

"But why Miss Aveylles? Sir. Compte need i say that Miss Aveylles is stanch as steel? Wh: have you been talking about? I insist upon knowing," said Miss Aveylles, gayly.

They moved farther down the veranda, away from the few other guests, and there told her of Miss Aveylles' loyalty.

It was a worthy rebel pet certainly. A plot so deeply laid that even a party of Federals up the river on false pretenses. Fair pretenses they seemed.

A traitor holds out the inducement that a loyal planter in the vicinity of Aveylles is desirous of disposing of his cotton at certain prices. This arch negotiator is supposed to be acted upon in the matter, because he has been trusted and relied upon in other matters connected with the Federal cause, and has proved himself worthy of those matters.

How could they know that love of gain would in these days overcome with the toil of their enemies? That he could lend himself to so dark a plan as this betrayal, who had done them good service with honest deeds before?

It was very simple. A boat sent up the river with a sufficient party to protect them from annoyance—the cotton, the extraordinary there had been only possible annoyance, no danger; for all along by this vicinity every thing was quiet and undisturbed at the time by any rebel occupation. The house of Miss Aveylles was the nearest and most convenient point to receive. Without her knowledge, but with no doubt of her co-operation, they had appointed it as a rendezvous. If the officers found that any business arrived before them and inquired for the agent, who was to make and receive all arrangements, she was now asked at this late day—but with the imperious effrontery which distinguishes the chivalry on occasions—to receive them in Miss Aveylles' absence, and detain them with some excuse of the temporary absence of the agent until a given hour, when her rebel friends would arrive in force and relieve her from this imposed society.

Grace Aveylles was born and bred a Southerner. She was at this point a rebel, as a thousand other Southern women are, by association instead of deliberate choice. She listened to this story and gathered the bare facts stated above, though it was by no means presented to her so harshly, but gloved over with a high-colored exaggeration of the truth.

She listened, and seemed fully to enter into the scheme: but after, when alone, her whole bearing changed, and the indignation and horror that she had felt manifested itself in every expression of her mobile face.

"Never," she ejaculated, "will I lend myself to such hideous betrayal! I should feel forever dishonored."

But what to do? Her only hope lay in the Federals earlier arrival than their enemy. It was now near midnight. They might arrive with the early morning, but not before—not before—not until later. All through that night she waked, lest she should sleep at their coming. What hour would it be?

The early sunlight shows what a change two years have made in Grace Aveylles. The beautiful girl has become a self-reliant woman, and you see on her face some process of the change; it is the shadow of loss. Perhaps she is thinking of this herself, of what she missed on a summer two years ago; for her eyes have ceased to follow the dark line of water so anxiously, and something lulls her into a dream. A dream from which she awakes with every nerve quivering, every sense alert. They have come, these betrayed men, for whom she waits. Thank Heaven it is not too late, they may be saved. They come up the broad avenue confidently in the early morning sunshine. Gay young officers in their dark uniforms, and in the prime of their youth. And just at the foot of the garden there streams the sand and spray from their little vessel—the whole a fine prize looked for their enemies.

Miss Aveylles comes down the veranda to meet them, stately and composed; but as the foremost officer lifts his cap all the blood in her veins seems to flow in a storm-current to her face.

"Mr. King!"

"Miss Aveylles!" and the same King hangs out the same old guard of distress.

His companions, who observed this a few paces back, thought smiling. "So King has an old flame here. Rum is the union why he was so anxious to be sent."

A moment of pause, and Miss Aveylles holds out her hand. "Mr. King, I keep my promise and welcome you to Aveylles."

She smiled as she spoke, but there was deadly faintness at her heart. What if after all they were, too late? What if—but there was no time for more thought, there must be action.

"Gentlemen," she said, still letting her hand lie in King's, "I am glad to see them all, "gentlemen, you have been betrayed!"

Her few rapid words that followed placed them in possession of the plot.

"You will have time to escape," she went on, breathlessly, "if you do not delay. Go at once, I beseech you. Those who waked all night to fight not overslept the moment of your coming." Major King had regained his self-possession.

"Except that," he exclaimed "we shall not run from these traitors. Forwarned like this, we can take them in their own toils."

A little cheer arose from his companions. Miss Aveylles grew pale with consternation.

"You will be overpowered! I will send, in flimsy.

But King had knowledge of the country. He knew that the force sent down from the upper part of the State would at that time be a very limited number, such as he was quite ready to risk meeting if on guard and under arms. Of this he assured her. He, moreover, believed each officer there who had scarcely time to define her position. A Confederate, where were her sympathies now? Hitherto she would have endured much, passively she would have lent herself to their cause, thinking that her rebel belief was within them perhaps. But a mine had exploded at her feet. In the yawning gulf she got a glimpse of the truth. But these blanch'n scattered involved themselves into order until afterward. It was enough for the moment to know that those who were to have been fooly betrayed were now ready to meet their betrayers.

Stealthily they came through the woods—a small force, as King had predicted, but ready sufficient to have done their vile work if they had arrived upon an unprepared party. Miss Aveylles heart beat short of her hope and defiance as she heard the avenue and discovered that they were surrounded. She heard shots fired, and wild tones mangling, and was great fear was in her heart. "Are they killed? Not one was killed. So wisely had King disposed his forces, so well were they sympathized, so well had themselves in the presence of so large a party, that it was almost a bloodless victory. They would return to Key West, however with a mere cargo than cotton. But Miss Aveylles—she who had placed victory in their hands? King forgot the two years as he greeted the woman where she stood.

"We owe you this," he said; "but do you know all that it has brought upon you? You can not stay here in safety. She has escaped who will tell the story—and you are suspected?"

She looked bewildered. "What? I have no safer place of refuge than Aveylles. I have no other home now. All my estates at New Orleans have been confiscated. Where shall I go?"

"Grace, dear Grace! will you not come with me? I was too proud to speak when you were so prosperous: but I loved you, Grace! I have loved you since that first hour I met you. Will you go with me, Grace?"

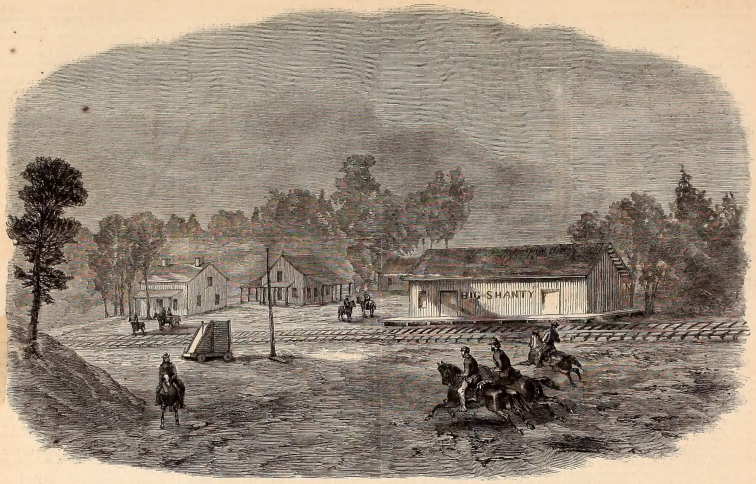
So he had loved her.

They had both kept this silent faith for two years.

She put out her hand, and half a smile dawned.

"I have kept my promise of welcome, and I will keep my faith," she said.

She took her faithful servants with her, but the mansion of Aveylles was left to desolation, perhaps destruction. Afterward, when its mistress espoused Major King, she was quite ready to espouse the cause for which he fought. Little by little the evidences of the corruption of secession had come to her. The last unholy plot rent the veil thoroughly from her eyes. Not for her lover's sake alone she was strong enough to become a martyr for a principle—but for conviction, did Grace Aveylles espouse his cause.



GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—"BIG SHANTY STATION"—GENERAL LOGAN'S ADVANCE, JUNE 10, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

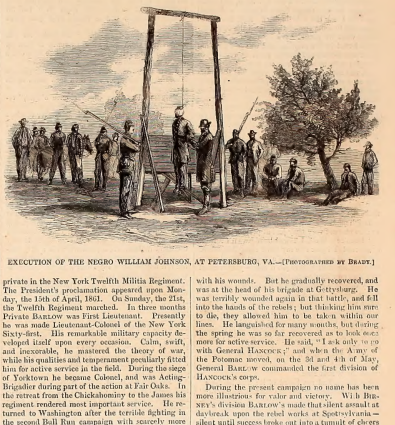
GEN. SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

THE MILITARY TELEGRAPH of the ARMY of the Cumberland, which we illustrate below, and which is under the command of Captain VAN DUZER, has proved an invaluable acquisition to General SHERMAN and to the North. We have by this means been in daily receipt of news from our armies in the West. Captain VAN DUZER surprised General SHERMAN shortly after he had occupied Ackworth by the information that the wires were working, and Washington was but one hour distant. The town of Ackworth is small, few of its inhabitants being at this time in it, since every man has been taken off by the army, and the female portion of the inhabitants were timid about remaining. Ackworth is on the Western and Atlantic Railroad, a few miles northwest of Marietta. Sherman reached this point on the 6th of June.

"BIG SHANTY," also illustrated on this page, although dull enough in ordinary times, is likely for some days to come, as the resting-place of SHERMAN'S army, to present scenes of the intensest activity. In front of the place, along the range of Lost and Kenesaw mountains, the enemy lies in force, until the combination of the Federal commander and the prowess of the Union army shall compel him to take another step southward.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—MILITARY TELEGRAPH TO ACKWORTH, GEORGIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE BRIG "VISION," CAPTAIN DONOVAN, LEAVING NEW YORK FOR LIVERPOOL, JUNE 30, 1864.



EXECUTION OF THE NEGRO WILLIAM JOHNSON, AT PETERSBURG, VA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GONE TO SEA.

We give above an illustration representing the brig UNION, which sailed on Sunday, June 26, from the Battery direct for Liverpool. Probably no vessel ever ventured to breast the Atlantic under circumstances so novel and impressive. This little brig is only fifteen feet long and four and a half feet wide, and has only a depth of two feet and ten inches. Her crew consisted of Captain JOHN C. DONOVAN, who owns the vessel, a Rhode Island sailor, and the Captain's dog Toby. The Vision was to have started on Saturday, but was delayed; she is expected to make her trip in two months. Notwithstanding the heat on Sunday, a large number of people crowded the Battery to witness her departure on this most romantic voyage. The brig sailed out in gallant style, carrying the stars and stripes.

GENERAL LONGSTREET.

To our last Weekly was engraved a portrait of General LEE, and in this we give that of General LONGSTREET, who is perhaps, since the death of STONEWALL JACKSON, second only to LEE in the military reputation he has achieved by the campaigns between Washington and Richmond during the last three years. General JAMES LONGSTREET, who is a native of Alabama, was regularly educated for the profession of arms. He entered the United States army in 1838. He was attached first to the Fourth and then to the Eighth infantry regiments. He served in all the battles of the Mexican war, and, like General LEE, was wounded at Chapultepec. He was twice brevetted for distinguished services in that war. In 1858 he obtained a post in the Paymaster's department, to which he belonged, with the rank of Major. When the civil war broke out, in 1861, he at once joined the army of the Confederate States. The brigade which he commanded at the fight of Bull Run, in July of that year, was one of the first bodies of southern troops that came into actual collision with the Federals; and in the sanguinary battle of MANASSAS, which soon afterward ensued, General LONGSTREET led the main attack, though General BEAUREGARD was in chief command. As a General of Division, LONGSTREET acted under General LEE throughout the Virginia campaigns of 1862 and 1863. LONGSTREET is forty-three years of age—a thick-set, determined-looking man. His corps, who are devotedly attached to him, often complain that he is always with General LEE. He is in the habit of exposing himself in a careless manner, and it was perhaps in this way that he got his wound in one of the battles in the Wilderness. At Gettysburg he is said to have led a Georgian regiment in a charge against a battery, hat in hand, and in front of every body. A few hours later a Colonel found him seated on the top of a snake fence at the edge of the wood, and looking perfectly calm and unperturbed, while some of his troops passed by. The gallant Colonel, who scarcely knew what had been the result of the battle, observed to General LONGSTREET, "I wouldn't have missed this for any thing." LONGSTREET replied, laughing: "The devil you wouldn't! I should liked to have missed it very much; we've attacked, and been repulsed; look there!"

NEGRO EXECUTION.

On this page a sketch is given representing the execution on June 20, of WILLIAM JOHNSON, a colored soldier. He deserted from the Twenty-third United States colored troops, and on the 8th attempted to commit an outrage on a white woman at Cold Harbor. Considerable importance was given to the affair, in order that the example might be made more effective. JOHNSON confessed his guilt, and was executed within the outer breastworks about Petersburg, on an elevation, and in plain view of the enemy, a white flag covering the ceremony.

GENERAL F. C. BARLOW.

General FRANCIS CHANNING BARLOW, more familiarly known as General FRANK BARLOW, whose portrait appears on page 437, is already one of the most conspicuous soldiers of the war—one of its most heroic and romantic figures. Born in Brooklyn, in 1834, he passed most of his childhood and youth in New England, graduating at the head of the distinguished class at Harvard in 1855. The college traditions of that time are full of anecdotes of his humor, and that fascinating superiority which excels without an effort. Upon leaving college he studied law, and after a brief employment in the Tribune office began to practice in New York. His cool, clear head and true heart taught him the significance of public affairs, and at the first call to arms he rose from his desk and enrolled himself as a private in the New York Twelfth Militia Regiment. The President's proclamation appeared upon Monday, the 15th of April, 1861. On Sunday, the 21st, the Twelfth Regiment marched. In three months Private BARLOW was First Lieutenant. Presently he was made Lieutenant-Colonel of the New York Sixty-first. His remarkable military capacity developed itself upon every occasion. Calm, swift, and inexorable, he mastered the theory of war, while his qualities and temperament peculiarly fitted him for active service in the field. During the siege of Yorktown he became Colonel, and was Acting-Brigadier during part of the action at Fair Oaks. In the retreat from the Chickahominy to the James his regiment rendered most important service. He returned to Washington after the terrible fighting in the second Bull Run campaign with scarcely more than a hundred men, and the New York Sixty-fourth was added to Colonel BARLOW's command. At the battle of Antietam, on the 17th September, 1862, he captured two stands of colors and three hundred men, and was highly praised by General CALDWELL, and recommended for promotion. Colonel BARLOW received two severe wounds, and was carried off the field for dead. Two days afterward the President appointed him Brigadier-General for distinguished conduct at the battle of Fair Oaks.

General BARLOW lay for a long time prostrate with his wounds. But he gradually recovered, and was at the head of his brigade at Gettysburg. He was terribly wounded again in that battle, and fell into the hands of the rebels; but thinking him sure to die, they allowed him to be taken within our lines. He languished for many months, but during the spring he was so far recovered as to look once more for active service. He said, "I ask only to go with General HANCOCK;" and when the Army of the Potomac moved, on the 3d and 4th of May, General BARLOW commanded the first division of HANCOCK's corps.

During the present campaign no name has been more illustrious for valor and victory. With BARNEY's division BARLOW's made that silent assault at daybreak upon the rebel works at Spottsylvania—silent until success broke out into a tumult of cheers—which resulted in the capture of the rebel Generals JOHNSON and STEWART, three thousand men, eighteen cannon, and twenty-two standards.

Throughout the campaign BARLOW is conspicuous among the noble band of united heroes, officers and men, in the very active front of battle. He is just thirty years old, but he has already made a name that the history of American Liberty will forever honor.

The men of General BARLOW's division would never forgive his biographer who should omit to record the unwearied service in the hospitals and among the wounded and dying Union soldiers, from the beginning of the war to this day, of his faithful and devoted wife. Never far from her heroic husband in the field, she is always an angel of mercy in his camp and among his men, and for no woman in the land do more earnest prayers ascend from suffering lips and grateful hearts than for Mrs. General BARLOW.

THE REBEL GENERAL JAMES LONGSTREET.

HOW I GOT MY LITTLE DOG.

"RALPH, I wish I had a nice little dog."

"Should think you might be satisfied with a first-class husband, baby, and puss."

"Fiddle-sticks!"

Ralph turned over a leaf of his lawbook with a significant air, and the clock and sewing-machine ticked on in silence for five minutes.

"Ralph, I tell you I do want a cunning little dog."

"Yes, dear."

Clock and sewing-machine monopolize another five minutes.

"Oh, Ralph, you don't know how I want a pretty little dog."

"Yes.

Four minutes, fifty-six seconds.

"Ralphie, I tell you you've no idea how I want that little doggie."

"Bless it!"

The sewing-machine paused for a moment while I rose to inflict a disciplinary cuff upon the curls over Ralph's left ear.

And that is a specimen of that gentleman's ordinary success in studying law-books in the parlor.

I don't blame the poor fellow. About six months ago I walked over one day to his office up town—that is, just beyond the Excelsior Hotel, which forms the centre of Schenckville. I staid some five hours, sweeping, dusting, sorting, arranging, picking up and carrying away—staid, in fact, until the establishment showed signs of civilization. Two days afterward I called, in passing, to enjoy a few minutes' quiet contemplation of the results of my labors.

I have not been there since.

Ralph returned to the attractions of that fascinating volume, and I to the side-room of baby's bib. There was a window just across the sewing-table at my left, with a dicky-ton blooming beautifully before it, and occasional vellleys of lard, shot-like snow pelting it without. I was remarking to myself with some complacency that it was just the day to be at work in one's own pretty parlor, with the top of Ralph's curly head just visible over the back of his arm-chair, and baby asleep in her crib across the room, and pussy amusing herself under the sofa with a denuded spool (if I only had a little dog). And then I had digressed to some speculations upon the two questions, what we should have for tea, and what we should read in the evening, and was just deciding upon cream-toast and Carlyle when my reverie was snapped short by a knock at the door.

It was not a very welcome sound just then, and the case was not materially improved when Peggy opened the hall-door and exhibited—old Adam Baum.

I never witnessed a more absurd attempt at sibyllism than that was of Ralph's when he sprang up out of his arm-chair, with an "Ah, Mr. Baum; good-afternoon. Sir."

"Middl'n, middl'n, middl'n," replied the visitor, taking it for granted he had been asked "how he you do?" "An' how're you all here the day?" And then he added, "Mornin'," at me, with a grunt.

For Mr. Baum is a practical man, after the facetonies women who wear purple ribbons about their heads.

"Rather throng, I reckon, squire, about these times."

Ralph made this intelligible by replying, "Why, no; he was not very busy just at present, Sir."

"Hain't? Well, I 'lowed bein' 'twuh't far out o' my road, I'd jes make my last stretch this yere the day, and see what sort of a dicker I could make with you about that there job o' mine—you've heerd on't 'fore now likely—but there—"

By this time our guest was established in a chair before the fire, with a striped nubbin now-and-then and a pipe in one hand, which looked like the head of a Dutch landlord impaled on an elder-stick; and now he left the subject waiting for the next pause while he occupied himself a little while in dipping up small coals with his pipe and trying to make them burn.

"That there suit o' mine, you know," he resumed at last, when the pipe was fairly burning, "gin the Widdy."

No, Ralph had not heard of it; and he asked, "What's the matter between you and Mrs. Ford?"

"Bout a farm," said Adam, puffing industriously. "I've a-dy-vus must a seen the Widdy's place yonder, up the creek, side o' me—pooty little o' a house, if you min', half log and half frame, just right across the run fersent me—trees aroun', if you min'. Well, Sir, you're the man."

A few more puffs and then he took up his story explosively.

Charley Ford came on yonder from up in York State fourteen year ago come next April. An' he got law in a office, he got smart'd anyone on ye'd ever lit up an' built him a house an' lifted there. An' he's to pay for't, y'un-stan', so much a year. Well, he gits sick o' Charley's bilin'-up—gin me that 'ere square—an' after that, min' ye, Charley Ford never gin me a cent—not the first blessed red cent.

"Well, bein' Charley was allers a pore, dreamy, sickly kin' o' a fella—rather a hard way o' gittin along —an' I just 'lowed I wouldn't push him—thought a pity of him a mite, an' so it is just slipped along an' slipped along. An' when the seven year was up—'twas to be all paid up in seven year, y'un min'—why then Charley was just a goin' off, as you might say, with consumption. Well Charley he sends for me, and he wants I should agree to wait for the widda's two childer just stay right straight along another seven year—consider, y'un-stran', wot he'd gin me for't, and the body up to it, and I'm not as' so forth an' so on."

"Well, being things was just as they was, you know—him a dyin' an' all—why I just gin t' up, 'greed to't, the way Charley wanted, an' him an' me we drawed up writ's with effect an' intent there; unto conformable. Well now, Sir, if you'll believe it, it's just them very writ's whereby the widda's got every thing there ever year, this very blessed minute, that she'd make out now was a deed o' that there farm"—with a tremendous flourish of the Dutch landlord.

"You have these writings?" inquired Ralph, after a little pause.

"Course, got 'em myself."

"You can prove their identity?"

"Sure!"

"You can prove them to be the same writings which were executed just before Ford's death?"

"Well, Sir, I'm not tell you wot I do, y'un" and Adam set one boot on the fender, evidently about to bring forward his great gun—"old man Judd, over yonder, was to give a deed o' his farm's ole-do. An' he goes to the widda an' wants to git the loan o' her deed to be copy,' bowt 'twould save hirin' a lawyer, y'un-stran'. Old man now he's dead right some way, an' he just takes it over to lawyer Bissel. Bissel he look, I'lumph, no deed for sure."

"So then you see why I just got to hear on't right straight along. Why the widda owns up now 't she's got a deed that writin' never could locked into't. Fur's I know the woman ac'ly thinks 'twas a deed. She never knowed a hect about things—bean stuck up kin' o' women mostly don't t,' remarked Mr. Baum, without looking at me.

"The other party, of course, claim that the deed has been destroyed since it left Mrs. Ford's hands, and that the paper you produce is a forgery," remarked Ralph.

"Well, that's about wot they'd like to make out," said Adam, stooping for another coal.

"How about the witnesses to the—this 'writing' you speak of?"

"Why, there's just the mischief o' the thing, you see, the witnesses is both dead. One on 'em was old Wells, an' t'other's was a han' o' mine 't went off to California an' died."

"Who was this last?"

"Name was Conn Hall—fella's used to call him Nose an' All—had such an all-fired great hook of a nose. Jam up kin' o' a chap Conn was too."

Mr. Baum was becoming communicative and ingratiating: I thought.

"The farm must be worth something by this time," remarked Ralph.

"Well the heft on't, wot lays up on the hill, that a'nt worth y'er poker; but that little corner 't lays on the flat, well, Sir, there's a New York oil company t'x boun' to have that there bit o' lan' twenty thousand dollars soon's ever that suit's done."

"Y-e-s," mused Ralph. "Bo lucky for you now if this Oon Hall should happen to turn up after all before it comes off. These California deaths are not always very reliable."

I saw Ralph start out of his dissecting glasses forever at his neighbor and then look down again grimly satisfied.

"Guess there ain't much chance o' that," remarked Adam.

"Now, Mr. Baum," began Ralph, after employing himself a little while in lightly unscrewing the point of his pencil, "I'll tell you my opinion of this matter. You are a very wealthy man. Those two flowing wells must be taking it without any objection, and so contemplating the fire under his wide-awake, leaving the profits of a very prominent, singularly-shaped human nose to be contemplated at leisure by Mr. Adam Baum.

Presently I saw the figure of the oil-nabob straightening itself, and his face growing yellow with mute fear of petroleum and coal-dust.

"Thunder!" he ejaculated at last, "that ain't you?"

"That's me, Sir," echoed the visitor.

"Heerd you was dead," gasped Adam, at length.

"Ah-h!" said Hall, significantly.

Then there was silence a little while. Mr. Baum was looking at Ralph's watery pretty well in a way, but not very avidly.

"Well, Sir," he said, brightening up, "what'll you take. Grocery just t'other side o' the derrick out here. Ain't got the first hair in the shanty."

"Can't drink, Sir," interrupted Hall, gruffly.

"No! take no time."

"Yes," said Ralph.

"There is a little business to be done to-day, Mr. Baum," said I, gravely, rising and standing by the table. Mr. Baum answered me a word.

Then we all remained "in statu quo" for a little while. Hall took up a pine stick, and with an elaborate nonchalance, began fashioning the ashes on the hearth into the semblance of a mountain.

"Well, Sir," he said at last.

"I don't do no business when there's women an' jakin aroun'," grumbled Adam.

"Let me see your writ," said I, quietly, "how I happen to be here to-day with Mr. Hall. I had some business with him some time ago, putting wood one day at my mother's, and Hall then mention that trip to California which you spoke of to my husband the next day. I wrote to Hall afterward, and thought perhaps I could find him. So I did find him, after a while, and we both came on to once, of course."

Mr. Baum looked at me. Mr. Hall never looked at anybody. Only, Oon, that is Conn Hall, Co—long, treat and time. Guess Old Adam's able to put up."

"Can't stop, I tell you," and Hall thrust the stick into the fire and took up his fur gloves.

Then, at last it came.

"Well, if you've a min' to reasonable, an' consid'r's an accommodation to an old man. We're all as is like to git out o' the way s'mirces—p-r-o-n-o-u-n-c-e-d swift as the sparks flies upards."

"Why, Oon, that's your name," said I, "we shall all remember that. There's nothing hard to be done. I have brought another deed ready for signing, and I placed the document, with pen and ink on the table; "when that is done, the whole matter will be settled, and I shall not name here, if you please, and Mr. Hall and I will sign as witnesses."

It was an hour to me before the creat-tallen old man got through the slow operation of shambling up to the table and scrawling his name. Then I wrote mine with nervous fingers. Hall put his great black hand down below, and in five minutes we were in the wagon again, the deed safe in my pocket.

Hall turned his horse's head, and then stood up with the reins in his hand, and shouted back at the house, "Adam, stray child!" at the door.

"Mr. Baum, I believe I didn't mention it to you before, and perhaps you'd like to hear. You remember Mrs. Ford's brother, one 't had a nose just like mine, you know, and signed that other deed."

"Thunder an' blazes!"

We didn't hear any more. Peter Hall touched his horse and away we went—Peter, almost helpless with laughter, over the best of all the practical jokes he had ever had a hand in.

This evening, as I am finishing my story, there's a discussion in progress, on the subject of a chicken-wing, between Ralph and Baffle. Darlie is an incipient Newfoundlander; a mere lapful of black-brown curly pet at present, with any amount of silky brown ears, but destined some of these years to monopolize two-thirds of the hearth-rug at least. He is on the best of terms with baby, and a very special favorite with my friend Master Charley Ford, not to speak of Pussy and Ralph, and on the whole I can very well understand the present aspect of affairs, except that Ralph will persist in spelling my pet's pretty name by calling him my Fee.

LOST IN THE WILDERNESS.

My love! my only love!
Where lies thy head to-night?
'Tis weary waiting for both of day,
And for tidings of the fight!

Somewhere in a crowded camp,
Or mayhap on a ghastly field,
In a curious kind of indistinctness. What had been corbury was submerged under a level surface of the tallowy varnish, and his short coat looked as if it had been cut from plates of grenay India-rubber. Incredible as it seemed, in that atmosphere, he was evidently on the point of eating his dinner. A smoking coffee-pot, with its corresponding tin cup, at the basis of hot oysters, and a yellow earthen pipkin pitilly occupied by twenty crackers, a piece of baker's loaf, and a right-angled segment of pound-cake, occupied the farther end of the bare pine table, with knife, fork, and iron spoon in the greasiest corner of all. Let no innocent foreigner presume to infer that this was a miserable habitation, or that its master proved himself an old miser by living in Shanty Nothing of the kind. Mr. Baum was only "shantying," and shantying is one of the recognized modes of existence.

Well, I went in, and my companion followed with a curt "How are ye, Sir?" to our host. I said my hand carelessly on the chair as I passed, and set it for him before the stove, taking a seat myself on the end of a bench near the table. The flowing wells must be taking it without any objection, and sat contemplating the fire under his wide-awake, leaving the profits of a very prominent, singularly-shaped human nose to be contemplated at leisure by Mr. Adam Baum.

Presently I saw the figure of the oil-nabob straightening itself, and his face growing yellow with mute fear of petroleum and coal-dust.

"Thunder!" he ejaculated at last, "that ain't you?"

"That's me, Sir," echoed the visitor.

"Heerd you was dead," gasped Adam, at length.

"Ah-h!" said Hall, significantly.

Then there was silence a little while. Mr. Baum was looking at Ralph's watery pretty well in a way, but not very avidly.

"Well, Sir," he said, brightening up, "what'll you take. Grocery just t'other side o' the derrick out here. Ain't got the first hair in the shanty."

"Can't drink, Sir," interrupted Hall, gruffly.

"No! take no time."

"Yes," said Ralph.

"There is a little business to be done to-day, Mr. Baum," said I, gravely, rising and standing by the table. Mr. Baum answered a word.

Then we all remained "in statu quo" for a little while. Hall took up a pine stick, and with an elaborate nonchalance, began fashioning the ashes on the hearth into the semblance of a mountain.

"Well, Sir," he said at last.

"I don't do no business when there's women an' jakin aroun'," grumbled Adam.

"Let me see your writ," said I, quietly, "how I happen to be here to-day with Mr. Hall. I had some business with him some time ago, putting wood one day at my mother's, and Hall then mention that trip to California which you spoke of to my husband the next day. I wrote to Hall afterward, and thought perhaps I could find him. So I did find him, after a while, and we both came on to once, of course."

Mr. Baum looked at me. Mr. Hall never looked at anybody. Only, Oon, that is Conn Hall, Co—long, treat and time. Guess Old Adam's able to put up."

"Can't stop, I tell you," and Hall thrust the stick into the fire and took up his fur gloves.

Then, at last it came.

"Well, if you've a min' to reasonable, an' consid'r's an accommodation to an old man. We're all as is like to git out o' the way s'mirces—p-r-o-n-o-u-n-c-e-d swift as the sparks flies upards."

"Why, Oon, that's your name," said I, "we shall all remember that. There's nothing hard to be done. I have brought another deed ready for signing, and I placed the document, with pen and ink on the table; when that is done, the whole matter will be settled, and I shall not name here, if you please, and Mr. Hall and I will sign as witnesses."

It was an hour to me before the creat-tallen old man got through the slow operation of shambling up to the table and scrawling his name. Then I wrote mine with nervous fingers. Hall put his great black hand down below, and in five minutes we were in the wagon again, the deed safe in my pocket.

Hall turned his horse's head, and then stood up with the reins in his hand, and shouted back at the house, "Adam, stray child!" at the door.

"Mr. Baum, I believe I didn't mention it to you before, and perhaps you'd like to hear. You remember Mrs. Ford's brother, one 't had a nose just like mine, you know, and signed that other deed."

"Thunder an' blazes!"

We didn't hear any more. Peter Hall touched his horse and away we went—Peter, almost helpless with laughter, over the best of all the practical jokes he had ever had a hand in.

This evening, as I am finishing my story, there's a discussion in progress, on the subject of a chicken-wing, between Ralph and Baffle. Darlie is an incipient Newfoundlander; a mere lapful of black-brown curly pet at present, with any amount of silky brown ears, but destined some of these years to monopolize two-thirds of the hearth-rug at least. He is on the best of terms with baby, and a very special favorite with my friend Master Charley Ford, not to speak of Pussy and Ralph, and on the whole I can very well understand the present aspect of affairs, except that Ralph will persist in spelling my pet's pretty name by calling him my Fee.

LOST IN THE WILDERNESS.

My love! my only love!
Where lies thy head to-night?
'Tis weary waiting for both of day,
And for tidings of the fight!

Somewhere in a crowded camp,
Or mayhap on a ghastly field,

Is lying one whom my jealous heart
To Death will never yield.

My love! my only love!
But the rivers roll between;
And the land it stretcheth for weary miles
In summer beauty green.

My love! my only love!
But the night is long and lone;
And my heart goes out through the dewy dark
With a sore, unsoothed moan.

My love! my only love!
But my arms are vacant yet;
And the cheeks that are fading because unkissed,
With passionate tears are wet.

My love! my only love!
My life is a wasting pain;
For its fullness of unshed tenderness
Maketh it ache again.

My love! my only love!
I will wait and watch for thee,
To find thee in all that is left for me,
If thy glory lieth low!

* * *

Alas! and she could not know
That the grass was springing green,
And the rank weeds hiding a SOMETHING where
A knightly soul had been.

Alas! for the faithful heart;
Alas! for its yearning pain:
He hath laid him down in the Wilderness,
Never to rise again.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEW MUSIC
Just Issued by Firth, Son & Co.

In the Bye-and-By, a beautiful Romanza, by H. Millard. Price 30c. The Dying Soldier; or, Dear Mother, I'm dying now, a companion to the already popular Song, "Dear Mother, I've come Home to Die." The Words and Music by W. Kipp. Price 30c. Sweet Home of my Early Days: a Song and Chorus for the times, by Mrs. Parkhurst. Price 30c. Hunt, by W. E. Bassford; an arrangement, for medium players, of the principal Melodies, including the Soldiers' Chorus of the popular Opera in Nine. 60c. each. The Ticket of Leave Polka, by Jules Levy. Performed by the Florence Quadrille Band. 30c. Grand Galop de Concert, or Song of the Storm, by Winnicke: a characteristic piece for the Piano in A and D's, calculated to display the Power. It is one of the author's best pieces. Price 50c. Any of the above sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

FIRTH, SON & CO., 563 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:

HISTORY OF FREDERICH II., called Frederick the Great, By Thomas Carlyle. Vols. I.-IV., with Portraits, Maps, Plans, &c. 12mo. Cloth, $1 75 per vol.

Mr. Carlyle has made the only living writer whose opinions are of value, even when it is impossible to agree with them. No one has so completely found the key of Frederick's paradoxes hint at so important truths. No one with a more understanding sympathy has read his heroics, or condemns the hapless possessors of pot-bellies to infamy; but then he expresses, even where they can not be confirmed, always enforces some weighty principle which we were in danger of forgetting. And if it sometimes happens that neither the hero nor the principles commend themselves to the reader's judgment, the anecdotes and the fun with which all his writings are instinct, never fail to make a good work.—London Examiner.

The history of Frederick the Great is coming to be Carlyle's epic masterpiece. Probably the history of Frederick will forever remain one of the finest pieces of literary painting. It is one of the most remarkable artistic attempts at special pleading, extant in our own or any language.—London Saturday Review.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS. Part II. in Harper's Magazine for July. Price 25 cents.

COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. By MRS GRASKELL. 8vo, Paper, 20 cents.

A charming little story, sanctified in English journals and at once republished in America. Mrs Gaskell is a fresh and sparkling.—Evening Post.

Cousin Phillis is a creation of genius worthy of the author of "Adam Bede." The narrative is powerful from its simplicity and truthfulness. The interest of the story is well sustained, not only by the originality of its plot, but by the skillful manner in which the characters are developed.—N. Y. Tribune.

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; or, Sabbath Readings. A Series of Sermons on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By Rev. Gardiner Spring, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in the City of New York. 12mo. Cloth, $1 00.

An excellent, practical, sensible, and edifying, and permanently valuable sermon, these masterly, devotional, and instructive discourses which have made the church a house of worship and religious improvement through two generations in the great, restless, metropolis.—N. Y. Tribune.

The peculiar excellence consists in a happy selection of the living topics of the day, and in the manner of using the Word of God, with an unusual fullness of Scriptural quotation and biblical insertion, which brings the speaker and hearer into holy sympathy. We anticipate from the publication of these sermons unmeasured usefulness.—N. Y. Observer.

The discourses are remarkable for their plainness of statement, and the directness and accuracy of their practical appeals. In style they are singularly terse and vigorous, owing to the vividness of the French pulpit. They embrace a wide variety of topics, and exhibit great knowledge of human nature, with no common mastery of the art of persuasion.—N. Y. Tribune.

NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS.
OR, SKETCHES OF A GIRL'S LIFE. Written by her Sister. With an Introduction by Rev. R. S. Foster, D.D. 16mo. Cloth, 75 cents.

THE LADDER OF LIFE.
A Novel. By Amelia B. Edwards. Author of "The Ladder of Life," &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.
A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "Rachel Ray," "Orley Farm," "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," "The Three Clerks," "The West Indies and the Spanish Main," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER & BROTHERS

J. H. Winslow & Co's

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $135 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 70 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches... 18 00 each.
$1000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " " " ..... 2 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins..... 5 00 to 8 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
6000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Bosom Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders 4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Ivory Holders..... 2 00 each.
Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles named, what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1: eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS
(From Juries 3 and 4) at the
International Exhibition,
LONDON, 1862;
AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, EXCITED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT EXCELLENCE AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be used as an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlets, with full particulars, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for July—Vol. 40, begins with a Double No., now ready, containing Portraits, Characters, and Biographies of leading men, living and dead, such as HANCOCK, HENRY WINN, WADSWORTH, HAWTHORNE, MCCLELLAN, President of Columbia, S. A., the Double Galvanion, with Portraits, Characters, and Biographies; Size, Symmetry, or the Basis; Physiological Laws of Life; Mental Manifestations; with Chart of Portraits; Phrenology—the Origin of Character; Phrenology, the Science of the Soul; and lots of other matter, to be found in no other publication. The Phrenological Illustrated Monthly, with Ninety-six Columns of rich reading matter. Newsmen have it. Sold at 30 cents, or $3 a year, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO.

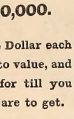
Manufacturers of GOLD PENS and PENCIL CASES of every description. Sole Manufacturers of the CELEBRATED
Angular Nibbed Pen.

AGENTS WANTED throughout the country. EXTRA inducements offered. Large discounts made to the trade. Send for our descriptive circular. AMERICAN GOLD PEN Co., No. 209 Broadway, N. Y.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and everywhere else, in this most lucrative business known. Horses not required. Address or apply to T. & H. GAUGHAN, 116 Broadway, New York.

The Salem Leg.

This Leg is LIGHT, DURABLE, COMFORTABLE, NOISELESS, simple in construction, and reliable. It dispenses with all cords, leaves the MUSCLES FREE and the AMPUTATION SHORT. It is adapted to ALL CLASSES of CASES, and enables the wearer to walk with astonishing ease and naturalness of step. For CIRCULARS containing full particulars, address "Salem Leg Company, Salem, Mass." Soldiers entering this Leg can receive the usual amount of government aid.



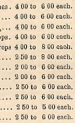
50,000 Agents Wanted.

Great sale of Jewelry, Watches, Chains, Pistols, Gold Pens and Cases, Rings, &c., &c., Army Badges, &c. For $1, we will send a Sample Package, and for Circular, and Certificate of Selection; and if we will send a new Artillery, Infantry, Cavalry, or Dominion's Pin, engraved as above. Send for wholesale illustrated circular. S. M. WARD & CO., 180 Broadway, N. Y.

THE Summer No. of MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR of FASHIONS Now Ready.—A brilliant display of beautiful Summer Styles, with Illustrations, Original and Select Patterns, an elegant Braid Sheet, with much valuable information, only 25 cents, or yearly subscription $3, with a premium of One Dollar's worth of EXTRA PATTERNS.

Mme. Demorest will find enclosed $1 00, and 1 ct. for postage on the premium of Braid Sheet, please send me your Mirror of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No. Address

Give your address in full, and address it to
MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.



THE ACME OF PERFECTION.
In CURES CATARRH in all its VARIOUS TYPES and STAGES with absolute certainty. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents, 75 Bleecker Street, one door W. of Broadway, N. Y. Sold by Druggists.

FIELD, NAVY, and OPERA GLASSES manufactured by B. H. HORN, Optician, 212 Broadway, corner of Fulton St.; also every description of Mathematical, Telescopes, Spectacles, and Eye-glasses, for sale wholesale and retail. Send stamp for circular.

Asthma Cured.

Relief guaranteed in Ten Minutes, and a permanent cure effected by "TUTTLE'S ELIXIR OF AN ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent post-paid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth St., Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The splendid Summer number, with elegant Illustrations, New Music, Beautiful Braid and Embroidery, Full Information, and Seven Full-sized Patterns, now ready.

Attention Company!

Clark's Conqueror, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustachios in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Any person using this Unguent, and finding it not as represented, by informing me of the fact, can have their money returned them at any time within 3 months from day of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, by
A. C. CLARK,
P. O. Box 1178,
Albany, N. Y.

LADIES' LETTER.

FIVE ANATOMICAL ENGRAVINGS.
Has information never before published.
Sent free, in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.
Address Box 4652. New York P. O.

Beautiful False Moustaches, 50 cts. and $1. Send stamp for circulars. Address C. W. Fiske, Brooklyn, N. Y.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

The Weak, the Cotemptive, Rheumatic, Costive, Bilious, and Delicate, after some days' use, will find renewed strength and life pervade every organ of their frames.

Every dose makes the blood purer. The nerves commence to be toned and terminate in the veins. These pills, as a first effect, act upon the arterial blood, increasing the circulation, by which impurities are deposited in the veins, and they throw off such collection into the bowels, which organs, by the energy derived from Brandreth Pills, expel them from the system. When first used, the Pills may occasion griping, and even make the patient feel worse. This is an excellent sign, and shows the disease within has begun to yield. No great good is often achieved without some trouble in its attainment, and this rule applies to the recovery of health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all reputeable dealers in medicines.

Songs of the Soldiers. Songs of the Soldiers.
The only collection which contains all the best Camp Songs. Edited by Frank Moore. Price $1 00. A liberal discount where quantities are purchased. Send orders to C. T. DILLINGHAM, Publisher, 443 Broadway, N. Y.

MARRIAGE.—WOMAN CULTURE. How to be Beautiful and healthy. Does He Love me? The Mother. How to Rear and Wean a Child. The most Dangerous Eyes. A Satisfactory Philosophy. The Cost of War, from 1861 to 1864. Self-Control. Phrenology in England. "Greeting." Home Influence. Economy, Caresse, etc., in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Sent by mail, post paid for 30 cents, or a year for $3. A new vol. begins with July. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE FUNNIEST GETTING FAT WITH SUCCESS. —10,000 sold in one day. Everybody and his wife, including the whole family, are digesting our fun with a gusto that makes the pockets of the publisher laugh and grow fat. Price, 25 cents. Sold, and yet there is room. Second edition now ready.

DEMOREST'S N. Y. ILLUSTRATED NEWS, the most popular Pictorial in America, and universally acknowledged the most graphic and finely illustrated paper ever published. Contains all the Fashions, and the Choicest Literature. Single copies 10 cents; yearly $4 00. Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashions for one year as a premium. The best medium for general advertising in the country. Advertisements inserted and addressed to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 20 Beekman Street.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Printing Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $3500.
Apply to BARD, ARCHER, & BRADSTREET, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

"INSTINCT AND REASON."—When Learned Men say. The Human Head, compared with the Gorilla. Or, Man's Place Among the Animals. Size, shape, and color, only a basement. Anecdotes of Dogs and Horses; What constitutes Mind. Difference between man and animal, given in the JULY DOREMI NO. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL; 30 cents; by the year, $3. Now Volume.
FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

DEAR READER, if you are a reader, do not fail to read the story entitled "Sweetheart Lil in the "Funniest" No. 5. You can read it over three, four or six times, and each time you read it you will laugh, and cry, and cry and laugh each time, especially if you have some one to laugh with you—it is much more than the most costly dinner. Sold everywhere at 10 cents.

SOMETHING NEW
IN PLAYING CARDS.
LOVE'S SECRETS.
Designs from French Artists.

The above very novel and beautiful two beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, each picture containing fifty-two pieces. Invoice 50 cents and two red stamps, and send for sample package. Liberal discount by gross to dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 50 Nassau St., New York.

Violin Strings for Hot Weather, 25c., mailed. Musicians' Omnibus, 100 tunes for flute, violin, fife, clarionet, or clarionet, Omnibus Complete, a musical library of 1500 tunes—violin, flute, or cornet, $2, mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 189 Bowery, N. Y.

Will you have Handsome Whiskers or Moustaches?

Are you Baldheaded?

DR. BRIGGS'S Celebrated Golden Ointment has proved to give whiskers or moustaches to the Whiskerless or Moustacheless to grow in from six to eight weeks, and so humbug Also on the head to grow hair.
2^{00} Testimonials given. All orders promptly attended to. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by. Write your name plain. Address,

DR. C. BRIGGS, Chicago, Ill.

"SIGNS OF CHARACTER."—PHRENOLOGY, illustrated with 170 Engravings, including men, women, and animals; resemblances in looks and character. Local Physiognomy, by the Hon. S. W. HOUSTON, D.D. Correspondence between the character of a country and of the people therein. Given in the JULY DOREMI NO. ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL; 30 cents, or $3 a year. New Vol. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

THE SAFEST and most certain remedy for Diarrhœa is Dr. Peck's Extract of Sweet Gum prepared from the bark of the Liquidamber Styraciflua, a native of America, but is perfectly safe in all climates. Price 50 cts. per bottle, or $5 per dozen. A trial of a single package sent to any address.
Prepared by the Dalen Medicine Co., No. 13 Grand St., New York, and for sale by all Druggists. PETER CLARK, Agent.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine, or by sample and free by mail for 50c. Bristol for $3, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—To sell a Splendid Steel Engraving of Abraham Lincoln, size 22x28. Send five for $5. Large discount to Agents. Also the largest assortment of Lithographs of the Great Battles. Plain and colored Lithographic Portraits of Generals, Gems for the Album, New Barbiere Hymn, the United States Army Diploma, and Gems for Soldiers. Prize Packages, &c. Send for circular to JOHN GIBSON, 12 Beekman Street, N. Y.

Shults' Unguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Photographic Medallions,

Or CAMPAIGN MEDALS, with accurate likenesses of candidates on metal, and enclosed in neat metallic cases, sent by mail, 15 cents each, or $1 50 per dozen. Liberal discount to the trade. Manufactured and sold wholesale and retail by JOHN GAULT,
No. 1 Park Place, New York.

O. T. W.

DR. CHAS. T. JACKSON, State Assayer of Massachusetts, after an analysis of Burnett's Oriental Tooth Wash, recommends it as a superior destructive. Sold by all druggists.

WANTED EVERYWHERE, good reliable Agents for a pleasant, legitimate, lively business. Permanent employment, and extra liberal inducements. Catalogue, with full particulars, sent free on application. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, 14 Chambers St., N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.
ALL KINDS AT BARTLETT'S, 483 BROADWAY, N. Y.

If you want a
First-rate Glee Book,

Obtain the "Musical Lyre," containing New and Sparkling Glees, Trios, Serenades, Chants, Four-Part Songs, Choruses, Operatic Selections, Hymns, and Sacred Anthems—decidedly the best book of its Class. Price $1 50, in cloth; $1 00 in boards. Sent post-paid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington Street, Boston.

The Rev. Charles E. King
Continues to send Free of Cost his Prescription for the radical treatment and cure of CONSUMPTION, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis and Catarrhal Affections of the Throat, Lungs, and Air-Passages; Disorders of the Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, and all Derangements of the Nervous System.
Address, with stamp, Rev. CHARLES E. KING, Station D, Bible House, N. Y.
The milder seasons are the most favorable to successful treatment in ALL DISORDERS. Religious papers will please copy.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1849)
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. 4 BARD, Agt., No. 19 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.

DR. B. C. PERRY,
DERMATOLOGIST,
49 Bond Street, New York,

Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations of the Skin, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free.
For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

CARPET WARP.
WOOL TWINE.
Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 64 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

A CHANCE FOR POETICAL PATRIOTISM.—A Prize of One Hundred Dollars is offered by the proprietor of Demorest's Illustrated News, for the best words to a song in the guarantee of Liberty and Universal Freedom in our glorious Constitution. See the particulars in Demorest's N. Y. Illustrated News.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Bellmore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by ADAMS'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutters charged low rates.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Pens and 13 other articles. 10 circulars sent free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

The Graefenberg Company's
NEW YORK CATHOLICON REMEDIES.
An infallible cure for "Female Weakness," and all Uterine complaints of women.
Price $1 50 per bottle. Five bottles for $6. CATHOLICON, The Great Remedy. VEGETABLE PILLS.
The best Pill in the world for family use, and for all Bilious and Liver complaints. 25 cts. per box.
Address all orders to J. F. BRIDGE, M.D.,
Resident Physician Graefenberg Company, No. 139 William Street, near Fulton, New York.
3^{00} Injection or Diarrhœa Cured by Catholicon. $3

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 each, or 11 Copies for $27 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.
One Copy For Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $17 00. Payment invariably in advance.
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

AN OLD STORY NEWLY APPLIED.

FERNANDY WOOD. "Say Peace! or, by Thunder, I'll split it up the middle!"

BOOTS & SHOES.
THE LARGEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY
OF GOOD BOOTS SHOES & C.
FOR LADIES, GENTLEMEN, BOYS & CHILDREN AT BROOKS'
BOOT AND SHOE EMPORIUMS
Nos. 275 BROADWAY & 181 & 50 FULTON ST.

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAR & SON.
MERCHANT TAILORS,
692 Broadway, Near 4th St., N. Y.,
Wholesale and Retail. Fine cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $6 for sample pipe.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,
Manufacturers of
GOLD MEDAL
Grand and Square Pianos,
Baltimore, Md.
Certificates of excellence from
Thalberg, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.
Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

Remington's
ARMY AND NAVY
REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Rifle Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

Good News for the Army.
Hereafter we will send, post-paid, any of our PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS ordered by soldiers for themselves or friends, giving an album of the full value of the money sent.
Our Albums have the reputation of being superior to all others in beauty and durability, and range in price from $2.50 to $20.
Our catalogue of
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS
may embrace about 5000 officers, army and navy, statesmen, artists, copies of works of art, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Our assortment of these is very extensive, including a great variety of views of the present war.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.
Manufactory of Photographic Materials.

Don't buy your Gaiters
or Shoes without Fogg's
Patent Lever Buckle.
They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can obtain Ten Cents Currency, and I will furnish sample by return mail.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
216 Front Street, New York,
and
63 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

A SWEET AND PERFUMED BREATH
VERSUS
A BAD BREATH.
What lady or gentleman would remain under the curse of a disagreeable breath, when, by using the
BALM OF 1000 FLOWERS,
it would be cured? How many lovers it has separated!!! How many friends forever parted! The SUBSCRIBER is no DREAMER. Your earnest friend will not mention it; and you are yourself ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the Balm as a tooth-wash night and morning.
The Balm of THOUSAND FLOWERS
is a sweet and delightful preparation. It is composed of Palm-oil and Honey: hence the name. The most BEAUTIFUL WOMEN
of ancient times used honey to beautify their complexion; but the combination with palm-oil and other valuable ingredients makes it still more valuable. For bathing after shaving, a few drops poured into a basin of water will dispel all fever, ague, &c. A few drops poured on the hair will soon make a beautiful soft lather, leaving the face pure and white.
When used for washing night and morning, it eradicates all Tan, Pimples, and Freckles, rendering the skin soft and white, and free from blemish.
Price 75 Cents. For sale by all Druggists.

EXCELSIOR
FIREWORKS.
FUNSTON & SCOFIELD, removed to No. 5 Dey St., near Broadway. Public and Private Exhibitions, Flags, Lanterns, &c. Goods guaranteed best and cheapest.

HISTORY, ART, POLITICS, BELLES-LETTRES, POETRY, BIOGRAPHY, CRITICISM, NARRATIVE, FICTION, are constantly represented in the pages of the
Atlantic Monthly
This Thoroughly American Magazine is published monthly by TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston.
Each number contains 144 pages, large octavo 25 cents. Liberal reduction to clubs. Send 25 cents for a specimen and circular.
TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston

TROPICAL BALSAM!
Prepared from the Tropical Balsam of Gilead Co.
Recommended by the Medical Faculty as the most effectual remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, and Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.
Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 25 cents per bottle.
Depot, 49 Cedar Street, New York.

U. S. Gov. Artificial Leg Depots,
658 Broadway, N. Y.; Rochester, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill., Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where the Government furnishes the U. S. Army and Navy Leg to Soldiers gratis, or his Patent Elastic Leg, Arm, Hand and Foot and Socket-Jointed Leg, which has lateral motion at the ankle like the natural one.
DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.
For information address Dr. Bly, at nearest Depot.

A New Novel,
By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens.
The Indian Queen.
This fine romance is just issued, in No. 70 of Beadle's Dime Novels. For sale by all News Dealers. Price Ten Cents. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Liberal Terms to Agents.
BEADLE & CO., Publishers, 118 William St., N. Y.

Gold Watch Free
AND
$15 Per Day, $15
Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Rapid Seller Stereoscope and Photo Pictures. $25 CAN BE MADE in a few hours by smart agents. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains large quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Holders, Emblems, Ladies' Paris Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Knockins, Household Companion, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, GENTS' Pocket Colleetion for the Year, Union Designs, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engraving, Birds-eye View, Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., etc. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid SOLID GOLD Silver Hunting Lever WATCH (warranted) presented FREE to each Agent. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

VERMILYE & CO.,
No. 44 Wall Street, New York,
Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.
U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,
converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.
The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

GRANT.
The largest and only correct portrait of Lieut.-Gen. Grant is published by JONES & CLARK, 23 NASSAU ST., N. Y. Agents wanted everywhere. Send 50 cents for sample and letter of agency.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address H. G. L. Meary & Co., 377 W. 23d St., N. Y.

FREMONT CAMPAIGN MEDAL. Of neat and beautiful design, to be worn as a badge or party emblem by all supporters of General FREMONT for the Presidency.
Send in your orders at once.
TERMS: Single Medal, 25 cents per dozen, $4 50. Liberal terms to the trade. Address J. W. EVERETT & CO., 111 Fulton St., N. Y. City.
Box 1614.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the
SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.
Send for a prospectus to below.
VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOVEREIGN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and $2 the pair bottle. LAVOLTA, OR THE TRUE, ELEGANT, CERTAIN, but only harmless restorative, $1 and $2 per bottle. HUILE DE MACASSAR, THE DESIGNETTE OIL, 75 cts. MEDICATED POMADE, THE FINEST, 75 cts. TOOTH POWDER, THE FINEST, 25 cts. ONE sixth off by the dozen. Druggist has not these articles for sale, but will consult with your order for VICTOR E. MAUGER, 113 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

Hurra for Gen. Grant!
Portrait of Gen. Grant in Oil Colors. The only portrait published printed in color. Agents wanted everywhere. Send 25 cents for a sample copy and agents circular, to N. FERRY, 96 Maiden Lane, New York.

Metallic Artificial Legs.
Weight only Four Pounds.
A fit guaranteed. It thinks no notice. It does not get out of order. The measure can be sent, and the leg returned by express. If you are not satisfied after six months' trial, I will return the money less twenty-five dollars.
Price $150 to $200. Send for a circular.
Office and Salesroom 291 Broadway, New York.
J. W. WESTON.
E. WESTON, 21 West 4th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

WARDS SHIRTS
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.
STEEL COLLARS
ENAMELLED WHITE.
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
Ladies, Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.
Price 75 cents per dozen, sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 90 cents.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N.Y.

GUN-POWDER
SMITH & RAND, Manufacturers of ORANGE RIFLE and ORANGE LIGHTNING POWDER, of superior strength and cleanness.
OFFICE, 170 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Card Photographs.
A splendid assortment. Catalogues sent free. Address E. W. HUTCHINGS, Metropolitan Hotel, 4 Lafayette St., N. Y.

Munro's Ten Cent Novels.—No. 1. The Hunters.—2. The Trapper's Retreat.—3. The Patriot Highwayman.—4. The Double Lieutenant.—5. The Truck of Fire.—6. The Man-Eater.—7. Charlotte Temple.—8. The Death Face.—9. The Indian Slayer.—10. The Tiger of the Ocean.—11. The Hunter's Triumph.—12. The Green Bushrangers.—13. The Two Guardsmen.—14. Zeke Bingham, the Lion-Hearted Scout.—15. The Scourge of the Sea.—16. The Captive Maiden.—17. Long-Legged Joe. For sale by all News Agents, and sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the trade. GEORGE MUNRO & CO., 137 William Street, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PATENT WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, 4-ounded dial, cut bands, "English Movements," and correct time-keeper.
A single one sent free by mail to any one, WITH A BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $8.
A GOLD SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$18 Algerine, $18
OR OSTRICH'S EGG WATCH.
A SUPERB "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or silver-plated Hunting Case Watch, Maps "Correct Time," the English Jeweled or Nickel Movements," "M. J. Tompion" Independent Action, Self Balance, a "Correct Guide to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time keeper, "warranted one year." WELL STEMM ACTS, and is an

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch,
Used by the British Army Officers.
Sent free by mail, in elegant MOROCCO CASE, for only $18.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct timepiece; and for beauty and fine finish they are equal in appearance to $100 watches."
Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 98 & 99 Ann Street, New York.

No Wash or Preparation. No trouble or entangling the Hair; but a beautiful brown or black color at once by using Buswell & Warner's Colorine. Now and Dest. Try it, you will use no other. Druggists' general Depot, 9 Dey St., N. Y. near Broadway.

NO mean cause of sterility, retarded growth, the person over 15, by its pernicious stimulating power. The Medium of the Tennessee Swamp Shrub has been found to exhilarate the blood, &c., to a fine and vigorous growth. The History and a small sample box of the Balsam will be sent sealed, on receipt of stamp.
JOHN RAWLINS, 513 Broadway, N. Y.

"Name-visible Runs finished." Mailed on receipt of $1. Suitable "Lic," $1. JEANERET, 78 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. Trade supplied.

U. S. Army Agency,
64 Bleecker Street; N. Y., opposite Pay Department.
All persons having claims against the Government should present them at the above office for speedy payment.
Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid.
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT
DRY AND GROUND IN OIL
In several dark shades.
For English double Cottager, Outbuildings, &c.
ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT
Hardens and invigorates the Gums
Purifies and Sweetens the Breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.
Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 25 cents per bottle.
HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,
218 Greenwich St., New York.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, below Broome St.
IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety.
COLORED STONE CHINA DINNER SETS.

GUNS, PISTOLS,
Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street. N. Y.,
31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris.
Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 25 CENTS, or FORTY FOR $ 1 00.
Address T. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just Published
DENIS DUVAL. A Novel. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "Esmond," &c. Illustrated by "Phiz." "The Virginians," "The English Humorists," "The Four Georges," "Roundabout Papers," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

"Monte's Ten Cent Novels.—No. 1. The Hunters.—2. The Trapper's Retreat.—3. The Patriot Highwayman.—4. The Double Lieutenant.—5. The Truck of Fire.—6. The Man-Eater.—7. Charlotte Temple.—8. The Death Face.—9. The Indian Slayer.—10. The Tiger of the Ocean.—11. The Hunter's Triumph.—12. The Green Bushrangers.—13. The Two Guardsmen.—14. Zeke Bingham, the Lion-Hearted Scout.—15. The Scourge of the Sea.—16. The Captive Maiden.—17. Long-Legged Joe. For sale by all News Agents, and sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the trade. GEORGE MUNRO & CO., 137 William Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 394.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT AT HIS HEAD-QUARTERS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

OUR FLAG!

[As one of the brigades of the Reserve Corps which came up to the rescue of General Thomas at Chickamauga was marching through Athens, Alabama, a bright-eyed girl of four summers was looking at the sturdy fellows trumping by. When she saw the sun glancing through the stripes of red and on the golden stars of the flag she exclaimed, clapping her hands, "Oh, pa! pa! God made that flag! See the stars!" A shout that could be heard was up from that column, and many a bronzed veteran lifted his hat as he passed the unexpected child, manifesting, if his good right arm availed any thing, God's flag should conquer.]

Down the long street the soldiers passed
In solid columns through the town;
Their clothes were soiled with Southern dust,
Their faces with the sun were brown.

They marched the field of blood to reach,
Where the fierce cannon thundered loud,
And where their hostile armies met
The black and blinding battle-cloud.

They bore aloft with conscious pride
The flag our fathers loved of old—
That banner with the crimson stripes,
And with the shining stars of gold.

Close by the road-side stood a child
With her dark hair and radiant eyes,
Neath whose white lids imprisoned seemed
The color of the azure skies.

And when she saw the sacred flag
For which our brave boys bear their scars,
"Papa!" she cried, and clapped her hands and smiled,
And eyes unused to tender looks
Turned fondly on the fair-haired child.

God's banner! Yes. With patriot blood
To-day its hallowed folds are wet;
But by such precious drops now rilled
Its stars shall be forever set.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1864.

THE FLAG AND THE ARMY.

THE good news from General SHERMAN, whose campaign is one of the most daring and, thus far, triumphant upon record, and the masterly skill and tenacity of General GRANT, keep the mind of the country firmly fixed upon the army and the progress of the war. The action of Congress and the resolution of the War Department in driving means for recruiting the ranks and presenting an undiminished as well as undaunted front to the enemy, merely respond to the exigent purpose of the hour. The Government takes the nation at its word. Every great Convention, every orator who speaks for the people, every man who knows where the available prize at stake, calls for the prosecution of the war, and demands that this campaign, if possible, shall shake the rebellion to the heart.

The desperate determination, the valor of the rebels in the field, nobody disputes. Their leaders have placed their names, their hopes, their pride, their fortunes, and their lives upon the hazard. For three years they have struggled, and they will struggle on until further struggle is not hopeless only, for it is that now, but impossible. They have scraped their section and brought every available man into the field. They have finally acknowledged that their defeat now is final. For two months the great battle has been joined. GRANT has steadily driven Lee to lay in Richmond. SHERMAN has relentlessly pushed them backward to Atlanta. Their furious shocks and onsets have been repelled. Their heaviest blows have helped them little. On land and sea their last hope and cursed cause totters, and the Government of the loyal people of the United States, which aims, as it has stated from the beginning of the war, only at the restoration of the absolute authority of the people, and peace by justice and equal rights, now calls upon those people to supply the men that shall shoot down the rebels and to the world that the power of a great, free, self-governing nation is exhaustless and irresistible.

Now then is the time, before the formal order is issued, for every citizen to use every effort to send a substitute if he can not go himself, and to replenish the army by the spontaneous act of the people. While the rebellion wavers, naturally, strong blow will bring it down. There are yet nearly five good months of fighting weather, and the heroes in the field ask only that they may be supported. The terms of the new bill for recruiting, in which the commutation bill is abolished, are clear, earnest, and—it seems to us—well considered. The bill means fight, as the country does. The Copperhead opposes it, suppose it, of course, as they formerly opposed the commutation, because they do not mean fight. They mean compromise, surrender, and disgrace. Our armies were never so well led, were never so united and enthusiastic, never fought so persistently and bravely as they do now. Let every loyal man in the land make himself a recruiting committee, that he may have the unwavering consciousness forever, and say to his children, that he too did his active part, by personal retrenchment and sacrifice and exertion, if not by actual service in the field, to secure the permanent victory of that flag whose inspirations and benedictions are so glowingly portrayed in the picture which adorns our present number.

THE "ALABAMA."

THE British pirate ship Alabama has been sunk by the American ship of war Kearsarge. The action took place off Cherbourg harbor on the morning of June 19, 1864, beginning about eleven o'clock and lasting more than an hour. The armament of the Alabama is reported by various authorities to have been three heavy rifled guns, with eight broadside 32-pounders that of the Kearsarge two eleven-inch shell-guns, four 32-pounders, and two smaller guns. The crew of the Kearsarge is said by the same authorities to have been one hundred and fifty: that of the Alabama about the same number. The Alabama opened the fight by a single long-range shot at two thousand yards, the Kearsarge reserving her fire. For two hours sailed around each other in circles seven times, and the fighting was mainly done at the distance of a quarter of a mile. After the action had lasted an hour a hundred and fifty rounds from the Alabama and a hundred from the Kearsarge, the pirate ship blacked fire, and seemed to be making sail for the shore, which was about nine miles distant. At half-past twelve she was in a sinking and disabled state. The English yacht Deerhound, which had been hovering near during the action, immediately made toward the Alabama, saving about forty men, including SEMMES and thirteen officers. Of the rest of the crew, some were killed, seventeen wounded, and sixty-eight captured. The Kearsarge sustained very little damage, and not a shot of her crew were wounded. She did not lose a man.

Thus, as was fitting, it appears that the Captain of the Alabama was saved by a party of his British abettors, who refused to come out for that purpose. Others invited him to a public dinner at Southampton, which he declined, and went to Paris to make the acquaintance of the rebel emissaries there. The English story that the yacht Deerhound saved him at the request of the Captain of the Kearsarge is a malignant libel upon the character of that officer. No man who has the honor of the navy at heart will easily suppose that an American captain would connive at the escape from just punishment of a buccaneer whose sole business has been to prey upon defenseless ships and burn them, and who has destroyed more than any other man to drive American vessels from the ocean and destroy American commerce.

But the great fact remains that the British pirate ship, built by British hands in a British yard, manned by British sailors, paid for by British money, encouraged by British sympathy, and cheered by British lungs, was also united from a British port, has been destroyed in the British Channel, and under the noses of British symbols of piracy, by the brave Jack Yankee fights under and for the American flag. "Built in the eclipse and rigged with curses dark" she has gone down as her own flag, the Red Cross Republican, of which she was a fitting instrument, soon follow her!

ENGLISH FRIENDS UPON THE PRESIDENCY.

Two of the most notable and influential of our English friends have thus expressed themselves upon the question of the Presidency. Their views are interesting from the character of the men and from their hearty sympathy in our cause. The first is MR. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, who, in a public letter to MR. GARRISON, declares that gentleman for supporting the President for another term. His letter is long, but its substance is a complaint that MR. LINCOLN has taken, as President, the strongest antislavery position, but has conducted places and on moral grounds but only as a military necessity. "Horrible indeed," says MR. NEWMAN, "is the misery for your future. No other chief magistrate dares not indulge the moralities of his heart through conscientious tremors at the guilt of violating the wicked laws of conquered rebels?"

The total and unnecessary mental confusion evinced by such a passage as that is appalling. MR. NEWMAN seems quite to forget the first perception of the fact that the President is a magistrate bound by oath to administer a government according to a constitution, and that, while that constitution confers, under certain circumstances, the highest powers, those powers can be properly and safely exercised only with due regard to the will of the people of whom the magistrate is the agent. If now it were possible for MR. NEWMAN to comprehend all the circumstances under which the President exercises that power, he would see that to accomplish in any degree the end for which MR. NEWMAN and all good men pray, it is necessary, vitally and inevitably necessary, to proceed as the President does. This war is only indirectly a moral reform. If the President, on the 14th of April, 1861, had summoned the country to arms to save the Union by abolishing slavery, the country would not have responded. It may be our shame that we hastened to obey a call for union merely, which we should only partially and unsuccessfully have answered for emancipation; but it is no less true. The slave influence had so debauched the national mind, was so intrenched in party spirit, that the rebellion must have asked nothing better than an edict of universal emancipation. The moral sentiment of the country, as well as its political intelligence and fidelity, had to be educated by the war. And whatever the moral convictions of the President might have been, it would have been the extremest folly for him to have assumed them to exist in the heart and wish of the people. They were not there. He knew it. Every thoughtful man in the land knew it. The very problem was, whether the war could be waged upon the other ground, or whether, as the rebels and their Northern friends loudly hoped, revolution was virtually accomplished before it began.

MR. NEWMAN, in his letter, shows so profound an ignorance of the controlling facts of the case in which he gives so summary and decisive a verdict, that we have a right to ask him whether he does not differ from DR. J. G. HOLLAND, whose whole life is an act of moral devotion, ought not to suggest to him that he may possibly be in error upon some essential point. It is idle to say that a statement, in the position of MR. LINCOLN, is to do all that he may think to be abstractly right upon any occasion, without regard to the means or persons. The duty of a statesman is to do all the good he can. If MR. NEWMAN could acquaint himself, as he can not, as the President can, with the exact condition of public affairs and the public sentiment when MR. LINCOLN assumed office, down to the opening of this campaign, and contemplate the measures of justice that have characterized his administration, we are very sure that instead of denouncing him with MR. FREMONT and MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS, as betraying human liberty, he would rather cheer with the black soldiers in GRANT'S army, when the President rode by, for "colored troops." It is a cruel injustice at home, it is a needless injustice in England, to revile the President for steadily walking over stones and through thorns toward the desired bourn, instead of trying to fly thither above all obstacles, and dropping at once, impotent, baffled, and despised.

MR. NEWMAN condemns himself in the very last sentence of his letter. If we Americans have a "ruinous national insanity—prejudice against color"—we do not deny, but explore, that the phrase is almost exact; it is but another way of saying that that prejudice is quite universal. How, then, can a President, in the rebellion in common sense, effect that it does not exist? How can he, without criminal folly, disregard that fact in his administration, however heavily he may bewail it and aim to overcome it? The first duty of every citizen is doubtless to destroy so unmanly, so mean a prejudice. But its destruction is not accomplished by passing a law which assumes that it does not exist. The law may wait, it must and should wait, until it expresses the conviction of the people. Meanwhile we repeat every where may be very sure that the President and every other good citizen will do what he can to remove the shame. Every man in the country owes to other the hand for waiting sixty minutes before it marks the hour?

Another English friend, of greater public renown than MR. NEWMAN, writes in a private letter: "I shall be glad to see you safe through the crisis of the Presidential election. The feeling of your friends here is that, I think, universally in favor of LINCOLN, both because he seems to them, on the whole, to have done his part well, and because he stands as a proof of constancy on the part of the 'fickle democracy' of America. His recent letter explaining the principles of his conduct on the question of slavery appeared to all of us an admirable document. No state paper equal to it in sterling qualities has been produced on this side of the water for many a year."

Our English friends have a very difficult duty to perform. They must maintain our cause often in profound ignorance of circumstances and of the details of the truth. Thus we have lately heard of ROBERT BROWNING citing the case of the colored sergeant WALKER, who was shot rather than serve without equal pay, as an instance of unmatched heroism. We have not spared our word for justice to the colored troops in the matter of pay. But justice should lead MR. BROWNING to correct his judgment when he learns that WALKER was shot for attempting a mutiny. "If every soldier is to take the righting of wrongs into his own hands, and try to persuade others to join him, the result is clear enough. We are glad to know that the mass of the friends of this country abroad agree with the great multitude of Union men at home that the President has done his part too well to be set aside for any untried man.

WENDELL PHILLIPS UPON THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

IF the articles in the FREMONT organ, the publication meeting at the Cooper Institute, and the letter of MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS to the Independent, are illustrations of the manner in which the campaign of the Radical Democracy is to be prosecuted, all feeling of indignation disappears in incredulity and pity. The speeches and the Copperhead applause may be contemplated with a smile, but it is impossible to read MR. PHILLIPS'S letter without sadness, not because he favors MR. FREMONT, but because he supports those who support MR. LINCOLN. Any expression of opinion may be easily enough disposed of if you may stigmatize it, unchallenged, as dishonest. If we may say that the men who made the Cleveland platform were hypocrites, MR. PHILLIPS'S position becomes painfully absurd. But he does deliberately say this of the Baltimore Convention, and, of course, as hypocrites are rascals, he has the argument, after the start, all his own way. He calls one of the Baltimore resolutions "meaningless and hypocritical," and speaks of another as a compliment insincerely offered. Now, that a man should find a resolution meaningless is his undoubted right. Nothing, for instance, can be more meaningless to us than the Cleveland assertion that the rebellion has destroyed slavery. But how if we should say, in view of some of the prominent managers at Cleveland and of the loud applauders of the Cleveland nominations, that it is idle to accuse equality for all men before the law is hypocritical? Yet we should have, we imagine, quite as much reason as MR. PHILLIPS in his aspersion upon Baltimore.

When a great convention of patriotic men, who do not become specialists in political matters because MR. PHILLIPS calls them so, declare that harmony should prevail in the national counsels, and that we only are worthy of public confidence who cordially support certain principles, they may be mistaken; but why are they any more hypocritical than their accuser when he says that he has contributed to the anti-slavery purpose of JOHN C. FREMONT? His argument is, that MR. FREMONT should be publicly trusted because he holds certain principles. The Baltimore resolution declares that only those who hold certain principles should be publicly trusted. Hypocrites! cries MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS. Shall we retort "hypocrite?" No; for we confide in his honesty, and if he does not confide in the honesty of the men who met at Baltimore, it is simply because he knows nothing about them, and is much too swift to assume the dishonesty of all who do not agree with him.

MR. PHILLIPS'S letter has been well answered, and at length, in the Independent. Our object is only to protest against that kind of argument which consists of calling your opponents knaves. If he really believes that the Baltimore Convention said what it did not mean, he must be content to know from those who are better informed that he is utterly mistaken. There are men who oppose MR. LINCOLN, there are others who support him reluctantly; but the Convention was composed of those who are sincere in him and his general administration with heart-felt sincerity. MR. PHILLIPS has no right whatever to call them hypocrites. The monstrous men forgive to his honest zeal the unsparing, wholesale, and savage invective against an administration which has done more to accomplish the object to which his life has been solely devoted than all other administrations together from the beginning. To his chosen and well-tried pair of metal against their opponents his caustic and contemptuous criticism of all expedients by which great moral principles are to be reduced to practice. But vast vituperation and bitter assaults upon the characters and motives of men who love liberty and their country not less than he, however they may differ from us as to the means of serving them, these are things which make many an admiring friend sad and sorry for him, and will they not one day make him profoundly sorry for himself?

"WE CAN'T SUBDUE THE REBELS."

To the despending or exulting exclamation of "Oh, we can't subdue the rebels!" there is but one reply. If it be indeed true, then the Government is not the will of the people; and every State is again an individual political community, for the bond which holds New York to Pennsylvania is exactly the same that unites New York and Georgia, and if it is broken any where it is broken every where. If it be true, our national flag has disappeared, our national honor is gone; and most of the States of the American Union are separate powers of smaller population than the cities of London or Paris. There is no navy, no army, no common force, no collective glory. The work of a hundred years is undone, and what State, section, party, or individual is the gainer of the least real advantage?

If we "can't subdue the rebels," the rebels have subdued us. In that case JEFFERSON DAVIS will be content, because his pride will be satisfied. FERNANDO WOOD and his followers, the Copperheads, will be content, because they will hope to prostitute the character of the North to a new Union upon terms dictated by slavery. The foreign enemies of the Union will be content, for they have lasted to see a republic which might one day completely vindicate the great truth of equal human rights as the only secure foundation of government. But there can be no real advantage gained by any of these. DAVIS will have founded a kingdom which civilization will abhor. WOOD will share the fate, a thousand-fold more terrible, of BENEDICT ARNOLD. And the whole BRAH; while the foreign powers will soon be in worse straits from their quarrels over our remains than they would ever be from our most united policy of peace. The Government of the United States will be overthrown; there will be universal anarchy upon its late domain; there will be a universal hopelessness of any new Union upon any honorable terms; each State, a prey to passionate popular, will fall into civil war, and those who so triumphantly assert that "We can't subdue the rebels," will learn what it is to be a citizen of a nation utterly shattered, degraded, and despised.

The alternative, as we have already said, is very clear. Either the people must conquer, or the rebellion will. Either the authority of the Government must be maintained unconditionally, or it must be overthrown; for a Government which shows itself unable to defend the system which they will obey the laws has ceased to be a Government. The talk about negotiation and settlement is idle, and unworthy sensible men. The moment it is seen that the thought of negotiation we begin to yield the Government. Mr. WOOD and his followers insist that the war must end in negotiation because they have not that compromise is the victory of the rebellion, and they wish the rebellion to succeed. For when they insist that the war is wicked and ought to stop, and propose to send commissioners to Richmond to arrange terms "honorable to the South," they propose the destruction of the Government, which is the success of the rebellion.

When such men say, "We can't subdue the rebels," their language is as clear as their patriotism. But when the same phrase is used merely in despondency by those who sincerely wish the national cause to be maintained, they should be asked to remember what the prospects of the war were one year ago, and what they are now. Gold is higher, but the rebels are in worse straits. The army that drove LEE from Gettysburg now threatens both his supplies and his escape from his own capital. Gold may go still higher, but so will the men and money necessary to put it down. There is no reason to apprehend disaster until there is a cry from the coward and breaking heart of the American people, "We can't subdue the rebels!" When that cry is heard the rebels may subdue us, and welcome, for there will be nothing left worth fighting for.

HOME FOR THE SOLDIERS.

MR. BENJAMIN FOSDICK, of Darien in Fairfield County, Connecticut, has done what many a patriotic man in many a town and village throughout the country would gladly have done, but for a fear. He has given five thousand dollars, with a tract of land and a building for the founding of a St. Clair's Home. The avowed object of the charity is the support of Connecticut soldiers, and primarily those of the district in which the home is situated. There is ample, humane, and generous charity which serves no political or personal end, and is worthy the widest and most grateful imitation. The soldiers of this war are henceforth heroes. They will be held in the most kindly and generous remembrance. But gratitude alone will not feed them; and while the Government will take care that the republic shall not even seem to be ungrateful, the open private bounty and assistance will be necessarily large and emphatic. No man can link his name with a nobler benefit to his fellow-citizens, and the soldiers' home is the treat of the kindest men who have given all for the common cause, who will become the most independent and most interesting institutions of our counties and cities.

NEW BOOKS.

The fourth volume of CARLYLE'S "History of Frederick the Great" is just issued by the HARPERS, and is a worthy companion volume of the preceding number. CARLYLE has set himself an impossible task, and has with an incredible power of will, and picturesque narrative, carried it to completion. Out of a century which he denounces as barren of all good things, and almost destitute of great men, he selects Frederick of Prussia as the great man and a true king. The truth is against him upon both points; but the fierce battle with the light of a Titan storming heaven, and his work is as brilliant as Vulcan's hammering iron at his forge. But let him beware of excess in strenuosity, and in the corrusation of his blows beat his iron to a jelly, yet he can never transform it into velvet. Even THOMAS CARLYLE can not make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. He is clearly conscious of this as he goes on. He has too shrewd an insight not to know that the case has already gone against him. His hero is too much of a charlatan, with all his genius as a soldier—he is too poor a specimen of a king by divine right, and there is no other, crowned or uncrowned, for CARLYLE not to know that, while his work is more prodigious than any he has over written, it fails of its intention. Not a heartbeat of love or sympathy, not a throb of admiration as for a benefactor of men, not an emotion of gratitude as to one who used every opportunity and talent for the best, does this elaborate, magnificent, and truly wonderful portrait, inspire. Yet as literary performance it is masterly. Characters and events are touched with living light. Even poor old General BRADDOCK reappears upon those pages with pathetic and enfolding distinctness. VOLTAIRE is covered with rubies and pearls as for making the great Frederick seem little to posterity. The book is Carlyle in his Great and Good Frederick against the world. It is a work of extraordinary and irritating attraction, and this volume is of especial interest at this time from its masterly battle-pieces.

The "History of the Rebellion, its Authors and Causes," by JAMES D. MCCABE, Philadelphia: National Book Co.), is a most important contribution to our history. It is properly the political annals of Slavery, from the formation of the constitution to the proclamation of emancipation, by a man whose life was devoted to the great debate. It is a relation of facts without much amplification, and is compiled from all the authentic sources and from the memory and experience of the author. It is not a complete history of the subject in all its aspects; but all the substantial facts are recorded. The profound conviction and earnestness of Mr. CRISWELL, joined with the moral heroism which marked his career, invest his story with living interest. It is often very delicious in humor, as when he tells us Mr. BUCHANAN "was able, earnest man, industrious in his habits, and thoroughly up to the times." The book, however, distinguished for a degree of self-complacency seldom connected with great moral worth, and in his prejudice he sees only Slavery right. Mr. GIDDINGS says of the conduct of the long debate by the supporters of Slavery will unquestionably be the final verdict of impartial men upon this point. "This resort to declamation, to the use of epithets, and denunciation against the advocates of liberty, constituted the only supposed justification of Slavery. This practice among statesmen exerted great influence upon the public mind." Mr. CRISWELL has a great hostility toward all who dared reiterate the underlying truths that slaves, in common with the human race, have a right to liberty as the natural right to life and liberty." The tone of this work is as temperate as it is decided. The cardinal point of Mr. CRISWELL'S argument is that the only republic of the Christian era, the corner-stone of the Union; and he died in the faith that it arose so long rejected was about to become, and forever, the head of the corner.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.—June 29. Mr. Hale's resolution instructing the Committee on the Conduct of the War to report who was responsible for the disgraceful surrender of Harper's Ferry, also conducted for 1862 was adopted. There was considerable debate on the subject, and the documents which had been transmitted from a State Department relative to the Trent affair were ordered to be printed.—June 30. Not in Session.

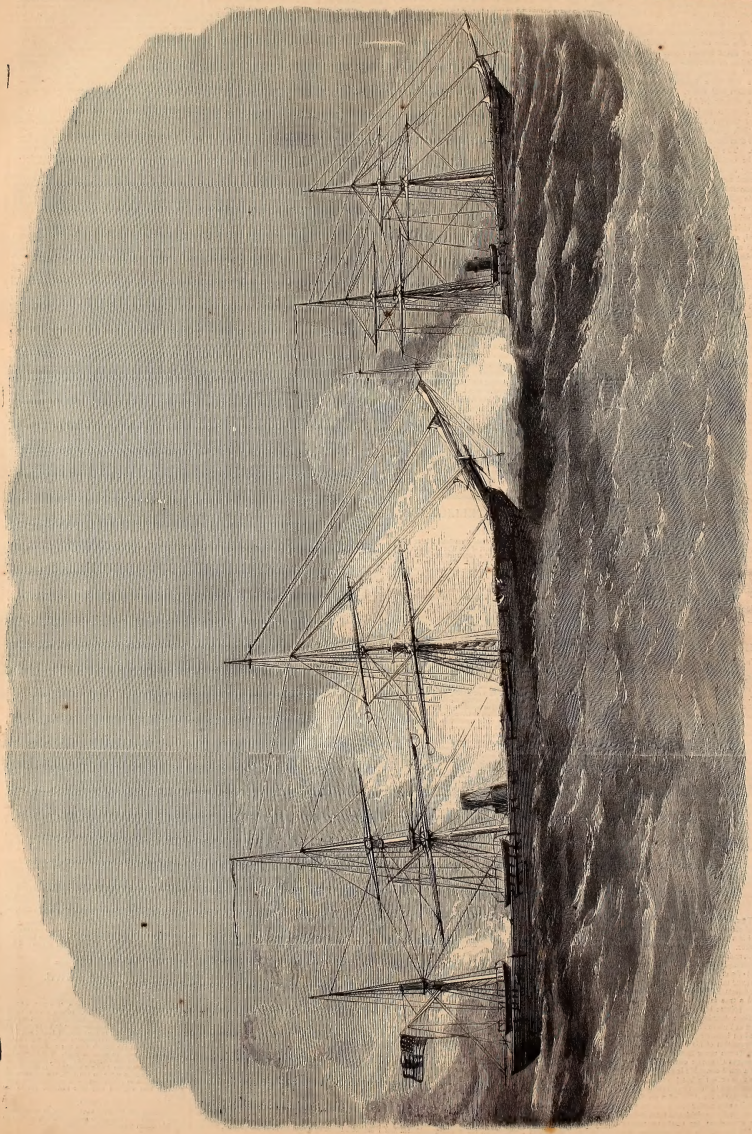
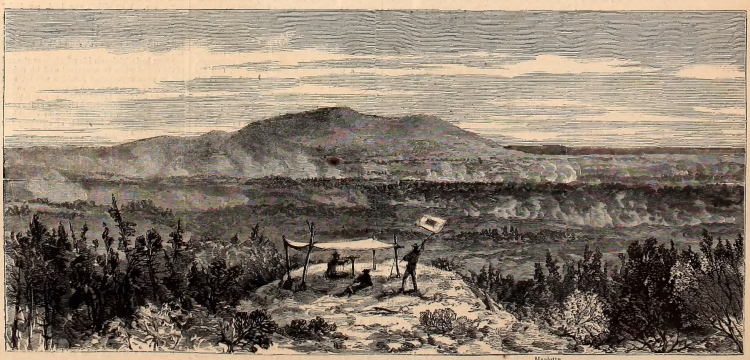
July 1. A vote of 27 to 6 was received that the House amendment to the Pension Act extending to the widows and children of soldiers and sailors dying of wounds or disease before that date the act that the parties had the right to claim, was agreed to. The House bill to repeal the duty on hemp was passed. A resolution authorizing the President to appoint a day for humiliation and prayer was adopted. The bill to provide for the publication of evidence in the District of Columbia was passed. The Committee had leave to sit. The Committee of Conference committee reading the substitute from Senate was agreed to. The report was agreed to. The bill to reduce the quota without draft was reduced from 60 to 40 days for the service men and from 40 to 30 days for men of forty to five per cent. on all moneys exceeding $200 for the purchase of substitutes, was passed. The Enrollment Act.—June 30. The bill to facilitate telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States was received from the House and concurred in. A committee was appointed on the bill to encourage immigration. Consideration of Senate amendments to the Enrollment Act. Mr. Sherman, Anthony, and Lane. The Senate disagreed to the amendments, and the bill was passed by the House on the 29th. The bill for the more speedy construction of the Pacific Railroad, etc., was passed by the House with amendments



THE NAVAL CONTEST OFF CHERBOURG, BETWEEN THE "ALABAMA" AND THE "KEARSARGE," JUNE 19, 1864.—[SEE PAGE 456.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—THE CREST OF PINE MOUNTAIN, WHERE GENERAL POLK FELL, JUNE 14, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 454.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—LOST MOUNTAIN AT SUNRISE, JUNE 15, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 454.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—VIEW OF KENESAW FROM PINE MOUNTAIN.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 454.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

We give on page 453 three interesting sketches relating to General SHERMAN'S advance in Georgia. These give a view of localities which, in connection with this campaign, have become historic. We have here, in the first place, a sketch of PINE MOUNTAIN: lately occupied by General HOWARD'S corps, and the occasion by the enemy—the result of one of SHERMAN'S flank movements. It is a high knob, from which a splendid view of the country and a good idea of the position of the different armies may be obtained.

It was on the crest of this mountain that Lieutenant-General POLK was killed, June 14, by a shell from the Fifth Indiana Battery—the battery of the gallant Captain SHIMONOSEK, who was himself killed the next day. The different corps of SHERMAN'S army have their signal stations on the top of Pine Mountain.

Another sketch gives a view of KENESAW, as seen from Pine Mountain. In the distance is a view of Marietta. Between the two mountains the smoke ascends from three Federal encampments, belonging to the center of the Cumberland, the Ohio, and the Tennessee. The enemy holds a strong position on the Kenesaw, which was unsuccessfully attempted on the 27th of June, by M'PHERSON, THOMAS attacking on the flank.

A third sketch gives a view of LOST MOUNTAIN AT SUNRISE.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXXV.

AT THE CORNER OF THE RUE DE RICHELIEU.

It is a tall and stately house of many stories. Perhaps by and by there may be pulled it down, and built up another palace more sumptuous on its site; but a quarter of a century since it was lofty, and capacious, and imposing.

It had been a café, a restaurant, and a concert-room. What it was when there once, I fancy. It had been a toy-shop, and a shawlshop, and an advertising tailor's. Once a court jeweler had it, and once a fashionable milliner. But it always bore its peculiar stamp of stateliness, and, at the worst of times, held on to its dignity bravely. It was always Paris-like.

In the time when this history ran its course, this place was in the last throes of its splendid shameful career as a gambling-house. The Maisons de Jeu, the scandal of France and in Europe, were moribund. The concession of a privilege for holding of the public gaming-tables was in the hands of the municipality of the city, who derived a large annual revenue from the infamous concerns: a revenue which was, however, but a beggar's dole compared with the enormous profits of the Fermiers Généraux, or lessees of the tables. To the credit of the Édiles of Paris, all the dirty money they gathered off the green baize of FRASCATI and similar haunts of madness and avarice, was applied to charitable purposes; but the Government had grown tired and ashamed of the infamous method of contributing to the poor-rate, and had warned the municipality that the concession they granted soon after eighteen hundred and fifty must be the last. The banker (or gaming-table keeper), BENAZET, had timely notice to remove his croupiers and maccrs, his rakes, and pricked cards, and was destained, with other birds of prey, to take flight to Baden and other outer regions of Fatherland, and settle there to the perpetuation of plunder. But France was freed, at last, from these vultures.

The life thus remaining to FRASCATI'S (for the Palais Royal tryptots were shut up) was a short one, but its splendor and fomentation of misery that it should be merry. To the accustomed frequenters of the establishment, suppers on the board-of scale of luxury were given every night in the cabinets adjoining the great gambling-rooms. Within a month of the dissolution, in the gigantic swindle, the cornices were regilt, fresh chandeliers hung, and the windows veiled with fresh gorgeous draperies. The influx of strangers was tremendous. There never was known such a crowd of players, from eleven o'clock in the morning till eleven o'clock in the evening; for these dens were open by day as well as by night. The saloons were crowded by dandies, lawyers, politicians, journalists, artists, and foreigners of distinction, mingled with the consumers of unmistakable bird of Paradise, and faced, fishy-eyed professional gamesters. People had to stake over each other's shoulders. Thousands of pounds scattered through the air in the hoarse voices directed their destination toward red or black, odd or even, under or over, number or color, manque or non-manque numbers. The croupiers looked contemptuously upon the marvelling strangers who played timidly. It was as much as ever room could be made for the desperate throwers who played rouleaux of golden louis. From nine o'clock, night until three o'clock, were the chinking of the money, the sharp pattering of the cards as they fell from the banker's hands, the stirring of the heaped counters, the click of the ball, the rasping of the croupes as the forfeited stakes were gathered in, and the dull, hoarse voices of the masters of the game crying out that red had won, or that thirty-five had turned up, black, even, and over—soon conjoining the gentlemen present to make their game, then telling them the game was made, and that no further stake could be received. A hundred times within an hour the lugubrious, monotonous chant was audible. One seemed to be listening to an outdoor litany of the Trappists: "Frère, il faut mourir."

Otherwise, there prevailed a deathly silence. Never was there so well-behaved a place as this aspertersaan pandemonium. It was accounted a flagrant breach of etiquette to make a noise under any circumstances—to rejoice loudly if you won, to lament audibly if you lost, to quarrel about a questionable throw, or even to converse in aught exceeding a discreet under-tone. When you entered, a grave door-keeper took from you your hat and stick, partly, it may be assumed, to insure the preservation of good manners in so very aristocratic a saloon, partly to obviate the possibility of any votary of the blind goddess who once much better acquainted with Fortune than we give her credit for), rendered desperate by a continuous run of ill-luck, flinging his hat violently at the dealer (or a more deadly if such Hosue of Commons is said to have once flung his wig at the head of an orator who wouldn't leave off), or attempting suicide with a revolver or cane. If acquaintances wished to chat, or to argue, they went into an ante-chamber, or into the foyer-arcade. The solemn gravity of the players, who stole about with cards and pins for calculating punters (who, knowing every possibility of the game save one, still, failing the knowledge of that, were beggared), appeared to glide in list slippers. The whole place wore a calm and peaceful aspect, most beautiful to the philosopher. There was no wailing, no gnashing of teeth, no tearing of hair, no rending of raiment. When human wickedness in concentrated on one particular object, and all its faculties are remorselessly perverted and degraded, the absolute strength of volition, toward the attainment of one particular end, human wickedness is apt to be very quiet indeed. If you should not whistle at his work, you may be sure. The administration of strychnine is not a comic song.

I occurred one morning during this intimate gala time, this "Vauxhall closing forever" season of FRASCATI'S, to two gentlemen known by name and character to the readers of this chronicle (although of one his slight and equivocal name have been but casually alluded), to look in at the corner of the Rue de Richelieu and try their luck upon the red and the black.

One was a very old friend of mine, a person to be a very old man. It is nearly fourteen years since we last met him. His hair was still black, but it was but a wig—a very good wig of a young head. His whiskers were ragged and sparse, and dyed accordingly. His face was pallid and thin. He recently grown, were ill-dyed, and the white showed athwart the purple, like cotton in a roundabout fustian. His teeth, which of course went to gleam so beautifully, were now only a few irregular broken and discolored fangs. His nose was bigger, and purpled and knobbed about the jaws, and in many places blotched with purple. It was easy to detect, without turning the man his profile, that the nasal organ was a kind of stimulant, and rushes down-hill by half a dozen pimply streams. His clothes were shabby and his linen cloudy; his trowsers were patched, and the lustre on his hat was due, half to grease and half to the scene-appliances of a wet sponge. You could see the hole in his left boot, where he had inked his stocking to conceal the whiteness of the orifice. In one hand he carried a thick yellow glove, which had no fellow; from his dexter wrist dangled by a string a loaded walking-stick, which was worn to the wood. Even if it would be unpardonable to omit the fact that he were spotless linen and cuffs, and that his frayed and evasous stock was fastened with a cham carbuncle pin, price one franc twenty-five centimes in Jacob Garnet's Vivienne, and unavailable at the Mont de Piété.

This was all that was left of the fashionable Mr. Francis Blunt. The prince of the Bohemian cultural fête, Gamridge's Hotel, the cabriolet and the tiger, the body-servant and the chambers in town, the wedding-ring, the gold-case and cambric, and the cut velvet waistcoats, had all come down to this. It would be wearisome to dwell on all the details of a career toward the dogs, which had continued with brief intermissions of prosperity for nearly twenty years. It would be sullying this page with the shabbiest and sorriest of chronicles. His instincts had always been carnine, and the dogs had their will of him. It was a natural culmination. It was only what might have been expected. Hundreds of spirits are dashing, as habitually as Mr. Blunt himself, to subsided into decrepitude, and drifted into extinction. The brilliant butterfly had become this sorry caterpillar again. It was but one of a motley, brilliant, worthless million.

But if you, the right honorable and dyed—the most comprehensive birds-eye view—here it is. A thousand table d'hôte dinners (many of them on credit), and a thousand suppers, concerts-and-cook-shops, with nothing to eat. Thousands of bottles of wine, some paid for, some to which he had been treated, many drunk in the common junkeepers out of. Much brandy, many cigars; hecatombs of card-packs, legions of billiard-balls, a sack full of bowled dice, a shower of stamped paper, bearing his name, now as drawer, now as accommodation acceptor, and the occasional appearance in the English Insolvent Debtors' Court; one or two prosecutions of outlawry; a team of begging letters; a host of unpaid tailors; several bevies of bayadères, and worse; half a dozen convictions for escroquerie entailing lengthened residences in French, in Belgian, and in German jails; a few duels, more numerous canings and horsewhippings. Behold it all. He had ridden in carriages-and-four, and he had been kicked down stairs; he had danced at balls that you envy; he had been lionized; he had been drunken and gay, and sick and in hospitals; but the route had been always downward, and it had come to this at last. And, in the forty-seventh year of his age, he had been prematurely old.

Otherwise, there prevailed a deathly silence. Never was there so well-behaved a place as this aspertersaan pandemonium. It was accounted a flagrant breach of etiquette to make a noise under any circumstances—to rejoice loudly if you won, to lament audibly if you lost, to quarrel about a questionable throw, or even to converse in aught exceeding a discreet under-tone. When you entered, a grave door-keeper took from you your hat and stick, partly, it may be assumed, to insure the preservation of good manners in so very aristocratic a saloon, partly to obviate the possibility of any votary of the blind goddess (who once much better acquainted with Fortune than we give her credit for), rendered desperate by a continuous run of ill-luck, flinging his hat violently at the dealer (or a more deadly if such House of Commons is said to have once flung his wig at the head of an orator who wouldn't leave off), or attempting suicide with a revolver or cane. If acquaintances wished to chat, or to argue, they went into an ante-chamber, or into the foyer-arcade. The solemn gravity of the players, who stole about with cards and pins for calculating punters (who, knowing every possibility of the game save one, still, failing the knowledge of that, were beggared), appeared to glide in list slippers. The whole place wore a calm and peaceful aspect, most beautiful to the philosopher. There was no wailing, no gnashing of teeth, no tearing of hair, no rending of raiment. When human wickedness in concentrated on one particular object, and all its faculties are remorselessly perverted and degraded, the absolute strength of volition, toward the attainment of one particular end, human wickedness is apt to be very quiet indeed. If you should not whistle at his work, you may be sure. The administration of strychnine is not a comic song.

I occurred one morning during this intimate gala time, this "Vauxhall closing forever" season of FRASCATI'S, to two gentlemen known by name and character to the readers of this chronicle (although of one his slight and equivocal name have been but casually alluded), to look in at the corner of the Rue de Richelieu and try their luck upon the red and the black.

One was a very old friend of mine, a person to be a very old man. It is nearly fourteen years since we last met him. His hair was still black, but it was but a wig—a very good wig of a young head. His whiskers were ragged and sparse, and dyed accordingly. His face was pallid and thin. His teeth, which of course went to gleam so beautifully, were now only a few irregular broken and discolored fangs. His nose was bigger, and purpled and knobbed about the jaws, and in many places blotched with purple. It was easy to detect, without turning the man his profile, that the nasal organ was a kind of stimulant, and rushes down-hill by half a dozen pimply streams. His clothes were shabby and his linen cloudy; his trowsers were patched, and the lustre on his hat was due, half to grease and half to the scene-appliances of a wet sponge. You could see the hole in his left boot, where he had inked his stocking to conceal the whiteness of the orifice. In one hand he carried a thick yellow glove, which had no fellow; from his dexter wrist dangled by a string a loaded walking-stick, which was worn to the wood. Even if it would be unpardonable to omit the fact that he were spotless linen and cuffs, and that his frayed and evasous stock was fastened with a cham carbuncle pin, price one franc twenty-five centimes in Jacob Garnet's Vivienne, and unavailable at the Mont de Piété.

This was all that was left of the fashionable Mr. Francis Blunt. The prince of the Bohemian cultural fête, Gamridge's Hotel, the cabriolet and the tiger, the body-servant and the chambers in town, the wedding-ring, the gold-case and cambric, and the cut velvet waistcoats, had all come down to this. It would be wearisome to dwell on all the details of a career toward the dogs, which had continued with brief intermissions of prosperity for nearly twenty years. It would be sullying this page with the shabbiest and sorriest of chronicles. His instincts had always been carnine, and the dogs had their will of him. It was a natural culmination. It was only what might have been expected. Hundreds of spirits are dashing, as habitually as Mr. Blunt himself, to subsided into decrepitude, and drifted into extinction. The brilliant butterfly had become this sorry caterpillar again. It was but one of a motley, brilliant, worthless million.

But if you, the right honorable and dyed—the most comprehensive birds-eye view—here it is. A thousand table d'hôte dinners (many of them on credit), and a thousand suppers, concerts-and-cook-shops, with nothing to eat. Thousands of bottles of wine, some paid for, some to which he had been treated, many drunk in the common junkeepers out of. Much brandy, many cigars; hecatombs of card-packs, legions of billiard-balls, a sack full of bowled dice, a shower of stamped paper, bearing his name, now as drawer, now as accommodation acceptor, and the occasional appearance in the English Insolvent Debtors' Court; one or two prosecutions of outlawry; a team of begging letters; a host of unpaid tailors; several bevies of bayadères, and worse; half a dozen convictions for escroquerie entailing lengthened residences in French, in Belgian, and in German jails; a few duels, more numerous canings and horsewhippings. Behold it all. He had ridden in carriages-and-four, and he had been kicked down stairs; he had danced at balls that you envy; he had been lionized; he had been drunken and gay, and sick and in hospitals; but the route had been always downward, and it had come to this at last. And, in the forty-seventh year of his age, he had been prematurely old.

While they were diminished in number, even so did Mr. Francis Blunt require every day more brandy, and derive a smaller amount of comfort from that down-hill cordial.

His circle of existence was narrowing. Mephistopheles's poodle was tracing more involved concentrics round him. The morul halter was tightening. He dared not show himself in London, in Devonshire, at the German watering-places. Out of a dozen former friends whom he would meet by chance, not ten, not eleven, but just the whole dozen, would cut him. When his name was mentioned, it was not as "poor devil"—as he was formerly contemptuous charity—but as "a horrible old scamp." The miserable man had no one to talk to now but a few tavern waiters, the billiard-marker, the fawning landladies, billiard-markers, police agents, and commissaries of police. His acquaintance with the two last-named classes was involuntary. The police were well aware of him. "Le nommé Blunt" was down in the blackest books of Rue de Jerusalem. He was in and out drunken to be made useful as a spy. The algnasils quietly watched until they could catch him in flagrant delit, and cart him off to the galleys as a robber. He had ceased to have a regular lodging, and slept for nights in the worst "garnis" of the worst quarters, at fifteen sous. When he had no money he prowled about the Champs Elysées. When he was flush of it, he gave a drinking-bout at the wine-shops in the Halles, which are kept open all night, and would be an insolent Amphytryon to regardless gendarmes and sergents de ville, who scoffed at him while they drank at his cost. But these fuming evenings were rare. He had reached, by slow degrees, that stage in the gambler career when a man never wins heavily, and when fortune ceases to smile only to pick up sufficient from the green cloth to save him from sheer starvation, and enable him to support life to two abject meals a day. There were very few even tenth-rate cafés and estaminets now where he was welcome, or allowed to break and drivel over his brandy or his absinthe. There is a phase in rascaldom when the rascal is even ostracised by his mates. Blunt had by some a relative left him a "Mauvais gamarade," cried the French raffs; "A thorough rip," sneered the English raffs who knew him. So Blunt was left alone.

"And yet," he would moan pitcously to himself sometimes, "I was a brother in Israel—he must be worth millions. Where is he? How came he to leave the service? Is he dead? I have written letters, and letters to him in vain. Where is George Blunt?"

There was one place, indeed, of which he was free—one haunt where for twelve hours out of the twenty-four—one caravanserai where he could enter. So long as he had a hat and coat to wear, admittance was his in the gaming-tables. The line was drawn at caps and blouses. So long as he could command a napoleon he was reckoned as belonging to the "mise decente," and their wearers were entitled to be called, in morning-house parlance, "Messieurs de la Cerlerie."

This precious Gentleman of the Gallery, then on the evening of which we speak, went up the well-worn stairs of Frascati's, and surrendered his hat and stick to the janitor at the door, who knew Blunt well enough, and, indeed, an ancient punter, on whom, when utterly broken down, the administration had taken compassion, and accorded with a kind of refuge for his declining days. He had seen men and cities, and knew a few tricks by which, against the bank, to stave off the madness of backing the red. And accordingly, once a month, when his scanty wages were paid him, he had a holiday, he duly carefully backed the red and lost every sou at the gaming-table, and next day went back contentedly to those who let him bide and stick.

A clean old gentleman in a shirt-frill, blue spectacles, nankeen pantaloons, and speckled grey stockings—the very type of a well-to-do retired gentleman—whispered behind his signet-ring and sad, as Blunt came to a vacant seat at the table, to a stately, military made-up personage, with a tremendous spiked mustache, and the shoes and half a dozen foreign orders at his button-hole:

"He was in luck yesterday. He backed the numbers, manque, and made a five-franc piece à cheval—on horseback. He must have won at least five louis. Had he been able to play gold instead of silver he would have netted a hundred."

He will back the same number, you will see, to-day and lose," quoth the military personage, sententiously. "I am sick of seeing that old scoundrel. I long to behold him sitting between two gens d'armes on the benches of the court of assize."

A soldier or clean old gentleman nor the military personage ever risked so much as a five-franc piece at the tables. It was strictly against their rules. Their business was to watch those who gambled; and there were others there whose business it was to watch them. But were spies of the police. But when the soils of the day were over, and they were off duty, the police and the military selects entertainers among the croupiers, and the fivelegal lackeys (whose services were perfunctory, and who were no more real footmen than the "greencoats" of the play-house) would adjourn to a quiet wine-shop and gamble away their leisure hours in comfort and joy.

Blunt played from noon till four o'clock. Superstitions, as all gamblers are, he had dreamed on three successive nights, that thirty-three was to be his lucky number as roulette. Understand, that he was by no means in possession of money or a banker on this number, and, when the ball had ceased revolving in the wheel, the number thirty-three, which he had called, been proclaimed, he would have received thirty-five times his stake. But there were, of course, no less than six-and-thirty chances against him; and, his dream notwithstanding, his capital was too small (he had three louis left after a night at the Halle) to risk even the smallest amount "en plein," or in full, on the number. He put his stakes on horseback: that is to say, on the yellow boundary line between the square numbered thirty-three and the square numbered thirty-four; so that, according to the rules, if either of those numbers turned up he was entitled to receive half thereof, or seventeen times his own stake. Sometimes he shifted his piece, and put it, still on horseback, between thirty-three and thirty-two, that increased his chances of winning. Oh! he was cunning.

With a rake with a five-franc piece | won't little, lost a little; abstained from playing during a few rounds; then kept his hand in by staking on red, on black, on odd, or on even, then were back to the charmed square of thirty-three, and put ten francs on horseback. The wheel went round and the ball jarred from compartment to compartment. "Trente-trois, noir, pair et manque," cried the banker.

With a rake the croupiers propelled toward the gamester seventeen times his stake a hundred and seventy francs.

He drew the money together, separated two louis from it, crammed the rest into his breast-pocket, and placed it in the same position. Then the game was made, and the brass pillar was twirled, and the ball went whizzing round.

"Trente-quatre, rouge impair et manque," cried the banker.

It being thirty-four, and the stake being on thirty-three, half of the gain was another number, they pushed seventeen times forty francs toward Blunt. He was now the possessor of one hundred and fifty francs.

He had not had so much money for months. He remembered that he could spend a hundred francs in a riotous night, keep fifty francs for eating and drinking, for emergencies, and still have a margin of capital of three hundred francs, which, properly divided, would enable him to play for a whole week. To many gamesters of Mr. Blunt's standing, who were waiting at the gate, the same calculation presented itself. But to the surprise of his neighbors, he never touched the five hundred and fifty francs. It was in gold, and he let the pile remain between thirty-three and thirty-four. He shut his eyes and screwed the lids close together. He folded his arms and dug his nails into the palms of his hands. And in the red of his eyelids he was burning hot and that his feet were icy cold. He gnawed his lips and awaited the issue.

He was startled by the ball rushed round in mad gyration. Blunt heard it hopping up and down, to and fro, from the outer to the inner circle. Then its career was at an end; there it stopped. Then there was silence; and a voice cried the sound of a trumpet came and smote him on the ear.

"Trente-trois," it said, "noir, pair et passe."

It was true. He had won seven thousand six hundred and fifty francs.

"By Jove!" cried a voice, in English, behind him, "I should have been backing that confounded thirty-two in full instead of on horseback, and have lost every sou."

Blunt turned round and saw a young gentleman, very handsome, very bold-looking, and very fashionably dressed.

"Was the countrymen, it seems," the gamester remarked, trying to muster up what he could of his ancient affable amenity of Francis Blunt, Esquire.

The young gentleman gave a haughty stare, and no direct reply.

"You're in luck, old gentleman," he condescended to observe.

"I am, and didn't you back my luck? Are you so rare a punter as not to be up to that chance?"

"I wasn't thinking about it. I was intent on my own cursed number. And now I have lost it."

Blunt had withdrawn his winnings at the end of the round while he conversed with his neighbor, as more experienced gamblers will do, as a measure of precaution, and sometimes even before they use their handkerchief, or take a pinch of snuff. He now unexpected found his nose, or even a sudden fit of sneezing or coughing, should render them incapable of watching the issues of the game.

Francis Blunt, Esquire, had never in his most prosperous period been addicted to practical joking. He was even to paying it when it was due, "Frank does not like parting with the shiners," was a remark frequently made by those on his disposition to be tenacious of current cash. He would sow his acceptances at three months broadcast, but found difficult to get a sovereign out of him. It is, however, one of the many superstitions of gamblers that they may be conciliated by a piece of gold to any player who has just lost his last stake. The recipient of this bounty should be young and preferably a woman, but ladies were excluded from Frascati's. Discipline must be preserved, even among the devils.

"And so you have lost all," Blunt said. He had not played for four rounds.

"Lost it all."

The old punter bat seven thousand six hundred and fifty francs. He could afford to be liberal. He took five louis from his breast-pocket and placed them in the young man's hand.

"Accept this loan," he said, omitting, not through delicacy, but through avarice, to call it a gift. "When you have won a hundred louis you can return it to me. But I advise you to back my luck."

The young man stared, hesitated, reddened slightly, passed his white fingers through his hair in a confused manner, then held out his hand and said: He money.

"I can give it you back presently, you know, old gentleman," he stammered.

Yes: Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt took the money. He reddened, stammered, hesitated; but he took the money. Have you never been told that inveterate gambling has an inevitable tendency to harden the human heart, and to destroy in the gamester every sense of shame? Out of a gaming-house Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt would have disdained to touch this shameful old creature's money. He looked like a beggar-man. But inside Frascati's Mr. Greyfaunt was very glad indeed to accept it. He was young yet, you see, but after another year's apprenticeship even the blush, the stammer, and the hesitation, would have disappeared.

Blunt went on playing. He soon forgot all about the person to whom he had been so unwontedly a benefactor. Nor did Mr. Greyfaunt preserve a long or a lively remembrance of his benefactor. "I'm not going to back the old rascal's luck," he said, candidly, to himself. "He'll lose his head presently and be cleaned out." So, as soon as he conveniently could, the grateful Mr. Greyfaunt slipped away with the five louis and wandered away to the trente-et-quarante table.

At three o'clock that afternoon the broker bankrupt, Francis Blunt, had won fifty thousand francs.

"I'll be a gentleman again," he chuckled to himself. "I wonder where that rascal Constant is. He'd be glad to shave and dress me again if I paid him the money I owed him. I'll find out my daughter and make a lady of her. I've got fifty thousand francs. That's two thousand pounds. By G—— I'll break the bank before I've done with them!"

He had been playing without any intermission, save his brief converse with Greyfaunt, since eleven o'clock. After four hours and more he felt faint. Stuffing his winnings, which, as his stakes had grown larger, had been gradually converted into notes, into his pocket, he went out to the restaurant attached to the establishment. He swallowed some soup and ate a cutlet, ordered a bottle of Champagne and drank the whole of it; then ordered a decanter of brandy, and drank the better part of that too. The meat and drink warmed the cockles of his poor heart, and made him feel braver in his rapacious intent. "I shall win a hundred thousand francs eleven o'clock," he muttered. "A hundred! Bah! Two hundred thousand. My hand's in. My luck's in. I wish it was the same lucky, though, instead of that child's play of roulette."

Toadies suddenly started up around him. Dilapidated men, almost as greasy and as ragged as himself, but who that very morning had avoided his company as though it had been contagious, came and claimed acquaintance with him, clapped him on the back, and congratulated him. He grinned, he shook them by the hand, congratulate the luck, since to that alone he was indebted for their society. But he was in a bounteous mood, and treated them gleefully all round. He would have borrowed money of him, but he had done enough in the way of pecuniary generosity. "As much brandy as you like," he said, "but not a cetitine."

He rose at about five, remarking that he would have another turn at the tables. He was, that afternoon, the lion of Frascati's, and a crowd followed in his eager eyes. He felt himself swimming and his legs trembling under him. He called for some soda-water, but there was none: there was only some liquid called Seltzer, of which he took a draught, with some brandy. Then, evading his admirers for a moment, he slipped aside into a side-room, where the lansquenet games of chess and draughts—for Frascati's liked to keep up appearances—were supposed to be played, and which was comparatively always empty. He threw a card-table to the door, knowing that no one would have the impudence to attempts were made to open it, and, sitting down, proceeded to pull off one of his boots. It was the fellow to the boot which had the hole in it, disclosing the inked stocking. He flattened a thousand franc note down into the toe, and put on the boot again, and rose up with a leer.

"If the worst come to the worst," he thought, "we have this to fall back upon."

By seven o'clock he had won in all a hundred and fifty thousand francs, but he had made at least half a dozen dives into the restaurant and drunk more brandy. More than once the croupier had to remind him that he had left a banknote, unclaimed, on the table. He left money drop and refused to pick it up. He flung about his money recklessly: now on one stake, now on the other, that he kept on straining and straining, winning. He was drunk.

The largest stake allowed at Frascati's was twenty-five thousand francs—a thousand pounds. He put down this sum in twenty-five notes of a thousand on the red. Black turned up, and his twenty-five thousand francs were swept away.

He gave a tipsy yell, and said that he didn't care, and put down twenty-five thousand more on the same color. Again black turned up, and he had lost fifty thousand francs.

"He has lost his head," whispered the clean-looking old gentleman.

"It is the beginning of the end," the military personage said.

Half an hour afterward, of all his winnings, Blunt had just one thousand francs left. The crowd were as absorbed in interest to see him lose as they had been during the afternoon to see him win. The press around him was enormous. Some mounted on the benches at the back of the saloon to have a better view. He was still the lion of Frascati's, but a lion in the toils, a lion encompassed by the hunters, a lion at bay.

To his drunken memory it suddenly occurred that all his winnings had been made by betting on the numbers. But a long period had elapsed since he had abandoned his faithful thirty-three. He cast his last thousand-franc note on a croupier, and told him to put it on "thirty-three."

"En plein ou a cheval—in full or on horseback?" asked the croupier.

"In full: may as well be hung for a sheep as for a lamb," stuttered Blunt, now very far gone.

The gallery were amazed at the desperation of the stake, for he admitted it to be his last. One friendly voice was raised to warn him against his peril.

"Put on five hundred! Cry out five hundred à la masse!" urged the voice, which belonged to a poor broken-down captain of the Grande Armée.

"Rouge!" mumbled Blunt. "Let it come up as it likes."

"At least put a louis, in case of accident, on zero. Zero hasn't been up for ninety rounds."

"Haven't got a louis left."

"Well, here is one," said the poor broken-down captain. "You're a true sport, and so desperate that something tells me that thirty-three or zero will turn up."

Blunt took the proffered louis, and tried, as steadily as he could, to roll it on end toward the compartment marked zero, which is close to the outer circumference of the wheel, in the middle of the table. But his aim, accurate enough when he was sober, was not. The coin stopped at the compartment marked "four," oscillated, and fell flat.

"Four zero!" a croupier said, inquiringly. He was close to the louis, and would have gently propelled it with his rake toward the designated spot; but Blunt, with a hiccough, forbade him.

"Let it be there," he said. "The devil will take care of his own."

"A thousand francs on thirty-three, and a single louis on zero," whispered the clean old gentleman of the follow must be mad. Any way he must lose."

The pillar revolved, the ball whizzed round and stopped. The croupier called out:

"ZERO."

The rakes gathered in Blunt's thousand franc note and the poor broken-down captain's louis. He did not care to ask his debtor when he would repay the louis. Justice had, perhaps, about as good a chance of being repaid as the thousand pounds which Sir John Falstaff owed him. The poor broken-down captain was a philosopher. All he said was this:

"The imbecile! Why did he not insure on zero as I told him? Zero would have lost. He would have been saved out of the wreck, and some capital would have been left for future operations."

Blunt was too old a hand to fall beneath the table in a fit, to tear his hair, or to beat his breast. He staggered away to the buffet, and asked the waiter to let him have a glass of brandy on credit. The request was instantly granted, and they gave him the liquor. He had lost so very largely as to be entitled to that trifling courtesium. Frascati had some bowels of compassion.

"Besides," he said, as he drained the glass, "it's only for a few days. I'll pay them presently. There's a fellow in the room owes me five louis. He'll be very hard seen him? A handsome fellow with curly hair."

He had reached that stage of intoxication not incompatible with business habits, when an additional glass of liquor rather sobers than stupefies. Blunt felt, for a moment, himself again. The waiters kept a book in which they put down (but not (now that he was ruined) if he attempted to create a disturbance; but he went very composedly to and fro, and to and fro, from the roulette to the trente-et-quarante, seeking for the fellow who owed him five louis.

He found the fellow at last, Edgar Greyfaunt's face was flushed and his eyes were sparkling. La fille de roulette had gold was before him. He was winning largely.

"Hallo! old gentleman," he cried, as Blunt came up with a look of rage and bloodshot eyes. "Cleaned out, I suppose?"

"Ay!"

"All you backed your luck a little too often. You'd better have been contented with a little. What a lot you were winning, to be sure! Stop! Don't I owe you a louis? Here they are. And oblige me by going to another table, and staying by yourself, for, if you back my luck, it's sure to turn, and I shall lose."

Blunt thrust the money in his pocket, and turned on the hall in disgust. The young man's voice and manner seemed to him inexpressibly insolent. He skulked to the roulette-table, and changed the piece of gold into twenty pieces of five francs each. He wished to protract his agony as long as possible.

He played cautiously, but persistently—eschewing the numbers altogether, waiting sometimes for a dozen rounds before there happened what he deemed a favorable chance, shifting his paltry stakes, now to red, now to black, now to odd, now to even, now to over, now to under. At one time he had scraped together some sixty or seventy francs; but luck again departed from him, and at three o'clock struck he had lost the last of his five louis.

He found out Edgar Greyfaunt again, who, still winning, was absorbed in the game. Blunt jogged his elbow.

"I am cleaned out again," he pleaded, humbly. "When you were too, I lent you five louis, and those I have had back, and spent. Lend me ten louis now, for Heaven's sake. There is only another hour left to play. Let me have one more chance."

"Go to the deuce!" cried Edgar Greyfaunt, pettishly, as he gathered in a handful of louis he had won.

"Only five louis, then," urged the miserable old man. "Make it five louis, for mercy's sake, and you shall have them back in five minutes. I didn't wait to be asked when I lent you the money."

"The more fool you," Mr. Greyfaunt coolly responded. "Don't bother me! You're making me play all at sixes and sevens. Stop! here's a five-franc piece. Fetch me a cup of tea, and some breakfast in the morning."

The ancient spirit of Francis Blunt, Esquire—the remembrance that he had once been a gentleman—rose for a single moment, and chased away the maniac fury, the fumes of brandy and tobacco, which hung about him as a mantle. By a mechanical movement he clutched at the proffered silver bit, lifting his shaking hand, he flung it at the head of Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt, accompanying the action by a volley of fierce invective addressed to that young gentleman.

The beggared gamester was speedily seized round the body by two of the powdered footmen. It was intolerable that the decorous conduct of so important a game as trente-et-quarante should be interrupted by the frenzied violence of this tattered and disreputable person. The entrance of the saloons must be henceforward interdicted to him. Monsieur the Commissary of Police said as much. The commissary came forward, unbuttoned his waistcoat, and showed his tricolored scarf beneath. Up to the powdered footmen he threw the significant words, "A la porte!" So it was to the door with him. Turn him out! Send him packing! There was some little scuffling and scraping along the floor, and there was some little snarling and sputtering, as he was half-dragged, half-pushed through the sumptuous saloons he was to behold never more. Then the players turned, looked, shrugged their shoulders, grinned, took snuff, and went on backing the red or the black. They got Blunt out without much difficulty, though he kicked a good deal, and tried to bite him of the hands. They bundled him down stairs, and flung his hat after him: detaining his stick as a lethal weapon capable of working mischief.

"And thank your stars, my brave," remarked the footman who gave him his final shove into the lane de Marivaux, "that we do not send for the sergents de ville, and have you taken to the nearest post. I think you would be grateful even for a bed of guard-house."

"Curse you!" cried the wretched old man, gathering up all his sobriety and all his strength. "Curse you and your thieving crew! I'll have that!" And he hit out—he had been a bruiser in his youth—and caught the menial cleverly under the jaw.

The Frenchman, to whom kicking and caning were tangible arguments, who did not understand stand fisticuffs, set up a dismal yell; but before he had recovered himself sufficiently to cry "It is a gentle! I shall be revenged!" Blunt staggered away, and was beyond pursuit.

The miserable old fellow was haunted by a vague impression that he had some money about him somewhere; but in what place he tried, accurately, he could not remember. He turned out his pockets, and pulling off his hat, searched the lining. But his efforts were fruitless. He began to cry, and was a sorry sight to see.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE following order, verbatim et literatim, is said to have been received by an undertaker from an afflicted widower: "Sur—Jane, my wife, is dead, and I want to bury her decently. At yunuze 10 o'clock. U nose wait to dig the hole—at the end of my too Uther wife—Let it be deep."

A physician having finished the amputation of a leg of one of his patients, the native of the island took the stump, and said anxiously to him, "Doctor, do you think you can put another leg on to that stump? There has never been the least shadow of a doubt about it." Then what was the use of amputating him, after?—Why, my dear friend, could you not have made a sick man that he is dying? He wanted to be assisted a little.

An enamored swain was serenading a pretty Quakeress, and sang the song of "Home, sweet home," when the lady suddenly opened the door, and said, "Friend, what do you hath been singing of thy home—thy sweet home; now, if thou wants a home, thou may come here, why don't thou go to it?"

Probably there are no two words which more distinctly point out sense and nonsense than these—gin and tickets.

Two countrymen visiting the menagerie of the Jardin des Plantes in Paris, and coming to the elephant, one of them exclaimed, "What is that?" Why, that's the elephant, to be sure," said a person standing by. "Oh that's the elephant," said the countryman; then, turning to his companion, he added, in an under-tone, "but how stupid in people to think they first him by the tail!"

A country schoolmaster was sent for a sentence, under which he had his name and vocation. Having described his name, he added, "And I am master of this parish." "Master of this parish!" observed the judge; "how can that be?" "I am master of the children of the parish," said the man; "the children are masters of their parents, the mothers are rulers of the fathers, and consequently I am master of the whole parish."

An Irishman being asked on a late trial for a certificate of his marriage, exhibited a long scar on his neck, and looked as though it might have been made with a fire-shovel. The evidence was satisfactory.

A horseman crossing a moor asked a countryman if it was safe riding. "Ay," answered the countryman, "it is hardenough at the bottom, I'll warrant you;" but in half a dozen steps the horse sunk up to the girths. "You story-telling rascal, you said it was hard at the bottom!" "Ay," replied the other, "but you are not half-way to the bottom yet."

An officer, in battle, happening to bow, a cannon-ball passed over his head, and took off that of the soldier who stood behind him. "You see," said he, "that a man cannot bow by politeness."

"I feel rather dull to-day," as the razor said after it had been used to open oysters.

What nation is most likely to succeed in a pedestrian exercise?—Determination.

A groomsman, advertising for a situation, says she "is a perfect mistress of her own temper."

"Have you ground the tools all right, as I told you this morning when I went away?" said a carpenter to a lad whom he had taken as an apprentice. "All but the handsaw, sir," replied the lad, proudly; "I couldn't get all the rust out of that."

A good deal of the consolation offered in the world is about as sickening as the assurance of the Irishman to his wife when she fell down the river. "You'll find ground at the bottom, my dear."

"The father of Francesca Sforza, when at work in the field, was accosted by some soldiers, and asked if he would enlist. "Let me throw my mattock on that oak," he replied, "and if it remains there I will." It remained there, and the peasant, regarding it as a sign, enlisted. He became Duke of Milan, and his grandson built on the pallets at Milan said to Paulus Jovius: 'Behold those boughs and that timber! I owe every thing to the branch of an oak—the branch that held my grandfather's mattock."

"Did you take the note, and did you see Mr. Thompson, Jack?" "Yes, Sir." "And how was he?" "Why, he looked pretty well, but very much worried, Sir." "And what do you mean?" "Why, while I was in the room he sent out three times to my inn, and I'm blessed if it was not on my best all the while."

Why is a sheep like a new dress?—Because it does not suffer any harm when you fold it.

What similarity is there between a nose and a violin? —They each have a bridge.

A Vermont paper says that a man in that State, who was lately drinking from a hole in the ice, fell down a big trout with his nose. He probably had a hook-nose.

Very often men cut their love-teeth, as they do their milk-teeth, without much pain.

Old men's eyes are like old men's memories: they are strongest for things a long way off.

A gentleman talking with his gardener, expressed his admiration at the rapid growth of the trees. "Why, yes, Sir," said the man; "I guess to consider that they have nothing else to do."

Franklin, when ambassador to France, being at a meeting of a literary society, was very much annoyed at the French when declaimed, determined to applaud when he saw a lady of his acquaintance express satisfaction. When they had ceased a little child, who understood the French, turned to him, "Pa, grandpapa, you always applaud the loudest when they were praising you!" Franklin laughed heartily and explained the matter.

Sir Walter Scott once stated that he kept a bowland laid waiting for him in the library at Abbotsford, and when he came in he found the ball rolled to his feet which Sir Walter perceived to be Johnson's Dictionary. "Well, Wat," said Sir Walter, "how do you like your new book?" "They're very pretty stories, Sir Walter," replied the lady, "but they're rather short."

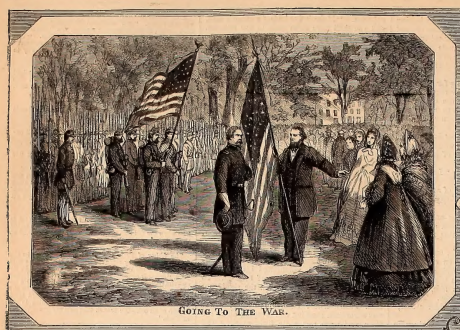
A baker has invented a new kind of yeast. It makes bread so light that a pound of it weighs only twelve ounces.

A Quaker being asked his opinion of phrenology, replied, indignantly, "Friend, there can be no good in a science that compels a man to take off his hat."

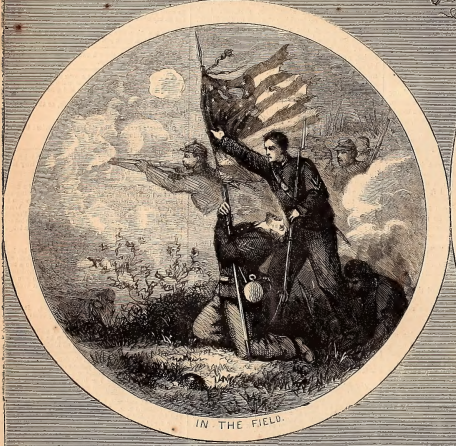
Dr. Abernethy, the celebrated physician, was never more disgusted than by hearing a patient detail a long account of troubles & various symptoms, & finally say, "I have a headache, having burned her hand, called at his house. Struck by the appearance of the lady, he said, "A poultice would soon cure the burned hand." "Oh," the next day she returned and said, "I tried the poultice for the burn," replied Dr. A., "but it was the mouth for last call, and her speech was lengthened to three words: "Well, your fee." "Nothing," said the physician; "you are the most sensible woman . ever saw."

A retired vocalist, who had acquired a large fortune by marriage, was asked to sing in company. "Allow me," said he, "to decline that unprofitable employment, which does not stop after it has made its nest."

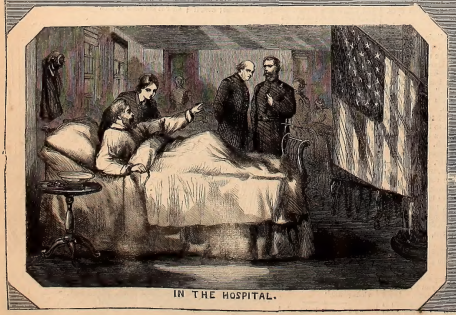
COLONIAL OLD LADY (sotto voce).—"You needn't move, Sir; I shall soon shake down."



GOING TO THE WAR.



IN THE FIELD.



IN THE HOSPITAL.

IN CHURCH.

MAKING

PROTECTOR

HE FLAG.
BORN FREE
OF ALL RIGHTS.
RETURNING FROM THE WAR.
ON BOARD.
IN CAMP.
AROUND THE DEAD.

THE LOVER'S RESCUE.

THE morning sunshine was streaming in rivulets of broken gold athwart the craggy wilderness that skirt the easterly shore of Mount Desert.

Along the whole iron-bound coast of Maine there, is no single spot so feared by wary skippers and worshiped by art-tourists as the beetling cliffs and hollow-sounding caverns of Mount Desert. We betide the luckless bark that loses her reckoning in a foggy morning near the treacherous ledges that lurk beneath that restless tide! Woe betide the good ship that trusts herself too near those dreadful cliffs!

There are few dwellings scattered along this bleak and inhospitable shore, yet the September sunshine gave a sort of home-like look to the weather-browned cottage that seemed to have nestled down among the rocks, where a shelving terrace offered a bit of garden-room, and walls of black green firs and spruces leaned against the cliffs behind. It was but noonday of a gloomy, however a single gnarled apple-tree, bending over the porch in an attitude that somehow contrived to convey the idea that it had wrestled with the fierce contagales until it had become completely discouraged, and didn't care whether it lived or died, a few thrifty vegetables on a sunny slope, guarded by a sturdy battalion of currant-bushes; two mammoth hydrangeas, in preoccupied bunches, whose small leaves hung over the door-stone, and a bright border of orange marigolds and blue Germans asters along the sunny path. Brave-hearted little autumn blossoms they were; for when the tides ran high and the wind shrieked their wildest, lashing the driving showers of spray fell like rain over all the garden domain.

Of course one could hardly expect any thing more real than a sea-nymph in this marine wilderness; but there was nothing shadowy or unsubstantial in the pretty, rosy, New England face of Lettice Moore as she stood at the gate, shading her clear eyes with one brown hand, while the salt wind, fresh from the rocking billows of the Atlantic, lifted the curls from her low, pure forehead. She was rather small, lithe and quick, with eyes as blue and dewy as freshly-blossomed morning-glories, and cheeks where the crimson glow of perfect health shone through the olive shadow left by sea-winds and fervent suns. For Lettice Moore was a sea-captain's daughter, and had grown up in the open air, just like the pines and spruces whose moaning branches sung her to sleep in the cloudy autumn nights.

She looked very lovely in her dress of madder-red calico, with its coquettish ruffled pockets fastened with red buttons, and the trim collar loosely and her slender throat with a fantastic bit of coral, almost like a glowing drop of blood, that her father had brought her from many years ago.

Suddenly the carmine deepened on her cheek, the clue eyes sparkled into soft brilliance.

"Hey! Lettice!" she murmured: "I hear his footsteps on the rocky stair." And she fluttered back into the house like a red autumn leaf. It was very evident that she did not intend for us to know how long she had stood there shading her eyes with her hand.

A tall, straight young fellow, with bright hazel-brown eyes, and a tawny mustache overhanging a mouth whose frank smile was better than a dozen letters of introduction, you might have known him for an artist by the sketching-case and camp-stool that were slung carelessly across his shoulder. And as he came round the curve in the path, whistling softly to himself, his face shadowed by the broad-brimmed Panama hat, whose black ribbon was fastened into his button-hole, he never for an instant imagined that Lettice Moore's blue eyes were closely watching him behind the dense leaves of the hardy scarlet-runners that veiled the kitchen window.

Mrs. Moore looked: Ah, reader, if you could only have seen it you would abjure the vanities of bahl and ormolu, rosewood and brocatelle, from this time forth for evermore: the square of new carpet in the centre was so bright and fresh—the boards were scoured to such snowy purity, and the golden light came in so softly through the dancing, glossy leaves of the scarlet-runners! And then the tin dishes shone like silver on the trim dresser, and the red peppers hanging from the beams overhead glowed at like giant rubies, and the blackbird in his wicker cage talked about it himself, and kept up an eye on the chickens that were skirmishing round the open door, like a policeman in a new jet-black suit! While Lettice herself, ridiculously unconscious, was nestled in the window-seat with a bit of fine stitching in her brown fingers, singing the low refrain of some old ditty, that she had caught from her sailors in the bay.

"Hey! Wayne!" she exclaimed, looking up suddenly as a bright sprig of sea-weed fluttered into her lap. "Why, how you startled me! Is it possible that you are back already?"

"Already!" repeated Kenneth Wayne, with an indescribable something of pique in his tone, "it is nearly eleven o'clock."

"So late as that!" said Lettice, biting off the end of her thread with teeth that were white and even as grains of rice.

Mr. Wayne stood leaning against the window-ledge, his eyes fixed dreamily on the bright dishes-full curls, and the olive cheek with its wine-like glow, where the moving leaf-shadows came and went at every breath.

"How lovely she is!" was the unsyllabled fancy that shaped itself in his mind. "I wonder," he thought, setting his teeth close together, "if I am but a mad, conceited fool, blindly putting my own interpretation on every look and glance, or if she really loves me!"

As the thought floated through his brain Lettice looked up.

"Are you going out again this afternoon, Mr. Wayne?"

"Yes, I am going down to take a study or two from the great caverns."

"How?"

"The little boat at the landing. You need not laugh, Letty, I am enough of a hand at the oars to get across to the caverns even if I haven't grown, like a barnacle, on these rocks."

"Did I laugh?" said Letty, demurely surveying her bit of stitching.

"You'll go with me, Letty? Think how deliciously cool those green waves will be at noontide."

"I don't think I care to go to-day," said Letty, with an air of supreme indifference.

"Letty?"

"Well, Mr. Wayne!"

"Why will you be so provoking?"

"Am I provoking? Really I wasn't aware of it!"

"Letty," said the young man, with a sudden spot of crimson burning on his cheek, "I can not endure this uncertainty any longer, I must know my fate!"

She lifted the blue, limpid eyes to his face with the innocent wonderment of a child, while her scarlet lips, half parted, were like the deep incarnadine of the West Indian shells that lay on the shelf beyond.

"I love you, Letty!" he said, passionately; "I have loved you since the day I first looked upon your face. The time is coming when I must leave this desolate shore; let me take you with me to be the sunshine of my life. Don't run away from me, Lettice Moore—give me one word, one look, to which I may cling and still hope on."

"You hurt my hand," said Lettice, petulantly. "Don't, Mr. Wayne!"

He relaxed his hold, but his cheek was growing pale.

"You have not answered me, Lettice."

She stole a shy, arch glance at him under her long, brown lashes.

It was neither more nor less than woman's instinct, this mischievous impulse that prompted Lettice, in that moment when the fate of her whole life trembled in the balance, to play with her lover's earnestness, and hide behind a mask of simulated indifference. And so Lettice pouted her pretty lip, and twisted the bronze-brown curl round her finger, and looked out on the blue sweep of the distant sea and answered never a word.

"Tell me, Letty, do you love me? Ay or no —an answer I will have."

Would have an answer, indeed! A pretty idea, thought willful Lettie, to pretend to reject such humble devotion, and then use such lordly phrases as this. He should have his answer—for the present at least. It would be a good lesson, and one that Mr. Kenneth Wayne appeared to need. So she drew herself up, and replied in one haughty monosyllable.

"No!"

He stood looking at her a moment, while the blood seemed to recede from his face, leaving an ashy ring around the lips, and then turned quietly away, and took his oars, which were resting on the rocky path, with eyes that saw not the blue glimmer of the distant sea, nor the lines of cloud that slanted the far away horizon.

The instant his footstep crossed the threshold Letty started up, as if to call him back. But she remembered, on the into silence upon her lips, and she sank back on the window-seat, hiding her face in her hands.

"What have I done? Oh, what have I done?"

But the next instant she dashed the moisture from her eyelashes with a quick, haughty movement, and took up her work, as if fully resolved to dismiss it a whole affair from her mind.

How long she sat there, apparently plying the needle, she could never have told; it might have been five minutes, or it might have been five hours. Her mind was in such a state of confusion as to take much note of time; and the old wooden clock in a grove of evergreens ticked on the window-sill as monotonously on, as it had ticked for thirty years, while the blackbird dozed in his cage, and the cricket chirped shrilly from the stunted bushes along the cliff.

"Why, Letty, you ain't sick, be you?"

Mrs. Moore had bustled in the room, with a basket of shining crimson apples on her arm, and through her bright spectacles keenly regarded her daughter's face.

"No, mother, I am not sick; why did you ask?"

"You're as white as a sheet, child; you're sittin' too close at that fine work. However, the color's beginnin' to come back a little now."

Mrs. Moore set down the basket of reading-chair, and untied her bonnet strings; a plump, cheery little body, with cheeks like the sunny side of a Bartlett pear, and bright gray eyes that had a winning sparkle in them yet.

"I've been over to Desire Peabody's to find when Mahala Ann was to be married," she went on, "and I come back by way of the meddler on the south hill, and the ground under that tree was just red with those ten apples. I called to Lettie, but she didn't answer, so I picked up the basket and brought it in myself, and I declare if she hasn't fallen asleep over her work, with the cool of the morning to come and go in!"

"Indeed, mother, I was not asleep," said Lettie, bending over her work to conceal the deep blush that mantled her face. "Why, how you startled me! Is it possible that you are back already?"

"Already!" repeated Kenneth Wayne, with an indescribable something of pique in his tone, "it is nearly eleven o'clock."

"So late as that!" said Lettice, biting off the end of her thread with teeth that were white and even as grains of rice.

Mr. Wayne stood leaning against the window-ledge, his eyes fixed dreamily on the bright dishes-full curls, and the olive cheek with its wine-like glow, where the moving leaf-shadows came and went at every breath.

"How lovely she is!" was the unsyllabled fancy that shaped itself in his mind. "I wonder," he thought, setting his teeth close together, "if I am but a mad, conceited fool, blindly putting my own interpretation on every look and glance, or if she really loves me!"

As the thought floated through his brain Lettice looked up.

"Are you going out again this afternoon, Mr. Wayne?"

"Yes, I am going down to take a study or two from the great caverns."

"How?"

"The little boat at the landing. You need not laugh, Letty, I am enough of a hand at the oars to get across to the caverns even if I haven't grown, like a barnacle, on these rocks."

"Did I laugh?" said Letty, demurely surveying her bit of stitching.

"You'll go with me, Letty? Think how deliciously cool those green waves will be at noontide."

"I don't think I care to go to-day," said Letty, with an air of supreme indifference.

"Letty?"

"Well, Mr. Wayne!"

"Why will you be so provoking?"

"Am I provoking? Really I wasn't aware of it!"

"Letty," said the young man, with a sudden spot of crimson burning on his cheek, "I can not endure this uncertainty any longer, I must know my fate!"

She lifted the blue, limpid eyes to his face with the innocent wonderment of a child, while her scarlet lips, half parted, were like the deep incarnadine of the West Indian shells that lay on the shelf beyond.

"I love you, Letty!" he said, passionately; "I have loved you since the day I first looked upon your face. The time is coming when I must leave this desolate shore; let me take you with me to be the sunshine of my life. Don't run away from me, Lettice Moore—give me one word, one look, to which I may cling and still hope on."

"You hurt my hand," said Lettice, petulantly. "Don't, Mr. Wayne!"

He relaxed his hold, but his cheek was growing pale.

"You have not answered me, Lettice."

She stole a shy, arch glance at him under her long, brown lashes.

It was neither more nor less than woman's instinct, this mischievous impulse that prompted Lettice, in that moment when the fate of her whole life trembled in the balance, to play with her lover's earnestness, and hide behind a mask of simulated indifference. And so Lettice pouted her pretty lip, and twisted the bronze-brown curl round her finger, and looked out on the blue sweep of the distant sea and answered never a word.

"Tell me, Letty, do you love me? Ay or no —an answer I will have."

Would have an answer, indeed! A pretty idea, thought willful Lettie, to pretend to reject such humble devotion, and then use such lordly phrases as this. He should have his answer—for the present at least. It would be a good lesson, and one that Mr. Kenneth Wayne appeared to need. So she drew herself up, and replied in one haughty monosyllable.

"No!"

He stood looking at her a moment, while the blood seemed to recede from his face, leaving an ashy ring around the lips, and then turned quietly away, and took his oars, which were resting on the rocky path, with eyes that saw not the blue glimmer of the distant sea, nor the lines of cloud that slanted the far away horizon.

The instant his footstep crossed the threshold Letty started up, as if to call him back. But she remembered on the into silence upon her lips, and she sank back on the window-seat, hiding her face in her hands.

"What have I done? Oh, what have I done?"

But the next instant she dashed the moisture from her eyelashes with a quick, haughty movement, and took up her work, as if fully resolved to dismiss it a whole affair from her mind.

How long she sat there, apparently plying the needle, she could never have told; it might have been five minutes, or it might have been five hours. Her mind was in such a state of confusion as to take much note of time; and the old wooden clock in a grove of evergreens ticked on the window-sill as monotonously on, as it had ticked for thirty years, while the blackbird dozed in his cage, and the cricket chirped shrilly from the stunted bushes along the cliff.

"Why, Letty, you ain't sick, be you?"

Mrs. Moore had bustled in the room, with a basket of shining crimson apples on her arm, and through her bright spectacles keenly regarded her daughter's face.

"No, mother, I am not sick; why did you ask?"

"You're as white as a sheet, child; you're sittin' too close at that fine work. However, the color's beginnin' to come back a little now."

Mrs. Moore set down the basket of reading-chair, and untied her bonnet strings; a plump, cheery little body, with cheeks like the sunny side of a Bartlett pear, and bright gray eyes that had a winning sparkle in them yet.

"I've been over to Desire Peabody's to find when Mahala Ann was to be married," she went on, "and I come back by way of the meddler on the south hill, and the ground under that tree was just red with those ten apples. I called to Lettie, but she didn't answer, so I picked up the basket and brought it in myself, and I declare if she hasn't fallen asleep over her work, with the cool of the morning to come and go in!"

"Indeed, mother, I was not asleep," said Lettie, bending over her work to conceal the deep blush that mantled her face. "Why, how you startled me! Is it possible that you are back already?"

"Already!" repeated Kenneth Wayne, with an indescribable something of pique in his tone, "it is nearly eleven o'clock."

"So late as that!" said Lettice, biting off the end of her thread with teeth that were white and even as grains of rice.

Mr. Wayne stood leaning against the window-ledge, his eyes fixed dreamily on the bright dishes-full curls, and the olive cheek with its wine-like glow, where the moving leaf-shadows came and went at every breath.

"How lovely she is!" was the unsyllabled fancy that shaped itself in his mind. "I wonder," he thought, setting his teeth close together, "if I am but a mad, conceited fool, blindly putting my own interpretation on every look and glance, or if she really loves me!"

As the thought floated through his brain Lettice looked up.

"Are you going out again this afternoon, Mr. Wayne?"

"Yes, I am going down to take a study or two from the great caverns."

"How?"

"The little boat at the landing. You need

Yet Kenneth Wayne was no coward. When once the dreadful certainty was impressed on his mind, he leaned with folded arms against the jagged wall, resolved to meet his fate as a brave man should.

So the world was passing away from him—the bright sunshine, the blue outer air, the song of robin-birds in the grizzled apple-tree at home. All the bright visions he had formed—the aspirations he had built up in the closely vistas of the future—the loves and hopes that had clustered round her—they, way—all, all passing away. And even through the roar of the rising tide he could hear the silver rocking of his watch, and smiled bitterly to think how soon Time would be but a meaningless name to him.

Dead! He could not fancy the strong, warm, throbbing vitality within his frame transformed to a cold corpse, with dank, streaming hair and livid, upturned face, tossed hither and yon upon the cruel crests of those leaping billows. Would he be carried far out to sea, and picked up days afterward by some passing ship? Or would his body be dashed to pieces against the hidden breakers of that fatal coast, and none ever know how or where he died? Or perhaps some wave might throw him on the beach at Schooner Head, and Lettice might look on his dead face with a pitying pang.

Lettice! Ah, there was the bitterness of death! The waves were creeping around his knees now, and throwing tongues of spray about him, as a serpent might dart its glittering tongue over its prey before the deadly sting, and his head began to swim strangely with the hollow boom of the waters against the beetling walls. He closed his eyes with a sort of dumb agony of despair to await the fate that was so certain, so relentless.

"Kenneth Wayne!" cried a voice.

Was it but the sickly phantasy of the death hour, or did Lettice Moore's wild voice sound under those very overhanging rocks?

It was no phantasy—a warm, living hand was pressing him through the black mist.

"Quick—the boat! Oh my God! to think that you were standing so close to your death."

He started blankly at the white, eager face opposite him—even then he did not fully realize that he had escaped from the very jaws of destruction.

"Lettice, speak to me! Kenneth! you have not lost your reason in that dreadful place."

He bent forward with a look of deep gratitude that thrilled through the sudist blood into her cheek, but neither of them spoke.

"Let me take the oars, Letty," he said, after a few minutes. "The waves are very high, and you are weak and worn out."

She shook her head.

"We shall reach the Head soon, and a misstroke might cost us our lives. You have not been used to the management of a boat since you were a baby; I have!"

Slight and slender as that pale girl was, Kenneth knew, instinctively, that she could be trusted. Wayne looked at her with a feeling almost akin to awe, as the salt had blew the hair away from her white face, and the cloids, drooping in black, fringed masses overhead, cast a strange reflection on her forehead.

Suddenly she leaned over to look at the shores they were approaching.

"Take care, mother, under water," she said, calmly. "We can not land there."

"Can not land there! Then what are we to do?"

"Kenneth, listen to me," she said, in low, distinct tones. "They are waiting for us on yonder beach, and they must not get into our secret nor aid us to land. A rope would part like cotton thread in such a sea as this. Do you see that ragged edge of rock projecting from the Head beyond?"

"Yes."

"I shall wait until yonder great breaker rolls in and let the boat ride in upon its crest. Then I shall throw the coil of rope over that rock."

"But the breaking wreckling line will snap it like a hair."

"You must not wait for the receding wave. Spring to the shore; they will be able to help you before the next breaker sweeps you away."

"And you, Lettice?"

"I shall have saved your life—that will be enough."

She sat silently watching her, until she rose up in the boat, poising herself like a beautiful Diana, as the boat rocked on the crest of a giant wave.

"Now is the time," she said, with a smile. "Don't forget me in the years that are to come!"

As she tossed the rope over the point of rock, there was a gleam of eye and scarlet lip only to those whose lives are spent beside the sea-shore, he clasped the frail figure in his arms and sprang.

For their lives! A misstep on the slippery shore would have precipitated both into the boiling whirlpools of the sea—a moment's hesitation would have been fatal. But Kenneth Wayne had carefully husbanded his strength, and calculated the exact distance with a precision learned through his artistic life.

He felt the clasp of kindly hands, the bonds of affection around him, were dragged up the wet and yielding sands; but one terrible apprehension filled his mind with strange dismay.

"Lettice! is she safe?"

For if death had taken her from him in that moment of peril life would be scarce worth having; death should though it were.

And then he heard her mother's voice whispering to her.

"Thank God! my child is alive and unhurt!"

Not all the pictured gloom of cathedrals, nor the chant of white-robed priests, could give more passionate fervency to the prayer that went up from the desolate rocks of the storm-girdled island—the prayer of thanks too deep for words, that burst from Kenneth Wayne's inmost soul!

And as the tempestuous night closed around the cliffs of Mount Desert,

The next morning rose bright and cloudless, as if no murky vapors had ever obscured the liquid dome of heaven; and when Kenneth Wayne came down stairs Lettice was standing by the window in a pink morning-dress—a little pale, but very lovely—in a mood unusually subdued and quiet. She looked up with a faint smile and a few murmured words of greeting as he entered, but he had made up his mind not to be put off by any such maidenly subterfuge. He went straight up to her, and looked fully into the blue eyes with a tender, searching glance.

"Lettie," he said, gently, "I have come to plead my cause with you yet again. We are nearer to each other than we were this time yesterday. You are my prisoner, Lettie. You would have given your life for me yesterday: I am here to ask you to give that life into my keeping now. I will not take it, dearest, with an everlasting love! Lettie, will you be my wife?"

She put her hand shyly into his.

"Oh, Kenneth, I never knew how much I loved you until I thought you were to me forever!"

THE OLD WAYSIDE INN.

"Sir, excuse me, but I wish to put you on your guard. I believe we have fallen into a den of thieves and murderers!"

I had been slumbering uneasily for nearly an hour, and had just become thoroughly awakened when Mr. Leslie entered my room cautiously, and addressed me in this singular manner.

I had had the misfortune to fall in with an elderly gentleman (Mr. Leslie by name) and his daughter Gertrude, an interesting young lady of twenty-eight or-ten; and our journey lay in the same direction, we very naturally agreed to accompany each other.

We had stopped at a roadside inn. Our accommodation was much more ample than I had supposed possible from the external appearance of the dwelling; and much to our satisfaction we were furnished with separate rooms, though all in the low chamber at the top of the house.

The apartment allotted to myself was a small one, furnished with a handsome bed with heavy green curtains, a looking-glass, and a couple of chairs. Every thing was in perfect keeping and good order, but the bed was placed against the wall near the door, greatly to my astonishment.

"What have you discovered?" I asked, hastily.

He gave me a soiled piece of paper, on which were rudely inscribed these words:

"Jim saw three travelers coming over the old road an hour ago. Probably they will be at your house pretty soon after dark, as the moon manages to keep them in sight. Don't try to settle them until I come, which will be about midnight.

We engaged in a short conversation as to the course we had better pursue, and then, without arriving at any conclusion, I left the landlord and Gertrude alone for a few moments, while I cautiously descended the stairs. Having gained the hall below, I found myself in a long narrow passage I had not before observed, and at last came to the door of an apartment in which I knew the landlord and his host, together with our would-be murderers, were assembled.

"Well, Tom, how do you propose to settle our guests above?"

This was the voice of our host addressing the new-comer.

"How have you disposed of them?"

"Why, I gave the old man and his girl the two rooms on the left, and that young fellow took the one at the right."

"The room you made so convenient last week?"

"Yes."

"Well, if that is the case I don't think we shall find much to do at all. The very instant you sent the report of my pistol you and Jim must be at hand to enter the old man's room and take care of him."

"But what will all this come off?"

"At twelve; they will be sleeping most soundly then."

It wanted just thirty minutes of the hour appointed, and I hastened to retrace my steps up stairs.

I visited my own room first, where I found that the "convenient fixture" I had heard spoken of below was merely a small square hole in the floor just opposite the pillow, sufficiently large to insert the barrel of any moderate-sized pistol—a very easy method to settle a man of his life.

Having made this discovery I sought Mr. Leslie and his daughter.

"I can offer no purpose," I said, "that each one of us should keep his own apartment. If we meet three together in the bottom has his head cut off, and one of us will be sure to get killed. On the contrary, should I manufacture a good counterfeit, as I now propose, to occupy my place for the time being in that rather dangerous bed, and in this manner waste Sexton's shot and throw him off his guard, I am very sure I could gain the mastery over the three to-band struggle in a very few minutes, and then come to your assistance. Does my proposition suit you?"

"Perfectly; and, luckily for your scheme, I wear a wig, which will be of considerable benefit to you in making the counterfeit of which you have spoken. Take it; it is entirely at your disposal."

It took but a very few moments to fit on the wig sufficiently with the bed-clothes, and arrange it in a favorable position upon the pillow, in front of the little opening, leaving one hole, I should say, to watch in the moonbeams. It wanted five minutes of twelve!

The silence was growing oppressive, when at last I saw the curtains move astde a little. There was a moment's silence, and then a loud report, and I had resolution enough to bend forward and utter a low, despairing moan, as the report died away. In an instant the door was opened, and the man called Sexton came running in, with his pistol still in his hand. Without the faintest suspicion he approached the bed; but meanwhile I had grasped a long, heavy bar of hard wood, which, I presume, by the merest chance, happened to be standing against the wall near by, and when he had arrived within a convenient distance I sprung out upon him, and with a single well-directed blow I laid him sprawling; and I judged insensible, upon the floor.

All this had occupied but a moment, and it was scarcely completed when I heard the report of another pistol in the direction of the apartment occupied by Mr. Leslie. Without stopping to assure myself further of the effect of the blow either seven knock I had given the fallen man, I hastened forward to the assistance of my companions. He was engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle with Jim, while our host was lying upon the floor, badly if not dangerously wounded.

Jim was making desperate efforts to draw a knife from his belt, while Mr. Leslie was using his utmost endeavors to prevent him. I was active and resolute, but I could see his strength was failing rapidly. I did not hesitate to put an immediate stop to the contest by again calling my club into requisition.

Having firmly secured our host and the fellow with the knife, and left Mr. Leslie in the charge of his daughter, I returned to the room where I had left Sexton. He was just recovering from the effects of the blow I had given him, which, as I had supposed, had rendered him insensible for a time, and I was just in season to bind him before he had recovered sufficiently to trouble us still further.

Now all that remained for me to do to render our situation quite secure was to find out in what manner the power to harm us in any way, and I at once started below for this purpose.

I afterward learned that Mr. Leslie had made his daughter promise, after my departure, to remain quietly in her own apartment, and not attempt to venture forth, and then stationed himself near the door, with the only pistol he ever carried in his hand. By some means, the man had Jim did not attack him as soon as the pistol was fired at my counterfeit by Sexton, as was at first intended, but waited a moment. By this time the landlord had relieved he had fired at the one in advance, who happened to be our host, and immediately grappled with the other.

We remained at the old inn for the remainder of the night, and gave information to the authorities in the morning.

OUT OF THE WILDERNESS.

"You will like my friend for my sake, lady Winsome," Hal Thuriet had said, one desolate, autumn-like day, before Captain Miles Wayne came to them on his furlough.

The Captain's mess had re-enlisted, and he with them, and they were all coming home that they might for a look at home faces before the spring campaign. Only Captain Wayne had no home, and but one friend—Hal Thuriet. He, with his wife and his own heart of his, loved him better than most brothers. His very first thought was to ask him to "The Maples"—only a hare wide from Thuriet's—to his brothal, his wee, white flower o' the world, staying there just three days, because of the sweet, new nestle, really engrossing him all the hours in the day. Would Rose like it? He asked her.

She looked a little at him, with a little in vexatious, this bringing a stranger in to be entertained, to spoil their quiet home pleasures, to take Hal away from him. Then her tender heart came mote her at the thought of the furloughed soldier with no home to go to—no welcome. She turned tearful, shining eyes to Hal.

"I love him, by all means. If I don't like him I'll love him because you do. It will be like a look at a peaceful home, perhaps. The spring campaign will lay so many of the poor fellows low. Let us be kind to him."

Then it was that Hal said, with a grateful look, that she would like his friend for his sake, he knew —the letter of invitation was sent, and in a week's time Captain Wayne was with them.

He had a strange power over Rose from the first moment she saw his handsome, haughty face. From the first she feared him, and tried to array herself at once against him. Some how, she could not say, her fear meant. It was as if her destiny had whispered a warning to her which she could not understand. She was cold at first, and Hal noticed with the saw that that made them all uncomfortable, especially Hal. Then she gently tried to make atonement—talked to him, and by and by began to understand how much there was in him besides courage.

She learned herself better in those days, too. She had just been a girl before—a capricious sprite, gay sometimes, tearful sometimes, but acting on impulse wholly. In Captain Wayne's presence she seemed ripening into womanhood. His words had their influence on her. His views of life from the gay young people she had known. Particularly might have been that he was an orphan from boyhood, and so had had none of the sweet affinities between him and the world of souls, where those who would have loved him were—partly that for years then very young he was forced to battle for as it were, near neighbor to death—looking on battle-fields, sharing in stormy charges, walking through hospitals, hearing the few quiet hours, the dangers, save one broad, deep roar upon his handsome forehead. When he talked it could hardly be in such gay, careless strain as Rose had been wont to hear. The impress of his earnest life was upon his words, and they moved her with a power she did not herself understand.

At first Hal liked it. He was charmed that they got on so well together—that his betrothed found his friend so companionable, and that his little Rose seemed so attractive in the clear-judging eyes of Captain Wayne. It was not till three weeks had passed that he grew at all uncomfortable, and by that time neither Rose nor the Captain was sufficiently at ease to notice the shadow on his brow. He was just as kind as ever—just as faithfully Miles Wayne's friend—but a change had come in Rose. There night be room in his large heart for fear or sorrow—there was none for petty jealousy or ignoble suspicion.

So the days went on. The spring began to look through the skies of April, and breathe in the softer winds; and in one week more Captain Wayne must go back to his post in the Army of the Potomac. Rose's eyes grew sad. She said little, but the color came and went on her cheek in painful flushes, and she was wasting to a shadow. Hal watched her furtively, with a growing pain. Captain Wayne never seemed to look at her, but he saw every motion. Silent watching of them all like a spell. Together from morning till night, yet neither of them cared to break it. Hal's sister, Jeannette—good, kindly, unsuspicious soul!—saw nothing. She talked to them on all occasions, when she was not busy elsewhere, in the most wal à propos style; yet they all found relief in the shelter of her commonplaces.

So the very last day came, and grew from dawning toward sunset—a cloudy, chilling but rain said—not one word which would make Rose or Captain Wayne traitors to love or friendship. If their eyes had played them false it had gone no farther. And yet they both knew that there was a secret between them before which either trembled—a secret losing no whit of its potency because it had not been put into words.

When the day began to darken to its close Hal got up. He meant to leave them alone together. If they loved each other, he thought, in Heaven's name let them say so to each other—he would think up they chose to brew for him. There was no bitterness in Hal's heart, only a great, yearning sorrow. He did not blame them—could not for or him. He knew they had meant fairly by him. If their souls had asserted themselves over their wills' despite—and he condemn them? So he was going out, to leave them to the twilight and each other, but Rose stopped him. There was an anguish of prayer in her eyes as she laid her hand on his arm.

"I want you, Hal. Stay with us," was a plea from which, suffered he such supplicating eyes, he could not turn away. So he staid.

In the twilight they talked, but still, growing strangely cold, though the fire upon the hearth burned bright as Rose sang. She sang as a cover to the silence that would have been more acute; but all the songs were tender, tremulous ballads of love and woe, with quivers of heart-piercing pain thrilling through them. Try as she would, no gayer would come to her. Still any thing was better than the silence, and she sang.

At last came Jeannette's cheery tones calling to supper, and they all got up. As Rose turned away Hal saw a look upon her face he knew. It was Hal, who had been leaning over her in the darkness.

They made the tea as long as affair as they could. There was another silence, but it was not a painful night, Jeannette's talk, and the everyday aspect which life always assumes on occasions of eating and drinking. Then Hal, who knew that there were but few hours more of silence, and a sort of fearful waiting —and then there was good-night.

Captain Wayne was to leave early next morning, and Jeannette—who always managed every thing, in a pleasant unconsciousness of any hidden rocks and quick-sands—arranged that Rose should not be up to see him off. She would preside at the early breakfast herself, and if Rose was a little late it was to the station; all the other good-bys must be said now.

Rose acquiesced gladly, feeling as if she were saved from one more peri—conscious all the while of a mad, despairing impulse to throw herself at Hal's feet, and tell him that her big him to take with him or kill her. That was under her breath; outwardly she was calm and pale. She shook hands with him, and said a mechanical good-by but she did not dare to meet his eyes. She heard him have farewells to the others that God would keep her, and keep her from straying, and her heart from pain; and then, scarcely knowing how, she was used, practically, at first, of a sense of deliverance. The hour of her temptation had passed by, and she had not uttered one word that Hal Thuriet's betrothed had not right to say. The passion of her pain, the fierce, mad sense of wrong and injustice, had not forced her to speak her heart when the sun of her life would seem set, and her world as empty as an egg-shell. This one night must be for ever sacred—the thanksgiving of a heart which believed itself delivered from moral wreck.

The Captain went away next morning before she was down stairs. She saw them walk down the avenue, he and Hal. The quick, soldierly footstep sound through her heart. Once he turned and looked back at the house, a long last look. She saw the sad lines round the mouth, the eyes full of sorrow, but full, too, of despair—the face which might have been her sun of all the world, and was to be none.

Then she sank into her chair, and tried to go back in spirit to the days before Miles Wayne came. Only the last night was in her mind. Surely it was that she loved him now. The other love had been but a feverish dream. Like a dream it would pass away. Over and over she said to herself; as the very sound of the words strengthened her, that she loved Hal, and Hal loved her. She would go down on her knees to God that night, and bless him, and his own little white Rose again. Hal was so good. No pain must ever come to him through her. Alas! the little knew what bitterness of woe she had given him to taste already.

So she went down at the door, and gave him a welcome like her old welcomes. He received it gently. He was kind, but oh, with such compassionate tenderness—not like Hal, the lover of Rose—and touched his lips to her forehead, with a low murmur of pity—

"Poor Rose! poor little Rose!"

Nearly a month went by, and she began to know better—to understand how, without one word of confession, or blame, or explanation, their relations had changed. She saw that he loved her still, but that he "had" her heart was not his, and so, without talking away his tenderness or lessening his care, renounced all claim on her. And then, ignorant still of herself, she wondered if she was glad of this, or sorry—wondered who she did be to, and sometimes made herself believe that what she had felt for Hal was deeper and stronger than that other passion. How many girls pass through just such experiences and incertitudes!

Then came the third of May—the order for the Army of the Potomac to move. A week of torturing suspense, in which no one felt any emotion save the one strained sense of fearful expectation; and then, among the list of dead at the battle of the Wilderness, Rose came—Captain Miles Wayne. Not wounded—not taken prisoner—not missing even, but just dead! Through that long May-day of fierce combat, ever among the hottest and bravest, and at the end of it, dead. In that last fierce charge, when so many brave souls went to the home of heroes, his had been set free, and gone forth out of the Wilderness to God!

Hal went to bear his own eyes. It would have been in vain to try to keep the papers from her. Her heart, indeed, had uttered sure prophecy of its fate, and she was ready for the sad list but as a confirmation of something known before. She could not see any one that day, not even Hal. She went away to her own room, where, alone in the silence with God, she recognized a Father's hand, and was still.

The next morning Hal came, and she opened the door to his knock. He gave her a letter.

"It is a message from him," he said, as if in apology for his intrusion. "He wrote it for you that last night. He wanted me to read it, but I would not. I said it was to give it to you myself, and he felt sure he should do this spring."

With those words he closed the door, and she sate alone with her message from the dead. She opened it and read:

"I am not sure, my wife, Rose—this list night that I shall ever pass under the same roof with you. I am going to the front, and nothing by-by. I am not afraid to die, but not one word of what I am about to my should meet your eyes—should, if I fall, remain sacred to you. Hal knows about to write it. He has given me his permission, and I have his promise that he shall see this letter when I am dead. And I write in full assurance that you will not have long to wait for me, Rose. Your heart will break when you see. It is not a morbid notion of fate—nor yet shall I commit suicide. I know that death is coming for me, and coming, and I think I shall not be backward in doing my duty. I am almost full, will I shall be among the first. I know it by the peace which fills my heart—for only by that shall I know you ever to unless. When I die I shall feel as if I were a traitor, hurried and bound from all I love and honor. But deep blood cleanses from stains, and and when I am gone even Hal will forgive me that I loved you. Rose, I shall not forge me the place you have in my memory, while you blossom into beauty at his fireside, or that I have loved you better than life.

"For I know, Rose, that you will be his wife. It should not be so, but I know before you have said it that you love him still, more than you love me. He is worthier of you than I am, and I know that you will find me so. Nay, I think I have understood what you felt for me; but it has been a romance, a fever, and is to make you all the happier. It has been a romance, a frenzy—something sweet, indeed, but something unnatural. Rose, I am sure your loyal Hal you might have loved me; but having loved him and been loved by him, you never could have forgot him in his or shaken off your allegiance to him. As my wife, if I had lived, you would have been faithful to me, and true to him before I ever saw you—his bride, whom I sinned just most to love, and whom I am loving. Feel not that this should God, not just but! I know that he was never more truly or deeply my friend than he is now. No very hard thing it will be a blessing on you both—a prayer for your happiness, Rose.

"He would have given up to me, if he had thought it would have made me both happy, which it would not mean. Perhaps he has done so, even now, in his heart. How sad it will be for him if I fall! Will you have forgot to ask a friend? I can not tell. It grieves upon me unconsciously that I can not tell. I am sorry for him, for you, for myself. I am a fool, and, God forgive me! I am sorry I can not go you will forgive me, you and he. You will not grieve for me one moment more than any of my life—but it will be for got right and wrong, past and future, looking into your eyes. Good-by, Rose!

"But why do I write on when I have said all I had to say? Rose, my wife, my love, you would be in quite remembrance when you are Hal's happy wife? When you read this I shall be beyond the sound of human speaking, beyond the reach, so they say, of earthly love or woe. Rose, I am sure that I pray for you now for no I shall know it; if you and he talk of me gently, pityingly, with tears in your eyes, I shall not know it; and, in the world beyond, it will give me heart's-ease.

"MILES WAYNE."

It was morning when she read these words. She remained alone with them all day. They were the final speech of one who had loved, and been unknown to her than he in his life had ever dared to come. It was almost to her as if his disembodied soul were with her beside her, keeping watch through the still hours of that long day.

When the twilight came she took the letter, and stole down stairs into the room where he had slept, and waited. She put it in his hand, and made him read it by the light still lingering in the western sky. She saw his face grow dead all, like marble, and with a gesture of appeal:

"You see what he says—is it true? Was it you or he whom I loved?"

"Both of us, perhaps, dear child," and the fond arms closed round her as they had never been for all of old. Soothed by his care, she wept her first tears. They fell on her seared heart like a grateful rain, bringing healing with them. The love of Hal then she would shudder convulsively, and cry with white, pitiful face.

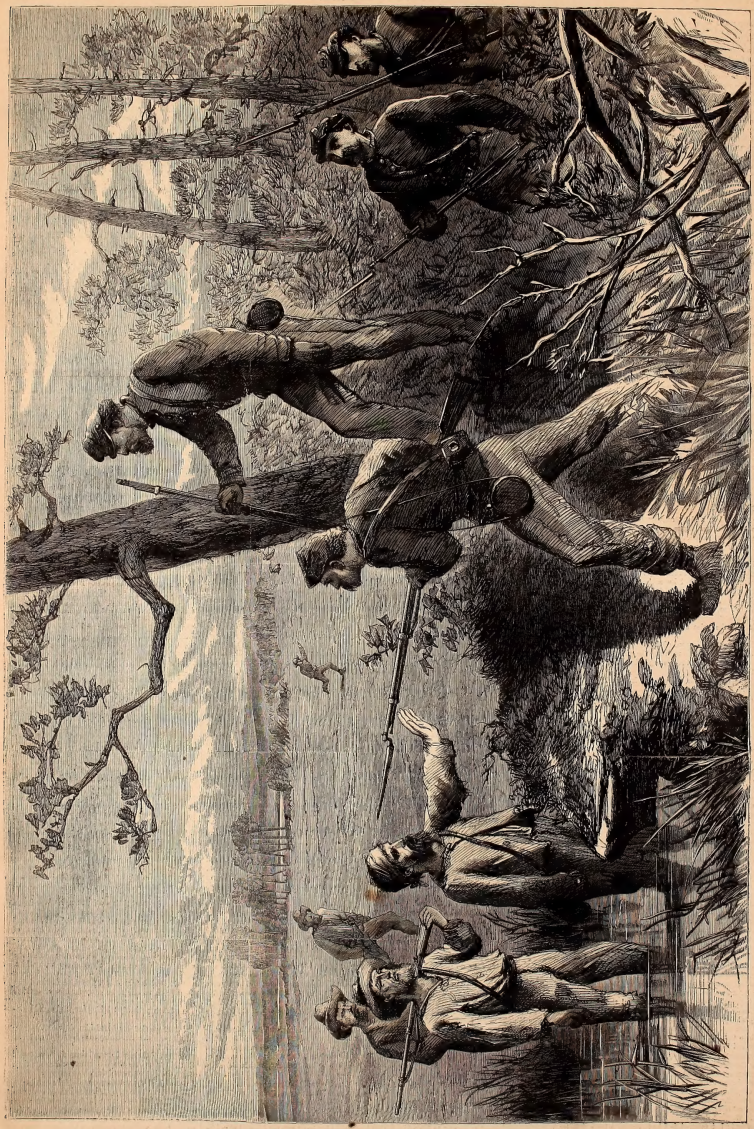
"No, Hal, it is so dreadful to think of him dying there, with no one to be sorry for him or comfort him!"

And then, patiently soothing her, Hal would whisper—

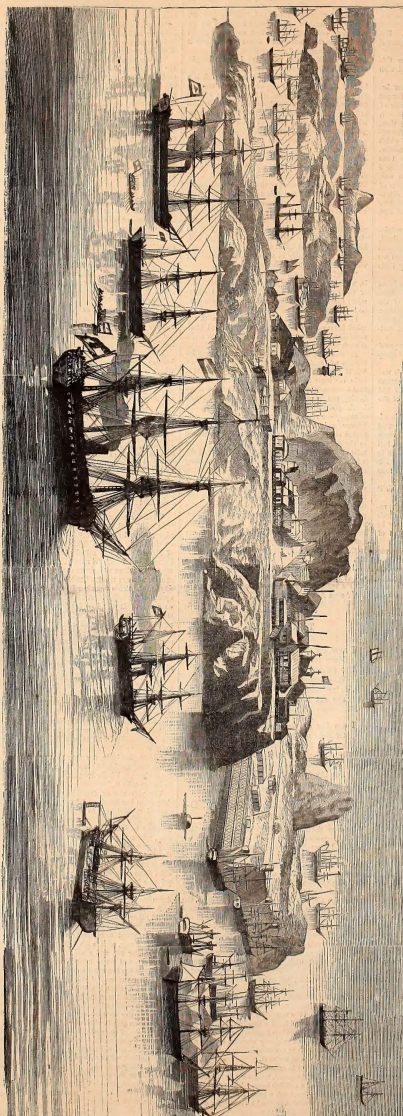
"Perhaps God comforted him, dear child—God, who loved him better than you or I, though we loved him well."

Rose fell the night around them there, a it fell that May-day over the Wilderness where so many brave dead hearts were lying.

When will the morning come—Hal's and hers? They can not look with their tear-blinded eyes into the future; but does it not hold a time when Captain Wayne's words will in proven prophecies—which Hal's wife, happy in his love, cradling his children on her knee, will only recall as a blessed and tender consolation in the days of so brief a sorrow, who waited out in the red tide of blood and battle all the wrong he had done to God and man, and wept home to the final Judge of all, out of the Wilderness?



REBEL DESERTERS COMING WITHIN THE UNION LINES.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



THE SPANISH SQUADRON, COMMANDED BY ADMIRAL PINZON, TAKING POSSESSION OF THE CHINCHA ISLANDS.

REBEL DESERTERS.

THE sketch which we give on page 460 represents a scene of daily occurrence both in the Eastern and Western campaigns. Deserters from the rebel army are, however, more frequent in the West, for the reason that the region from which they were originally drawn is in a far less degree actuated by a feeling of hatred against the North. The masses of the rebellion are not in Georgia, Louisiana, Texas, and Mississippi, but in Virginia and South Carolina. A great proportion of those who come within our lines in Virginia are men who have been conscripted in North Carolina. These deserters are of great use to our Generals in giving important information in regard to the disposition and numbers of the enemy. Not unfrequently they become invaluable as scouts. If the secret history of our campaigns could be written, it would be found that not a few of our victories, particularly in the West, have been due to the faithful and oftentimes romantic adventures of these scouts.

A few days ago there came into General SHERMAN'S lines a portion of THIGG'S Fifty-fourth Virginia Regiment—the same which was in HUMPHREY MARSHALL'S army at Middle Creek when that fat Colonel was defeated by GARFIELD. Donelson, Vicksburg, Chattanooga, and other national victories, have told upon these soldiers' first love for secession.

THE CHINCHA ISLANDS.

PUBLIC attention has been of late especially directed to the Guano Islands, the occupation of which by a Spanish squadron we illustrate on this page. The CHINCHA ISLANDS are situated in the Pacific, on the west coast of Peru, to which country they belong. They are three in number, inconsiderable as to size, and about ten miles distant from the port of Pisco. These desolate solitudes are solely important by reason of the guano which through a series of years has accumulated from the excrements of various marine birds, forming beds, sometimes of a brown and sometimes of a raw color, which in certain places rise to the height of 120 feet. The huts of the inhabitants are built on the guano itself. The means of subsistence on these islands, even to water, have to be drawn from the main land. This makes the cost of living very great. A hotel has been established there, offering to travelers comfortable accommodation. The majority of the inhabitants are workmen who are continually employed in transporting the hard guano to depôts for exportation.

The Spanish authorities having disclaimed all connection with Admiral Pinzon's seizure of the Chincha Islands, and having withdrawn their fleet, there is no apprehension of further difficulty.

MY SERVICE OF PLATE.

NOT long ago I was presented by a circle of admiring friends with a service of plate.

I use the term admiring in a figurative sense, mind; not that I am incapable of exciting admiration in the opposite sex, but because this particular circle of friends was composed entirely of men, with the weaknesses of men, including envy, jealousy, etc., and because I have been made painfully aware since that some of them entertained feelings toward me bordering on dislike, which necessarily precludes sentiments of admiration.

I am what angry tax-payers call a public servant; an upper servant, however, being at the head of one of the bureaus in a certain department of the Federal Government.

It is customary every year in this department for one of the chief clerks to receive, and the underlings to present, a testimonial, in the shape generally of a silver service, procured by voluntary subscriptions from all the employés. As these presentations are confined to the chief clerks, a few, in fact many, of the underlings, with the pettiness inherent in our fallen natures, are mean enough to regard these voluntary subscriptions in the light of forced contributions, and to class them with the monthly levy on our salaries for party purposes, which really is odious and tyrannical, but to which we are compelled to submit by the uncertain tenure of political positions.

Last year it was Van Ricketts the First Auditor's turn to receive; the year before Sweetser the Cashier accepted; and this year Palsfox Primrose, your most obedient, was honored with, as I premised, a service of plate.

Yes, honored; to my great regret and misfortune, as I will shortly make apparent.

The gift is invariably made on Christmas-eve; and it is etiquette for the designated recipient, although aware of the intended honor months before, to affect profound ignorance of what is going to take place; to be blind to the subscription-list passing under his nose; and, moreover, to be unusually bland and amiable to all in the office: this last circumstance exposing him to the designs of any unscrupulous employé who may take advantage of the complacent mood of his superior to "borrow" the amount of his subscription by borrowing. This happened to me, who, although not a lending man, was obliged—yes obliged—to give (for it were a mockery to call it lending) sundry sums, amounting in the aggregate to eighty-two dollars, the week preceding my reception of the plate. Of course it is impossible to refuse; the meanest miser alive couldn't be guilty of that at a moment when his fellow-citizens are bestirring themselves to offer him a proof of their love and esteem in an elegant, costly, and substantial shape. Of course a man feels flattered—highly so—and can't help telling his wife about it beforehand, as I did, rather incautiously, as it chanced; for she naturally confided the important information to other ladies, who in turn confided it to their husbands; so that, in the natural confusion of tenses incidental to the verbal transmission of news, it was spread abroad and believed that I actually was in possession of the testimonial a week before the presentation, much to my sunnyness, as I was obliged to receive congratulations with counterfeit looks of blank surprise, and practice the most unblushing deception and insincerity. However, it was impossible to find fault with Emma (that is Mrs. Primrose), for her indiscreet and premature revelations; for the dear woman was as highly fluttered at the forthcoming honor as I was—certainly more demonstratively delighted, for the sole about immediately making preparations for the event. She mentioned at once the necessity of receiving the committee appointed to wait on me in a proper manner, and suggested that the drawing-rooms needed new curtains and a new carpet, hinting also at the propriety of our two daughters having new apparel, to say nothing, which she did say, about her own attire.

I ventured a mild objection. "My dear Emma," said I, "why put ourselves to the trouble and expense of a new and happy fireside without ostentation? Why should we depart from that republican simplicity which has ever been our ornament and pride, and which we have inherited, with other virtues, from our Revolutionary forefathers?"

"My dear Pelafox," replied my wife, banishing my objections with a kiss, "this is no ordinary occasion. I have always had a profound contempt for testimonials in general, and vote this one of those silly, unmeaning ceremonies, arising from vanity and mutual admiration. I would not stir a hand or foot to receive them; but this is altogether different. I know it to be but the genuine and spontaneous expression of esteem from those who know you best, and have had the amplest opportunity to judge you, and recognize your worth and ability."

"Well, well, Emma," said I, with a smile, "perhaps it is so. Do as you like, my love." And I decked from the room, content that Mrs. Primrose took the right view of the matter; for she is a woman of uncommon keenness of perception, and an excellent judge of human nature.

My house is a small and modest one; but on the suspicious occasion I may say it presented quite a brilliant appearance. The new carpet was resplendent; Mrs. Primrose and our daughters Emma and Susan were elegant; and I was attired with my usual good taste in a new suit of clothes and a scintillating scarf.

The committee came towards evening, preceded by a porter, who deposited, or rather dropped, a heavy package, directed in brown paper on the accurate-table of our front drawing-room. My family and I affected total unconcern at this proceeding, as in duty bound, and awaited the action of the committee, whom we rose to meet with cordial yet serious and becoming greetings.

The speaker was my intimate friend Sweetser, the most effective stump-speaker in the Thirtieth Ward, over whose head such a superb enormous pause, and which my modesty forbids me to repeat at length. Suffice it to say that he alluded in very complimentary terms to my long career of usefulness as an officer of the United States Government, to my unswerving fidelity, unshaken loyalty, and unimpeachable integrity while in the service of said Government; touching also on the enviable reputation I enjoyed as a fellow-citizen, a husband, a father, and as a neighbor. Then, with a graceful wave of his hand the orator directed my attention to the box-wrap, now free from its envelope and standing in splendor, in the following words: "The nation, Sir, owes you a debt of gratitude which it is unable to pay; but we, Sir, as an integral portion of that nation, and as representatives of your fellow-citizens in the employ of the —— Department of the United States of America, beg to tender, to you, Sir, this service of plate as a trifling token of our esteem and regard for your manifold virtues, talents, and worth."

This glowing eulogium overwhelmed me. My heart swelled, my eyes filled, and my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. I could only shake the hands of Sweetser and the rest of the committee with silent emotion and felt supremely happy, and that I deserved it all.

My wife and the girls were equally overcome, but soon recovered sufficient composure to wipe their eyes and order Bridget to throw aside the sliding doors of the back-parlor where a sumptuous banquet awaited the reception and appetite of our friends. I could only wave them toward the table, and with unspeakable alacrity they followed themselves, without useless ceremony, to the choice Champagne, Bourbon, and brandy I had with generous forethought provided for their delectation.

I can say with truth that that was the proudest moment of my life. I felt now that my ambition had at last found its due appreciation, and, in fact, and in my mind's eye, I saw my way clear to at least a seat in Congress.

The committee did justice to our hospitality, and it was very late, or rather early, when they left. Three of them, owing to the distance living in their knee-joints, were unable to walk home, and had to be conveyed in the bottom of a baker's cart the only vehicle available at that hour. All, in fact, were enthusiasts who threw their whole souls into every undertaking.

We slept but little, if any, the remainder of that night. It took at least two hours after our guests had departed to thoroughly examine our gift and review the ceremony and entertainment. "I must say, my dear, that the whole affair is highly creditable indeed to all concerned," remarked I to Mrs. P. "Very, very creditable."

"Yes, love," replied my wife, with her eyes still on the silver; "it is so gratifying also to find that one has so many warm and devoted friends."

"It is indeed. It would be gratifying to any one's feelings. It is to mine," I acknowledged with proud consciousness and with a glow of satisfaction still on my countenance as I stood warming my back at the fire.

"And what an heir-loom this will be, Pelafox! Just think!—your great-grandchildren will cherish each piece, and point with pride to the inscription: 'Presented to Pelafox Primrose, Esq., Christmas, 1863, by them.'"

"Is Mr. Spinneymuck, that little fellow with the heavy mustache, married?" interrupted my daughter Susan.

This introduced a new train of ideas; and, with a yawn, I suggested the propriety of retiring for the remainder of the night.

"Let us put the silver away before we go. But where shall we put it? It won't be safe to leave it here," said Mrs. P.

"True, Emma; true. I think that, for this night, we had better each take a piece to bed with us. That will be the safest plan."

And so Mrs. Primrose and I hid the salver between the mattresses of our bed, and the tea-pot under the bolster; while the girls took charge of the creamer, sugar-bowl, etc. The tea-set—or, rather, the possession of it—made a wakeful pillow, for my thoughts would revert to certain ideas engendered by the day's festivities, and I realized the excited apprehensions of a rather unpleasant nature. The morning brought but little reassurance. I am not a rash man; but, on the contrary, rather a cautious one—in fact, a nervously cautious one. My dwelling is a detached one, on the outskirts of the city, and near an unquiet and disorderly neighborhood; hence I think I was justified in feeling for the safety of my family while in possession of such a tempting bait for burglars.

I went to business, and received the congratulations of my fellow-clerks in a manner much enjoyed, especially as I noted that some of them appeared rather dissatisfied, and as if they looked upon me as a little of an exterminer. If so, they little thought how they were being avenged.

I took home with me in the evening an abundance of bolts, long and strong, and a six-shooter. Mrs. Primrose turned a little pale at the sight of the weapon and condemned my caution, but nothing. She awoke me, however, several times during the night to listen, so that I passed a somewhat restless one.

"My dear, why not buy a safe—a burglar-proof one?" suggested Mrs. P.; "then we might sleep in perfect security."

I merely answered that a burglar-proof safe was the extreme expression of human folly, inasmuch as the service was worth; and hinted that I had already laid out as much money in honor of the testimonial as I could afford.

The following evening Bridget, our faithful handmaiden, brought the unwelcome intelligence that the fact of our possessing a testimonial was known in the disorderly neighborhood; that children had been hanging on our palings all the afternoon to get a peep at it, and that one boy had heard it talked about in the grocery between several men of indigent appearance.

"D—n the service!" I exclaimed; "I wish it were further!"

"Hush-sh!" said my gentle helpmeet, reproving the hasty o-h'urgation. "Pelafox, that's rather ungenerous to our kind friends. It may be somewhat annoying, but it certainly is flattering to the pride of your great-grandchildren."

I was on the point of anathematizing those unborn incumbents, when Mrs. Primrose stopped my mouth with her little hand and prevented me.

"I'll tell you what we can do, dear. We can get a Patent Magnetic Alarm Telegraph, that I see advertised, and have the wire affixed to the door and window, and in case any one attempted to enter bells would be set a-ringing that would arouse the whole household."

"A very good idea indeed, Emma; I'll order one to-morrow. Meanwhile I'll step down to the kitchen-door and have a talk with the police on the subject."

As a prudent man I deemed it my duty to notify the authorities of the suspicious excitement prevalent in the disorderly neighborhood on the subject of my testimonial.

"I am glad you mentioned it," said the sergeant on duty, "for there's a 'lush drum' in the avenue near you, consisting of two 'cross-cut' knacks,' and 'knackers,' and you had better keep a sharp look to your locks. I'll direct the men to keep an eye on your premises, however, as I've got 'em 'dead to rights' if any thing is attempted."

As my respectable informant's advice explained that "lush drum" meant a low dram-shop patronized by thieves; that "crossmen" were housebreakers; "knackers" burglars; and "nonacks" passers of counterfeit money.

This was explicit, if not reassuring; and when I went home I found the police already there, and kept a very sharp look to my locks. It was too bitterly cold that night to delude one's self into the belief that the vigilant police had established a watch on the premises, and I had a horrid dream that a detachment of crossmen and knackers from the lush drum, armed with shotguns and daggers, had feloniously invaded our bedchamber.

The next day I applied for the protection of the Patent Magnetic Alarm Telegraph; but Bridget, who had set up rather late with a cousin "from the west," thought she heard a noise in the back-yard, and, forgetting the alarm telegraph, threw up the dining-room window without detaching the wire. Instantly a frightful shriek of agony resounded throughout the house, and Mrs. Primrose and the girls were thrown into a convulsion of terror. Alarmed at the condition of my poor spouse, I dared not leave her to ascertain what had happened; and after a few minutes, that seemed hours, we suffered indescribable fears, when Bridget arrived to explain the mishap and relieve our apprehensions.

"Emma," said I at breakfast the next morning, "that service is undoubtedly a flattering testimonial, and I will be also a nuisance. I would like," I added, faintly, "to—to—sell it."

"Pelafox, surely you are not in earnest," said Mrs. P., gravely: "for my part, I would rather undergo untold torments than part with it in that way."

"Well, Mrs. Primrose," said I, in a determined tone, "I suppose we must keep it here until after New-Year's Day, for the sake of our great-grandprinces to visit us on that day, and the silver must be on exhibition; but after that I will not consent to keep it any longer, and subject you and the girls to such constant fright."

A new expedient suggested itself to Mrs. P. "Why not keep it in some bank? Have a neat mahogany case lined with velvet, made to contain it, and keep it in some bank where we can have it at a moment's notice."

"An excellent idea, my dear; I never thought of it. I'll order the case at once."

Meanwhile New-Year's Day came, and with it a host of clerks from the department, who brought their friends, and ad admired the service, and all preferred quenching their thirst in Champagne than in tea or coffee. And some did so, I regret to say, with an avidity that betrayed their intention of getting the worth of their subscription in wine.

The mahogany case was duly finished, and I called on the cashier of the bank where I keep my little account and stated my wishes.

"My dear Sir, we would oblige you with pleasure, but I wouldn't advise you to leave it here. The bank could not assume the least responsibility of such a deposit; and this being something that you prize far beyond its intrinsic value, why, if it were lost or stolen—"

"Oh," said I, rather eagerly, "I would not expect you to assume the slightest responsibility. I would be perfectly satisfied even if it were lost, knowing that I had left it at my risk."

There was no alternative, my dear, but the cashier was evidently bent on refusing me.

"Um!" he replied. "Well; but the difficulty is, we have no room for it. It is altogether too cumbersome. I would oblige you otherwise; but in this case the case is the objection—ha, ha! Do you see, Sir?"

I left him in despair, but calm despair, with my mind fully made up to filing the confounded testimonial into the fire if I would pass another night of such tribulation as I had undergone.

Fortunately, on my return to consummate my intention of consigning the silver to the locker of David Jones, a symbol met my gloomy gaze that made me pause. It was a small sheet—an insignia that betokened the habitation of one devoted to relieving the necessities of the distressed; of a philanthropist that had a heart of human kindness and of money—a responsible man who invited my confidence, and to whom, in a short interview, I imparted my dilemma. He proposed instant relief, and in the most generous manner offered not only to take charge of the testimonial, but also to lend me a handsome sum of money for the privilege of being custodian.

I went home with a light heart. The next day my friend was in possession of the silver. He has it now. He gave me his bond to return it at any time I might require it, although I would have preferred being under no further obligations to him, yet he insisted so strongly on it, that, rather than hurt his feelings, I accepted a little loan, which my great-grandchildren, if they wish to point with pride to the inscription, may repay with, of course, interest.

And now, in conclusion, I will state, for the benefit of any one who may be in precisely similar case with a testimonial, that my benefactor's name is Mr. Aaron Abednego, the pawnbroker.

TWO VISIONS.

I.

I saw her in the stately dance
Move proudly, like a queen;
Her perfect head was raised, her glance
Was steady, calm, serene.
I said, "I would that the world of such were full,
For she is very beautiful!"

II.

I saw her by the low bedside
Of sickness gently move;
Upon her face no look of pride,
But sympathy and love.
I said, "Would that the world of such were full,
For she is more than beautiful!"

MARIE; OR, THE BLUE HAND.

TOWARD the close of October, on a fine day which I well remember, though so many years have since elapsed, I was returning on foot from Orleans to the ancient Chateau de Beaugency, one of those relics of a former age which have always an interest from old associations. The road wound circuitously among the hills; the sun was shining brightly on the green fields and the little cottages half hidden in their vines, the air was mild and warm, but taken with the rich odor of fruit, and Nature all around me seemed to rest in the luxury of life. Some distance in advance, and on the same road, a regiment of the Garde de Etrangère was marching leisurely along, the gay uniforms forming a brilliant contrast with the tranquil scene, and presenting in itself over the country. I pushed quickly on, for I wanted to listen to the music of their band, of which I could only catch a few distant notes, and as I drew nearer, the music ceased, and the drum only beat from time to time, to mark the measured step of the soldiers. After half an hour I came up with them, and I was surprised and pleased to recognize in one of the officers a friend whom I had met in Paris. We saluted each other, and walked on together in conversation, when the regiment suddenly wheeled off the road, and halted on a little common beside it, surrounded almost entirely with fir-trees.

"You are about to manœuvre, I suppose?"

"No," said the captain, with a shrug of his shoulders, "we have a bad job here. They are about to try, and probably shoot, a soldier of my company, for having robbed the peasant he was billeted on."

"What! judge him and condemn him, and execute him, all in the same regiment?"

"Tis according to the articles," answered he.

The word, in his sense, was unanswerable; as if in these articles every thing had been provided for—crime and chastisement, justice and humanity itself.

"Come," said the captain, "follow me, if you have any curiosity; it will soon be over."

Instinctively I followed him, for I was desirous of seeing the end of this strange drama.

The regiment was formed in a square; behind the second line, and at the edge of the wood, a few of the soldiers were digging a grave. A cold chill ran through me as I saw it. But still it was quite possible that the culprit might be declared innocent, and I consoled myself with the reflection.

In the middle of the square, where officers were sitting upon drums, and a ninth, to the right of them and a little in advance, were from time to time a few soldiers who had pieces of paper, which were read on his knees; but he seemed to me to do it negligently, and as a mere matter of form.

The prisoner was summoned. He was a young man, of fine appearance, and with a frank, open look, which was in itself a recommendation; and with him a woman advanced, who was the only witness in the matter.

The colonel turned toward her, and was about to interrogate her, when the soldier stepped forward.

"It is useless," said he. "I confess every thing; it is I who have broken the wretched head of that woman."

"You, Titer," said the colonel, "you have always passed for an honest fellow."

"'Tis true, colonel. I have always tried to please my officers. 'Tis not for myself I stole it; 'tis for Marie."

"For what Marie?"

"For Marie who lives yonder, in the country; 'tis by Arenberg, by the great tree that— Shall I never see her again?"

"Impossible, Titer. I can not comprehend you."

"My colonel, read, I pray, this letter." And he handed him the following letter, every word of which is living in my memory:

"TYPER, DEAR FRIEND,—I avail myself of Arnold, the man, who is going to the city yonder, to send to thee this letter and a silk purse which I have made after thy plan. I wish, dear friend, that I could make it for thee as I could me always for loving thee as much, and tells me that thou dost love me. But then perhaps not, Titer? Even if thou dost not, I shall still love thee. Did I not promise thee, on the day of our betrothal, to be my blue kerchief at the dance at Arenberg? When shall I again see thee? Tell me, for my pleasure to hear that art detained by thy officers, loved by thy comrades. But then perhaps not. Pere Jean quickly, and then we will marry at the last. Adieu, Titer, dear friend.

"MARIE."

"P.S.—Try to send me something from France; not for me, for I have every thing, but that I may be with me. But then must kin what thou conduct, for I am sure that kind will make the point of thy knife."

When the letter had been read Titer again spoke. "Arnold," said he, "brought me that letter last night, when I was billeted by Père Jean. I begged to pay for three months to set free my brother and cousin, who are returned to their country now a few days. I went this morning I got up to them, and I opened my window. A blue kerchief was hanging on a cord. It was like Marie's; it had the same color, the same form as hers. I had the wickedness to take it. I placed it in my haversack, and I descended to the street; but I repented, and I was returning to the house when the woman ran after me. The handkerchief was found on me. I have told the truth. The articles say I am to be shot. Shoot me, then, but do not despise me."

The judges could not hide their emotion. Who could? But what was to be put to the vote he was condemned to death unanimously. He listened to the sentence with calmness, and then, approaching the captain, he prayed of him that he would restore him four francs. The captain handed them to him.

And then I saw him turn to the woman, to whom the handkerchief had been restored, and I heard these words:

"Forgive, Madame, one four francs: I know not if the handkerchief be worth more; but if it be, I am giving my life for it as well. I pray you, then, to let me have it."

The poor woman, trembling and horrified, let it drop from her hand, and Titer, taking it from the ground, walked back to the officer.

"My officer," said he, in a tone that it was sufficient to hear to understand that brought back all eyes, "in two years you will return to our mountains; you will again see them. Ask for Marie, then, at Arenberg, and with this blue kerchief she is so good. My officer, give her this handkerchief from poor Titer; but ah! do not say at what price he bought it. You promise?"

"I promise," replied the other, the tears rolling down his sweetly cheeks.

And then Titer knelt down and began to recommend his soul to God. As for me, I could no longer bear the fearful spectacle before me. Visions of an innocent whom Nature herself shielded. I crawled away, sick with horror, my limbs trembling under me, and a weight bearing down on my heart, and threw myself into the wood, that I might not see the cruel tragedy about to happen.

"Assassins! assassins!" I cried, as I leaned almost in weakness against the trunk of a tree; "of what importance is a man guilty! Not even an officer can be be good and kind. Tigers are more merciful. We are to each other wolves or divinities. God pardon the executioners!"

The echo of the muskets rang through the wood; the very leaves seemed to tremble as it rolled from tree to tree. I fell upon my knees; I wept aloud.

By-and-by, when all was quiet, I stole out of the wood. They had all gone. All? Alas! I hurried again to the road, and I shuddered to see, at a little distance, the short grass crimsoned with ghastly stains; close by was a mound of new-dug earth. I broke down a branch from one of the trees, and fashioned it into a rude cross; and I planted it on the unknown grave where poor Titer reposed! By all the world save by me and perhaps by Marie.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

Of Articles to be sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $125 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 70 00 each.
50 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches.. 18 00 each.
$500 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
$500 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " " " ..... 2 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Pearl Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 8 00 each.
$100 Gent's Breast Pins..... 2 50 to 8 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Room Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
4000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Scene Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Ladies' Jewelry..... 2 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders 4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one is, are then put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar, and will collect 20 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS
(From Juries 8 and 40 at the
International Exhibition,
LONDON, 1862;
AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GENERAL DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlets, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or otherwise, to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

$3 00 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and everywhere else, in this most lucrative business known. Honorable and no risk. Address or apply to T. & H. GAUGHAN, 118 Broadway, New York.

LADIES' LETTER.

FIVE ANATOMICAL ENGRAVINGS.
The information never before published.
Sent free, in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.
Address Box 4662, New York P. O.

AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO.

Manufacturers of GOLD PENS and PENCIL CASES of every description. Sole Manufacturers of the CELEBRATED
Angular Nibbed Pen.

AGENTS WANTED throughout the country. Extra inducements offered. Large discounts made to the trade. Send for our descriptive circular. AMERICAN GOLD PEN CO., No. 209 Broadway, N. Y.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.
ALL KINDS AT BARTLETT'S, 543 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The Improved Ridgewood Smoking Case.

Send for Circular. Ridgewood Manuf. Co., 420 Broadway.

The West Indian
Hair Curler

Warranted to curl the most straight and stiff Hair on the first application, either into short ringlets or waving massive curls. Sent, securely packed, on receipt of 50 cts.
Address WILD GILBERT LYON,
Box 5251, New York Post Office.

Burnett's Kalliston

Is a luxury for the bath. It has a refreshing perfume, emolling anything known. It acts upon the skin like a charm.

SOMETHING NEW
IN PLAYING CARDS.
LOVE SCENES.
Designs from French Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of elegant design, and they can also be used in the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with amusement. Enclose 50 cents and ten red stamps, and send for a sample pack. Put up in Gilt Cases. Liberal discount by gross to dealers. H. A. CASWELL, 40 Nassau St., New York.

Manhattan Life Insurance Company,
No. 32 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.
Opposite the Post-Office.
CASH CAPITAL AND ACCUMULATION OVER
$1,600,000.

The triennial dividend of profits of this company has resulted in addition or addition to the policy of more than 50 per cent. on the whole premium paid.

These profits are paid in the fifth-time of the assured, thus aiding them to pay future premiums.

POLICIES can be made non-forfeitable after five years from date, for or on account of errors, omissions, and misstatements in the application, without fraud.

ANNUITIES are granted on favorable terms.
HENRY STOKES, President.
C. Y. WEMPLE, Secretary.

J. L. HALSEY, Asst. Sec.
S. N. STEBBINS, Actuary.

WANTED, in every TOWN, COUNTY, STATE, TERRITORY, and DOMINION, enterprising Agents to sell popular Books, Light Works. Small capital, liberal profits, quick returns. Furniture by return post on receipt of stamp, by FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Broker's Stock of Unredeemed Goods, consisting of a variety of rich and valuable goods, viz.: Gold and Silver Watches, Ladies' and Gents' Gold Chains, Gold Jewelry of every description, Pure Gems, Shawls, Furniture, Scarfs, Silver and Silver-Plated Ware, Photograph Albums, and a variety of other articles worth from 75 cents to $200 each, for sale at one dollar for each article at Farmers' Loan Office, address
ANDREWS & CO., 105 Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

The Salem Leg.

This Leg is LIGHT, DURABLE, COMFORTABLE, NOISELESS, SIMPLE in construction, and NATURAL in form. It dispenses with all cords, leaves the stump-joint free to motion, and is readily adjusted to the wearer. All the CLASPS of CASES, and enables the wearer to walk with unchanged tread and NATURAL step. For CIRCULARS containing full particulars, address "Salem Leg Company, Salem Mass." Soldiers' pensioning this Leg can receive the usual amount of government aid.

THE SUMMER No. of MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR of FASHIONS Now Ready.—A brilliant display of beautiful novelties, music, elegant fashion plates, seven Full Size Patterns, an elegant Braid Sheet, with much valuable information, only 25 cents; or yearly subscription $1, with a premium of One Dollar's worth of Extra Patterns. (Form of an Order.)

Mme. Demorest will find enclosed $1 00, and 2 cts. for postage on the premium, for which please send me your Mirror of Fashions for one year, commencing with the Summer No.

Give your address in full, and address it to
MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

Albums for the Army.
Our New Pocket Album,
holding sixteen pictures, and sold at Seventy-five Cents,
is the cheapest and best Pocket Album ever offered to the public.
Sent by mail to any address, post-paid, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.
SAMUEL BOWLES & COMPANY,
Photograph Album Manufacturers,
Springfield, Mass.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine, or ten samples sent free by mail for 50c. Retails for $3, by E. L. WOLCOTT, 218 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Mr. J. C. Rapelyea,
Of Monmouth County, New Jersey, writes, March, 18, 1859.
DYSENTERY CURED.

I was troubled in January last with costiveness for several days, and took ten grains of calomel to obtain relief. I caught cold, I suppose; at any rate, a severe diarrhœa set in, which my medical attendant found it impossible to arrest. This was followed by dysentery. My strength was all gone. Every thing passed through me as I took it. A friend from New York, Mr. George Lewis, fortunately called on me and advised Brandreth's Pills. I thought, in my weakened condition, one pill would be enough; but he administered four, and the next morning four more. Much sooner came from me, and, to my surprise, the soreness and pain diminished. One box cured me fully. I am now hearty, with a fine appetite. You are at liberty to publish this.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING,
NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The splendid Summer number, with elegant illustrations, New Music, Beautiful Braid and Embroidery, Valuable Information, and Seven Full-Sized Patterns, now ready.

Attention Company!

Clark's Onguenta, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustache in six weeks or no charge, smoothness, without stain or injury to the skin. Any person using this Onguent, and failing to do as represented, by following out the facts, can have their money returned them at any time within 3 months from date of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.
Address HOWARD & WILLIAMS,
P. O. Drawer 118,
Albany, N. Y.

MARRIAGE.—Woman Culture. How to be Beautiful, full and healthy. Does He Love me? This Matter, to Whom, and Why not to. The most Dangerous Eyes. A Satisfactory Philosophy. The Cost of War, from 1877 to 1885. Social Conflict. Speaking and Reading "Greeting." Home Influence. Economy, Comics, etc., in 124 pages of the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. For the first year for 19 cents, or a year for $1. A new vol.
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

THE FUNNIEST GETTING FAT WITH SUCCESS—10,000 sold in one day. Everybody and his wife, including the Wild Irishman, are sending out for what a gusto that makes the pockets of the publisher laugh and grow fat. Beware of imitators, and yet there is room. Second edition now ready.

DEMOREST'S N. Y. ILLUSTRATED NEWS, the most popular, cheap, and interesting Literary and Pictorial Newspaper ever published. Sold by all Newsmen, or sent by mail, post-paid, for $2 00 per annum, or a premium. The best medium for general advertising in the country. Advertisements should be addressed to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 39 Beekman Street.

Printing-Press for Sale.
One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $2,500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

"INSTINCT AND REASON."—What Learned Men say. The Human Mind, compared with the Gorilla. The one three stories high, with a sky-light; the other, only a basement. Anecdotes of Dogs and Horses. What constitutes the difference between man and animal. Given in the FREE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for 20 cents by first post, or $2 a year. New Volume.
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

DEAR READER, if you are a reader, do not fail to read the story about the KNICKERS in the "Funny Side" No. 2. Very many will over there, four or six times, and nearly split your sides, and laugh and cry, and cry and laugh over the misfortunes of the Knickers and the laugh with you—it is worth more than the most costly dinner. Sold everywhere. Only 25 cents.

"SIGNS OF CHARACTER."—Physiognomy, illustrated with 14 figures, including men, women, and animals, combinations of heads and characters. Lord Physiognomy, by the Rev. G. W. Hosmer, D.D. Correspondence between the character of a country and the people thereof. Given in the JUDY DOUGLAS No. 1. Price 10 cents. Judy Douglas, 32 pages, or $2 a year. New Vol. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow! Warranted to fill six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.
E. G. GRAHAM, No. 199 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Shits' Onguent. warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks. Sent by mail, post-paid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1845)
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S NEW ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Ag't, No. 22 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.

A CHANCE FOR POETICAL PATRIOTISM.—A Prize of One Hundred Dollars is offered by the proprietor of Brandreth's Sanitarial Nerve, for the best word for a song on the guarantees of Liberty and Universal Freedom in our glorious Constitution. See the particulars in Demorest's N.Y. Illustrated News.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway, where charged for rates.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Meritorious Pencils, Greatest Inducements, and 13 other articles. 16 circulars sent free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

The Exact and most certain remedy for Diarrhœa is Dr. Peck's Extract of Sweet Gum, by Dyes. It is the Leaf of Sweet Gum, by Dyes. It is highly recommended, but is perfectly safe for children of all ages. A few bottles should be put in every package sent to soldiers.

Prepared by the Medical Staff of Dr. Peck, No. 48 Park Row, New York, and for sale by all Druggists. PECK'S PILLS Cures.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published;
HISTORY OF FREDERICH II., called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE. 4 vols., with Portraits, Maps, Plans, &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75 per vol.

Mr. Carlyle is about the only living writer whose opinions are of value, even when it is impossible to agree with them. No one is more fond than he of paradox, but few men's paradoxes hint at so important truths. No one with a more ludicrous disposition sets up stronger men as heroes, or condemns the hapless possessors of pot-bellies to infamy; but then his judgments, even where they are not be confirmed, always enforce some weighty principle which we were in danger of forgetting. And if it sometimes happens that neither the hero nor the principles commend themselves, still the thoroughness of the examination, and the fun with which all his writings are instinct, never fail to make a great work.—London Examiner.

The history of Frederick the Great is coming to be Carlyle's opus magnum. Probably the history of Frederick will forever remain one of the finest pieces of literary painting, as well as one of the most marvelous attempts at special pleading, extant in our own or any language.—London Spectator.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS. Part II. in Harper's Magazine for July. Price 25 cents.

COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. By MISS GRACEWAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

A charming little story, ascribed in English journals and by some usually well informed to Miss Thackeray. It is fresh and sparkling.—Saturday Press.

The author, indeed, is a creature of genius worthy of the author of "Adam Bede!" The narrative is powerful from its simplicity, and the descriptions, or rather indications, of country landscape are fresh and natural.—World.

An exquisite story! A narrative of local nature, of the utmost simplicity of construction and style, and filled with genuine touches of nature. The interest of the story is well sustained, not only by the originality of its plot, but by the skillful, though apparently artless, presentation of its characters.—N. Y. Tribune.

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; or, Sabbath Readings. A Series of Sermons on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By Rev. GLADDEN SEMMES, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, in the City of New York. Fcp. 8vo, Cloth. 9 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

His choice, solemn, most spiritual, edifying, and permanently valuable sermons, these masterly, devotional, and instructive discourses which have made his church a house of worship and religious improvement through two generations, and which, green, restless, changing city. Their peculiar excellence consists in a happy unfolding of the Word of God, with an amount of that undefinable virtue in preaching called unction, which brings the speaker and hearer into holy sympathy. We anticipate from these sermons richer and more general usefulness.—N. Y. Observer.

The discourses are remarkable for their plainness of statement, their directness and urgency of duty and appeal to motive. In style they are singularly terse and animated, falling in the vivacity of the French pulpit. They embrace a wide variety of topics, and exhibit great knowledge of human nature, and no common mastery of the art of persuasion.—N. Y. Tribune.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For August, 1864.

CONTENTS:

A CLUB-MAN IN AFRICA.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Wild Bull of Equatorial Africa.—An Adventure with a Rhinoceros.—The Gallinas Country.—By Ox and Hammock, in Angola.—The Djikkuinka.—Interior Scene in the Quissamacha.
THEODOSIA BURR.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Portraits of Theodosia in 1776, 1797, and 1802.
SPRING.
THE MILITARY HOSPITALS AT FORTRESS MONROE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Hampton Hospital.—The Chesapeake Hospital.—Hospital Ward.—Drug Department.—Smoker-Warden.—"Home."—"Sport".—The Grave-Yard.—The Grave-Digger.—Our Dead.—Our Kitchen.—A Scene in the Hospital.—The Chapel and Library.—Bringing in Patients.
LOST BEND.
THE SISTERS.
THE SHAKSPEARE TERCENTENARY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Stratford Bust.—The Droeshout Print.—The Stratford Monument.—The Chandos Portrait.—The Janssen Portrait.—The Kesselstadt Mask.
THE LOST WORLD. By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN." Concluded.
THE CONTRABAND CAMP. And then M'Clellan explained," &c.
WOMAN ON THE FARM.
DENIS DUVAL. By WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY. [COMMENCED.]
CHAPTER VIII. Denis at Sea.
CHAPTER IX. Denis by the Editor.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Letters.—Denis's Valet.
THE BOOK OF SNOBDOM.
BROKEN IMAGES.
THE LOVES OF THE APPARENTLY DROWNED.
With Four Illustrations after Dr. Marshall Hall and Dr. Silvester.
OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS.
CHAPTER VI. Mr. Boffin's Bower.
CHAPTER IX. Mr. and Mrs. Boffin in Consultation.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mr. Boffin's Carriage Cushion.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—At the Bar.—Mr. Venus surrounded by the Trophies of his Art.
PRICES AND INVESTMENTS.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Here's Richmon."—The Excelsior Club.
FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bridal Toilet.—Child's Pelisse.—Under-Sleeves.—Muslin Waist.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $27 50.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5 50.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.
One Copy for Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 3 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $27 50. Remember, invariably, in advance.
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Two Dollars per line for first insertion, and Fifty Cents per line for each subsequent insertion. Liberal deduction to Advertisers on the Quarter, Half, or Whole Year.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

MR. LINCOLN. "MIKE, remove the SALMON and bring me a TOD."

MIKE. "The TOD'S out; but can't I fitch something else, Sir?"

QUITE THE REVERSE.

"JOHNSTON has SHERMAN just where he wants him."—Richmond Enquirer.

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

BENJAMIN'S RUPTURE CURE TRUSS challenges the world to equal it in retaining and perfectly curing Hernia, or Rupture. Office, 1 Barclay Street, opposite the Astor House.

PRESIDENTIAL

Campaign Medals.

Of every description now ready in Pin and Medal. Trade orders solicited and promptly filled at Factory prices. Wholesale Depot Campaign Medal Co., 458 Broadway, N. Y.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the

SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.

Send for a prospectus as below.

VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOVEREIGN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 65 cts. per bottle. JAPONICA, FOR THE HAIR, EXPLANT, CERTAIN, but only harmless restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE PHILOCOME, THE DELIGHTFUL OIL, 75 cts. MAGNOLIA PHILOCOME, THE EXQUISITE PERFUME, 75 cts. One obstacle off by the dozen. If your druggist has not these articles, talk to no other, but remit with your order to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 118 Chambers St., N. Y., note signed for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

CARPET WARP.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 54 Malden Lane, N.Y.

HISTORY, ART, Politics, BELLES-LETTRES, POETRY, BIOGRAPHY, CRITICISM, NARRATIVE, FICTION, are constantly represented in the pages of the

Atlantic Monthly

This Thoroughly American Magazine is published monthly at THREE DOLLARS a year; single copies 25 cents. Liberal reduction to clubs. Send 20 cents for a specimen and circular.

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston

VERMILYE & CO.,

No. 44 Wall Street, New York,

Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,

converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.

The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

STAMMERING

Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address H. C. BATES & CO., 277 W. 23d St., N. Y.

Don't buy your Gaiters

or Shoes without Fogg's

Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can receive TEN CENTS CURRENCY, and I will mail sample of either address. FREDERICK STEVENS, 319 Pearl Street, New York, and 65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

POLLAK & SON,

MERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS, 602 Broadway, NEAR 4th St., N. Y. Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired, all goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circulars, or $5 for sample pipe.

A SWEET AND

PERFUMED BREATH.

What lady or gentleman would remain under the cure of a disagreeable breath, when, by using the

BALM OF 1000 FLOWERS,

it would be cured? How many lovers it has separated!!! How many friends forever parted! The STRANGE is so DELICATE, your DEAREST friend will not mention it; and you are yourself ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the Balm as a tooth-wash night and morning.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL WOMEN

of ancient times owed beauty to beautify their complexion; but the combination with palm-oil and other valuable ingredients makes it still more valuable. For bathing suffering infants, a few drops poured into a basin of water will dispel all fever, tetter, &c. A few drops poured on your shaving-brush makes a beautiful soft lather, leaving the face pure and white.

When used for washing night and morning, it eradicates all Tan, Freckles, and Pimples, rendering the skin soft and white, and free from blemish.

Price 75 Cents. For sale by all Druggists.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,

Manufacturers of

GOLD MEDAL

Grand and Square Pianos,

Baltimore, Md.

Certificates of excellence from

Thalberg, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.

Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

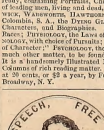
Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion. N. Y.

THE ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for July.—Vol. 40, begins with a Double No., now ready, containing Portraits, Characters, and Biographies of leading men, living and dead, such as HANCOCK, SEWARD, BLENKER, BUTLER, HAWTHORNE, MITCHELL, President of Columbia, S. A., the DYING GLADIATOR, with Portraits, Characters, and Biographies. Also, Etymology, or the Races; PHYSIOLOGY, the Laws of Life and Health; PSYCHOLOGY, with choice of Pursuits; PHYSIOGNOMY, or "Signs of Character;" PHYSIOLOGY, the Science of the Soul; and much other matter, to be found in no other publication. It is a handsomely Illustrated Monthly, with Ninety-six Columns of rich reading matter. Numbers have it. Only at 20 cents, or $2 a year, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.



Box 1614.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c., ENGLISH GLASS to order and great variety. COLORED STONE CHINA DINING SETS.

B. T. Hayward,

208 Broadway, N. Y.

Head-Quarters for CAMPAIGN, ARMY, NAVY, and SOCIETY BADGES and MEDALS, GOLD PENS and JEWELRY of every description. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for wholesale illustrated circular.

$15 Per Day, $15

Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large Size Stationery and Price Package. $25 CAN BE MADE in a few hours by smart agents. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains large quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Blotters, Ruhens, Ladies' Paris Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, Gents' Pocket Calendars for the Year, Union Dodgers, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Birth and Costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, etc., etc., etc. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A splendid SOLID Gold or Silver Hunting Case LEVER WATCH (warranted) presented FREE to each Agent. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS,

Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 & 24 John Street. N.Y.

31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris.

Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums

Sweetens and Preserves the Teeth. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.

Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,

215 Greenwich St., New York.

WARDS SHIRTS

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free on application.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.

Price 75 cts. each; sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 90 cents.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED. — $50 per month guaranteed. A FEW MEN and WOMEN, address with stamp, L. L. TODD & CO., New York.

DIARRHŒA.

DYSENTERY. CHOLERA. CHOLERA MORBUS, &c.—Certain and immediate cure. HEGEMAN & CO.'S celebrated Diarrhœa Remedy has been used with unfailing success since the Cholera season of 1832. A simple dose will usually check the diarrhœa in a few hours. Prepared only by HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, New York. Sold by all the principal Druggists in the United States.

$7 ARMY $7 WATCH.

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, enameled dial, cut hands, English Movement, and correct time-keeper.

A single one sent free by mail in neat case, with a BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $7.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

$18 Algerine, $18

OR OFFICER'S WATCH.

A SCREW "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Duncan Regulator," Jeweled or Nickel Movements," "M. J. Tessa" Independent Action, Self Balance, a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time-keeper. "Warrants of one year." WILL STAND ANY, and is in

Exact Imitation of $100 Watch.

Used by the British Army Officers.

Sent free by mail, in Elegant Morocco Case, for only $18.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here and an imitation of the celebrated timekeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct timepieces; and for beauty and finish they are equal in appearance to $100 watches."

Address MIAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 98 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

TROPICAL BALSAMS

Prepared by CHARLES BROEKMAN and CO.

Of the Laboratory of Dr. J. G. Feelle, late of Amsterdam, Holland, and Dr. Thomas, late of Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are a combination of Copaiba and Cubeb, with Sandal Wood, Buchu, Uva Ursi, Triticum, and essentially free from Mercury, Iodine, Turpentine, and Nitrate of Potash.

Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing nausea, disagreeable eructations, or unpleasant taste in the mouth. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing diarrhœa, disagreeable effects upon the kidneys, or any unpleasant sensation whatever. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the kidneys. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the kidneys. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the kidneys. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system.

Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the kidneys. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the kidneys. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the bowels. Dr. BROEKMAN'S TROPICAL BALSAMS are the only preparation of Copaiba and Cubeb that can be taken without producing any unpleasant effects upon the system.

Depot, 194 Bowery, New York. Sold by all Druggists and Country Merchants.

U. S. Gov. Artificial Leg Depot,

658 Broadway, N. Y., Boetcher, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where the Government furnishes the U. S. Army and Navy Leg to Soldiers gratis, or its value applied on the Anatomical Ball and Socket Joint Leg, which has lateral motion at the ankle like the natural one.

DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.

For instructions address DR. BLY, 64 Second Dept.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

DRY AND GROUND IN OIL

in several dark shades.

For English and Gothic Cottages. Outbuildings, &c.

ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

GUN-POWDER

SMITH & RAND, Manufacturers of ORANGE RIFLE and ORANGE LIGHTNING POWDER, of superior strength and cleanness.

OFFICE, 170 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 395.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE SINKING OF THE "ALABAMA," OFF CHERBOURG, JUNE 19, 1864.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE SINKING OF THE REBEL CORSAIR.

It was the morn of a Sabbath day,
The air was calm and the sky was clear;
Blue were the waters in Cherbourg bay,
Where, in the shade of the frowning fort
Which guards the port,
Lay the rebel privateer.

Outside, clearing her decks for the fight,
Flouted the Yankee ship on the seas,
When the pirate vessel hovered in sight,
Saucily flaunting her bastard rag,
The rebel flag,
Defiantly in the breeze.

Then the drums on the Kearsarge beat,
Calling to quarters her gallant crew;
Every man of them sprung to his gun,
Eager and anxious for the fray
On that Sabbath day,
As the corsair nearer drew.

Soon a column of dense white smoke
Was seen to curl from the pirate's side,
And the booming sound of her cannon broke
On the Sabbath calmas upon the deep,
And out of sleep
Woke the echoes near and wide.

Closer together the two ships came;
An ominous silence the Yankee kept,
When on a sudden a sheet of flame,
Lurid and hot as the fires of hell,
With hissing rush
From each open port-hole swept.

So for a little more than an hour
Over the calm, still waters flew,
Mowling and screeching, the iron shower;
While ever resonant, loud and clear
Sounded each cheer
Of the valiant Yankee crew.

Then the rebel captain, beaten at last,
Headed his vessel for Cherbourg town,
But the gallant Kearsarge, following fast,
Lodged her shell in the pirate's hull
Without a lull
Till he hauled his colors down.

Up went a white flag to the breeze,
But scarce had it floated a moment there
When down went the ship into the seas,
Leaving her crew to find watery graves,
Or fight the waves—
So sank the bold corsair!

SINKING OF THE "ALABAMA."

FULLER details than were at hand at our last issue enable us this week to give a more extended account of the destruction of the Alabama, which is illustrated on our first page. The Alabama arrived off Cherbourg June 14, taking shelter under the guns of Fort Hue de Caux, and the next day Captain SEMMES, understanding that he would not be allowed to remain at anchor in the French port, and that he must soon measure the strength of his vessel with that of the Kearsarge, which was vigilantly watching, improved his escape with great, impudently politeCaptain WINSLOW not to depart from his post, as he intended to come out and offer battle. The decks of the conflict, considering both the relative strength and speed of the two vessels, were nearly equally balanced. The tonnage of both was the same; they were equal in match; and as to armament, if there was any advantage it was with the Alabama, for the latter carried a 100-pound rifled gun, a heavy 68-pounder, and six broadside 32-pounders, while the Kearsarge carried one gun less, viz.: four broadside 32-pounders, two 11-inch Dahlgren, and one 28-pound rifle. The crew of the Alabama, as stated by her officers, consisted of about 150; that of the Kearsarge of about the same number. The Deerhound, an English yacht, having on board the owner Mr. LANCASTER—a member of the Royal Yacht Club—together with his wife and family, had come out to witness the action. A French pilot-boat was near at hand for the same purpose. In order to protect the more vital parts of his vessel, Captain WINSLOW had suspended a double row of chains from the sides of the ship's bulge, covering them over with wooden planks. This proved a very valuable defense in the action; it was one, however, equally in the power of every vessel to have adopted if he had chosen.

At twenty minutes past 10 A.M. of the 19th the Alabama was discovered by the Kearsarge making her way out of the Western Pass of the harbor. Captain WINSLOW steamed off to the northward to a distance of seven miles from Cherbourg until it was certain that all the manœuvres or battle could be executed outside of French jurisdiction. At 11 the minutes to eleven he wheeled about and steered for the Alabama, whose first broadside was gallantly delivered by SEMMES, the Kearsarge slowly returning his fire at first, sending one shot to the Alabama's three. Both vessels used their starboard batteries; and during the whole action the ships, in order to keep their broadsides bearing, manœuvred in circles, grazing continually westward at a distance from each other of from five hundred to one thousand yards. The Alabama delivered her fire not only more rapidly than the Kearsarge, but frequently at random. Every shot from the Kearsarge told upon the rebel corsair. In less than fifteen minutes from the commencement of the action the spanker gaff of the Alabama was shot away, and with it dropped the rebel ensign, which was soon after hoisted at the mizzen mast-head. Soon her hull began to feel the well-directed blows of the Kearsarge, which meanwhile dealt fearful havoc among the rebel crew, knocking them down, killing and disabling them in all parts of the vessel. SEMMES seeing all this, yet observed in his amazement that his most powerful shells fell harmless from the sides of the Kearsarge. After an hour and ten minutes, the two ships were while keeping up their fire, and in their movement westward gradually nearing the shore, though still clear of French waters, the Alabama, perceiving in its sides and between decks by the fiery rain of shells from the Kearsarge, began to show signs of sinking. Seven shots had been completed by her combatants, and it was now noon: there was a lull in the conflict, and the Alabama with all her steam on headed for the French coast. Aware of her intention, Captain WINSLOW—his vessel not seriously disabled, although many shots had passed and had taken effect on her hull, and with only three men severely wounded, none killed—by a rapid movement steered to the inside of the Alabama and delivered a broadside in her weak side, making a fresh opening for the water into the sinking vessel.

The battle was now decided. One hundred and seventy-three shots had been fired by the Kearsarge and perhaps double that number by the Alabama. Captain SEMMES, the first of the rebel naval officers out by the rapid influx of water, hauled down his colors, was received on board the Kearsarge, and once again in token of surrender. His three waist boats had been torn to shreds in the fight, and he had left only two quarter-boats, which were filled with the wounded and with boys unable to swim. A boat was sent alongside of the Kearsarge to give notice of the surrender of the Alabama, and to ask assistance for the sinking crew. This assistance was promptly granted, and how effectually rendered may be inferred from the number picked up by the boats of the Kearsarge. At precisely twenty-four minutes past twelve, twenty minutes after her furnaces went out, the Alabama being on the point of making her final plunge, every man leaped overboard. The rebel flag had been left to sink with that of the twenty wounded, some were in the quarterboats with the boys and others were aboard the Kearsarge; the rest of the crew were all afloat, and some of them drowning. Every available boat of both vessels was now employed in lowering away, and besides these the Deerhound and the French pilot-boat were requested to share in this humane service. In this way one hundred and seventy-two men—seventy of them by the boats of the Kearsarge, forty by the Deerhound, and nine by the French boat. Among those rescued by the Kearsarge was Captain SEMMES and thirteen other officers. In the most dishonorable manner both the Deerhound and the French boat, instead of surrendering the prisoners to the Kearsarge, conveyed them away to port.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1864.

THE CONFLICT OF SOVEREIGNTIES.

THE late efforts, strenuously advised by the Richmond rebel papers and excitingly hailed by their allies the Copperheads, both to bring the National and State authorities into collision, should be pondered by every loyal citizen. The friends of the rebellion at the North do not hope to produce civil war in the State directly, but indirectly. They do not expect to raise the people in the loyal States to help with arms the secession of the rebel States, but they do not despair of giving relief and success to the rebels by inciting even an armed stand for State Sovereignty against the National Government.

Let every man remember, then, that no "sovereignty" in a State is essential to the welfare or existence of the State, which any of the essential attributes of sovereignty were surrendered in the Constitution for the security of the whole people, and whatever further surrender is necessary the same people may be trusted to make. Both State and Union exist by and for the people; and whatever the existence of the Union may require can never properly be refused by a State. MADISON asks, in the 45th Number of the Federalist, "Was the precious blood of thousands spilt, and the hard earned substance of millions lavished, not that the people of America should enjoy peace, liberty, and safety, but that the governments of the individual States, that particular municipal establishments might enjoy a certain extent of power, and be arrayed with certain dignities and attributes of sovereignty? . . . As far as the former objects can be best obtained, not be reconciled to the happiness of the people, the voice of every good citizen must be, Let the former be sacrificed to the latter." And why not, since State and Union exist solely for the happiness of the people?

Now the Constitution amply provides for waging foreign war and for suppressing rebellion. But the powers are generally granted, because particular cases could not be foreseen. Therefore every necessary step whatever might be considered lawful, the Constitution expressly provides for the suspension of the habeas corpus—thus permitting the temporary and arbitrary overthrow of the most sacred and fundamental right of all, that of personal liberty. In a state of war, therefore, the National authority is of necessity every where supreme for the purposes of the war. If any local authority could interpose the national existence would become impossible, because, in that case, there might be as many conflicting authorities as there are States—a situation incompatible with national existence or a condition of war. To say that martial law must be declared before the National authority can intervene is a fallacy, for martial law of itself suspends all other. But the Constitution declares that the habeas corpus may be disregarded, in case of rebellion, when—and, of course, by whom—the safety may require. That is to say, the extremest measures may be taken whenever and wherever they are necessary. It may not be necessary to declare martial law in Maine, but it may be essential to seize summarily a man in Portland. The Constitution provides for the emergency, and no loyal citizen would be moved to cry by the act than by any other necessitated by war.

The Attorney for this district, in his late argument against the National sovereignty, repeats the fallacy of Governor SEYMOUR in regard to coercing States. The National Government has no right to coerce States, was the shallow cry of the abettors of rebellion three years ago. But has not the National Government, existing by the will of the people, quite as good a right to enforce its laws against rebellious citizens as the State of New York or the city of Rochester. The District Attorney says that the State of New York is not a party. Of course not, and it never could be, for the Constitution of the United States forbids it. But the people of the United States, and in the State of New York, are at war. They are engaged indeed in a very serious war; and they, in common with all other people of the United States, have entered into a solemn compact to suppress by force the very attempt to give their authorities supreme powers for the purposes of the war, subject, of course, to impeachment and to the consequences of popular discontent.

Under the plea of State sovereignty to overthrow the National sovereignty is the secret hope and wish proceeding in the air of General DIX. JEFFERSON DAVIS has no other object, no other excuse. But what shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Suppose we save the State and lose the nation? Which is our first and rightful interest and care, the Union or the State? What is the State without the Union? What do either and both exist for but for the security of our liberties? And for what purpose is the question of conflict raised at this time but to imperil those liberties? It is the device of the rebels, and is fostered by those who would gladly see the rebels triumph. Mad in character and intent in those of the men and the papers which support it. If you find a paper which in every way thwarts the Government, disheartens the loyal, encourages the rebellion, and justifies the draft riots, you find a paper which is alarmed lest State sovereignty should be overthrown, lest the State should in any sane man believe that the SEYMOURS, the WOODS, and their followers, are more solicitous for the honor and dignity of New York than General DIX and his friends? The whole doctrine of State sovereignty might be swept away to-morrow; the very remembrance that the States ever were sovereign might be wiped out, and our liberties would still be safe: for it is on our love of them, and not on our theories of the origin and nature of our Government, nor yet on the precise form of the Government itself, that our possession of them depends." And we do not believe any admirable paper in the July number of the North American Review, which we heartily commend to our readers.

THE POSITION OF THE "RADICAL DEMOCRACY."

IN the Presidential election of 1860, in which it took part, the influence known as the Slave power legally lost the control of the government of the United States, and immediately began arms to destroy it. Since the beginning of the war and the accession of the new Administration the efforts at disorganization and strength of the rebellion, have naturally been incessant and vigorous. Slavery has been prohibited in the national Territories, it has been abolished in the District of Columbia. A more strenuous treaty with England for the suppression of the Slave-trade has been negotiated. The Fugitive Slave law has been repealed. Colored men have been allowed to carry the mails, and their right to give testimony in courts of law has been established. Slaves of the Union have been enrolled as soldiers of the United States, receiving equal wages with all others. The President has emancipated by proclamation the slaves in all the rebel section. The Convention of loyal Union men have declared with the utmost enthusiasm for an amendment of the Constitution making Slavery impossible. The President hails the proposition with all his heart, having long ago declared that the Union could not endure half slave and half free, having lately expressed the faith of his life that if any thing is wrong, it is Slavery.

These things have been done under the administration of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. This policy succeeds the universal and unhesitating subservience to the Slave power of FILLMORE'S, PIERCE'S, and BUCHANAN'S administrations. It has been cordially supported by the country; the last three State elections showing every where a regularly increasing majority for the policy of the Administration. It is the anchor of hope for peace and union. Yet at this moment, and in view of these facts, Mr. FREMONT gravely says that Mr. LINCOLN has betrayed his principles, and Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS speaks of the President's "indecision, heartlessness, and infamous pandering to negrophobia and the Slave power." He could say nothing worse of PIERCE or BUCHANAN, and words cease to have any meaning when they are so grossly and recklessly perverted.

That among the supporters of the Cleveland nomination there are men who honestly believe that the Administration is culpably slow in dealing with the cause of the rebellion can not be doubted. That they will gladly accept Mr. PHILLIPS as their spokesman, few observers can know who knows what sincerity and purity of purpose are. Those observers would doubtless regret to serve the rebels and their cause, and yet, with Mr. PHILLIPS, they declare that they are proud to support the Cleveland action. Will they, then, refuse a moment to see if their censure at this juncture, and under the present circumstances, is one which helps the cause which they chiefly honor? Mr. PHILLIPS says that he does not expect the Cleveland movement as such to succeed, but is willing to unite with any body who will help to succeed that Mr. LINCOLN, Dr. BROWNSON and Mr. JOHN COCHRANE invite the radical Democrats to join the party which wishes to defeat Mr. LINCOLN. To what does all this inevitably tend?

These gentlemen will agree probably that Mr. VALLANDIGHAM is almost as base a sycophant of the rebellion as Mr. DICKINSON. They have not forgotten VALLANDIGHAM'S eager crawling from Washington to Charlestown in Virginia to meet JOHN E. MASON, the rebel emissary in London, to see if he could not extort from old JOHN BROWN some word, or hint, or shrug which could compromise the Democratic leaders in the affair at Harper's Ferry. They know what VALLANDIGHAM was and is. They know that he is going to the Chicago Convention, and why he goes there, and whether or not that Convention will spew him out. They know, also—or do n't—doubt?—that the main inspiration of the Democratic Convention is negrophobia. They know, also—or do they doubt?—that "the friends" of the rebellion, who last year were so much reinforcement by army, and hung and burned negroes in New York, will be represented in that Convention. They know, then, that the doubt—that the great body of men who mean war and liberty as the hope of Union and peace will not be represented at Chicago. And do they not know—or do they doubt?—that, of necessity, Cleveland is a tender to Chicago—the mere Deerhound to that Alabama? If they doubt, we refer them to the words of Mr. FREMONT, and of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE'S "Radical Democracy." That paper says: "There is so little difference between the views of the Radical Democracy and the Democratic party that it would be easy to adopt a common ticket." The same paper cries: "Down with Lincoln! Down with the battle-cry! Let there be but two parties: let all be for or against Lincoln." Bearing this in mind, the Boston Atlanta Register, a rebel journal which heartily agrees with the PREMONT organ in malignant hate of the President and General GRANT. Speaking of the Copperheads, it says: "If they will use the battle-cry of down with Lincoln while we use the cartridge-box, each side will be a helper to the other, and both will be successful in accomplishing the greatest work which this country and the continent have witnessed." Mr. PHILLIPS and his friends know whether this is a misrepresentation or not of the chief New York Copperhead papers says that "it is the duty of the country to rally at the next election and put down LINCOLN as well as his confederate, JEFF DAVIS." Mr. PHILLIPS and his friends virtually say, "Certainly, the slave-hunter and the slave-hound." Another of the Copperhead journals declares that they can certainly poll more votes by uniting upon FREMONT "to defeat the Administration." Mr. PHILLIPS and his friends think that these papers have become Abolitionists? that they are going to support Mr. FREMONT, if at all, upon the platform of negro equality?

It is in vain that Mr. PHILLIPS repeats a resolution of the Cleveland Convention calling it the highest tide-mark of American politics. The Copperhead hypocrite says, "Down with LINCOLN!" Chicago had already shouted it in advance. The cry of rebel rage comes hissing up from the South, "Down with LINCOLN!" VALLANDIGHAM and his friends catch and prolong it—"Down with LINCOLN!" Every Copperhead in the land rings with the refrain, "Down with LINCOLN!" PIERCE, the SEYMOURS, REED, the WOODS, all their organs, their orators, and their newspapers join the chorus. JEFFERSON DAVIS hears and cheers, "Down with LINCOLN!" "Down with LINCOLN!" is the battle-cry of every rebel in the field; of every Copperhead and apologist or devotee of slavery in the land, on the stump, and at the ballot-box; and of every enemy of the American idea and system in Europe. It is not love of liberty; it is not equality before the law; it is not national honor, and peace, and Union through justice; it is not humanity and the country which in spire that cry. It is an "infamous pandering to negrophobia;" it is a craven wish for compromise; it is the abjectness of submission to rebellious slaveholders; it is hating national disgrace, and universal civil war and anarchy; it is bloody rioting against drafts and the mad measure of the friendless and most unfortunate of our population which howls and roars and rages in the cry, "DOWN with LINCOLN!" It is folly for MR. PHILLIPS and his friends to say that they don't mean that. It is not they who raised the cry nor who pitch it. The cry was raised and meant that long before they joined in it. Their voices merely swell the chorus. They push their skiff out upon a stream which sets fierce and resistless toward the plunge, and they can not say that they mean to go up stream and do not mean to go over.

In this perilous hour we have all a right to demand compromise of each other. The radical Democrats talk of a union between Cleveland and Chicago. Yes—a union of the minnow and the whale—by absorption. The minnow may swell the bulk of the whale. Will the whale increase the minnow? Do these gentlemen seriously suppose that the handful of Abolitionists at Cleveland will dictate the terms of any union at Chicago? What is the party that will meet there? It is that party which, as such, has steadily denied the right of the Government to touch Slavery in any way. It is that party whose Senators and Representatives in Congress, with four exceptions and among the latter, refused to propose an emancipation Constitutional amendment to the country. There is no party whatever in the speeches, votes, resolutions, and journals of the Chicago party but of an unswerving allegiance to Slavery. How can any man believe that the Cleveland nominees would expect a union at Chicago; and yet, if there be none, how can any man of sense view the Cleveland movement but as a powerful screen in favor of the next man?

Under the circumstances in which this country is placed, even if the President were the blind, stupid, and blundering creature that MR. PHILLIPS indignantly calls him, and which we as indignantly deny, there are but two results possible in the canvass—his re-election, or his defeat by a Copperhead. In this situation, therefore, while they denounce MR. LINCOLN for pandering to the Slave power, seeking in that way to deprive him of the vote of radical Union men, MR. PHILLIPS and his friends are doing the work of JAMES M. MASON and of ROBERT TOOMBS.

If, indeed, they believe that MR. LINCOLN is so base a betrayer of liberty that their duty to God and man requires them to convince at the election of Copperhead, we have no reason to say. But they must not deceive themselves by supposing that they are not convincing. If they are willing, with MR. BROWNSON, to see FERNANDO WOOD or VALLANDIGHAM defeat MR. LINCOLN we are equally silent. Or if they think that Chicago intends to nominate FREMONT or any one else, upon a platform of negro voting, we certainly say nothing, but we as surely deplore the total want of sagacity which such a view evinces. They undoubtedly have the right which MR. PHILLIPS claims of agitating to make party progress possible. But he and they are certainly opposite if they agitate so as to make party progress impossible. Do they not know that the actual alternative in the election of MR. LINCOLN and his platform, or that of the candidate and platform at Chicago? If they do—and we can not understand how they could seem being—had they still agitate so as to aid and comfort Copperheads and divide Union men, MR. PHILLIPS and his friends will have hope to excuse themselves by saying that they repudiate expediency, nor be surprised if from the indignant hearts and lips of the great host who seek to maintain the Union and liberty but a few words come thundering back: "Heaven will not hold such guilt. less of the evils unnecessarily brought on this bleeding land."

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

GENERAL GRANT shows that he understands two cardinal points of all military operations, the most rapid movement and the most patient waiting. While he lies before Petersburg he keeps pushing his army, with the population of Richmond, consuming the supplies which our raids upon Lee's communications cause to reach him with difficulty. At the same time, and by the same means, he prevents Lee from destroying JOHNSTON or receiving aid from him, while he reorganizes and recruits his army from the immense work of the early campaign. Except in fact, besieging Richmond, and there is no reason to doubt that he says exactly what he thinks in declaring that aid goes well.

Meanwhile the stupendous campaign of General SHERMAN triumphantly proceeds. He has yet to cross the Chattahoochee River, which is a difficult feat in the face of the enemy. But that achieved, when JOHNSTON has him once more directly where he wants him, Atlanta can hardly long hold out, for it is by no means so susceptible of defense as many of the points which SHERMAN has already occupied; and once in Atlanta, the whole railroad system of the Southwest is in his hands. There is no reason to suppose that the army which has advanced steadily for more than seventy days straight into the heart of the enemy's country, and has successfully forced or carried every advantageous point, will be baffled by any thing but its own defection or the reinforcement of the enemy. One of these alternatives is impossible, the other General GRANT will make impracticable.

The raid of Missouri and in the Carolinas we hold our own, wisely refraining from offensive demonstrations while the main contest is in course of decision. At sea we have just had one of the great victories, and the most satisfactory events of the war, in the sinking of the English pirate, the Alabama. The raid into Maryland is primarily doubtless a thieving movement for LEE's larder, one of a kind to which we shall be always subject through the war, and which a proper militia organization would reduce in number and destroy in effectiveness. It is indeed an indication of the purpose and tenacity of the rebellion, and every where the rebels show resolution and endurance. But every where also, and steadily, the limits of the rebellion diminish. "Oh dear!" sighs some despairing soul, "we are fighting at Harper's Ferry three years ago, and we are still fighting there! Washington and Baltimore were threatened two years ago, one year ago, and again this year! Haiti we better give it all up, and confess that we can not do it?"

To this pigeon-hole there is one constant reply, "Where were we last year, and where are we now? Where were we at the battle of Bull Run three years ago, and where now? Where after Lyon's campaign, and where now?" The duration of the war proves quite as much the national purpose as the rebel pluck. If it would have been possible to reinforce Lee as much as he had proved our quality, it would certainly be the height of folly to do so when that quality has been shown. But if the war were to last for quarter before we had taken Paducah, and were not sure of St. Louis, it can hardly be right to say we are sure of Richmond and the other on Richmond. We grant the uncertainty of war. We would always impress it upon our readers. But in three years the uncertain event of war has passed from disaster to success; from the Ohio to the Chattahoochee; from the Potomac to Petersburg: has built a navy; has organized an army of a million of men; and strengthened the heart of the loyal mass of citizens; has stopped the rams in British ports; and has announced to all the world that United States are and intend to remain one of the great sovereign powers of the world.

THE LESSON OF THE RAID.

THE general consternation at the late irruption of the rebels into Maryland was not surprising, for the approach of marauding enemies upon a peaceful neighborhood can not fail to be a distressing and desolating event. A newspaper in New York can very easily laugh at a Maryland farmer driving off his cattle in a Maryland farmer, and many of them, can not very long resist a score of thousands of veteran troops, more or less demoralized, and led by men who in a sudden emergency consider how most surely to save themselves and their property, it is natural that under such an emergency may be avoided in future.

The mere fact of a raid is unimportant. Any company of mounted men may steal over the Potomac in the night, ride a certain number of miles, and return unmolested, just as a dozen armed men could ride through the State of New York. But the effect of the raid was to create a relieving public anxiety as to the consequences of a serious advance, and that is the perfect organization of the militia. Three years has taught us that we may need at any time a certain force on this side of the Potomac prepared for action; but it has not yet persuaded us to have it ready. There is Pennsylvania, the nearest area separated from Virginia and the mouth of the Shenandoah Valley merely by a narrow strip of Maryland, which the enemy appears to hear an agonizing call from Pennsylvania to come and keep the foe back.

Now we are perfectly willing that in this war as in every national affair, there is no Pennsylvania and no New York. It is the lives and property of citizens of the United States which the enemy burns and which we are summoned to defend. But the section of the country peculiarly exposed should be peculiarly prepared. If trouble menaces the State New York the city of New York should be able to deal with it in the first instance, and await patiently the summons of the State authorities to Chautauqua. The just cause of complaint is, that neither in Maryland nor Pennsylvania does there seem to be that military preparation which is especially incumbent upon their situation. Ohio recently put forty thousand men into camp in a very few days. It was nobly done, and every State should at this juncture be able to do the same thing. Every State should be virtually under arms until this rebellion is conquered. The arms-bearing population should be enrolled and drilled every week; and then upon occasion an army of a hundred thousand men could move to any point as promptly as a New York regiment. Such a state of preparation is itself a bulwark, and the enemy which knows it heeds it and stays at home.

If GOVERNORS CURTIN and BRADFORD will make an urgent an appeal to the citizens of Pennsylvania and Maryland to make all future raids impossible as they have lately made to repel this last foray, and will themselves spare no effort until the militia of each of those States is placed upon a reasonable footing, they will be saving the necessity of those calls for help at the last moment, which, by their terrified apprehension, increase the excitement they are designed to allay. Let us remember that because the enemy may retreat now they may not return; and let this year's experience do for us what last year's ought to have done. The authorities at Washington are often accused of not responding to the earnestness of the people. But popular earnestness is rarely most only in furnishing soldiers for the great armies in the field, but in that state of watchful preparation which makes the citizens of every country a home-guard hardly less efficient in its degree than those armies themselves.

When we are prepared to repel raids there will be very few raids to repel.

FROM MARIETTA.

A FRIEND and gallant soldier of the Kenesaw army sends us this pleasant letter:

NEAR MARIETTA, GEORGIA, June 27, 1864.

I inclose with this a few words in regard to a dear friend who was killed this morning in an unsuccessful assault on the enemy's works. It falls far short of doing justice to poor HERBERT's memory, who was almost an ideal soldier, so gallant, refined, and handsome was he.

I am by the numbers of Harper's Weekly we get here that you are not unmindful of us as the East, though of course the Army of the Potomac naturally and justly absorbs the greater amount of interest. Thus far our campaign has been fully successful, with a slight repulse to-day for the first time since the Chattanooga, fifty-three days ago. But that will make no difference either in the feeling or courage of the army or their confidence in ultimate success. (Here's memory, who was almost an ideal soldier, &c., duly occupied Marietta.) It is sad to see so many poor fellows so maimed and crippled, but nothing can be more touching than their uncomplaining cheerfulness under every adversity.

I wish those people in the North who have such queer notions of the exalted character of the Southern Chivalry could see the spirit of the South as they really are. I suppose that Georgia is the best of the Southern States, as it was furthest removed from the North, and contains more churches, school-houses, and pretty villages than elsewhere in the same space in the South. But the people whom we have chiefly seen and known are ignorant, superstitious, bigoted, and uncouth; at least those who are left behind. The women degraded and drink. The men are all of the same stamp. By-and-by we shall see a new population here, and then it will be a country to which we can point with pride.

I am glad the Baltimore Convention has done its work so well. We shall have to do ours equally well, and hope you will keep down any fire in the rear to thwart us in our operations. We feel any hostile sentiment in the North almost as quickly and as keenly as we do changes of temperature.

FRIENDLY. I see, has gone over to the enemy—a thing which kills him and does not help them.

"We shall march prospering, not with his presence."

[The President's wife and Major-General's commission to the wife of the brave Brigadier-General HASKELL, who lost his life while gallantly leading his men against the enemy's works at Kenesaw Mountain. Here follows a correspondent's sketch.—ED.]

Brigadier-General WILLIAM G. HASKELL was killed in an assault on the enemy's works near Kenesaw Mountain, Georgia, on the 22d of June, 1864.

A graduate of the Military Academy at West Point in 1853, he was promoted to a Captaincy in the Fifteenth Infantry early in 1861, and in November of that year was appointed Colonel of the Sixty-fifth Ohio Volunteers. On taking the command of the Second Brigade of the Cumberland he was assigned by General Buell to the command of a brigade, which position he held to the day of his death in almost uninterrupted service. Young, active, energetic, and of an almost feminine delicacy of manner, refined in speech and entertaining in its stories and lectures, he stamped his own high character upon the brigade which he may be said to have created, and which loved him almost as idolatry. It was during the while the army was engaged this brigade here, under his gallant leadership, to active and honorable service. At Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge in the last and hottest fight Tennessee Campaign; until then at Rocky Face, Resaca, and in all the daily skirmishes which followed, up to the hour of his heroic death, at the head of his devoted brigade, within a few feet of the enemy's breast-works, he was always the same brave, cheerful, modest, intelligent, faithful officer, and the man and hero true and friend. No danger ever intimidated him, no hardship ever discouraged, no disappointment ever soured him. He kept whistling his Highland airs in the first battle, he did not receive his reward till a few days before his last. To the many friends who congratulated the slow coming of what he had so amply earned, and who would sometimes express disappointment, if not a kind of disgust, at the delay, his answer was always the same—a rebuke to their impatience and a cheerful assurance that he believed for the reward which comes to every faithful performance of duty. Yet his shrewd bright eye when at last his merits were acknowledged by the official action of the President and of Congress, showed that he was not insensible to the honor. Several times wounded, he never sought or asked any indulgence, and the moment of his death was still suffering from injuries received at Resaca a month before. In him the army has lost a chivalrous soldier, the country a worthy son, and all who knew him a true friend. Mourned he will be by many, but by none more sincerely than by the little gallant surviving remnant of the noble brigade which he has so often and so skillfully led, and which will never let his memory die out of their hearts. His ringing voice they will no more hear, as often before, when he has led them to victory through the very jaws of death; but his rare powers of command, his kindliness at heart, and his soldier's death, will be the theme of many a reminiscence around the camp and in the bivouac, and never without new devotion to the great cause to which he gave all that man can give.

"KEARSARGE."

PROUD mountain! rear thy granite peak with its diadem of snow,
In the kindling sunbeams sparkling that round about thee glow,
A brighter lustre gilds thy brow, new honors dost thou bear;
Thy fame is borne across the seas, rings loudly through the air;
The ocean child that bears thy name brings laurels fresh and large
To twine around thy snowy brow, thou noble Mount Kearsarge!

Exulting in thy triumph, let "Great Monadnock" hear,
Let "Adams," "Webster," "Jefferson," call back the news of cheer;
And from the towering summits with joyous smiles are crowned,
Distant "Katahdin" shines afar and hears the glorious sound;
For Victory! ay, Victory! hath crowned thee on the sea,
And Yankee tars have blazoned bright the banner of the free!

In vain the English weapon, and in vain the English gun,
The ship they built, the ship they manned with the deep hate of old:
The timber dug it floated wide, naught but a craven lie
To cover England's coward guilt and England's infamy.

But vain their might and vain their wiles, thanks be all our sailors brave!
The pirate Alabama lies beneath the Atlantic's wave.

Boldly the sky thou facest, majestic Mount Kearsarge,
And round thy base are gathered close thy grim trees tall and large;
So standeth firm our country, and looks on God's free heaven,
And swears that ne'er again shall close the fetters they have riven;
While shouting glad, "Amen! Amen!" press round her sturdy sons,
And Echo brings an answering peal from thy namesake's thundering guns.

Look down, O mountain! on our land, though silent be thy voice,
We know that with us in our joy thou proudly dost rejoice.
Look forth upon thy forests green that toss their lofty crests;
Be thou our witness on the land, thy god-child on the waves;
And to our children ye shall tell, in the far distant day,
How England's pet marauder sank beneath the ocean spray.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

THERE is no news of importance from Grant's army. In the West, however, an important movement has been made by General THOMAS. Kenesaw Mountain and Marietta fell into our hands just one year after the capture of Vicksburg. A fleet steamboat officer's advance was nine miles south of Marietta. The evacuation of Kenesaw was due to two things first, the advance of our right toward the Chattahoochee, on the Sandtown Pike; and, secondly, the impregnability of the position of our knobs west of the Kenesaw, by which we were enabled to enfilade the rebel lines in the valley on our flank. The main position of which we hold the Kenesaw was made: Hindman on the east side of the mountain, and Cheatham on the west side, while the enemy's centre was attacked by NORTON's and DAVIS's divisions, supported by the Eighth by Geary and Butterfield, Schofield swinging around on the extreme right. Our loss was heavy, but not of any essential importance to our last week's assault on the mountain fallen, our movement on the right of the enemy's line. On July 3 the enemy abandoned the mountain defenses for another line on the Chattahoochee. General POPE was taken prisoner by General Stuart's cavalry, but kept close to the railroads. About a thousand of Stuart's men, Confederate rebel troopers, were captured in the pursuit.

That which has chiefly excited the public during the past week is General Early's invasion of Maryland, in favor which we give a map on page 471. Some of the conflicting reports which have prevailed we are unable to reject as being of no essential importance to our last week's report. The enemy were met in force on the 9th at Monocacy Bridge, by General WALLACE, commanding Pocatello, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge in the last and hottest Tennessee Campaign; until then at Rocky Face, Resaca, and in all the daily skirmishes which followed, up to the hour of his heroic death, at the head of his devoted brigade, within a few feet of the enemy's breast-works, he was always the same brave, cheerful, modest, intelligent, faithful officer, and the man and hero true and friend. No danger ever intimidated him, no hardship ever discouraged, no disappointment ever soured him. He kept whistling his Highland airs in the first battle, he did not receive his reward till a few days before his last. To the many friends who congratulated the slow coming of what he had so amply earned, and who would sometimes express disappointment, if not a kind of disgust, at the delay, his answer was always the same—a rebuke to their impatience and a cheerful assurance that he believed for the reward which comes to every faithful performance of duty. Yet his shrewd bright eye when at last his merits were acknowledged by the official action of the President and of Congress, showed that he was not insensible to the honor. Several times wounded, he never sought or asked any indulgence, and the moment of his death was still suffering from injuries received at Resaca a month before. In him the army has lost a chivalrous soldier, the country a worthy son, and all who knew him a true friend. Mourned he will be by many, but by none more sincerely than by the little gallant surviving remnant of the noble brigade which he has so often and so skillfully led, and which will never let his memory die out of their hearts. His ringing voice they will no more hear, as often before, when he has led them to victory through the very jaws of death; but his rare powers of command, his kindliness at heart, and his soldier's death, will be the theme of many a reminiscence around the camp and in the bivouac, and never without new devotion to the great cause to which he gave all that man can give.

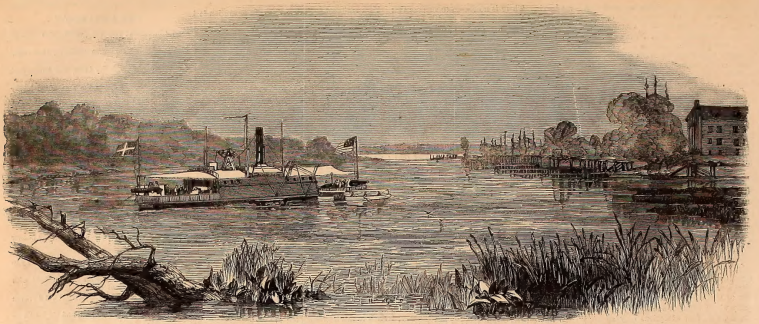
Major-General Wallace, commanding Pocatello, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge in the last and hottest Tennessee Campaign; until then at Rocky Face, Resaca, and in all the daily skirmishes which followed, up to the hour of his heroic death, at the head of his devoted brigade, within a few feet of the enemy's breast-works, he was always the same brave, cheerful, modest, intelligent, faithful officer, and the man and hero true and friend. No danger ever intimidated him, no hardship ever discouraged, no disappointment ever soured him. He kept whistling his Highland airs in the first battle, he did not receive his reward till a few days before his last. To the many friends who congratulated the slow coming of what he had so amply earned, and who would sometimes express disappointment, if not a kind of disgust, at the delay, his answer was always the same—a rebuke to their impatience and a cheerful assurance that he believed for the reward which comes to every faithful performance of duty. Yet his shrewd bright eye when at last his merits were acknowledged by the official action of the President and of Congress, showed that he was not insensible to the honor. Several times wounded, he never sought or asked any indulgence, and the moment of his death was still suffering from injuries received at Resaca a month before. In him the army has lost a chivalrous soldier, the country a worthy son, and all who knew him a true friend. Mourned he will be by many, but by none more sincerely than by the little gallant surviving remnant of the noble brigade which he has so often and so skillfully led, and which will never let his memory die out of their hearts. His ringing voice they will no more hear, as often before, when he has led them to victory through the very jaws of death; but his rare powers of command, his kindliness at heart, and his soldier's death, will be the theme of many a reminiscence around the camp and in the bivouac, and never without new devotion to the great cause to which he gave all that man can give.

Major-General J. J. Reynolds, who for some time past has been in command of the defenses of New Orleans, will take the field immediately as commander of the Nineteenth corps of the Department of the Gulf. The chief charge of the defenses before General Reynolds, will resume his old position.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

THE Conference held its last sitting June 28. No result was obtained. The neutral Powers have agreed that the line of the Schlei offers a good frontier, and that this would be a concession to Germany. Denmark consents to this, but will not cede Alsen and Duppel. The war is to be continued, and the Island of Alsen has been taken by the Prussians. A naval engagement was expected to take place soon off Heligoland.



VIEW ON THE APPOMATTOX, BELOW PORT WALTHALL.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

JONES'S NECK, FROM GENERAL FOSTER'S HEAD-QUARTERS, NEAR MALVERN HILL, ON THE JAMES.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

DIVINE SERVICE AT GENERAL BALDY SMITH'S HEAD-QUARTERS, IN FRONT OF PETERSBURG, JULY 3, 1864.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GENERAL MEADE AND HIS STAFF.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN.

MR. BRADY, of Washington, furnishes two photographs which enable us to present our readers with the illustrations on this page, representing Generals MEADE and BURNSIDE, with their Staffs.

Several illustrations are given on pages 468, 472, and 473, which relate to Petersburg and its surroundings. The large double-page cut is a panoramic view of the country as well as of the military situation around Petersburg. The view is that disclosed from WEITZEL'S Look-out and Signal Tower, at Bermuda Hundred, looking southward—including in that direction about ten miles, thus taking in Petersburg, on the extreme right. From Petersburg the Appomattox runs from right to left, emptying into the James. City Point is not included in the view; but the pontoon-bridge is disclosed by which the army communicates with Bermuda Hundred. Where Point of Rocks juts out into the river is General BUTLER'S head-quarters. The landing is specially designated in the large cut; at the dock is the Greyhound, the flag-ship of that officer, and the Sylvia Stow. This portion of the sketch is enlarged in the cut above, entitled the PONTOON-BRIDGE AT THE POINT OF ROCKS, ON THE APPOMATTOX. Another portion of the large cut is also enlarged, giving a view of the rebel Fort Clifton, on the Appomattox, showing at the same time a Federal battery in the fore-ground. At the left of Fort Clifton, directly in front of Clifton House, the rebels have a Water-Battery; they have also sunk obstructions in the river to prevent Federal boats from ascending to Petersburg. Both the battery and the obstructions are disclosed in the cut.

A sketch on page 468 gives a view on the Appomattox at Port Walthal, which is the nearest point approached by gun-boats. The gun-boat shown in the sketch is the Commodore Perry, Captain A. P. FOSTER. This sketch is also connected with the double-page cut. A few turns of her wheel would bring the gun-boat under the guns of Fort Clifton. There are two other sketches on the same page. One of these gives a view of Jones's Neck, on the James, opposite which General FOSTER has an intrenched position, between Aiken's Landing and Four-Mile Creek. A pontoon bridge crosses at this point. General FOSTER'S flank is protected by double-ended gun-boats. The other sketch represents a service held at General SMITH'S head-quarters, July 3, attended by Generals SMITH, NEIL, BURNHAM, and MARTINDALE.

GENERAL BURNSIDE AND HIS STAFF.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

THE LOVE-CHEAT.

She loved me, she said, and she swore it:
She swore it a thousand times:
She treasured my letters like jewels;
She learned and repeated my rhymes.

And numberless tokens she gave me;
Her kisses were many and sweet;
And I thought her an angel from heaven
While she was but a womanly cheat.

She robbed me of rest and of comfort,
And gave me bright hopes in return;
And now, by the fireside lonely,
Her letters I mallingly burn.

For lord are the marriage-bells pealing;
The priest, too, is blessing the bride;
And she leans on the arm of another,
Who once was my love and my pride.

Ah, well! let her live and be married:
Her letters are burnt, and I vow
'Tis better be rid of such tokens,
And keep the heart healthy and free.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

BEHIND THE MADELEINE.

Behind the church of the Madeleine, Rataplan,—drummer of the Imperial Guard, ex-landlord of the Hôtel Rataplan, hard by Leicester Square, London—kept a tavern for the accommodation of English visitors to the only city in the world worth living in.

Rataplan was old, his eye was glassy, his hand tremulous, his voice husky, and his frame feeble, but he was as fat as ever. His adiposity was pendulous and flabby now, not firm and juicy, but it was fat, nevertheless, and, at his age, was something to be thankful for.

Rataplan had been given to vociferate. It fatigued him too much, he said. It was much if the visitors to his hostelry could obtain a bifteck aux pommes, or even a modeste slice from the gigot of the joint. Rataplan's long residence in Albion had not disabused his mind of the impression that all English people liked their meat underdone, raw; and whenever an English groom (say) or a workman employed at some factory in Paris ordered a bifteck aux pommes to be cooked in the English fashion, Rataplan would answer, "I know, ver well, ver fash-ee-yas? Well bleeding, bien sanguant, bein?"

Nor had the good man's protracted sojourn in her perfidious country enabled him to attain anything approaching a copious, or even fluent, acquaintance with its language. A stock of idiomatic expressions he had indeed picked up, which would have seemed to argue some familiarity with our vernacular, but he still, to all intents and purposes, spoke English execrably.

He wore the attire of a petty burgeois now, in lieu of his old and unvarying culinary costume. It did not improve his personal appearance much. He had looked well, if not better, in his white jacket, apron, and cap, decidedly in hue as those habiliments habitually were, than in a shabby snuff-colored surtout with a cotton velvet collar, a dingy nankeen waistcoat, striped trowsers much too short for him, and a cloth cap with a peak in it.

Affairs had not gone prosperously with him at the Hôtel Rataplan. He had failed to make any thing like a competency, much less a fortune, out of that establishment. In the first place, Mademoiselle Adèle, his daughter, had made a misalliance: having, in defiance of her father's commands, not only encouraged the addresses of a dissolute fiddler at the French Plays, but actually on the very day came morning and allied herself in marriage to that objectionable person. It was a terrible blow for Rataplan. Nevertheless, he was wont to say, "if they had gone to the Bavarian chapel in Warwick Street! But Mademoiselle must needs promulgate herself at the church of I know not what sect of the Anglican dissidence in the Soho. She had abjured, forsooth, the errors of the Romish communion! Well, the men with white neckcloths and little paper books had been, in fact, pursuing her for months. She became what you call a convert. She was the victim of their machinations sourdes. Patience de ma sainte mère! Sometimes I think that in France, my daughter would have been compelled to address to me three solemn citations—trois sommations respectueuses—before she would have dared to commit the fatal act. But she has acknowledged her act of disobedience most fully, and now this vagabond of a fiddler beats my Adèle. Ma parole d'honneur, c'est à faire blanchir les cheveux. It is enough to make one's hair turn white."

It would have taken an extreme degree of agony to turn Papa Rataplan's hair white. He had none to turn, he was quite bald.

Then Mr. Peter Thomas died, and Rataplan had to bury her. Then his customers fell off, and he lost the most profitable of his guests, the better-tempered counters, who suddenly disappeared. Then Rataplan got into trouble with the police for winking at the contraband amusement of a select society of cooks in the employ of divers noblemen, gentlemen, and hotel-keepers in the British metropolis, who were accustomed to dine at the Hôtel Rataplan, and afterward to play kings-et- a all night. He was threatened with the loss of his license. The threat did not do him much harm, for the butcher sued him, and then the distiller put an execution into the premises, and finally there came collapse, and Rataplan passed through the Bankruptcy Court.

He bore his downfall with becoming resignation. He carefully returned as bad all the debts owing to him by his countrymen, and by this stroke of policy not only obviated the possibility of their being pressed for payment, but gained a few of them, through personal gratitude, to pay him, after he had undergone the ordeal of white washing, some few pounds in the way of loans. "It will enable me to cultivate my cabbages," he remarked, philosophically.

Returning to his native country, a gleam of good fortune shot unexpectedly across his path. He met with a person whom he had not seen for ten years, Frédéric Chaillot, Esquire, lieutenant, ex-body-servant to Francis Blunt, Esquire, who had always been of an active and sparkling turn of mind, and had gone into business at Chaillot as a manufacturer of paper-hangings, and was doing according to his own account a pretty well. He was anxious to realize a fortune, he said; not for himself, but he had some one to leave it to. But where was that some one? To his misery and despair he could not tell. What had become of the countess and of her child? They had disappeared, no one would say which way. He kept up a correspondence with Becky Sharp for some years, but Becky had never been able to obtain a scintilla of information relating to Lily or her mother. The countess seemed to have vanished from the stage, or rather from the ring. In the chronicles of the saw-dust she was no longer known, even by her horse-riding name.

Jean Baptiste Constant commiserated the deserved state of mind of his friend Rataplan. The bankrupt hotel-keeper said he had had, by this time, quite enough of England, and that he only desired to remain in London long enough, if possible, at the head of an invading army of his countrymen. "How I would sack Leycesterre square, and give up the Cherokee to the principale!" he was wont to murmur between his set teeth, grinding them meanwhile. "Yes; and that street, moreover, the Beaufort-buildings. Ah! not one of the functionaries of that tribunal which we proud, free, and independent people, the lowest hussier, but should passer par les armes —all, all, be put to the sword." The vindictiveness of Rataplan was positively appalling.

So Jean Baptiste Constant, after meditating for a time as to how the old man's knowledge of a country he was not likely to revisit, as he could best be utilized, determined to set him up in business again in a little twentieth-rate cafe' on the Boulevard, not far from the church of the Madeleine. The street was new; the Rouen Railway Station, the Gare Saint Lazare, was minus in the Rue d'Amsterdam has so revolutionized this part of Paris, was not yet dreamed of; the rent was small, and the premises of very reasonable. Rataplan was once more gratified by becoming a landlord. In the evening of life it was again his pleasure to be lord and commandant. Still were the conditions imposed upon him by his friend, patron, and benefactor, Jean Baptiste of Rue Cocky Monmartre, most severe.

"Rataplan, mon bon," said the ex-valet to the ex-landlord, "I know you intend long enough to set up a little Paris in the midst of London. That was to please yourself. You shall, unless I am much mistaken, do so. Now, if you have no objection, you shall please me. I want you to set up a little London in the midst of Paris."

"Never, never!" Rataplan would at first and vehemently protest. "Jamais en France! Je glais ne regrette. No, no, I hundred times no! Between Rataplan and Albion, the three perverted and pitiful years of exile have left a hatred and scorn, which blood, and blood alone, can cumulate."

"Very well," the valet would gravely reply. "You shall sell bitrhs bien saignants. That is blood, it is not? One must accomplish his destiny, my Rataplan, and you were born to be a cook."

To the end Rataplan submitted, cheerfully enough, to the accomplishment of his destiny, and did as he was told most loyally. He entered into the first project, but at last modified the plans of J. B. Constant. They were worthy of that astute and experienced operator. The dingy little Cafe-Restaurant Rataplan, in the Rue Cuit-au-Four, that miserable den where you could procure nothing but tough flaps of beef, fried cutlets, bean soup, and gelatinous coffee, corrosive absinthe, questionable cognac, and Chinese gin, was to be a model establishment, a thought of christening his establishment "Le Clarendon," or "Le Mirvet," or "Le Cavendish," or "Le Malakoff Hotel," but, on reflection, it was admitted that there were difficulties in the way of the proposed nomenclature, by reason of the nearly all those names. But every Frenchman has heard of Miller Chesterfield, and among the natives the Café Restaurant Rataplan would have attained considerable notoriety; while to the especial class of sojourners in Paris whom Constant hoped to secure as patrons, the name Chesterfield had not only an English but a sporting sound, and consequently soon became very popular.

The patrons he had pitched upon were a curious race. In every great city much frequented by foreigners there are two under-currents of a town life: first, the retainers of the high and mighty strangers who are on their travels; and next, the shiftless and out-of-elbows creatures, who, having once come abroad, are prevented by poverty from getting home again. Sometimes they contrive, after years of borrowing and begging, to raise sufficient funds to return to the country which has no longer any need of them; but in many instances they never do get home, and, shuffling through a shabby and disreputable life on the fee'ble ends a craving for bad brandy has left them, die at last, and are buried in the Potter's Field. Such people every continental metropolis numbers by hundreds or by thousands. Generally they belong to the British Nation. We do not consider ourselves to be foreigners any where; so my countrymen will understand what I mean in saying that foreigners are usually very little difficulty in forgathering, intermingling with, and assimilating themselves to other foreigners. The English native rarely if ever does. He is, in the end, insular, carries something about him that is purely, peculiarly, and—to others but his own—incomprehensively, English wherever he goes, and leaves at last his coffin to be covered with a phantom Union Jack. Do you know Jack Mosley—they say the "ley" is an interpolation between where an "e" is, and an "s" should be in his surname—the tall, handsome Israelite, whom his friends call the Wandering Jew, and who has been traveling and trading in diamonds from the Antipodes to the Straits of Malacca any time these twenty years? Well, Jack told me he was coming the other day, from the Wrahe diggings in California overland to Florence in the State of Missouri. It was somewhere in the Rocky Mountains that he was taken at night, and he was huddled up in a stage-coach, asleep, and dreaming of bears, wolves, and wild Indians. Suddenly the coach turned down, but fortunately close to a little tavern. Jack Mosley rubbed his eyes, and thought he was still dreaming, when, shuffling forward, himself in front of the precise model of an English inn-yard, he saw the sign of the Green Man and Still, surmounted in front; there were the red and white blinds to the windows; there was the bar, with its big show-case of cut, its pork pies, its jars of gayly-painted kegs of cordials, and its well-polished beer-engine. There was the little parlor, with its green-curtained door, its hanging pittcons, its rack of churchwarden pipes, and its colored prints of fights for the championship, among which the late Sylvain Sykes's top-boots, pitfably conversing with his trainer, who was likewise his groom, could be distinguished in drab gaiters. There was a grinning hostler; there was a stout pot-boy; there was a spruce waitress; there was apparently a one-eyed bulldog on the premises. On the coffee-room blinds there flourished the approved golden legends of "Hops and malt make the brave always sing, sirs that were to be dressed, neat wines and soda-water; but, wonder of wonders! what do you think of the sign? Not the "George and Washington," not "The Jefferson," not the "Big Negro," not the "Bull and Bear," not even the "Lucky Placer," but "The Osbaldistone Arms." The landlord was an American born, and his grandfather had been a groom in the Osbaldistone family in England. He subscribed to Bell's Life and the local Yorkshire papers regularly, and his house looked as though some magician had suddenly caught it up from the English north country and dropped it down in the middle of the Rocky Mountains.

Rataplan, incited by J. B. Constant, did his best to Anglicize the Cafe-Restaurant Chesterfield. A little English sprang up in the Rue Cuit-au-Four, looking as strange there as the English colony established at the mouth of the Elbe. The partners imported the double and biting Gloucester, the luscious Cheshire, the voluminous cake of Stilton, English ale and English porter were always on draught, and a joint, of as near an approach to English beef as could be procured, was set at the butcher's in the neighboring Rue St. Lazare, was always in carbuncles when exposed under gas-lamps, even to the intense amazement of the French customers, who, sometimes trying them, frequently managed to drink a layer of meat on the floor, and, when they burned their mouths with the fiery English mustard, howled dismally. Now and then Rataplan (Papa) nor did the cruel which Rataplan had learned in London, of frying three quarts into one gallon, forsake him now.

M. Jean Baptiste Constant moved about the establishment in his usual quiet manner as manager and the nominal landlord, but in which the wary ex-body servant of Mr. Francis Blunt had taken care to secure a proportionate interest in his usual discreet and demure, not to say stealthy, manner. Every knife, fork, and napkin in the place was his; yet you would not have thought, to look at him, that he would have interfered in the slightest degree with Rataplan's mission. He rarely interfered with Rataplan's arrangements. He allowed him undisputed control in the kitchen. He permitted him to purchase his two waiters, and to overcharge the guests as much as ever he liked. He allowed him a fair share in the profits which he had, in a short space of time, grown to be considerable; but he was nevertheless but unconsciously the master over the Café Restaurant Chesterfield. He liked to sway this secret power, to have this occult veto, to be behind the scenes, and pull the wires, and make the puppets dance. It suited his pensive, bilious, cat-like, contemplative nature. The gambling was the training for him. He liked it, and the pupils of his eyes contracted in the noonday glare. He had been accustomed to it in his youth. He could bask; but he preferred to bask in the shade, and down in a cellar.

He liked to breakfast at the Chesterfield sometimes, just to see how things were going on: paying for his meal, like a man, at the counter. The waiters did not know exactly what to make of them. They were both Swiss, who had been abroad, and picked up much of the English language in the Haymarket cafés and Leicester Square hotels. One of them, Jules, imagined him to be a kind of pensioner or hanger-on of the establishment, boarded from time to time, through charity, by the patron Rataplan. The other, Alphonse, had a somewhat shrewder notion of his standing in the house. "I will wager," Alphonse would say to his intimates, "that this monsieur is le bailleur de fonds—the capitalist—the finder of money to the Café Restaurant Chesterfield." "But how can he be a capitalist?" the dull-witted Jules would expostulate. "He never scolds us. He never calls us 'ingaud,' or 'cochon.' Is that like a bailleur de fonds?" — "Bah, you are stupid!" Alphonse would retort. "Jules, thou hast an excellent heart, but thou hast a skull of wood, filled with sauce a la tartare in place of brains. It is always the species always wear their crowns? Was the Emperor always crossing the Alps on a white horse, attacking the front of the Austrian lines? Why I tell, thee, gnoccata, that still waters run deep, that I can put dirt in the most dangerous, and that the great art of capitalists consists in never appearing to have any money."

My uncle from Hale was a capitalist. In the commerce of grains he acquired millions; yet to look at him thou wouldst not have thought that he had possessed the sous. He sends to rob one against another. What, yet another game at dominoes? Come, then, phenomenon of temerity, and I will play thee for the third chopine."

On a particular morning which it is desirable to fix in the reader's mind, Jean Baptiste Constant was breakfasting at the Café Restaurant Chesterfield, and he had company. Three sat down to breakfast with him. He had first invited the patron Rataplan to be a partaker of the meal, and the third guest was a florid, well-looking gentleman enough, with very fine black whiskers, now slightly inclining to gray, and who was very gorgeously attired in a blue frock-coat, a tumbled cravat, and a cap with a tassel of gold bullion. This gentleman spoke most European languages with equal fluency, and with equal incorrectness. He was a traveling courier by profession, and his name was Prunz Simm.

The three had supplied themselves with copious meal of oysters, omelet, and cold roast beef, washed down by English pale ale and stout (for foreigners in general, and England, be it ever so short a time, surmount the predilection they acquire for brown beer and Allsort) and some of Rataplan's best red wine. They were now at the stage of coffee, brandy, and cigars, and were unmistakably enjoying themselves.

"I did not like de goffees zo much as de Jogolates, Mr. Stimm observed, between whiffs of his very powerful cigar; "dey are goodes as pih graziosa, and besser vor the stomjacks; but de cigares is not good nor de jogoulets nor de wine, and de gombany tastes like vinegar."

"You are always talking of your stomach, friend Courier," said Constant gayly. "I wish you would talk to me about that little girl you met, ver so many years ago, on board the Boulogne steamer, when you were traveling with your general."

"Vat vor it is goot to talk about de liddle girls?" quietly replied Simm, with a sigh. "We shall not none of us never see her again. She gomes like de shadow of a liddle bird, and she go as de wind, like de rin ring of dobbacco-smoke dat go up do de ceiling and vade avay nobody can say vere she is gone."

"And yet all of us would give thousands, millions—at least much that is valuable to us," Constant replied; "to meet with her again. Child she must be grown into a woman by this time."

"And a beautiful ones too," interposed the courier, "for she was the simplest, most sylphide mins ever met dat light itself upon."

"Light itself upon indeed, Simm!" He snapped his fingers as he spoke. "I have no more children, and care little to hear about them. Yet there was something by the old woman. The tigress! the fury! the abandoned creature, lost to all sense of morality, honor, decency, virtue!"

"She owes you money, Papa Rataplan." This was from Constant.

"Money be converged sterling. She never paid her bill the last time she descended at the Hôtel Rataplan. It is a flagrant fraud on me. It is an infamy. She defrauded, swindled me out of my dues. She had the finest vins of Champagne, and the best of Burgundies generally. She owes me even for the cigarettes she smoked, the depraved and epicurean bacchante! Her flight was premeditated. She knew my daughter not of perfidy to which, in a perfidious and shameless world, the honorable Rataplan had to submit. But I will be avenged. I will demand justice. Yet shall the tribunals be seized of the details of this most scandalous and infamous affair. I desire to re-enter into my funds. I demand the provisional arrestation, the prise de corps, against the person of sans Ie nom. Ah! Rataplan struck the table with his clenched fist, and filled himself another goblet.

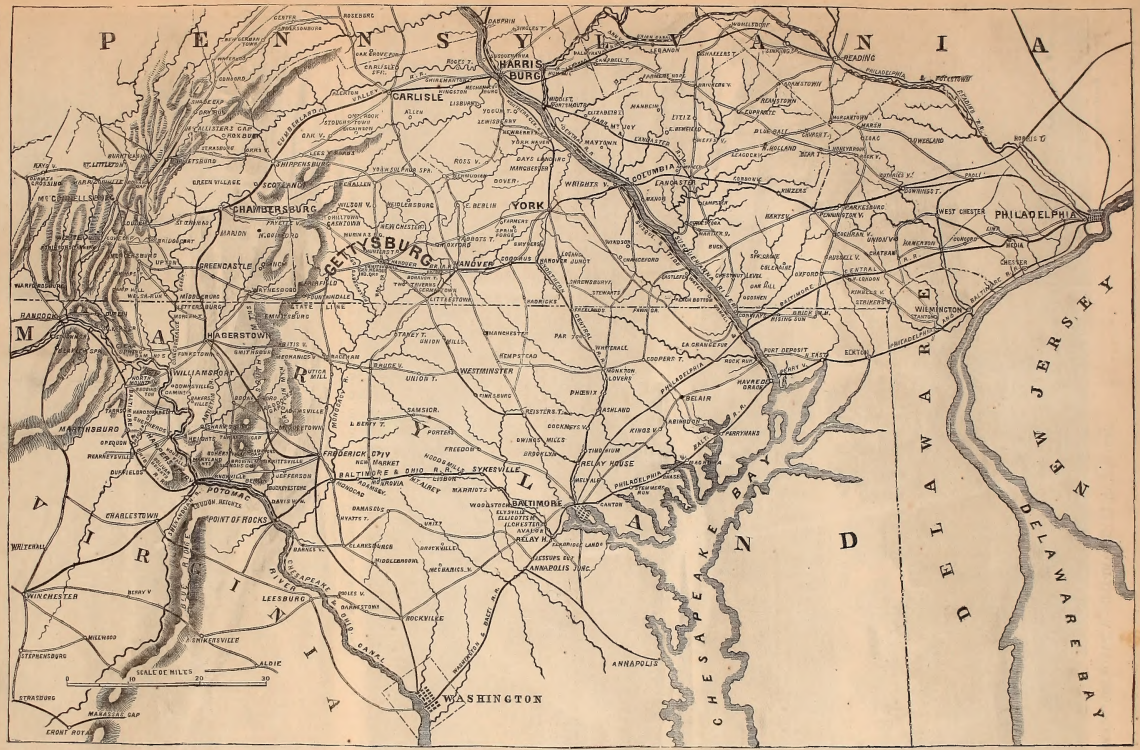
"Better than taking la gouttc too early, Papa Rataplan," Constant said, discreetly withdrawing the decanter of Anglaise from the excited landlord's reach. "Suppose we finish these libations and take a walk."

"I all my hearts," Mr. Stimm acquiesced, rising. "My heads is stronges enough for much more gombany than dat. Vere shall we to open more gombany, and Franz Stimms can then have the pleasure of reciprocifying dis most gharming bonpatron Rataplan. Vere shall we to go?" he said, as he can talk about de liddle gals. Blezz her liddle heart!"

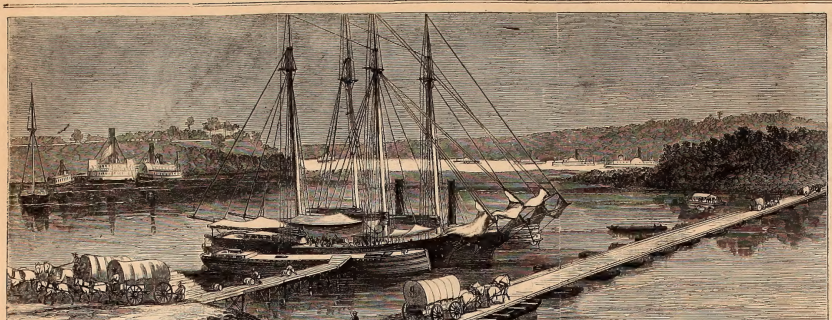
But the establishment," pleaded Rataplan, nervously.

"The establishment," said Constant, easily, "can be left to the waiters and the dame du comptoir for-an hour or two. The Café Restaurant Chesterfield will run away. Allons, messieurs, I am at your service."

"Gom and dalk about de liddle gals," repeated the courier.

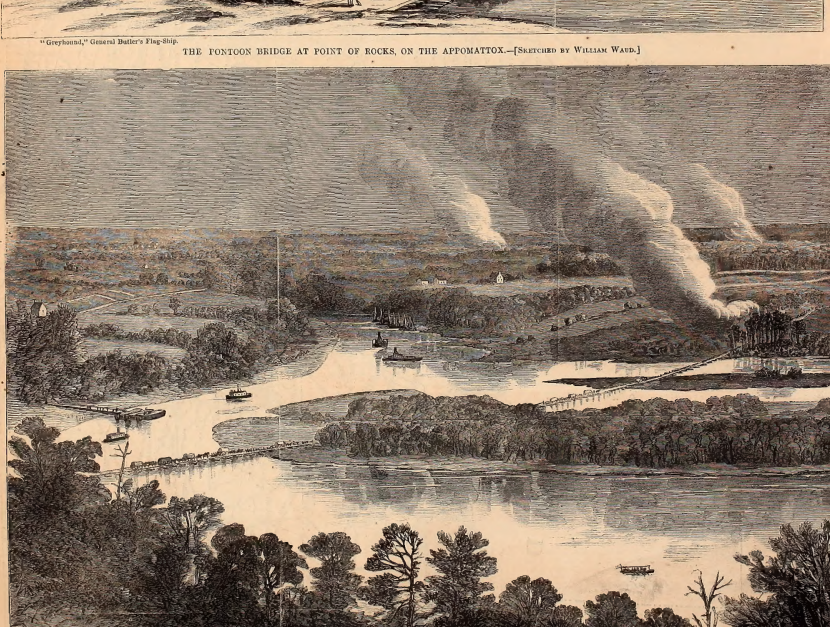


MAP ILLUSTRATING THE REBEL INVASION IN MARYLAND.—[SEE PAGE 467.]



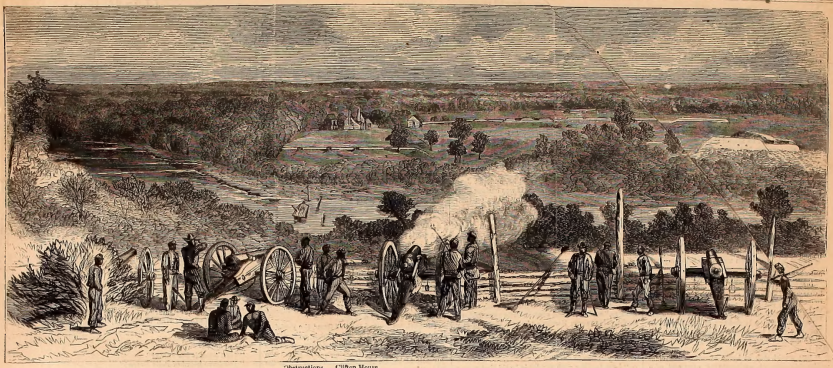
"Greyhound," General Butler's Flag-Ship.

THE PONTOON BRIDGE AT POINT OF ROCKS, ON THE APPOMATTOX.—[SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

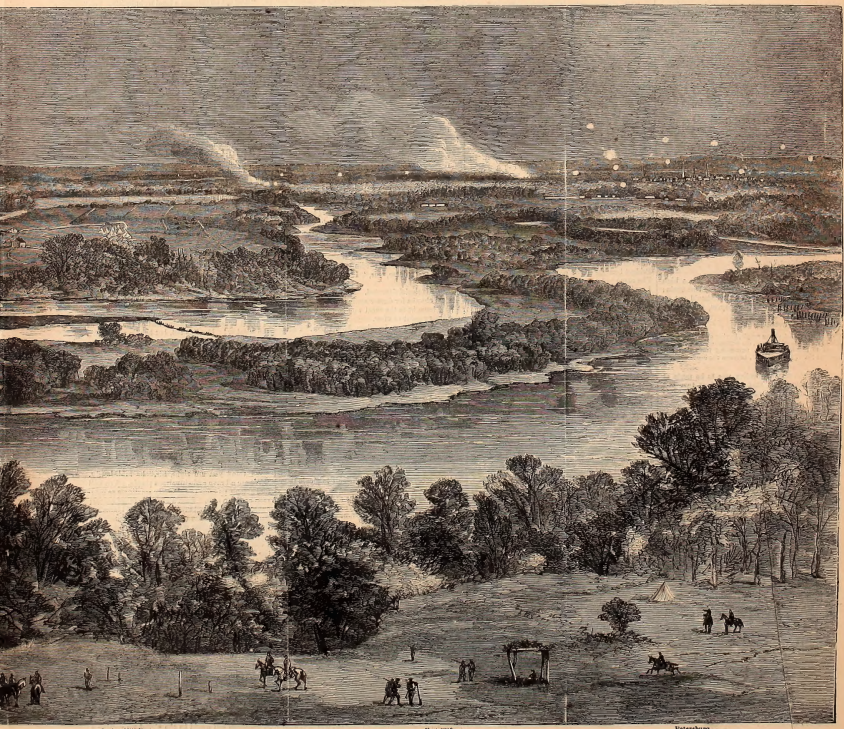


Point of Rocks Landing.

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—A PANORAMIC VIEW OF THE SITU



THE REBEL FORT CLIFTON AND OUR BATTERIES, ON THE APPOMATTOX.—[Sketched by William Waud.]



ATION AROUND PETERSBURG.—Sketched by William Waud.—[See Page 469.]

OUR BOARDER.

"JAMES, I think we ought to do something." Thus my wife to me at the breakfast-table one morning in May, a week after we had moved into our new quarters in a little house with a big rent. You see it was in a pleasant neighborhood, this house, and in cities you always have to pay rent on your neighborhood.

"Certainly, Susan. Do something? By all means. What let's do?"

"Every thing is so high now."

"I realize the fact, my dear—I do indeed."

"We shouldn't be ashamed to practice economy in any way we can in these war times."

"I'm not ashamed, I'm sure. I wish understood the science better, that's all."

"What do you say to taking a boarder?"

"Well, now, my dear, I don't think it right to take in people. Do as you will, however."

"I mean you. You know what I mean. Do be serious. There's that chamber up stairs that is unfurnished. Why can't get some one to occupy it?"

"Sure enough, so I can."

"Some pleasant person, you know, who would be one of us, and a person would you think a pleasant one, my—"

"Well, a good-looking and well-bred young man, with plenty of money and no bad habits—I should want him to be willing to pay a little. I don't and not to be too particular about the terms. We would come in early at night, and the boy would have a latch-key; or, what is better, have he might be out of quiet, somewhat habits—"

"Young men with plenty of money usually are," said I.

"I will would stay at home evenings. A companionable, genteel, good-natured, easy sort of a young man, who might become attached to us."

"Or what do you say to a pretty young woman with black eyes and curls, who would make home cheerful and attractive, as only a lovely and charming woman can?"

"I won't have any young women about me, Mr. Dobb. Women are a nuisance in a house as men are; they are always finding fault about something or other; you never can suit them."

"Just what I've often told you, wife."

"Now that's meant for me. I think that men are harder to suit than women usually. I know I am, no matter what you say."

"Then let's not have a man, dear, if you can't suit him."

"Oh, how provoking you are! I never can talk with you, you always catch a body up so. But I do think we ought to have a boarder to occupy the unfurnished room; it's no use to us."

"If I was looking for board I should not be happy if any room was not furnished."

"Why, of course we would furnish it."

"And that would be an expense. I don't think people begin to live when they want to practice economy, do they?"

"Yes, but—"

"In war time especially."

"Yes, I know, but—"

"And every thing is so high—particularly carpets."

"James, if you treat me in this way I will drop the whole subject."

"Oh, I'm willing to drop it."

My wife ate her breakfast after that in a high state of pout. But at dinner she attacked me again; and it was finally arranged that I should put an advertisement in one of the papers, soliciting a boarder.

This is the advertisement:

BOARDING.—A young couple, having a pleasant home to a gentlemanly boarder, are willing to take a suitable person to board, having an unoccupied front chamber. Apply at No. 1— Street, between the hours of 9 and 10 P.M.

The reason why application was to be made at the hour named was that we dined at two, and hence I was sure to be at home to see the applying party.

I am an artist, and human nature is my theme. I thought that the genteel enterprise would afford me an opportunity of studying my fellow-creatures in a condition where I had never yet seen any of them. We had five applicants during the next four days. It struck me as a curious illustration of the mysterious law which govern human movements that I there should be an applicant each day, and only one.

I suppose you are aware that artists are in the habit of making "studies from nature." I made a few in the course of the four days following, which you can not see by citing at my studio; but you can see them here.

The advertisement appeared in Tuesday morning's paper. We ate punctual in dining at two, and at two P.M. we had a juicy round of roast beef when the door-bell rang.

"There's your boarder, wife," said I.

"My boarder?"

"Oh, well, ourboarder; any thing for peace."

The applicant was a young gentleman of modest demeanor, who marked that he had observed my proposition to entertain a guest [a guest; yes; very well put, Mr. Applicant], and being in pursuit of accommodations such as I had described, he had called to see.

"Would you like to see the room?" said I.

Well, the rm was of comparatively small moment to him he had no doubt that he should be suited with it room; he cared more for the character of the folly. He was in the habit of spending his evenings at home.

Ah, thoug I, here's the moral young man of good habits at wife wants.

"Have a library?"

"I have and a very nice one I think it is."

"I would like to see it."

I showedhim the library. He ran his eye over it, and took a book.

"This a novel, I see."

"Yes; that is Charles Reade's last—Very Hard Cash.' An excellent book."

He put it back, wrong side up, and took down another.

"Another novel. 'The Virginians.'"

Ah, you'll find several of Thackeray's works. They are of red volumes on the top shelf comprises Thackeray's humorous works. Do you like him?"

"Not particularly," said his book. I never perus novels. They are pernicious."

He put that back wrong side up, and took down a little volume in green and gold.

"Perhaps you like poems better," said I. "That is Jean Ingelow's book. This," I continued, touching the books as I named them, "is Bryant's last; this is Longfellow's; Here is 'Pelayo,' a beautiful new epic by a Mr. Close. Beach; and here are several of the standard poets."

"I seldom read poetry," said he, and put Jean Ingelow back wrong side up, "it would be more what a facility he had for standing my books on their heads. It made me nervous to look at him.

"Have you any theology on hand?" he asked.

"Oh yes. Here is Sawyer's Translation of the New Testament."

"A sacrilegious innovator," he murmured.

"And here is Farrar's 'Critical History of Free Thought,' and that work of his on the doctrines theological dissertations, here are several works by my friend Eleazar Lord, on 'Plenary Inspiration' and kindred matters." I thought I began to perceive the young man's drift.

"These all appear to be works for modern pretenders," said he, "and are from little new to, no doubt. Have you Baxter's 'Saint's Rest,' or any works of that class?"

"Why, no; my library includes few theological works except by modern writers. I have a Bible. Will you like to see that?"

"I am familiar with the Bible," said that young man in a crushing tone. "What are your religious beliefs?"

"We attend service at an Episcopalian church."

"The next thing to Papacy in my opinion."

That young man and I were not to get between his knees, and surveyed me anxiously.

"Do you have regular family prayer?" said he

"No, Sir."

He dropped his hat on the floor. When he picked it up he put it on his head and proceeded to take hold of the door-knob. Fortified by that grasp, he stood there and read me a tedious lecture on the necessity of family prayer in a household, and conjured me to release myself from the semi-Papistic mummery of Episcopalianism. After which he became a tract, which he declined my wife to read. It was entitled, "Come to Jesus;" and as my wife is a member of the Episcopal society yourstanding, it struck me as a superfluous if not a saucy act in that young man, who must have been ten years her junior. I thought it best not to ask that my wife neglected to read the tract.

I closed the door on that young man at last had a sigh of relief. Good gracious! what had we such a bore in my house on any terms!

"What a fool to lose such an excellent young man!" said my wife.

A consoling remark I thought that. But it did not reconcile me to my cold dinner, which I ate in mute rebellion.

The next day, punctual to the moment when I was busily carving, the door-bell rang again, and Bridget brought in the card of Mr. Thomas Allen. The name had a familiar look, but for the life of me I could not tell where I had seen it before.

Mr. Thomas Allen was a young gentleman in a striped coat and trousers, a full hat of careless gloss. His shirt-front was adorned with a glittering pin, and he wore a massive watch-chain. As he entered the room he swung in his right pocket a huge roll of greenbacks. Now, I thought, wife has the young man with plenty of money; if he's single, moral, too—but, hang it, he musta't be too moral.

He certainly did not look as if morality was his besetting weakness.

"Called to see about board," said Mr. Allen, rising. "My card." And he handed it out.

"Yes, I remember," said Mr. Allen. Would you like to see the room?"

"I have seen these hotels, you kr ow," said the young man, without deigning to answer my question. "Thought I'd try on the private style of thing. Have you any city references, you know, and all that—if you want 'em. Tom Allen's pretty well known, though."

"Tom Allen?" I said. "I even that name?

"Pay in advance if you want. All on the square. Where's the room?"

I took him up stairs and showed him the room.

"Nice little hole," said he, "when you git it furnished. My trunks I'll fill up some. What's the figure?"

"The price for board?"

"Yeph [?] Mine's high, I tole it.

"I don't know exactly. We'll have to ask Mrs. Dobb about that."

"All right; let's go down and ask her. I fancy you'll suit me."

The parties called from her dinner, and told Mr. Allen the price; to which he at once agreed.

"I'll move my trunks up to-night," said he. "I shall want a latch-key, you know."

"Ah, that indeed!" I looked at my wife.

"You see," Mr. Allen went on, "I'm in the minsted business. My partner is out West. And I have to be out evenings. Any objection to my having a latch-key, Mrs. Dobb?"

"The fact is," said I, "my wife is opposed to latch-keys."

"Don't want to sit up for me, do you?"

"I fear we should not be able to accommodate a gentleman in your line of business," said I. "We are quiet people—"

"Oh, I don't mind how quiet you are!"

"And think we shall have to decline taking you, Mr. Allen. We should not suit you at all."

I hoped he understood that. But he didn't. had a fearful time in impressing on that young artist in burned cork the fact that we didn't want him in our house. But at last I succeeded. And then I went out to a cold dinner again.

The conviction forced itself upon me at this stage in the business that I had selected an unfortunate hour for interviews with the prospective boarders. I do not like my dinners cold, and I told my wife so.

She laughed at me!

Such is woman.

On Thursday the inevitable door-bell at five minutes past two o'clock. I really did not see the beauty of this sort of thing.

At this time it was a man of thirty-five or forty years, I judged. He wore a heavy beard and carried a cane. You're not a young man, at any rate, was my mental observation; but if you are blessed with money you may do—provided you find us pious sufficiently, and are not in the minstrel business.

"You advertise for a boarder, I see," he announced.

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, I think perhaps we can make a trade."

A trade! Is the man a horse-jockey?

I am a widower, Sir, and know how to appreciate a pleasant home; yes, Sir, and pay for it."

Excellent, so far.

"I ask nothing but to be let alone."

Quotation from J. Davis.

"And I draw at sight rights; pay in advance; price is immaterial; don't smoke in my room or out of it; and particularly, I don't bother myself about other people's business."

In short, we seemed to have found the model at last. He went into the bchchamber, and said he liked it. He went into the dining-room, where he bowed courteously to Mrs. Dobb, and patted the juvenile Dobb on the head; and glancing at the table remarked, in a real good-natured way, that he saw we lived well. He asked Bridget if she would serve on a boarder, and was occasionally if he paid her for it. He said he was satisfied he should find this a pleasant home, and for his part he should do his share in trying to make it so. He mentioned that the golden rule was his guide on all occasions.

Before he left the room he passed through the parlor—"a very pleasant place," our boarder graciously styled it, and added that there was nothing like a few choice paintings and statuettes to set off a room.

Just then his eye fell upon a bust upon a bracket on the wall. Whose bust it was I will not specify further than to say that it was that of a loyal and honest public functionary whom I much admire. He turned away quickly:

"Which your idea, my dear, in sticking up a bust of Black-and-tan parlor? It can't be for ornament. God never made a homelier man."

"Nor a better," said I.

"Are you a friend of his?"

"Yes, Sir, I am. Are you?"

"No, Sir, I am not. And, what is more, I can not bear the sight of a good man. He is a fool, Sir—a blockhead—a disgrace to the country."

I scuffed a bottle; but I can not say I had a wish to abandon my self to the fate we had quite a lively tilts time for a few minutes. I expressed my views, and he expressed his; and there was wrath.

"I bid you good-day, Sir," said the model; "we could never inhabit the same house together. I shall look for another boarding-place."

"As you please, Sir," I replied, with some warmth.

And the model departed.

Cold chunks for dinner again; and the degree of heat I brought to the meal was no improvement in a culinary point of view.

"Confound your boarders, Mrs. Dobb!" I said. "We had much better do as we please."

The next day, when the door-bell rang at the inevitable moment, I told my wife she might inform the fellow at once that we would conclude to have no boarder. I was actually getting dyspeptic with these cold dinners.

But the fellow at the door proved to be a lady, and Mrs. Dobb had the delightful task of waiting on her. I ate my dinner with unvented gusto, and seemed in a more genial mind to the conversation that took place in the next room.

I thought I would come and see you, as I am desirous of obtaining a boarding-place" came to my ears in a sweet, feminine voice.

"I did not think a lady boarder," said my wife.

"How unfortunate!"

"They are so much more difficult to please than gentlemen, you know."

"I am so sorry! I liked the appearance of the neighborhood so much; and if you will pardon me, I like your house also, too, now that I have met you, I am sure I should love you."

An awkward pause.

"Have you children?" the sweet voice went on.

"We have four," said my wife.

"I do love children so much! I have one—in heaven."

Ah, thought I, that's a telling blow!

"You are a widow lady, then?" said Mrs. Dobb.

"Yes, ma'am; I have been alone for three years. Oh, if you knew what it was to be without a pleasant home you would pity me. I am sick to death of boarding-houses. My feelings are all domestic; but in boarding-houses there is no domestic circle."

"Perhaps—ah—I don't know—" stammered my wife: "would you like to see the room?"

"Oh, may I? You are too kind."

Then they went up stairs.

"A fascinating young widow, eh? Here was an enemy to my wife's resolutions indeed!

They were up stairs a long time, I thought. But at last they came down and I heard the lady go out. I left the table and ran to look out the window, napkin in hand. There were the weeds in closing a distance—the lady and the widow turned her face and looked up at the house.

I recognized the face. Ohe, jam satis!

"Have you engaged the lady?" I inquired, as I returned to the table.

"I have, Mr. Dobb," said my wife.

"You like her then?"

"Yes; she is a perfect lady."

"You really think so?"

"Think so! I know so. You men are always boasting about your ability at reading character, and perhaps in general you may be our superiors that way; but let me tell you that when I have once been favorably impressed with a person I am never disappointed in my judgment."

"Thank you."

"I don't refer to you, my dear. You are an exception."

"And so you like her?"

"I told you I did."

"And were you doing up stairs so long?"

"Oh, I showed her all the chambers. She was so glad to find my chamber was next hers, where she could converse when she wanted a quiet chat without my having to leave the room."

"Then you liked her, eh?"

"James, what do you mean? I told you I liked her."

"How do you like your cold dinner, my dear?"

"I don't lose my temper over it, at least. But I want to know what you mean by asking me a dozen times over whether I liked her."

"Oh, nothing; only, I know her."

"You know her?"

"By reputation."

"Now, James, what do you mean? If you know any thing about that lady I wish you would tell me."

"Did you ask her name?"

"Yes; her name is Mrs. Wellington."

"No it isn't."

"It isn't?"

"Not any."

"Then what is her name?"

"You have heard of Belle Burns?"

"Yes; everybody was interested for poisoning her husband?"

"And got off through a legal technicality. Yes."

"Well, what of her?"

"Why, you've taken her to board, that's all. When is she coming?"

"James, are you making sport of me?"

"Not in the least, my dear. That woman who just left the house is Madame Belle Burns. When does she come?"

"I ask a question! You know of course she can't come at all if it's her."

"But you like her so well."

"James!"

"And you are never deceived in your estimate of character."

"James, you might be more generous than to crack disgusting jokes on such a subject."

"Well, then, I won't, my dear. But I'll tell you what it is: I think we had better give up the idea of taking a boarder; we seem to have poor success. I have had three very unsatisfactory specimens of the genus to deal with, and you have had one as bad as my three, and I don't find that we get any thing but cold dinners for our pains. I think we'll give up the enterprise altogether."

My wife has never talked about taking a boarder since then, and I don't suppose she ever will again as long as she lives.

A SOUTHERNER'S COURTSHIP.

"THERE is no mistake about it: I'm a Northerner myself, and as proud of my section as any man of them all; but the fact is unquestionable, beyond controversy, that Southern men are more personally brave, chivalrous, generous than Northern men."

What says Georgia Sterne had an idea looked at the speaker! Her lids fell, but her lip was slightly curled. She waited silently to hear what Augusta Trevanion would reply to such a speech as this.

Augusta Trevanion was a young and handsome native Southerner, educated principally at Boston, a Southerner by birth, professedly Union in sentiment, having escaped to the North but a few weeks before, at some peril of life and limb; and still more recently, from the hour in which they had first met, an ardently devoted votary at the shrine of Georgia Sterne, who had regarded him with seeming favor.

It came very soon—Augusta Trevanion's reply to them amid the chatter and small-talk which his companion's remark had elicited from the ladies, save Georgia:

"I think you are right," he said, loftily.

We are a brave and chivalrous people. You will understand some of the causes of coldness we encounter at the North. I am a Union man, of course; I think I have proved myself that; but I blame the North so much for the part they have pursued in this matter, I consider my own people so aggravated and forced into this war, that for the life of me I can't help feeling glad when I hear of victory for the South and defeat for the North."

Georgia Sterne's drooping lids quivered, and across the colorlessness of her cheek shot an arrowy flush, hot and red, as though it had been branded there. Her self-complacent listener did not see it.

He had forgotten Miss Sterne for the moment.

"I wonder if there would be such a thing as getting South for a week," said young Tracy, the gentleman who had first spoken. "I have really been thinking of making the attempt."

"It would be a very fool-hardy attempt indeed," said Trevanion, sagely.

"How?"

"I wouldn't give that for your life when you get there," with a snap of his fingers.

"Ah, yes, I suppose it is dangerous for a Northern man to go among them."

"Certainly it is, and with good reason. They hate every thing Northern so that the chances are a thousand to one that the first words you uttered on Southern soil would be the signal for putting a rope round your neck and suspending you to the nearest tree. Miss Sterne, I beg your pardon. This is not talk for ladies' ears."

Georgia had risen, her face very pale, save for the small spot of color that glowed redly on either check. She leaned with both hands clasped upon the back of the seat in which she had been sitting, and made a slightly impatient movement of her whole person when Trevanion spoke. She looked at him with a kind of shuddering impatience, controlled, but none the less evident, while she said:

"And you call that a brave, chivalrous, and generous people?"

Trevanion colored.

"But remember the aggravation, Miss Sterne. For years, now, [been ignorant] Yankees—"

He paused, coloring more deeply than before. He remembered that Miss Sterne claimed Connecticut as her birth-place. Into that awkward silence Georgia dropped these words:

"For years, now, this brave and chivalrous people have been committing the most cold-blooded murders upon men whose only offence was that they were strangers, alien to the chivalrous soil that held such greed for their life. I know that the pretence was that they were meddling with slave property; but in most cases there was no proof even of that. Pray do not interrupt me. I have lived South, or rather visited there, much. I know with the utmost certainty that these things occurred. There are clouds of witnesses to these murderous facts. I can die proof of one from your own lips. I see you have not forgotten that poor young man who was taken from your very side as you were escaping North—taken to a death he as little deserved as you. Pray, Mr. Trevanion, why did you leave this brave and chivalrous people to cast your lot among such as us? If your heart is with your brave Southern friends, if you rejoice in the triumph of their arms and the defeat of your own, Sir, how does it happen that you are not in their ranks, fighting shoulder to shoulder with them in the cause for which you have such strong sympathies? I can only a woman, but even I would scorn to accept the protection of a Government that I felt such enmity toward as you do toward this, to which you have nevertheless fled for refuge."

Augusta Trevanion made a faint effort at first to smile and treat the matter lightly, but it was impossible to do that under the flash of Georgia's eyes. He dropped his forehead upon his hand to hide the expressiveness of his white face. Her speech falling even from the lips of Georgia Sterne, he knew alone knew what she was to him—angered him terribly, and perhaps all the more from its pertinency and truth, while, while he was not cool enough to admit, yet stung him to the quick.

Georgia gave a sweeping glance to the rest—they understood its condemnation of their spiritless conduct, and taking her hat from a branch where it swung, she parted with her hand the green clusters that drooped almost to the ground, and left the room to recover from their amazement and consternation as best they might.

Pretty Mrs. Lennox was the first to recover her senses, asserting, with a flirt of her pluny fan, that "Georgia Sterne's temper was a little furious."

The rest put in their word presently, all but Trevanion. He sat silent for a little, and then, as though compelled, every word was distinctly heard, rose, and, with briefest apology, left them.

With his hat, which he crowded upon his brows he walked away, wandering on aimlessly, companioned by such thoughts as were natural under the circumstances.

Angry thoughts were for some time the most prominent—angry because of what Georgia had said, and because she had said it—angriest because of his vanity.

But as he walked and as he thought a cooler mood came upon him. It was impossible to resist the soothing influences of silence and cool airs about him, and that memory, of how supremely beautiful Georgia had looked, while she said even those stinging words, added its fascination to the rest.

Trevanion was not insensible to the nature of the circumstances which surrounded him. Though he had been ignorant of it at the time, more than he had dashed into his brain from the honest, indignant outspokenness of Georgia Sterne [had] never more him from the gaping accurateness of the facts themselves, which had faced him at home—that brave and chivalrous house which he had been vaunting a little before.

How his cheek reddened as he remembered, with sudden sympathy, how true a truth the girl had smitten him with! Was it true? He did remember; the young man of whom she had spoken had been his companion in that attempt to escape, in which one had succeeded and the other had not. They had, though traveling together, spoken but finally not to recognize each other. His friend had been a Northern man; and a careless, too eager word had brought the blood-hounds upon him. They fell upon him savagely, and unjudged, unjuried, sent him to a violent death. Trevanion knew that, and yet only a little before had been taking about chivalry. Was there any chivalry in what he did? Was it not cowardice to run but the rankest, and most brutal cowardice in many another similar deed that had come to his consciousness nearly or closely?

He looked at himself suddenly like a man who had been up to that moment clothed in and hugging to him the cerements of the grave.

True, it had been only the fling of white fingers, the flash of a pair of eyes, musical scorn and indignation from the lips of a girl—a Yankee girl too—that had brought this truth home to him; but white fingers, lips, and eyes had not their equal in all Augusta Trevanion's consciousness.

And just then he lifted his eyes and saw, but a little in advance of him, Georgia Sterne herself. Had she seen him? Was she conscious that he was so near her? Would she, if he accosted her now, turn upon him such scornful flashes as she had a while before? Why not? What was he more or less now than then? While he hesitated she turned and saw him.

And then, while she hesitated an instant, from some impulse born of the moment Augusta Trevanion advanced toward her, and, extending his hand, said,

"Surely we are friends still, Miss Sterne?"

She did not refuse her hand, but she dropped it instingly, and with no smiles breaking the grave lines about her mouth.

"Surely you would not break friendship with a man for his opinion?" he repeated, seeing that she did not speak.

At that her hand dropped away from his, and she said, with the faintest of smiles,

"Holding such opinions as you and I do, how could we be friends? Do you know, Sir"—and she grew grave as death again—"that the only brother I had in the world died in the parlor prison of this brave and chivalrous people—was set upon, as your friend was, and slain in the same cowardly manner? I can not be friendly with any man who claims the actions of such deeds as brave and chivalrous."

She was turning away when he stepped before her: "But I love you, Miss Sterne!" and stood palely regarding her.

She spoke too—paler, if possible, when he said that—and she shrank a little. The next instant, however, she said, "I am very sorry, Sir!" and turning again with proud calm, walked rapidly in the opposite direction.

Trevanion stood looking after her till she had gotten from view, and then, replacing the hat he had been holding in his hand till now, he said to himself,

"I am man enough not to blame you, Georgia Sterne; and if you and I ever meet again this side eternity it shall be with very different terms than those upon which we have parted."

From the ranks of the gay traveling party of which Georgia Sterne was a member suddenly disappeared Augusta Trevanion. There was some wondering as to what had become of him, but Georgia never wondered, or grew any thing but more indifferent, as the moments flew by. She withdrew herself presently, upon some excuse, and, returning home, spent in quiet and seclusion the remainder of the day. Mrs. Lennox, in her Socialism, indeed, compared to the gay life she had been leading, but not so quiet a life. She was the centre of an unmanning spirit of woe, and gentle and efficient effort for the encouragement and comfort of the country's brave defenders.

But all the time she grew graver and more quiet in herself, thoughtful and subdued in manner, as one smitten but not crushed by fortitude smiling.

She stood alone in her own sitting-room one evening, several months after that meeting and parting with Augusta Trevanion, when a servant entered and gave her a card bearing his name. For almost the first time in months a fatal color flitted over Georgia's pale face as she read his name. She went down to see him quietly enough—so quietly, indeed, as to disappoint him somewhat. Very few can suspect how much emotion sometimes underlies a woman's outward calm; and he had expected, perhaps, that the sound of his name, as at distance when he had so much that he wished to say to her.

He began his speech as he entered—began like one who had meant to introduce it to her differently, but it was impossible to give it the introduction he had meant. And there was no one by that he could him with her superb distance; so he said, simply,

"You will pardon this intrusion, Miss Sterne, when you have the errand upon which I come. I have been a gentleman who was acquainted with your brother Richmond."—She started a little, but did not speak, and he went on: "He did not die at the time you supposed he did. This gentleman was with him in the Libey Prison once weeks."

"Where is this gentleman? Why did he not come and see me himself?" exclaimed Georgia, her face flushing.

"He did: I am he."

"You?"

"I am he."

"But how came you in the Libey Prison? And poor Frank was taken by cowardly assassins two years ago! I don't understand you, Mr. Trevanion—no."

Frank did not die at the time you supposed. He was living an inmate of the Libey Prison at the same time with myself, about one month ago."

"One month ago!" starting from her seat, and looking at him reproachfully. "Don't trifle with me, Mr. Trevanion!"

"I am not trifling. I saw your brother, Frank Aldrich Sterne, alive and well one month ago."

She was trembling so that she could not look him in the face. Extending her hands to him, she said, simply, "Pity me, and spare me further suspense. You have more to tell. I can bear it—tell me at once."

"Can you bear it?" not noticing the hands she extended to him, and looking at her keenly. "Can you bear to hear that he is alive and well now?—that he is for sure alive and well? That I have come from here—waiting till I have prepared you for the news of his life—?"

"I can wait any longer, Augusta!" And Frank Sterne, having littered outside long enough to ascertain that the shock to Georgia was not likely to be fatal, sprung through the low window, and clasped his sister in his arms.

"I didn't believe any of the time that you'd get the news safely," said Frank, presently, laughing and shaking the tears out of his eyes; "but Augusta here would have to be prepared, and she prepared for the reception of such news—by Augusta!" But Augusta had vanished from the room, and after staring blankly enough through the window at his receding form, Frank said,

"Splendid fellow that, Georgia! I must go and bring him back presently. I should have died if I hadn't been for him. The ruffians had banged me about till I was dying of sheer weariness of life, when Trevanion was brought in prisoner where I was. He nursed me, and scolded and cajoled me, till I was dragged away together with many others. All the way he bore the brunt of every thing, till he brought me here. And, by-the-way, he says that he was rank scoesh till he met you last summer, and you put the truth into him so sharply that he went right away and enlisted as a private in a Northern regiment. A fellow who was in the same company told me that he never saw such fight as there was in Trevanion. If you had any influence, as he says, in bringing him over to the right side, Georgia, you may thank you've gained the country something worth having, for he's a man, every inch of him, and that's what can't be said of all these Southerners by a great deal."

It was dusk when Trevanion came back with Frank. The lights were in the parlor alone.

Miss Sterne stood by the window when Augusta entered. She advanced to meet him, a flush on her cheek, but otherwise composedly calm, and extending her hand. He took it.

"Have you nothing to say to me, Georgia?" he said, holding it in both his.

Her eyes drooped away from his suddenly, but she did not withdraw her hand. Indeed, she could not, he was holding it so closely in his.

"May I have this hand, Georgia? May I try to teach you to love me?"

He had to bend his head to catch her answer, it was so low.

"I have always loved you, Augusta."

PARTING.

O BROOK, be still! O gentle South,
Thy kisses cease among the noisy leaves,
And only kiss my burning mouth!

O Stars, make all your light to pour
On him who love to me so fondly chooses—
On him who comes, to come no more!

For now indeed I can not spare
His first least footsteps; and I fain would see Far as I may now and fare.

Or shall I wish that unaware
He should come near me with sweetly startle me,
His hand upon my arm?—'Tis there!

O Brook, flow on! O amorous South,
Kiss with a thousand kisses all the leaves!—
His kisses are for my mouth!

But ah, kind Stars, let not your light
Confuse the sweetness of my lover's eyes,
That bid farewell to mine to-night!—
Farewell! farewell to mine to-night!

"OVER THE WAY."
A CHILD'S STORY.

"WON'T it ever be dinner-time, mother?"

"Truly, child, I don't know."

Lucy was very hungry; not hungry like you, little people, who have had warm bread and milk already this morning, but hungry, so that her little body was all one void, and her head ached from it. You see there had been no dinner-time yesterday, and only supper the day before. Now, her mother was stitching as busily for her as if only a sentence—like a knot in her thread here and there—to give Lucy in reply to her questions and remarks—if she finished that pile of stitching early enough; and if the Dorcas woman was neither busy nor cross, nor, as often happened, talking to the clerk, then she would be paid.

And all these "ifs" lay between Lucy and her dinner.

Poor little Lucy! she sat curled up in the window-seat to see the sunshine if she could not feel it; it shone on the other side of the way.

Over the way seemed to have fullness of riches; for, besides the sunshine, it had a baker's shop, where, on Fridays before, Lucy had watched the loaves go in to be baked. They had looked tempting then, but now, oh dear! they were heavenly. Crusty, pale-brown batter puddings; crisp bursting potatoes, brown with gravy; and once, after a leg of pork, there came through the draughty window such a fragrance of onions as made the little watcher clasp her hands with a long "oh!" of pleasure and longing.

You may not agree with her as to the perfume of onions; but then, you see, Lucy's nose was not educated, only hungry, which is quite another thing.

By-and-by, it seemed that all the dinners had been fetched from the oven—the stool on the counter cooling rapidly.

"What could the people be about that belonged to it?"—not that it belonged to—Lucy's thoughts were hungry.

"Perhaps they've forgotten it; perhaps they're dead; then nobody'll have it; oh, what a pity!"

Lucy's last thought was so energetic that it jumped to life, and became half answered. It was such a beautiful dinner; in spite of the shade of the shop, Lucy's far-sighted eyes could see that; a large round pudding, and a dish of a brownish red, and all round about it, and over and under it, just like things of no consequence, were those potatoes, and nobody came to claim it.

"Mother! I don't believe it's wicked to steal!"

"Truly, child, I don't know."

Lucy's mother had been a Quakeress till she married, and was a good woman still, but it seemed to take all there was of her to keep Lucy alive at all, any sort of a child; and now, between work, and hunger, and cold, she was almost in a snow-sleep; so she never thought to get down off her pattens and run into the street.

"I could steal it, I must smell it," said Lucy to herself, and she went and stood at the baker's door.

"I must just touch that warm dish," and Lucy went in. No one was in the shop, and there was one potato just on the edge of the dish.

"I'm sure it will fall over and be broke, and then somebody'll tread on it; such a pity!" This time Lucy's thoughts did not reach her lips, but something else did, and presently one potato, first one bite, then another; then it was all gone.

"Why, you little thief!" Lucy was sure it was a giant's voice, it sounded so high up, and so loud, after her mother's weak one; and, yes, that must be a giant's hand laid on her shoulder; but, of course, it wasn't a giant, you know; it was good Mrs. Bacon, the bakeress, who had more children than you could count when they were all running about, and who, if she had known how hungry Lucy was, would have given her, not somebody else's potato perhaps, but a bit of her own dinner; but you see, she did not know, and that was the mischief.

"Speak, child," and Mrs. Bacon gave another shake; she thought Lucy was sulky, the one unpardonable sin among her own children; but between the food and the fright Lucy felt sick and dizzy, and hot and cold, until she could not understand herself, much less Mrs. Bacon.

"You evil little thing!" Another shake, and Lucy, feeling the world go round for the first time in her life, fell flat on the floor.

"Oh! goodness gracious, Bacon, I've been and killed a child!" It was quite consistent with the scene that "Bacon" should appear through a trapdoor in the floor, as he did, all flour and astonishment, to find his wife with a little ragged girl in her lap.

"What on earth shall I do?"

"Put her in some warm water." Mrs. Bacon, who ruled the household generally, always obeyed her husband in troublous times; so, before long, Lucy woke up in water; it was quite certainly, but on the whole satisfactory; and she was about to drive here eyes in, just feeling the soft warm water lapping her limbs, when Mrs. Bacon said,

"Oh! do as wake up, there's a lamb, my pretty!" You see she had children all about her "little dear" by now, and saw only a child like one of her own; but so thin! I rather think some of the warm water on Lucy's back had salt in it.

"Do as wake up!" really it seemed worth while; the state of things was puzzling, but then it was scarcely needful to puzzle one's self, when the conundrum consisted of eyes, nose, ears, being greeted by a laughing, a smell of warm bread, and things delicious, and a whispered order of "Porridge directly." The porridge came just as Lucy was dressed, but in her own things, which were dean enough, and then in a frock belonging to Polly Bacon, who came to gaze with admiring awe at a little girl hungry enough to eat porridge.

"Where do you live, little girl?" said Polly, thinking, perhaps, that porridge-hungry might come under the manners and customs of some distant region.

"Over the way," said Lucy. Mrs. Bacon rather drew back; she remembered the potato for the first time. It is not exactly pleasant to have people with millions of the best in the right of property living "over the way."

"Well, I'll take you over." Just as they were crossing the road a wild-looking woman with a big bundle ran out of the house opposite, and Lucy, shrinking, said, "Mother, mother!" and caught hold of her, just escaping a butcher's horse with no eyes to spare for little girls.

"That child's dead before she's done with," said Mrs. Bacon.

"Let's speak to the mother," said Mrs. Bacon. So they went up to Lucy's mother, who was trimming and crying.

"Oh! Lucy, naughty girl, where have you been?"

"It's all right, ma'am," said Mrs. Bacon; "we'll do for her if you like, while you take home your work." Certainly, it was time the work went, so Lucy's mother had to go too, and her visitors followed Lucy as fairer to her apartment. Such a room—high up, and low, dark and unshaded, bare and cheerless. It required wonderful how it could contrive to have so many contradictory qualities without one pleasant one. In all the culture of two comfortable homes, the geezer had never seen such a room. Mrs. Bacon felt a strong desire to relieve herself by scolding somebody, but a lump in her throat cut short the speech, and when, after a short, most grotesquely eloquent one she had ever made—just "Oh! Bacon," and she laid her head on her husband's shoulder.

"It's pitiful, isn't it, old woman? I'll run over for some bread," and he was coming back so speedily that the fire was lit before Lucy knew what was going to happen. The chimney had been idle so long that it gave all the smoke it could, but when it was conquered the bright warm flames began to dance, and so did Lucy.

"Oh! what will mother say? there's a fire, there's a fire!" and she bent down her little body in front of it, spreading out her arms as if she could hug it, and laughing wildly.

"Oh! there's a fire, what will mother say? it's like mine!" and that should have been but Pall sat asleep with her hands clasped like a child in a picture with angels watching her.

By-and-by Lucy's mother came back to find, not only the fire, but on it a pot of Irish stew.

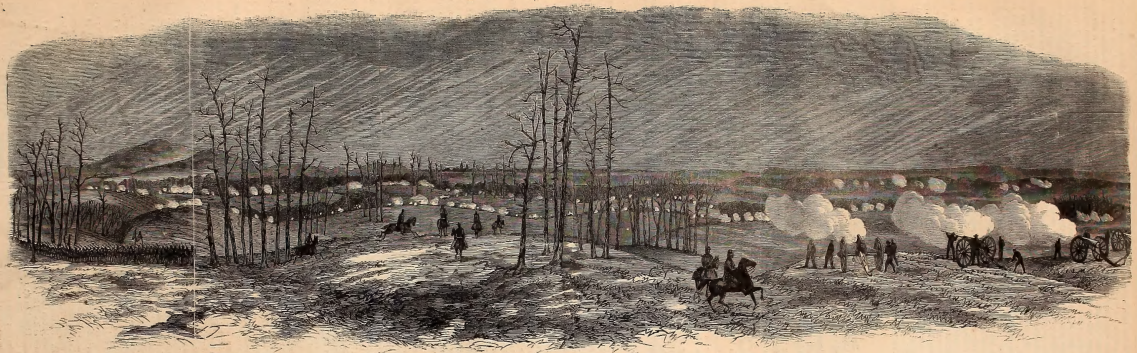
"Lucy, Lucy, wake up, child; what's happened?"

"Oh! I don't know, mother; it's all beautiful; but I don't know any thing; it was all over there; true; her little life had run on so fast that she had got behind it somehow. But they were both too hungry to do any thing but eat, with food at hand, so the question was "laid on the table" as they say in Congress. Just as dinner was done, Mrs. Bacon came in and put such a long talk with Lucy's mother that the little one forgot to listen until she heard,

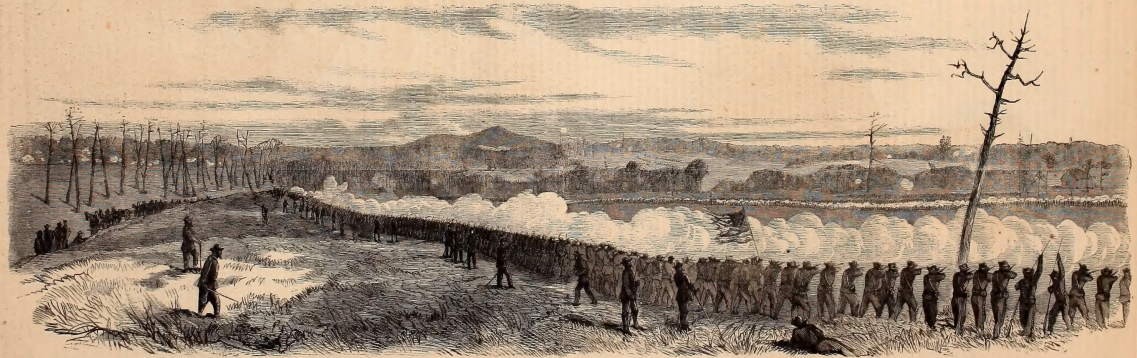
"Well, never go without a dinner again; with three of my children, just babies, I can always find you work."

"Did you ever hear, ma'am, of the 'blessing of those ready to perish?' because you will have it to-night."

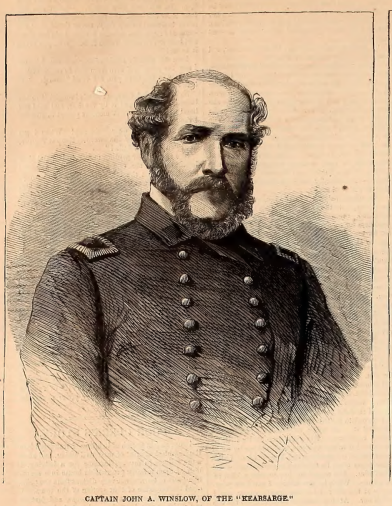
"I've had more blessings all my life than I ever deserved," said good Mrs. Bacon, with such a pleasant light in her motherly eyes, that I think, had you been there to see, you must have kissed her at the risk of receiving the most awesome baths do that loss pleasantly. She kept her word. Lucy never went without dinner any more.



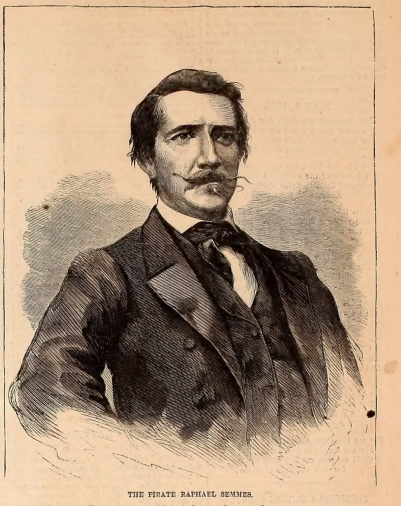
GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND SWINGING AROUND KENESAW MOUNTAIN.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN—THE REBEL CHARGE ON OUR RIGHT, NEAR MARIETTA, JUNE 22, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



CAPTAIN JOHN A. WINSLOW, OF THE "KEARSARGE."
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK, BOSTON.]



THE PIRATE RAPHAEL SEMMES.
[PHOTOGRAPHED IN 1863 BY A. DUPERTE, KINGSTON, JAMAICA.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

On page 476 we give two sketches illustrating Sherman's movements to the right of Kenesaw Mountain. One of these, representing the REBEL CHARGE ON OUR RIGHT NEAR MARIETTA, relates to the battle of Culp's Farm, four miles west of Marietta, June 22. SCHOFIELD held the extreme right; on his left, HOOKER commanded the Marietta Road; HOWARD held the centre; and PALMER and M'PHERSON extended the Federal lines to Brush Mountain, on the railroad. Nearly all day the rebels engaged HOWARD, to divert attention from the right, where they were massing troops on the Marietta Road against HOOKER. A furious attack was made at this point at five P.M. The following troops were engaged: WILLIAMS's division on the right, GEARY's in the centre, and BUTTERFIELD's on the left: General KNIPE's and ROGER's brigades formed a second line on the right. An attempt was made to flank HOOKER's right, but this was prevented by the Fourteenth Kentucky, from SCHOFIELD's corps. Soon SCHOFIELD's main body pressed up, and the rebels were driven in great disorder.

The other cut shows the ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND SWINGING AROUND THE KENESAW MOUNTAIN on the right, in order to flank the position.

The KENESAW MOUNTAIN has two elevations, one about 900 and the other 800 feet high. The base of the mountain extends about four miles from east to west.

CAPTAIN WINSLOW AND THE PIRATE SEMMES.

On this page we give the portraits of Captain JOHN A. WINSLOW, of the Kearsarge, and of Captain RAPHAEL SEMMES, late of the Alabama. The portrait of the latter is from a photograph taken by A. DUPERTE, in Jamaica, January, 1863.

Captain WINSLOW was born in Wilmington, North Carolina, in 1811. His father was a Northerner, descended from the old Plymouth stock of WINSLOWS; his mother was a Southerner. He was educated at Dedham, Massachusetts, and entered the navy as midshipman at the age of fourteen. DANIEL WEBSTER secured for him this position. His family reside at ROXBURY, near BOSTON. He was placed in command of the Kearsarge as soon as that vessel arrived off the European coast. Before his conflict with the Alabama he had some apprehensions, and repeatedly advised the Naval Department to increase the force off Cherbourg, but said he would do the best he could. Upon the receipt of a vote of thanks from Congress he will be made a Commodore.

Captain RAPHAEL SEMMES, formerly an officer of our navy, was, early in the war, appointed by the rebel GOVERNMENT to take command of the Sumter, which ran out of New Orleans in July, 1861. This vessel, after burning several prizes, reached Cadiz the following February. Here she was blockaded by the Tuscarora, until SEMMES, despairing of escape, sold her. When the Alabama had managed to escape from En lund SEMMES became her captain. He held this position nearly two years, capturing and burning American vessels, until at last, blocked in at Cherbourg, as the Sumter had been at Cadiz, the Alabama came out and fought the Kearsarge and was sunk.

THE GREAT RAILWAY DISASTER NEAR MONTREAL, CANADA.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. HALSEY & CO., MONTREAL.]

THE TERRIBLE RAILWAY DISASTER IN CANADA.

It is not often that we have to record a disaster more affecting than that which happened to the German emigrant train on the Grand Trunk Railway in Canada at the end of June, and which is illustrated on this page, from a photograph sent us by A. BALTHY & Co., of Montreal. The accident happened near Montreal, at Belœil Bridge. The passengers consisted mostly of emigrants from Bohemia, Poland, Saxony, Sweden, and Norway; five hundred and thirty souls in all, who had just arrived from Hamburg in the Neckar, which sailed from that port May 18. Some of them intended to settle in Upper Canada, and others in the United States. They presented a very respectable appearance; for the most part they were grouped in families, there being but few single men in the company; and generally they appeared to be well provided with means. Fortunately eighty were compelled to remain behind at Quebec, because they had no means. Altogether, there were eight hundred and thirty-five that took the train from Point Levi. It was a night-train, and the night was clear and pleasant. When the train reached the bridge, at 1.15 A.M., the draw was open to allow some barges to pass through to Lake Champlain. The usual red danger-light was burning, and could be seen at a distance of 540 yards. The signal was not regarded, and the train rushed on, falling into the river 40 feet, car after car, on the deck of one of the barges. First came the locomotive, sinking the barge, then the tender, cascading upon the locomotive, followed by the baggage-car, which fell flat into the draw. Above all these, in the most utter confusion, came the passenger-cars. Only one of these was fitted with seats, and was curiously delivered on top of the barge's deck, having pretty effectually shaken up its inmates. The other cars were piled one above another, crushed into an indiscriminate mass of splinters and iron; the car-wheels, the bundles of the passengers, and their bruised bodies, were not huddled together, but mixed up, confused with one another. One hundred were wounded and ninety were killed. The removal of the dead, says the Montreal Gazette, "revealed a horrible sight. A shapeless blue mass of heads and hands and feet protruded among the splinters and frame-work, and gradually resolved itself into a closely-packed mass of human beings, all ragged and bloody, and dusted from crown to feet with blue bruises and wheals and cuts inflicted by the ponderous iron-work, the splinters, and the enormous weight of the train." It was impossible to identify the dead or to discover their names. The engine-driver, WILLIAM BARNEY, is held responsible for the disaster.

MAY 6, 1864.

How beautiful was earth that day!
The far blue sky had not a cloud;
The river rippled on its way,
Singing sweet songs aloud.

And IT My heart was calmly blest.
I knew afar the war-cloud rolled
Lurid and dark, in fierce unrest,
Laden with woes untold.

But on that day my fears were stilled;
The very air I breathed was joy:
The rest and peace my soul had filled
Had nothing of alloy.

I took the flower he loved the best—
The arbutus—fairest child of May—
And with its perfume half suppressed,
Turned many a happy spray

About his picture on the wall;
His eyes were on me all the while,
And when I had arranged them all,
I thought he seemed to smile.

O Christ, be pitiful! That hour
Saw him fall bleeding on the sod;
And there it yoked with wreath and flower
His soul went up to God!

For him one pang—and then a crown;
For him the laurels heroes wear;
For him a name whose long renown
Ages shall onward bear.

For me the cross without the crown,
For me the drear and lonely life;
O God! my sun, not his, went down
On that red field of strife.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.—There is no place like Home. Felicitous. If your home be in a row of houses it is probable that the home of your neighbors will be very like yours.

"WHERE a woman," says MRS. Partington, "has been married with a considerable beau, and she finds her husband spending to her own, she will never want to enter the matrimonial state."

"You look as if you were beside yourself," said a wag to a fellow who stood by a donkey.

"I am a broken man," said a poet. "So I should think," was the answer, "for I have seen your pieces."

One evening the late Bishop of London was to have dined with a party where Sydney Smith was a guest. Just before dinner a note arrived, saying that he was unable to keep his engagement, a dog having rushed out from the crowd and bitten him in the leg. When the note was read aloud to the company, Sydney Smith's comment was, "I should like to hear the dog's account of the story."

"My dear doctor," said an Irishman, "it's no use your giving me an emetic: I tried it twice, and it would not stay in my stomach one minute."

"Now do, my dollies 'think as your bat?'" said a schoolmaster to one of his pupils. "Darkness that may be felt," replied the youthful wit.

A thief, who lately broke open a grocer's warehouse, stressed himself so much upon the occasion that he died of a sweat.

In a French translation of Shakspeare, the passage—"Frailty, thy name is woman," is translated, "Maidenhood (fraîcheur) thy name of the lady!"

One person asked another if he believed in the appearance of spirits? "No!" was the reply; "but I believe in their disappearance. I have missed a bottle of brandy since last night."

What is that which destroys a town and makes a martyr?—Conflagration.

Some time since a man in Maine wanted to exhibit an Egyptian mummy, and went to the court-house for a license. "What is it?" asked the judge. "An Egyptian mummy, may it please the Court, more than three thousand years old," was the answer. "Three thousand years old!" exclaimed the judge, jumping to his feet, "and is he the criminal?"

MRS. Partington says she can't perceive why people now-days are continually getting up so many new superlief notions. "I think we was growing, as a nation, well enough what the particularly alluded. The old lady laid down with newspapers for her reading, and nothing more." "Why, ma'am," said they, "we have got to making 'trust proservers,' and a thousand people didn't have enough things to make proservers without making 'em of fish."

FAITHFUL HOUSE.—Why is faith like honey?—Because it is sanctified in the comb.

"I say, Sambo, can you answer dis conundrum? Suppose I gib you a bottle of whisky corked—what will it cork—keep it corked, or go de whisky out?" "Why, nuffin' cork or breaking de bottle?" "I gibe dat up." "Why, gosh de cork will go in, you t'ink?"

A QUESTION FOR MR. GOUGH.—May a reformed drunkard be designated "a man convinced against his will?"

A clear stream reflects all objects that are upon its bosom, but is unsullied by them. So it should be with our hearts—they should show the effect of all objects, and yet remain unharmed by any.

A writer, dwelling upon the importance of small things, says that he always takes "into even of a straw"—especially if there be a cherry-colter at the end of it.

The lady whose "poses of mind" was broken intends to have it repaired.

An enterprising but ignorant South American has sent to an Albany locomotive-shop for one hundred "excursionists." He expects to use them in taking wild cattle on the plains of Paraguay, in place of the lasso.

A young lady who is a zealous canvasser in support of the Free Presbyterian Church, called upon a poor man in the kine of Kirkaldy to solicit his name, and, after in vain trying her ingenuity to find some means by which he might save a penny a week, to be given for the support of the minister, who was about to be driven from his kirk by the vile Erastians, she asked—"Do you have yourself?" "Nae, marm." "How much does your shaving cost you?" "Fippence a week." "Well, you must come to a share yourself, and then you would save the two-pence, which you could give to the maintenance of the kirk." "Deed, marm, I'm owerauld to learn, but I'll tell ye what I'll do: if your minister will come and shave me, I'll gie him the fippence."

A convict was lately tracked into the service of a young married couple in Baltimore. He was discharged, after a very pretty lady's maid, and had been going all the duties of his old profession. The horror of the lady was unbounded, and still more of the husband, may he imagine, when the polite said: "That pretty woman is the man we want."

A physician, residing by a stone-mason's shop, bawled out, "Good-morning, Mr. D——! Hard at work, I see. You should have a partner to help you." "I have one, sir, and I thee, will, I suppose, to see who wants a monument next?" "Why, sir, what ails the man?" "Nothing, sir, but he's sick, and you are doctoring him. Then I keep right on."

Tom bought a gallon of gin to take home; and, by way of a label, wrote his name upon a card, which happened to lie the nearest at hand, and tied it to the handle. A friend coming along, and observing the jug, quietly remarked: "Tom, you've made a mistake in the label, my friend." "Why?" said Tom. "Because somebody might mistake along with the spirit of that name."

A man said the only reason why his dwelling was not blown away in a late storm was, because there was a heavy mortgage on it.

A celebrated quack, while holding forth on a stage at Chelmsford, in order to promote the sale of his nostrums, told the people that he came there for their good, and not for wont. And then addressing his Merry Andrew, he drew," said he, "do we come here for nut?" "No faith, Sir," replied the wag, "we come here for your good."

"We don't sell spirits," said a tax-avoiding beer-seller; "we will give you a glass; and then, if you want a biscuit, we'll sell it to you for three halfpence." The "glass of water" was handed down, a stiff glass swallowed, and the landlord handed his customer a biscuit. "Now, sir, I think not," said the customer; "you sell 'em too dear. I can get five or six of 'em for a penny any where else."

LULA'S LETTER.

A CHILD'S STORY.

"MAMMA," said my little daughter, "may I write a letter to a soldier? All the girls have."

"Write a letter to a soldier, my child?"

"Yes, mamma. Maggie and Mary have written theirs and put them in the comfort bags, and we think the soldiers will be so pleased to find a letter. We want all yesterday, but mamma and Maggie's mother is going to send them away as soon as it will be ready."

I leave granted, Lula brought the wherewithal, and sat down gravely to the production of an epistle.

"Dear Soldier—We have all been making slings for the soldiers, and I send this comfort bag to you. I hope it will be very useful. How many soldiers are there in a man sewing: but I suppose it must be done when there are no wounds. I am a little girl seven years old. I live in the country, and I love you very much for it. It must be so hard to be a soldier and never go home. I hope that God will take care of you, and bring you safe home to your friends. I cannot stop now, because mamma says I want to know who gets the bag. My papa is Mr. Georges Clinton, Rosedale, Maryland. Please remember me in your prayers. Your affectionate little friend,

"LULA."

After the bags had gone Lula became impatient to hear from her soldier, so she called him. But many a long week passed by, and Lula began to despair to talk of it, when her father came in to dinner with the long-expected document. I, with the fatherly instincts of middle-age, was surprised that it should come at all; but Lula was in ecstasies. The impatient fingers tore open the envelope, and coming to me we read it together:

"My dear little Friend"—thus the letter began—"I have just finished your very welcome letter, and I hasten to reply you shall have it at length. Accept my thanks for your gift. Bless the little fingers that worked it. Is there the warm heart that fell for the soldier and wished to help a little sufferer. It was the first bag I received, and for sixteen months. My dear little sister Estella used to send me a present every week. She was my only correspondent, and when she died I thought I had lost every friend. But I had my brother. He was with me in Pennsylvania in which I was, and am, a private. We were together a year in Virginia. Then Lilian, my darling, went to Mountain, I saw him fall. I could not go to him. The thought of his lying there alone was terrible to my friend. After the battle ended, and the snow of the grass, the longing of the hour of victory and rejoicing was gone away, the night became as still as it is in the country after a day of rain. I went to look for my brother. I could not cry. Then I could look for my father. I found him at last. Near him lay those who had been his old playmates, born by sheds, but a few primary branches yet left. At his feet lay a soldier with my brother's face. Without sleeping his long sleep, while the sod of Virginia over him, and the dew of heaven fell upon his cheek. I will not tell you of my sorrow. I thought I might have not spoken of what occurred, and I have not spoken of it to any one but you. I write to you because you are a little child, and I think you will be able to comfort me. I am now going to mend my stockings and darn the holes in my socks, and then I will write you how I would make you open your eyes. I hope your father will allow you to write to me again. Please to have me addressed, that you can see when you wish to do another kind action. I have been long in reply.

"Very respectfully yours,

"PRIVATE FLEMING."

Lula wrote a longer letter next time, telling of her papa, and mamma, and brother Johnnie; how she went to the Sunday-school, and what she had for tea; her, who pretended to be cross, and was not; how she, aiding her playmates, bought for him a fine ruler as a present, and placed it, with a note, on his table on April-Fool's Day. Even about her Java sparrow the little pen discoursed, her dear J. S., who wore a white standing-collar like old Mr. Wasters, and who slept in a basket. She spent some time over the spinks, pulled lak over the table-cover, and double-dyed her fingers. Then she sent off a cheery letter, and not a word of mine discovered her. Ere long MRS. FLEMING was added to the correspondence went on all winter. I liked his letters very much; as well as Lula did, which is saying a great deal for them. He remembered he was writing to a child, and while he interested her our feelings were excited by his simple relations. When Christmas approached Lula wished to send him a box.

"I think I ought, mamma; he is my soldier, and has nobody else to think of him."

I gave her permission, but offered no assistance, wishing to see how she would manage. She begged a pair-box of the grocer. Could you not have got her to with paper. Grandma was delighted with the opportunity to sew two of the large stockings she was constantly knitting. They begged me to make a plum-cake, and papa gave a bottle of wine. The children bought nuts and candy; and Lula, after an anxious talk with me, sent, as her own particular gift, pocket-handkerchiefs marked with his initials—"D. P. Fleming." Papa having suggested something to read, Johnnie brought his favorite books, Arabian Nights and Pilgrim's Progress, and could with difficulty be persuaded to substitute Harper's Magazines.

The subsequent of the box was a grateful letter that more than repaid us. Lula was specially delighted, because Mr. Fleming confessed to a weakness for candy, and her father had laughed at her for sending bonbons to a soldier. There was a note to Mr. Nelson, in which Mr. Fleming said he was to have a furlough, with the rest of the regiment, before re-enlisting for the war. He begged permission to see Lula. Mr. Nelson immediately wrote for him to come. But we did not tell Lula, to save her the excitement and fretting of expectation. About two weeks afterward I was reading in my room when Lula flew in.

"Mamma," said she, "there is a soldier down stairs asking for you." And she hid her face in my dress and began to tremble.

The servant brought in his card.

"Don't you want to see Mr. Fleming, Lula?"

"No, no!" she sobbed.

"I am going out, and will send Margaret up for you. You may be disappointed in him, Lula," but remember, he is fighting our battles for us: he is a soldier, and his presence compels respect and ness. Expect nothing, but come down quietly when I send for you."

I owned to a little trepidation myself: a glance dispelled it. He was a tall, robust young man—almost handsome. His voice trembled a little as he responded to my welcome, and not be could never tell all our goodness had done for him. Lula's letter came when he was in Pennsylvania—and saved him. His regard for her seemed a kind of reverence. While he was talking I saw Lula peeping at the white skirt of the drawing-room, and I called her. At that name he rose, dropped the cup he held, and went forward to meet her. She was trembling like a leaf—an old-fashioned red cent-but smiling, and looking up at him from under her long lashes. He offered her his hand without a word. Lula gave hers, when he kissed it as if she had been a princess and he of the blood-royal. Then he raised her and led her in at first. Her confusion were off when Johnnie came home, and went into a complete state of admiration. Mr. Nelson asked him to stay to tea during his leave, and was afterward very glad he did so, for that week gave me thorough knowledge of him, and when he left I was sorry to go, for he had been one of them.

For a long time after Mr. Fleming's departure Johnnie and Lula played army plays exclusively. They drilled with umbrellas set up camp-papers, fought battles, were taken by guerillas—embodiments of the stories of Mayne Reid—and finally, between us, for I now undertook the bulk of the correspondence; then the campaign began, and we had nothing. I was sure, from the silence that followed Gettysburg, in which his regiment took a prominent part, that something had happened to Mr. Fleming. Mrs. Nelson inquired. He was thought to be a prisoner, but it was not positively known. Lula and Johnnie could not realize such a thing. If a prisoner was a thing in their eyes. What a story Mr. Fleming would have to tell them!

Then fell on Mrs. Baltimore to publish an old aunt, and in the course of our stay we went to see the hospitals. As I never lost any chance of hearing of the fate of Mr. Fleming, I told his story to the matron, but young nurse who walked about with us. She had been to the front, in the very first rank of those who went to succor the wounded.

There was a Captain Fleming ill in one of the wards, dying of the wounds received at Gettysburg. We did not know where he came from, or anything about him, except that he had no friends to whom news of his condition could be sent. I asked her to point him out, for a misgiving seized me. Surely it was he, white and changed. I drew back, fearing he might see me, and the nurse led the children and told him some one had come to see him. A little color flushed into his face as I came forward, and with a poor effort to smile he laid his pillow and nodded. I cried too. "Why didn't you let us know where you were?" I asked at last.

"I was ill," he said, "and my letter had been unanswered for so long that I thought perhaps you were tired enough for me, so I wrote no more. Isn't Lula here?"

"You shall see her to-morrow. When you are a little stronger, and can be moved, you must come to us. We will nurse you well again."

"I shall soon be well enough to be moved," said he, with a very significant look. "I am not in your house, dear lady. Do you think Lula will know me? I hope she will not be afraid again. You will bring her to-morrow?"

I promised—and the next day we came. Lula knew he was very ill, but she was not quite prepared for the white face, the great black eyes, with their eager, intense glances. He smiled, and motioned her to come near him.

"Then you didn't forget your soldier after all."

"Oh; I didn't—I didn't!" And both the soft arms were round his neck. "Can't you get well for your Mr. Fleming?"

"Oh yes, dear," said he, holding her to him with his little strength, "they have made me a captain, and given me a sword? Lula, I must give it to you with my own hands. I know you will keep it for my sake. If I never disgraced my office, never hesitated in my duty, never doubted in the cause in fact, it was because I knew Lula loved me and believed in me. There it is. Will you bring it to me?"

Lula was greatly afraid of any weapon, I knew. I saw her pause and turn from him to the sword.

"It will not hurt you, my child," said I. "It is to be kept sacredly."

So the dimpled, inexpert hands brought it to the bedside. He grasped it by the hilt, and held her hand with his left. A moment's pause passed in silence. I thought he prayed.

"Lula, you have dear little one! When I get well I will come for the sword. Keep it for me. Will you kiss me, Lula?"

Lula put her pouting mouth to his, and then looking up to me, one arm hugging the fierce sword, held out the other hand to be led away. The sad eyes were full of awe. She did not cry, but sat very still in the carriage. When her father came in at night, and Lula tried to tell him every thing, she could not for her sobs.

The next day Mr. Nelson went with me to the hospital, but all was over. We had not taken Mr. Fleming was well. God had taken him home to his mother and father.

A few days after my husband went to Washington and succeeded in seeing Fleming's colonel, who spoke of our soldier in unqualified praise.

"He was a splendid fellow," said he, "for he saved my life once that day. His bravery won him his shoulder-straps and his sword. He died from a lingering suffering in Baltimore, and would not let me know. I would have given all I own to have found him."

When we were once more at home her father hung the sword on the wall of Lula's room.

"Until Lula gets most remarried," said he, turning and seeing the tears running down her cheeks, "that Captain Fleming never failed in his duty, died in doing it, the most glorious death that was ever bravely. A child may live the life of a soldier in his thoughts, at times. Lula, may yours never die honor the sword!"

A POOR CLERK'S STORY.

POOR, and in search of lodgings, I wandered into the humblest district of western London, and after some failures in my applications, I found a dingy, blighted upon a fairly presentable house in a shamefaced street, not entirely distant from the principal thoroughfare of that section of the town. I was admitted—after repeated knocks, and just as my patience was becoming exhausted—by an old woman of about sixty-five, though it is possible that she might have been prematurely aged by want and misery. She was dressed in the scantiest of the terms of the lodgings, the poor old creature, who was bowed down by age and body frame, and palsy, stammered out that she would call her daughter to answer my questions, but "would I please step in-to the parlor." I complied, and sat down on the ragged mat in the dingy passage while the old woman hobbled and jerked herself down the stairs to the kitchen. I knew where she went by the door, for a dull sound of voices, which I had noticed upon entering, suddenly expanded into a confused roar, and then fell away, and both male and female laughter. The occupants of the kitchen, who were evidently carousing (it was between the hours of dining and the afternoon), seemed to me to greet the old woman with sheets of derision. Something hard was flung at her or her errand, and then, with a shrill, fiery cry out in her quaky treble, and the missile, whatever it was, rolling upon the wooden floor. A great laugh was raised at the old lady's expense. I recognized the trembling old tones, declaring, I presume, the matter which had so unseasonably interrupted the mirth of the kitchen. Then she came directly; and I shortly afterward heard a younger and stronger voice commanding the attention of my landlady stood before me. She was a bold, stubbly-looking woman of about thirty, with a face which, though not absolutely ill-looking, had a bad stamp, and certainly unattractive. She instantly assumed a smirk and courtesy to the prospective lodger; but I observed a certain expression of interance, and a peculiar lack of lustre in her eyes, which were not those of a habitual drunkard or rogue. She excused herself for not waiting upon me immediately; but "it was all along of that stupid old woman, who never could do nothing right, they; Heavin knew, she did nothing for the use of the house in return for all the eatin' and drinkin' which she consumed." I left it to on. After a wretched old woman, and denying in every word the fact that it was her mother of whom she spoke so coolly, she landlady proceeded on to the "drawing-room floor," and threw open the door with a conscious flourish. The room was scantily furnished, but I believe at any other time I should have incontinently left the spot; but something prompted me, and I agreed to hire the room for a week. I then became interested in spite of myself, and I was determined to know something more about my shabby old friend.

I had agreed to commence my lodgings from the first of December till the New-Year's Day following; and on beginning my reign in my new quarters, I found the wisdom of hiring apartments of this sort weekly, a plan I ever adopted afterward. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory and inconvenient as far as accommodation and attendance were concerned, and yet I said, for I had already found an interest in the place. The shaky old woman was the servant-of-all-work, the factotum, the fag of the lodgings. Often I have myself relieved her of the breakfast-tray, when the cup and saucer and bottom-bed and tea-pot have been trembling responsively, and the egg designed for my humble repast has been divorced from its cup and has been rolling wildly from side to side, like a barrel on deck in a storm. Sometimes I have, on the contrary, seen her, answered the bell, fetched the beer (no rascue), and performed, in fact, every menial office, with the shameless daughter and recruit semi-in-law sit.

drank (and were drunk), and slept at ease, with all household burdens, save that light one of receiving the lodger's money, shifted from their young shoulders to her crazy ones. After a due amount of patience on my part, I ventured to inquire of the old handmaid as to the ménage of the slipshod household.

"Why do you do all the work?" I said kindly to her one morning, after I had extricated my breakfast (at the expense of the egg) from entire dissolution at her hands. "It is too much for you."

To my surprise the poor old woman sat down on a chair and burst into tears. I was not a little astonished, but held my tongue till she had somewhat recovered, when I again remarked, "I'm afraid this is too much for you, my dear sir."

The old creature rose suddenly, and tottered to the door. "I humbly pray your pardon, Sir," she stammered. "I forgot myself. I've not been well lately, Sir, and the children have——"

"Stop," I said. "Shut the door, and tell me all about it. I am anxious to know all about you, and if I can do any thing——"

"Oh no, dear Sir," cried the poor old wretch, trembling with fear, in addition to her usual palsy. "I don't notice me, Sir, if you please; pray don't. If they were to know that I had been crying, or talking to you, they'd——" Here she paused, and looked earnestly at the door.

"What would they do?" I asked.

"They'd beat me, Sir. Often does, if I forget my place and lie, oh! be a-whi'—screaming, and flinging pewter pots at me. I was ill once for weeks from a blow he gave me."

"Why do you stay, then?" I asked; but a moment after I was ashamed of the folly of my question, as the old woman answered—

"Where can I go, Sir?"

The simplicity and despair in this response convincing me that I should do no good by personally interfering in the domestic misunderstandings, I refrained from further questioning, and waited for some issue to this course of ill-treatment, when I might, though an outsider, be justified in stepping in as a check. It soon came. In the Christmas week the poor old mother took to her bed, thoroughly conquered by the cold weather and the incessant washing. Every day I heard angry voices and curses blistering, and the wainscoting of which separated my bedroom from the wretched old creature's sleeping den. A feeble squeaking was all that rough usage, and the excessive exertion dictated by blood used to blaze within me at the cowardice and the low triumph of that drunken and disreputable pair, who bullied while their mother was gasping for breath, or calling for common assistance. I did once forget my position, and attempted to expostulate with the daughter, my landlady, who came into my room, attended by a rumpled-haired child with a dirty face (which was a pretty likeness of her mother's), on the morning of the twenty-fourth of December.

Bedizened was the landlady and ribboned all over. Evidently she was bound upon a merry-making with friends that Christmas-eve; and I was so struck with the heartlessness of a daughter who bedewed her fortunes, such as they were, to the poor woman starving and neglected in the next room) leaving a merry party perhaps, in the care of only a child of five years old, that I mildly reflected upon the impropriety which the customers might make on the occasion. I was speedily silenced by that indescribable manner which a low-bred woman always can assume to those whom she considers as interfering in her concerns; and on her departure, her husband, his eyes still dazed and lustreless from last night's excess, merely put his head inside my door and gave me a look; but that glance decided me against interfering any further. I was doomed to a closer intimacy ere—days, as it were, of my lodging, with no other occupants than a bedridden old woman and a drunken child. I had taken a rather more expansive dinner than usual that evening, in honor of the day; and when I returned, feeling my way back, I called out to the little child, who was, I supposed, in her granny's room, to come and show me where the coal-cellar was. A frill "I, Sir," answered me, and I waited for my little guide. She was a long time coming; and I was getting worried and cold, when I heard a strange hobbling outside my door, and, to my horror and amazement, the old mother staggered in with a coal-scuttle in her hand, the little child grasping her thin dress tightly and smiling the while.

"Gracious Heavens!" I gasped; "low's this? Why are you here? Whatever induced you to get up to do this?" I would have gone without fire a hundred times rather than you should have done this, child.

The old woman smiled, as I seized the coal-scuttle out of her palsied hands. "It's nothing, Sir—nothing. I'd do it for you, Sir—for you but not for them—oh, no, Sir, indeed. God bless you, Sir! Good-night, and a merry Christmas to you. Come, Nancy, darling!"

"For God's sake!" I cried, "go back to bed; you'll kill yourself in this bitter cold. Go back, I beseech you."

"I'm going, Sir," said the shivering creature; "but are you sure you want nothing fetched, or any thing?"

"In Heaven's name, no!" I cried again. "Do go back to bed; you'll kill yourself."

"No," muttered the poor old wretch, as I watched her retreating to her den. "I shall not have killed myself." And so murmuring she hobbled out of sight.

My terrors were increasing. I poked the fire, but could get no addition to my spirits by watching the friendly blaze. At last, worn out, and at a late hour, I determined upon going to bed, and trying to overcome the sad forebodings which had seized upon me by sleep. I lay long time awake, but at length I went off into a deep slumber. How long I remained unconscious I do not know, but troublesome dreams affected my sleep, increasing in horror till they culminated in my starting up in my bed with a loud cry ringing in my ears. Believing it to be the effect of a disordered fancy, I was preparing to sleep again, when my blood ran icily through my veins at a repetition of the former cry. It was a child's voice. Yes; and in the next room. I listened, and heard a struggling, and then the patter-ing of naked feet over the floor of the next room. I sprang out of bed, and rushed to the door. Suddenly I heard the child cry out in a pang of fear, "Granny, granny, don't! Send it away! send it away! Go away! I don't know you; you are so ugly. Go away!" And then, louder still, "Help me, help me!" The child's voice was raised almost to a shriek. Go away! go away! Who are you? Let granny alone. Oh, mother, mother, come back; come back to granny." And a moment after the little naked feet were pattering down and up the stairs, while the child moaned piteously, "Oh, mother, mother, come back!" Mustering my fears as well as I could, I leaped out of bed, huddled on my clothes, and cautiously opened my bedroom door. It was pitch dark outside; but I could hear the child, still moaning, descending the stairs. I groped my way to the old woman's room, I reached the door and paused a moment to listen. There was silence over the house, save when the wailing of the little girl could be indistinctly heard below. Carefully undoing the door open, I entered, and nearly choked-ed aloud at the sight which met my eyes. Crumpled up in bed, with face and knees together, sat the old woman. Her eyes were widely staring; her hands grasping the wretched quilt, her jaw dropped, her face the color of stone, and as inflexible. She was dead!

Taking a hasty inspection of the miserable room, to insure that no one was concealed there, and that there had been no robbery, I softly closed the disordered retired, and had just lighted my candle in my room when I heard the little creature at the door again. I called to her by name, and she ran, sobbing to me, speechless from horror. As soon as I could obtain an explanation, I asked her what she had seen? "Was it a man?"

"No, no; it wasn't a man, nee a woman. She didn't know what it was, for it was very dreadful, so ugly. Oh, poor granny, poor granny!"

This was all I could learn from her. I put her into my bed, and, leaving the candle lighted, went out of the house and walked about the streets till daylight. The morning returned, and knew not the worst then. They were sobered after this shock; and were civil to me, and thanked me for the care I had taken of the child, whom, however, they studiously kept away from me. The old woman was decently buried; and on New-Year's Day I left my lodging. I shall never forget that night so long as I live. But what was it that the child saw?

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1845)

GOLD PENS.

PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S GOLD PENS. 25 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.

ALL KINDS BY BARTLETT, No. 345 BROADWAY, N. Y.

SOMETHING NEW

IN PLAYING CARDS.

LOVE SCENES.

Designs Taken from Artists.

The above new Card has fifty-two beautiful pictures, of short stories, and they can also be used the same as ordinary playing cards, thus combining pleasure with profit. Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of stamp, and send for sample pack. $5 per dozen. Liberal discount to the trade. Address H. A. CASWELL, 60 Nassau St., New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Press, Chase, Roller, and Table Distribution. Bed 38x51. Price $2000.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Unguent will force a heavy growth of hair on the inside (open the smooth-est face) without stain or injury to the skin. Sent to any part by mail, free, on receipt of price. Address, or apply for circular, DR. F. G. GRAHAM, No. 67 Nassau St., New York.

Shuits' Unguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 50 cents. Address E. C. SHUITS, Troy, N. Y.

Attention Company!

Clark's Gunpowt, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustaches in six weeks or money refunded. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, for 50 cents. Any person using this Unguent, and finding it not as represented, by informing me of the fact, can have their money returned them at any time within 3 months from day of purchase. Price 50 cts. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money. Address, CLARK & CO.,

P. O. Drawer 119,

Albany, N. Y.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Horticulturist Pruning, Grinding Machines, and 10 other articles. 10 circulars sent free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

THE SWEET GUM and many certain remedy for Diarrhœa in Dr. Peck's Extract of Sweet Gum and Wild Cherry, prepared from the bark of the Sweet Gum tree, which is the only tree ever discovered, but is perfectly safe for children of all ages. A few bottles should be put in every package sent to soldiers.

Prepared by the Dixie Medicine Co. 42 Park Row, New York, and for sale by all druggists. PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETTS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENT'S PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000,

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be sold for more than one dollar each on any account whatever. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get your Circular containing full list and particulars; also terms to Agents, which is the best ever proposed and Town in the United States.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

203 Broadway, New York.

We send our entire Mammoth Jewelry Prize Programme free, with specimens to Agents. No charge for certificates or for doing the business. Provide return postage, and address JAMES R. WESTBROOK & CO., 109 Spring Street, New York.

The Graefenberg Company's

UTERINE CATHOLICON (Wilcox's Patent).

An infallible cure for "Female Weakness," and all Uterine complaints, Falling of the Womb, etc.

Price $1.50 per bottle. Five bottles for SIX DOLLARS.

Graefenberg Company's Vegetable Pills.

The best Pill in the world for family use, and for all Bilious and Liver complaints. Price 25 cents per box.

Address all orders to

J. P. BIDDLE, M.D.,

Resident Physician GRAEFENBERG COMPANY,

No. 139 William Street, near Fulton, New York.

☞ Inquire of DEALERS EVERYWHERE. ☜

CRISTADORO'S

Portable Printing Offices.

For the Army and Navy

H. I. CRISTADORO, Druggists, and all who want a Cheap, Portable, Intelligible, and expeditious Printing Outfit, for Circulars, Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., &c., &c., address Cristadoro's Co., No. 56 Ann St., N.Y., and Lincoln St., Brooklyn.

THE PRESCRIPTION, which was employed with such signal success at the Venezuelean Mission Hospital for the radical treatment of Consumption, in the worst stages, Asthma, Bronchitis, and Catarrh, derangements of the Nervous System, and disorders of the Stomach, Liver, and Kidneys, is now given to the Public, Gratis, by Druggists, and Invalids, with full directions for preparation and use. Free of Cost. Address, with stamp,

REV. JAMES T. KING,

Station D, Bible House, N. Y.

The mild seasons are most favorable for treatment.

FLORIMEL.

Ladies should use BURNETT'S FLORIMEL. It is a choice perfume, unlike the pungent and sickening perfumes in the market.

DR. B. C. PERRY,

DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York.

Formerly of Paris, Diseases of the Skin, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also consulted New York Presidents, and other Illustrations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free.

For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

(From Juries 8 and 4) at the

International Exhibition,

LONDON, 1862;

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, 1863, MAIZENA RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT EXCELLENCE AND PURITY.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlets, with 20 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter, to WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and everywhere else, in the most lucrative business now before the public. Sample sent by mail, free, on receipt of 25 cents. Address

T. & H. GAUGHAN, 116 Broadway, New York.

WANTED, in every TOWN, COUNTY, STATE, TERRITORY, and PROVINCE, with enterprising Agents to sell popular Books, Light Works. Small capital, liberal profits, quick returns. Circulars for return postage, or 3 cents in stamp, by FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, can be purchased from HAROLDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 49 Broadway. Boilers charged low rates.

THE ACME OF PERFECTION.

DR CURES CATARRH in six to five Days and Stages with unfailing certainty. Price $1 00. Send a stamp for a pamphlet. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents, 75 Bleecker Street, one door W. of Broadway, N. Y. Sold by Druggists.

New Music Book for Sabbath Schools.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL TRUMPET. A collection of Hymns and Tunes, Chants and Anthems, approved by 1000 Sabbath Schools Leaders, and entitled to THE ORIGIN OF THE TRUMPET, for the use of Sabbath Schools. By W. O. PERKINS. Specimen copies of this new and excellent book, for examination, will be sent, postpaid, for 25 cts. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

THE SUM OF DISEASE REDUCED.

By the operation of Brandreth's Pills, the sum total of disease is reduced, and their continued use, according to printed directions which accompany each box of new style, is certain to cure, in all cases where the life-principle is within their recuperative powers.

SYMPTOMS OF BRANDRETH'S FILLS CURATIVE QUALITIES.—The whole curative effect may be placed in this light. If the stomach and bowels are out of order, the general health is deranged. If appetite ceases the nerves and the body, whether local or general in character, that disease will more or less affect the stomach and bowels. Now Brandreth's Pills, by operating immediately upon the blood, and cleansing the stomach and bowels of matters that interfere with their healthy action, restore and keep in order these important and governing organs of the economy of man.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions, and are now under the PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

1864 Presidential Campaign 1864

MEDALS.

Manufactured and for sale by E. N. Foote & Co., 293 Broadway, N. Y. A specie awarded in every town and city.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little of every thing relating to the human system, Qict, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the luxury subjects treated in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Erysipelas, Piles, Liver and Kidney complaints of Digestion, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Female Organs of Generation, Barrenness, Impotency, Sexual Weakness, Rupture, Tape Worm, Nervousness, Sore Eyes, Diseases of the Heart, How to Save the Teeth, Sight and Throw Away Spectacles, Marriage, Social Science, Hygiene, the Curious Science of the Human Voice, Philosophy of Elopements, Philosophy of Child-rearing, a Chapter for the Married, and a thousand of values to married and single, never written before, making altogether a curious book for curious people, and a good book for every one. 400 pages; 100 Illustrations. To be had of all News Agents, or will be sent free by mail to all who will send 25 cents, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 00. Address R. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and examine, or two samples sent by mail for twenty cts. Retail for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have Just Published:

READE'S SAVAGE AFRICA. Western Africa: being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial, Southwestern, and Western Africa; with Notices of the Habits of the Gorilla; on the Existence of Unicorn and Trilobite; on the Slave Trade; on the Origin, Character, and Capabilities of the Negro, and of the future Civilization of Western Africa. By W. WINWOOD READE, Fellow of the Geographical and Anthropological Societies of London, and Corresponding Member of the Geographical Society of Paris. With Illustrations and a Map. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

HISTORY OF FREDERICK II., called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE. 8 vols., with Portraits, Maps, Plans, &c. 12mo, Cloth, $7 00 per vol.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND. By CHARLES DICKENS. Part I. Illustrated by Marcus Stone. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. By MRS GASKELL. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; or, Sabbath Readings. A Series of Discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By Rev. GARDINER SPRING, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in the City of New York. Portrait. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

DENIS DUVAL. A Novel. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "Pendennis," "Esmond," "The Newcomes," "Philip," "The Virginians," "The English Humorists," "The Four Georges," "Roundabout Papers," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GUIDE-BOOK OF THE CENTRAL RAILROAD OF NEW JERSEY, and its Connections with the Coal-Fields of Pennsylvania. 12mo, Flexible Cloth, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS: OR, SKETCHES OF A GIRL'S LIFE. Written by her Sister. With an Introduction by Rev. R. S. FOSTER, D.D. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

BARDAN'S HISTORY. A Novel. By ARTHUR B. FRENCH. Author of "The Lackey of Life," "The Story of Cervantes," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

☞ Any of the above works sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For August, 1864, Now Ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 75 each, or 11 Copies for $37 50.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S

WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for Four Months $1 00
One Copy for One Year 4 00
One Copy for Two Years 7 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 75 each, or 11 Copies for $37 50. Postage gratuitously in advance.

TERMS IN ADVERTISEMENTS.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements, payable in advance.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

A CASE FOR THE COLD-WATER CURE.

DOCTOR BULL. "Are you subject to these attacks?"

CAPTAIN SEMMES. "No, Doctor; this is the first of the kind. The fact is heretofore I have been very careful to avoid exposure to any thing which might produce the slightest reaction."

DOCTOR BULL. "But, about this affair; how did it come on?"

CAPTAIN SEMMES. "Well, first I experienced a sort of choking in the Side, accompanied by Symptoms of Collapse, followed by a General Sinking, and a kind of Swimming Sensation."

DOCTOR BULL. "Yes, yes—exactly! I think I had slight symptoms of the disorder myself some years ago. It is known among the profession as Yankeephobia, for which Spirit of Cayenne is frequently used: but in your case, I should recommend building up—a little iron, and—a forth. However, I will fix you up something which will make a man of you in no time."

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

PRESIDENTIAL Campaign Medals.
Of every description now ready in Pin and Medal. Trade orders solicited and promptly filled at Factory prices. Whole-sale Depot Campaign Medal Co., 436 Broadway, N. Y.

Good News for the Army.
If you are in the field, post-paid, any of our PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS ordered by soldiers for themselves or friends, giving an album of the full value of the money sent.
Our Albums have the reputation of being superior to all others in beauty and durability, and range in price from $5 to. $50.
Our catalogue of
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS
now embraces about 5000 Officers, Army and navy, statesmen, actors, copies of works of art, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Our assortment of these is very extensive, including a great variety of views of the present war.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, New York.
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials.

Don't buy your Gaiters
or Shoes without Fogg's
Patent Lever Buckle.
They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can receive Ten Cents Currency, and I will mail sample of two patterns.
FREDERICK STEVENS,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
65 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

POLLAK & SON,
MECHANICAL MANUFACTURERS,
652 Broadway, Near 4th St., N. Y.,
Wholesale and Retail. Flags of all order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $6 for sample pipe.

STAMMERING
Cured by Dutes' Apparatus. For descriptive pamphlet address H. C. L. Mears & Co., 921 Pa. Av., Wash., D. C.

U. S. Army Agency,
64 Bleecker Street, N. Y., opposite Par Department.
All persons having claims against the Government should procure them at this office for settlement and payment.
Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid.
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharges can be sent by mail.

B. T. Hayward,
208 Broadway, N. Y.
Head-Quarters for CAMPAIGN, ARMY, NAVY, and SOCIETY BADGES and MEDALS. GOLD PENS and JEWELRY of every description. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for a Nebraska illustrated circular.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cup, small size, enameled dial, cut hands, "English Movements," and correct time keeper.
A single one sent free by mail in neat case, WITH A BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $7.
A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $5
$18 Algerine, $18
ON OFFICER'S WATCH.
A Stress "Extra Double Gold Plated" engraved or engine turned Hunting Case Watch, Magic Spring, "Genuine English Jeweled or Model Movements," "A 1 Timekeeper" Independent Action, Self Balance, a "Correct Guide" to the Soldier or Traveler. Perfect time keeper. "Guaranteed one year." WILL STAND ACID, and is an Exact Imitation of $100 Watch.
Used by the British Army Officers.
Sent free by mail, in elegant Morocco Case, for only $18.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of Feb. 20 says of the "European Timekeeper," "It is a novelty here, and an imitation of the celebrated Jimalkeeper so much in use among the British army officers, and is calculated to meet the wants of our soldiers in the field." Illustrated News says, "Correct timepiece; and for bounty and fine finish they are equal in appearance to $40 watches."
Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 35 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

TROPICAL BALSAM
Prepared by Cornero Brothers and Co.
Known as infallible for the speedy cure of Gonorrhœa and other diseases.
Dr. Delamar Co., N. Y. Physician, writes: "I have made a chemical analysis of the 'Tropical Balsam' prepared by Cornero Brothers and Co., and find it to be a safe, effective and reliable remedy for Gonorrhœa and other diseases of the kind. It is composed of pure vegetable ingredients, and does not contain Copaiba, Cubebs, Turpentine, Sandal Wood, Mercury, or any poisonous drugs. It is a pleasant, safe and speedy remedy."
I have made a chemical analysis of the "Tropical Balsam" prepared by Cornero Brothers and Co., and find it to be a safe, effective and reliable remedy for Gonorrhœa and other diseases of the kind. It is composed of pure vegetable ingredients, and does not contain Copaiba, Cubebs, Turpentine, Sandal Wood, Mercury, or any poisonous drugs. It is a pleasant, safe and speedy remedy.
Dr. Jerome Cochran, M.D.
Dr. Delamar Co., N. Y. Physician, writes: "I have made a chemical analysis of the 'Tropical Balsam' prepared by Cornero Brothers and Co., and find it to be a safe, effective and reliable remedy for Gonorrhœa and other diseases of the kind. It is composed of pure vegetable ingredients, and does not contain Copaiba, Cubebs, Turpentine, Sandal Wood, Mercury, or any poisonous drugs. It is a pleasant, safe and speedy remedy."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VIII.—No. 396.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS.—$3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN.

WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, the new Secretary of the Treasury, whose portrait we give on this page, was born at Boscowen, New Hampshire, October 16, 1806, and is therefore now fifty-eight years old. He was a graduate of Bowdoin College, at the early age of seventeen, and at twenty-one was admitted to the bar. Remarkable for energy and intelligence, his progress was rapid. He was a member of the State Legislature when only twenty-five years of age, and was the youngest member of that body. His insight into the details of Political Economy as enunciated with legislation was even then early evinced in a debate on the United States Bank, in which he won distinction. In 1840 the Whig candidate for Congress, and successful even beyond the limits of a party vote; in 1845 renominated, but declining from a choice to pursue his profession; in 1850 again elected, but deprived of his seat by a mistaken return of ballots; in 1854 elected to the Senate, where he was perhaps the ablest opponent to the Nebraska bill; again elected in 1859, for the six years which are just expiring; and now, in consonance with the wishes of the whole country, appointed to fill the most difficult and the most responsible position in the Cabinet—these have been the steps by which Mr. FESSENDEN, for more than a generation, has steadily risen in popular estimation and in his power to serve his country. Not known as a man of genius, or even of uncommon brilliancy, experienced in solid statesmanship rather than superficial policy, he perhaps more than any other man was fitted for the position which he now fills. This is no blind confidence, since Mr. FESSENDEN, as Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has given a foretaste of his greatness as a financier.

IN THE TRENCHES.

WE give on page 485 three illustrations of the siege of Petersburg, relating chiefly to the operations of our artillery.

Captain AMSDEN's battery, Third New York Artillery, the subject of one of these sketches, is close to the enemy's line, which it incessantly annoys with troublesome messengers, stirring up the rebel infantry and distracting the aim of sharp-shooters, which, in turn, do their best to kill our gunners.

Another sketch exhibits a method by which the gunners protect themselves against sharp-shooters. This is effected by means of mantelets, which are really nothing more nor less than ramparts, heavily constructed, made to cover the embrasures, and having an aperture through which the gun's muzzle is thrust.

The Coburns, which are the subject of the remaining sketch, are small brass mortars, which have proved of great service in demoralising the enemy in his rifle-pits, in places where the lines are so close as to afford no available positions for light artillery. The Coburns are fired over our own soldiers at a great elevation, dropping shells with effect upon the unseen defenders of the rebel works.

WILSON'S RAID IN VIRGINIA.

GENERAL WILSON'S raid, which we illustrate on pages 488 and 489, dealt a serious blow against Lee's lines of communications with the South. This illustration affords the reader a vivid, and at the same time a correct, impression of the manner in which an extensive cavalry raid is carried. So far from being an irregular proceeding, a great raid is now as well organized as any other movement of the army: each man has his work to do, and one stage of operations succeeds another as regularly as the evolutions on a parade-ground. WILSON'S raid resulted in a destruction of sixty miles of railroad, a destruction in which the Danville and the South-side road shared about equally. General WILSON reported that it would take the rebels forty days, even if they had the material at hand to repair the loss. The expedition had some difficulty in returning; but it succeeded finally in eluding the enemy, getting back to our lines with a loss of twelve cannon and between 750 and 1000 men.

THE REBEL INVASION OF MARYLAND.

THE rebel raid in Maryland (illustrated on page 484), which a few days ago was the exciting theme of conversation, has vanished, leaving behind as the traces of its devastation desolated homes, empty roosts and stables, and broken communications. The Government has not been directly a great sufferer, although a considerable amount of commissary and ordnance stores were captured at Martinsburg. For the most part the burden of loss has fallen upon private citizens. The illustrations which we give refer to a few out of the many scenes connected with this raid; they need no detailed description. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal runs along the line of the Potomac from Georgetown to Cumberland, where it terminates; it runs side by side with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. The cost of the work was over twenty-two millions. The damage which the rebels have done will be easily repaired. It is an occasion for regret that they have been able to carry away so much plunder.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

ON page 492 we give a sketch illustrating SHERMAN'S advance. The action represented in the cut was only a part of a grand movement. The fighting was done chiefly by portions of JEFFERSON C. DAVIS and NEWTON'S divisions, of the Fourteenth and Fourth Army Corps respectively, who had orders to break the Confederate centre, if possible. At the same time an attack was made on the right and left by LOGAN and BLAIR. The attack on the centre, though gallantly executed, was unsuccessful. NEWTON'S division attacked on the right, DAVIS's on the left. General HARKER, one of the best-beloved men in the army, a brave soldier and a true patriot, was killed. Colonel DANIEL M'COOK was badly wounded, and Colonel MITCHELL slightly.

THE FIRE IN BROOKLYN.

THE great fire which took place on Friday, July 15, in Brooklyn, and which we illustrate on page 493, is the most destructive which has occurred in that city for many years. The fire, occasioned by carelessness, broke out in one of the two great warehouses of Messrs. SCRIBNER & RUTHERFORD, at the foot of Joralemon Street at 12½ o'clock, while the workmen were away at dinner. The two structures, partly of brick and partly of wood, were known as the Free and the Bonded warehouses respectively, extending 300 feet on the water-line and 200 feet deep. They were used for storage, and contained a great quantity of saltpetre, together with sugar, molasses, hides, and guano. As soon as the flames reached the saltpetre a terrific explosion took place, which shook the buildings in New York, and in the immediate neighborhood was very destructive to glass panes and frail ceilings. The explosion was repeated several times, and was so violent as to hurl firemen standing on the pier into the water. The immense crowd gathered about to witness the scene also suffered some annoyance from falling brick and timber which had been hurled into the air like rockets. Some shipping in the vicinity caught fire but experienced no serious damage. We give in the illustration a representation of the boats towing out the Russian frigate from the point of danger. The entire loss, merely considering the contents of the warehouses, sums up to nearly a million of dollars. Large business houses and private cottages in the vicinity were seriously damaged. When the Persian Street which is impossible to describe. Mothers were running about with their babies, and the street was filled with furniture, and the greatest excitement prevailed.

WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DROUGHT.

THE sky is brass, the lordly sun
Looks down with a fiery eye,
The shallow rivers scarcely run,
The streamlet's bed is dry.

The meadow's crust is stiff and hard,
The trees have a sombre hue,
The threadbare cost of the rusty sward
Needs patching with verdure anew.

Still bearing down, still staring down,
The remorseless rays are cast,
And scorching lambiet and seething town
Both swoon in their fiery blast.

The dust lies thick in the village road,
The cattle crowd to the muddy pool,
The swarming flies hold myriad revel
Around, and harass the village fool.

Oh heavily drops the bearded grain,
The summer flowers wilt and die,
And stretch their tiny stems in vain
To the clouds for tears of sympathy

None come; but the sound men ache to hear
Is the hurrying rush of the angry rain
Hurling its cohorts from far and near
On roof-tree and window-pane.

A thousand tongues for its coming pray,
A thousand hearts for its advent long:
Oh come and chase our gloom away—
Descend, and fill the land with song!

July 20, 1864.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1864.

MORE MEN.

THE Government calls for more men. The call has been long expected, and will be greeted with satisfaction by every loyal citizen. True vigilants in reinforcements save to ourselves upon every point at the very moment that the rebellion is straining its utmost strength against us: and should any man forget for a moment the greatness of the work in which we are engaged.

We are fighting with a section which has no other thought or interest than the war. Every man who can bear arms or do any work whatever is dragged into the service. As a resident of the South writes to the Hartford Press: "The infirm even are not exempt from the practical operation of the conscription. The lame, the halt, and,—the blind, almost, are there. They are food for cannon, and a diseased man fills a ditch as well as another.....The reign of terror keeps down in a great measure open opposition.....There is no instance in history of a more centralized despotism than that of the so-called Confederacy." The whole power of resources, drinks, and thinks war. It has no commerce; it has no trade. It raises its own food, and it agrees to consider bank paper money. Its soldiers are seized and forced to fight as long as the war lasts, at small wages or none. Its disaffected, the men who tacitly oppose the rebellion at home, apprehends favor if, are hunted and tortured and shot and hung. The rebellion has the fierceness, the unity, and the tyranny of a mere despotism.

It is very clear that we shall not put down such a rebellion by swinging our heels and grumbling at the Government. We shall not do it by counting our superior numbers and calculating our greater resources. We shall do it only by bringing those numbers and resources to bear. At this moment, when the rebellion is playing its most strenuous and desperate game, the Government wants men. Why do we not see that they are raised, instead of sneering that we ought to have them? The rebels dash over the border into Maryland. "Why does the Government allow it?" somebody indignantly asks. The chances are that the somebody who says so has neither been to the war, nor sent a substitute, nor paid a tax, and that he pays his income-tax with a groan or an oath.

Our business is not to sneer and grumble at the Government, but to help it. If somebody stops in his growling to say that it is useless to trust men or money to such a Government, then somebody merely reasons in a circle. For why grumble at a Government for not doing what you will not give it the means to do? But besides reasoning in a circle, somebody is wrong. Men are not put to good service. But if servants like GRANT and SHERMAN, with FARRAGUT and WINSLOW is not good service, what is?

Those eminent philanthropists, the "Conservatives," who massacred negroes last summer, declare that the wicked Government is piling up hecatombs of our fellow-citizens to glut its fierce lust of political power. But is an armed rebellion, of the scope of this, to be gently patted down with olive branches or extinguished with smooth drivel?

The Government asks us all to stand by it in this great crisis, with men and money. While the armies penetrate Georgia and Virginia it asks an army for this frontier—an army of reserves. To make assurance sure it must have the great reserve of the country to call upon at any moment. Every arm-bearing man in the Free States who cares enough for the country to fight for it at need should be enrolled and drilled every week. When Captain WINSLOW'S crew shipped in the Kearsarge a month-few of them could scarcely stir the eleven-inch Parrotts. After a season of steady drill they whipped them about like mauline-spikes. Let us be drilled, and our raw militia become the skilful crew. The pirate SEMMES says he hoped to board the Kearsarge. The brave tars of that glorious ship were trained for exactly that attempt, and longed for the rebs to try it. Let us be trained, and when the rebs try boarding the free States we shall show them how they, that we have them just where we want them.

The tortoise outran the hare because he meant to win. Our enemy is equally in earnest. Let us be in earnest, and not go to sleep again in Pennsylvania and Maryland, and we shall take the victory that belongs to us.

CORRUPTION.

The gentlemen who ardently sustained the Administration of which you were lamented General JOHN B. FLOYD, and Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, and Mr. HOWELL COBB, and Mr. ISAAC TOUCEY were shocked and astonished, and of which Messrs. WIGFALL, SLIDELL, JEFFERSON DAVIS, and TOOMBS were eminent supporters, are loud in their denunciations of frauds and treachery of the present Administration. There was such fidelity to the Union, such impartial love of country, such devotion to the Constitution among the gentlemen who filled the key of a government they were conspiring to destroy, that their friends and supporters can see little hope of the Union or of the Government except in the immediate return to office of their old associates and allies. "Conservative" doctors, especially, are extremely severe upon every the fact that the political sympathisers of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS are not likely to be triumphantly put at the head of the Government by the loyal American people, and loudly bewail official corruption and the degenerate times.

That there are great frauds upon the Government, trials and convictions like that of HOMESTAMM clearly establish. That there are gentlemen in uniform who take pay and play "ol soldier" is undeniable. That there are rogues still abroad, and even sometimes in the employ of the Government, is as true as it was when FLOYD and DAVIS were Secretaries of War. But that there are weak spots in the revenue service is as true as in the days when names which it would be painful to specify gave that service its reputation. And finally, that there are political corruptions are proportionately much less now than they have been for many years is as true as that publicity is sadder than secrecy.

When so immense a war burst upon the country, involving the raising, equipping, and supplying of an enormous army and navy, the opportunity of swindling and plunder was increased ten thousand fold. No Government could possibly prevent it. The only hope of escaping it lay in the universal honesty of the people; and if that failed—if it chanced that the people were not entirely honest—the rogues would betray their gains. The duty of the Government was to expose and punish the gamesters as fast as it could find them; and this duty it has not been omiss. It has been faithful and constantly performed. The public commission that sat in the Western Department, whose sessions were held in secret, closed, and the incessant private watchfulness of special agents, show that there has been no disposition to shut this duty; while the personal character of the gentlemen who have permanently composed the Administration has been such as to persuade every honest man in the land that, so far as concerned them, the Government and its Cabinet itself, as in the régime of rebels and their friends, whose return is so naturally desired by the pure and "Conservative" patriots who had no objection to Mr. FLOYD, but who find Mr. STANTON altogether culpable.

If any loyal man, however, is alarmed by the discovery of dishonesty among contractors, soldiers, agents, or ostensible friends of the Government, let him remember the consequences of the country, and reflect that such things are inevitable under any administration whatever during a war. JOHN HOOK barely bawling beef, beef, beef, through the Continental camp in the Revolution, shows that even the times that trict men's souls could not destroy selfishness, or prevent good citizens, therefore, promptly demand and support the investigation of all charges of corruption, wherever they may be laid and upon whomsoever they may fall. But at the same time let him discriminate. When he hears any ancient ally of FLOYD & Co. piously decrying corruption, let him suggest to the critic that the characters of the men and of the policy which he has always unshrinkingly supported make his criticisms suspicious. When Robert Maxime accuses his neighbor of stealing, Master Robert must not be surprised if people feel of his own pockets before they touch his neighbor's.

PEACE.

THE duration of the war and its cost in life and money incline some quiet souls, who would never consent to disunion, to ask whether we had not better try for a shorter road to peace than fighting. But is there any such road? Is there say so short a way out of the war as through it? Suppose that the Government should order General GRANT to send in a flag of truce and propose an armistice. What should follow? Why, he would ask the rebels upon what terms they would agree to return to the Union? But they do not wish to return. They have done with the Union. The error of the honest peace men is that they do not see the rebellion to be the expression of a determination of the rebel leaders to found a separate government. They know, if we do not, that a system of free labor and of slavery can not coexist in a political society like ours. It has been tried from the beginning of the Government, and was practicable for seventy years only because during that time the interest of slavery constantly overbore that of freedom. The moment it was clear that freedom was to prevail, the friends of slavery tried to withdraw to form a new nation. They do not question the fairness or constitutionality of the election. They did not even wish to see if any illegal acts were to be attempted. They said simply, as Mr. RHETT expressed it, that "it is nothing remarkable that Mr. LINCOLN's election or the Fugitive Slave Law. It is a matter which has been gathering head for thirty years."

The rebels armed, then, in the firm conviction that freedom and slavery were incompatible in the same Union. They were willing to risk war with an established Government, with a much greater population, with infinitely superior resources. For three years they have maintained the contest, although they have been steadily reduced in territory and power. And if now they were asked what terms they would accept, they would surely answer "disunion." They would say, 'Let us part in peace. You want liberty; we want slavery. We said so before we began the war. Let us separate.'

But if we should reply that they might dictate terms, would they be more pliable? If we should say that we would agree to tolerate slavery in any State, and in all the Territories; that its discussion should be a penal offense; that any body who decided the humane and religious and civilizing character should be imprisoned for life, and that the mention of the word should be a capital offense, would they retract? Certainly not. They would say, and with perfect truth, that we were promising more than we could perform. They would say, truly, that they knew the sincere sentiment of the loyal States was averse to slavery, and that consequently the mind and heart and conscience of the North would not support such an agreement. They would say that they originally rebelled not because of any violation of law, but because of a difference of conviction; and they would add, that while any kind of material interest might be adjusted a radical moral difference could never be permanently compromised.

What arguments could we offer them that would break the force of such convictions? What more could we do than promise to let them have their own way? Have they declined before what would remain but either to consent to disunion, or to compel them to submission to the Government?

"CONSERVATISM."

SINCE "Conservatism" culminated in the bloody riots of last summer it has not paraded its name very conspicuously. But of late we have observed that it begins to plume itself a little. "Conservative" men are invited to dine and chat. Resolutions and speeches are described as "Conservative." "Conservative" opinions are warmly commended. Let us see, then, what Conservatism truly is, and test the claims of that which just now in our history endeavors to assume the name.

The inevitable and eternal activity of the human mind tends constantly to draw society into ceaseless progress. This is the spirit we call Reform. It is the wind that forever fills the sails and moves the ship. Conservatism is the rudder which holds the moving ship to its course. The happy progress of society is achieved by the harmonious co-operation of both. Reform stimulates; Conservatism directs. In this true sense young men are reformers, old men are conservatives; or, as we might say, youth for action, age for counsel. But both are for progress; for without movement society, like the individual, dies.

Each of these tendencies, of course, has its extremes. There is an extravagance of reform which blows upon the sails with a fury that splits them, and a foolishness of Conservatism which deserts the rudder for the anchor. Both produce the same result; they stop the ship.

Apply these plain truths to our own situation. We are maintaining a Government founded in impartial liberty against a rebellion for the destruction of the Government and the perpetuity of Slavery. What is true Conservatism in such a contest? It is that course which steadily and strongly promotes the success of the Government and the overthrow of the rebellion. A true Conservatism aims first and always to preserve the vital principle of the Government.

Are then the ignorant, brutal ruffians who lustily denounce "niggers," or the better dressed and educated who accuse the Executive of pure despotism, who destroy public confidence in the management of the finances, of the army, of the navy; who sneer at all measures proposed; who suggest of our military misfortunes; who extol rebel successes; who charge the guilt of beginning the war upon the loyal States, and that of continuing it upon the Constitutional authorities; and who shout the valor of soldiers if they are negroes, in the face of the plainest facts—are these persons, who in every way embarrass the Government, who distress the people, and favor the triumph of the rebellion and slavery "Conservatives?" Yet there is not a single point of slander or accusation which now calls itself "Conservative" that does not do some or all of these things.

To such dull folly does this kind of "Conservatism" naturally fall that recently one of its organs deliberately declared the assault of the colored troops upon Fort Wagner, a year ago, to be a fiction. "Anxious to operate on the meanest prejudice that ever imbruted any portion of a civilized people, and fearing best slavery should become more unpopular in the light of the glorious heroism of men of the enslaved race, a newspaper peculiarly fond of calling itself "Conservative" denies that there was any such assault. It might as well deny that there was any Fort Wagner or any battle; and it may hope to be believed upon its word. And the hearts that ache and break because of that battle; when it can restore the brave youth who left his home to the paper, full of life, charm, and was "buried with his niggers" by the enemies of God, of man, and of the country, whose cause this "Conservatism" obsequiously serves.

Just as true as it is that the spirit of Conservatism is the same spirit which, despising human nature and love of man, was treasonable to the assignment of France, and produced the French Revolution: in CHARLES and JAMES STUART of England, and restored the kingdom for fifty years: in GEORGE III., and occasioned our great Revolution; and, finally, in the doctrines of human slavery at the bottom of revolt in this country, who have plunged us into this bloody war.

The true Conservatism of our Revolution protested with OTIS, ADAMS, and WASHINGTON against the encroachment of parliamentary power. The false cried, with Dr. JOHNSON, "taxation is tyranny." The true Conservatism, tried every legal form of redress, and, when it failed, was deluded by no siren song of peace and quiet and prosperity, but struggled for the independence of America and fought for six years. The false Conservatism decried the true, then as always, as radical, revolutionary, and incendiary. And the same spirit to-day, despising the real significance of the word it misuses, opposes a dull resistance to every form of progress and development which an enlightened people necessarily makes under free institutions. Consequently it is at once impotent, ridiculous, and contemptible. The Lamia, in the Greek story, smiled like a lovely woman; but the eye of the philosopher saw what she was, and brought her to nothing by the ground a loathsome snake. The modern Lamia will find the common sense of the Yankee as terrible as the philosopher's eye.

FIGHTING FOR OUR FOES.

IT is only gradually that the facts appear which illustrate the terrorism under which the people of the seditious States have long suffered. Thus we find in a M.S. letter now in our possession, written and sent from New York by a "friend of the South" in January, 1861, less than two months after the secession of South Carolina, the following passage:

"I had much money from the Gulf States in seeking investment here. I saw a letter from Bob Toombs bitterly denouncing the forced collection of money. One gentleman writes that he was visited the day he left by 20 minute-men, who ordered breakfast, maltreated his servants, and forced $300 from him."

Take this fact as a specimen, put it with the innumerable instances of the actions of Vigilance Committees in lonely country districts throughout the South—the mock trials, tortures, and executions of men whom any ruffian for any purpose chose to denounce—and what an appalling picture we have of the necessary condition of a society in which almost half the population were regarded as chattels, and in which a few great proprietors, owning the land and the laborers, kept their white fellow-citizens ignorant and debased in order that they might submit without repining to their own poverty and wretchedness, and to the slavery of the blacks! Of course, as in the case mentioned in the letter, the consequences of such a state of things sometimes recoil upon the authors, and the victims of the tyranny play the tyrant.

Many of these wretched victims are in arms against us. But we are fighting for them. The war for the Union and the rights secured by the Constitution is a war for their social and political salvation, and our victory is their deliverance. As the guns of GRANT and SHERMAN shake down their idols and clear the air, these men, and deluded fellow-citizens of ours, will see that in this country whatever degradation injures every laboring man, and that equal rights before the law is the only possible foundation of permanent peace and union. It is for them, as the people of those States, it is against the leaders and the system which have deprived them of their fair chance as American citizens, that this holy war is waged. God send them and us a good deliverance!

REUTER.

THERE is a person in England by the name of REUTER who has the supervision of the telegrams to the London press. He announced MR. LINCOLN's nomination as follows: "Mr. Lincoln has accepted the nomination of the Baltimore Convention, which opposes the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting Slavery." In view of the fact that the acceptance thus telegraphed was the response to the interview with the Committee, in which the President read a written and unqualified approval of that amendment, this is very well to say. We wonder whether that worthy purveyor of news announced that the Alabama had sunk the Kearsarge. Judging from the past, however the mistake occurred, the telegram said precisely what REUTER and the English friends of the rebels wished might be true. For he knows instinctively that the sympathies of the working-people of England, which controls the action of the Government, would desert our cause if they could only be made to believe that we had ourselves betrayed it.

NEW BOOKS.

A DASHING, smashing novel is "Captain Brand, of the Centipede, a Pirate of Eminence in the West Indies, his Loves and Exploits," by HARRY GRINDAGE (HARPER). It is crowded with the exciting incident which, in these days of the Alabama and Kearsarge, is most timely; and in this summer weather it is pleasant to hear the roar of the surf and feel the breath of the gale that sounds throughout the story. It is melodramatic, of course. Pirates and the Gulf can not be otherwise. But the hearty welcome of "Captain Brand" in London, where it has been already published, shows that HARRY GRINDAGE's hand has not lost its old cunning; and the readers of "Leo Grinpo" and "Scampavino" will not willingly lay down this last and most important work of the author.

The author of "Guy Livingstone" will always be sure of his audience. So eminent a preacher of muscular Christianity, in the proportion of a ton of muscle to a grain of Christianity, has a fascination for a very large docket. "Maurice Dering" is his new story large discourse. "Maurice Dering" is in not very long, and is a tale of passion and revenge. The book is a curious study of the state of mind which is peculiarly English, although not in the best sense. Like "Guy Livingstone," it reveals a certain brutality of nature, a Berserkir quality, which explains much British history.

The third part of "Our Mutual Friend" is published in Harper's Monthly for August. DICKENS is all himself in it. The profuse, rollicking humor of the portraiture of the Boffin family is in the most excellent vein, and the extravagance is in the direction in which he is always best. His story is read, perhaps, better serially than in any other way, because it is more fully read. So pleasant a meeting morsel we are sure to turn and taste all over. Boffin is one of the grotesque masks with which DICKENS delights to cover a simple, faithful, genial human heart, and which reminds us of the variety of our common humanity.

In the third number of the Magazine we may also mention the graphic and touching sketch of THEODOSIA BURR and the interesting account of the Shakespearian Tercentenary at Stratford.

THE LATEST REBEL POETRY.

THE poetic muse still lingers in the Southern land. The rebel rhymsters are not all conscripts, nor the rebel women all utterly forlorn. There is, after all, a great deal of humanity left in the world, although the half of them are fighting, and half of the other half starving, it seems that among the remaining quarter some yet affect to be poets; and complaisant editors of dingy, half-sheet, rebel newspapers encourage their "fine phrensy" by printing their effusions in small type in obscure corners of their journals.

By favor of friends in Nassau—which portion of the British possessions every body knows to be the "neutral" head-quarters of the blockade-running interest—we have come into possession of late files of Southern newspapers, containing numerous specimens of fresh poetical contributions. These rhymes are of all sorts and written in every kind of metre. The elegiac, lyric, sentimental, amatory, and patriotic are all represented; and although their order of merit is not of the highest, their value as literary curiosities is not to be lowered.

A NEW YORK publisher has recently issued a compilation of "Rebel Rhymes and Rhapsodies," collected from the Southern journals during the first year of the rebellion, which at this writing is an interesting and valuable addition to the war-literature of the time; but since the date of its publication there have been various occurrences calculated, as MR. YANCEY observed, to "fire the Southern heart," and especially to stimulate the Southern muse—such, for instance, as the death of the rebel General J. E. B. STUART (commonly called "Jeb" STUART) in battle, during the present campaign of General GRANT. Stuart was killed by a rifle-shot in one of the early fights in May; and having been buried in Richmond, with such military honors as the meagre means of that harassed capital afforded, elegiac poets came to cast their lays upon his tomb. One of these effusions, published in a Richmond paper, is entitled "The Dead Cavalier," and bears the signature of "Mrs. Marshall Winston." It opens thus:

> The drums come back muffled that, beating aloud,
> Went out in the morning all thrill to the fight;
> For the hero we dread to be buried is shroud,
> And his steed is led ground without rider to-night.
> He sleeps in the valley, the valley he fell for,
> And march on the cortège to cadences slow.

Then the poet bids the beholder "stand by the corse," and > ——Look down on that face;

> Mark where the bullet burst its way through—and proceeds to tell of > ——The story he wrote with the point of his sword:

> How it trolled through the cities, how it stirred up the land.

In a better vein than this is another—"In Memoriam"—to the memory of a young college boy written by H. C. Alexander. It has a melodious ring:

> Ten thousand scabbards clog with joy
> To arrange his bonnie plaid,
> Ten thousand shoes flash in sly,
> Ten thousand leaving behind are bare,
> Though Stuart is no more!
>
> No more! and is it then too true?
> Does beyond live so much more
> Nor yet again that flowing cree
> Shall we behold with gentle zeal
> Confront the battle's roar?
>
> No more your bonnie locks flow
> Shall Stuart lead the van—
> Asleep the rare Virginia knight,
> Nor rocks he 'tis the foe that flies,
> While victory follows him.
>
> Thou of the soldier's talon and brow,
> Mourn'st thou dead Jackson's charge?
> Mourn for the knighted Stuart then,
> Who brought you Jackson back again,
> O Rappahannock's magic!

Nor is this elegiac inclined to relinquish hope, even though "the flowing crest" lies low, for he adds:

> The royal blood is not extinct,
> Though Stuart and Hampton fall;
> Though Stuart falls, the Cavaliers
> Their bugles wind from hill to hill,
> And put their trust in God!

One more specimen of this elegiac poetry catches the eye. It is indited by Miss Margretta J. Cowell in memory of MRS. Beauregard, the wife of the rebel General. This piece of verse appears in the Mobile Daily Register, May 6, 1864, and is entitled "Lines on seeing Gnossa—the passionate utterance of a Southern woman:"

> Upon our country's altar still we lay
> With bleeding hearts our precious sacrifice;
> Accept, A God! with pride we offer Thee
> Of Southern Liberty the sacred price.
>
> O women of the South! in whose hearts
> How have ye meekly stood, an angel bond:
> Ever by your fire's constancy earned the right
> Of freedom for our suffering, struggling land.

Turning from these sombre pieces to the gayer efforts of the Muse, we find in the Mobile Sunday Mercury the following effusion addressed upon the President of the United States—evidently the production of some jovial rebel who determined to try what he could do:

TOAST'S TO ABE LINCOLN.

THE BRAVE CURSE.

> May Heaven's curses, dark and dire,
> Commingled with Almighty fire,
> Fall on your head and press you down
> With dreadful force to the dark dim sea.
>
> May pains forever from you fly,
> Fleasures flee when they come nigh,
> And in their place may gnawing pain
> Seize and rack your body and brain!
>
> May sleep ne'er bless your weary eyes,
> Nor guardian angels from the skies
> Around your bed their vigils keep;
> To guard you well should e'er you sleep!
>
> May friends forsake you, foes increase,
> And no kind hand assist or bless,
> But all the world be you to curse,
> And crush your life with bitterest woes!
>
> May loathsome sights appall your eyes,
> And scalding age with furrows rise;
> So mar your life that thou shalt rave
> For final refuge in the grave.
>
> On you may hell put forth its might,
> And shroud your soul in endless night;
> May this curse be thy resting-place,
> And that of all your cursed race!

And if there be a curse more dire
Than hell with all its liquid fire,
Oh, may it in your soul e'en creep,
And hellish fiends their slightly orgies keep!

TOASTER.

In this case "Toaster" must be a misprint for "Curser." No gentleman surrenders of indignant Fontiff was ever more hearty and precise. So far as we can learn, however, MR. LINCOLN still sleeps o' nights, just as if "Toaster" hadn't cursed him so heavily.

The sentimental mood inspires "Fireside Musings" in the mind of another Mobilian, who writes four plaintive verses, one of which is as follows:

> And my child upon my smiling,
> From my heart will grief beguiling,
> Seems an angel sent to cheer me in this dark and troublous hour,
> Like link'twixt earth and heaven,
> Like a bright and beauteous flower,
> Bearing me above the tempest and the clouds that o'er us lower.

It would be impertinent to hint that this resembles Poe. It is only the utterance of a Poet.

Two more verses complete the stunning this collection. One of them is given below, according to the original; and it is certainly a unique production:

THE WAR SONG.

> 1 Ime called to serve to leve my home > my wife and Children too > and thare is not my wifull doom > as many other do
>
> 2 I march in to the battle field > and there to risk my life > there men there bloody weapon yeild > for both sides and strife
>
> 3 all those to me boo are so dear
> they wep their grief and mourn > they live in deal of Death and fear > that I shall never return
>
> 4 but ot it is I must submit > what are my fats may be > to late the battle I have to meet > my God to strengthin me
>
> 5 should this not fill a bonan beat > and here upon the ground
> I can not help but feel distreet > for those I left behind
>
> 6 the end effects of war I feel > for sin my Jins must pay > yet it is by me Makers will > my life may still be spared
>
> 7 Lord be with all of mine I pray > and all of my cosenes > and make us meet to cross from day to day > thy christ Lord to bless
>
> 8 it may be that this war will end > and prisners all set free > and volitteers returning home > and soldiers cease to be
>
> 9 if Ime called home whilst I am gone > shed not a tear for me > but tell to all my friends a round
> I died for liberty

10 there our Widows are left to mourn for Husbands once so Dear how fell upon the battle ground and never made to fear

11 now I must say farewell to you and all I do not see to think that I my lore no more perhaps shall meet with me

12 but if I never more see you
I hope you'll meet in Glory while I am roving ore the hills of Heaven for ever more.

"The Contraband's Return" is a beatific vision of the happy time when the runaway slave will trot home to a "master," and pray for the privilege of being once more the humble bondman. The writer puts these words into the mouth of this impossible African:

> Don't you know me, Massa William?
> Don't you know me, Missus dear?
> Don't you know old Aunt Rebecca,
> Who went away from you last year,
> With Peter, Phil, and Philip Judy,
> To join the wicked Yankee crew?
> But I've come back, my dear old Missus,
> To live and die with you!
>
> I never knew the old plantation
> Was half so fresh and green to me
> As when among that Yankee nation
> The rebbles drove me to be free!
> But when I looked around for freedom,
> (We thought it was the bright and fair)
> Hunger, misery, and starvation
> Was all that met us there.
>
> * * * * *
>
> O, Massa William, see me kneeling!
> O, missus, my one word for me!
> You'll let me stay? Oh! thank you, massa;
> Now I'm happy! now I'm free!
> I've seen enough of Yankee freedom,
> I've had enough of Yankee love!
> As they have treated me, I'll treat them,
> Do't down to them above.

Here is a little prose poem of a peculiar style:

> So long as the Union was faithful to her trust like friends and like brothers we were loving and were just but when the Yankees proclaimed our rights to be theirs but we'st hoist on high the bonnie blue flag that bears the single star.—Richmond Whig.

Then cheer boys cheer Raise on high the joyous shout for Arkansas and Kentucky one and both were out and let another Rousing cheer for tennessee Be given for the single Star the bonnie blue flag has grown to be three.—Cheers—hurra hurra.

There are many more of these curious productions—elegiac, lyric, sentimental, didactic, and patriotic—but we conclude with the following very creditable specimen of the rebel amatory style, "written for the Mobile Tribune."

"OUR JESSIE."

> Our Jessie is pretty and true,
> Our Jessie is modest and true,
> I'm half dying with love,
> I could act or I could die,
> And drink my champagne from her shoe.
>
> Oh Jessie, I'm sorry I was,
> Oh Jessie, so pretty and wise,
> What pleasure the sun
> Can I ever have done
> To merit the light of those eyes?
>
> For Jessie, Oh Jessie, my life,
> For Jessie, through darkness and rain
> I'd ride a fine horse
> Though a cord for my neck
> Should await me, recruiting again.
>
> Oh Jessie, My Darling, My Dear,
> I would that I were a bee,
> I'd sock only thy lip,
> And there I would sip,
> (What an object of envy I'd be!)
>
> Oh Jessie, you dear little duck,
> Can such monster one be?
> Why an angel would blush,
> Look you mad, and my bush,
> If I kindly compared her to thee.

GEORGE WOOD.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

GENERAL GRANT'S army still confronts the rebel lines at Petersburg. There is no new development in the investitures of Richmond; a portion of GRANT'S force, a very small portion, was recalled to Washington at the time of the raid, but they will soon be returned. The engineering of the bullets registered in the papers of the day was completed on the 26th, and by the retreat of the rebels, will soon enable our forces to intercept their communications. The long-continued drought is very perceptible.

It is reported that General SHERMAN has crossed the Chattahoochee: but he has not, it seems, very closely followed the rebels beyond the river. Much of the plain may be affected by interruptions in his rear has become a serious question. His communications must be protected: it is a long line to protect even if he had a hundred thousand men to spare for that specific purpose. He has found it necessary to issue an order prohibiting sweethearts in the disinfecting of camps. The Chattahoochee River rises in the Appalachian range in Habersham County, Georgia. Before it empties, it receives the water of Alabama at Miller's Bend, from which it flows nearly south, forming for 200 miles the boundary between Georgia and Alabama to its junction with Flint River, with which it unites, forming the Apalachicola. It is navigable for steamboats 220 miles above this junction. The latest advices report heavy rains on the head waters of this river. Johnston, not choosing to defend the line of the Chattahoochee, has withdrawn behind the fortifications at Atlanta.

The rebels appear to be inaugurating a series of offensive operations on a small scale, the object of which is to interrupt the main campaign in the line of the road. This line of operations begins with Early's raid into Maryland. We now hear of an invasion of Kentucky by a mere body of rebels moving into that State through Pound Gap.

LATE REBEL RAIDS.

The events of the late rebel raid may be summed up as follows: After the engagement at Lynchburg, June 18, Hunter, despite the superior numbers of the enemy, was of escape so convenient as through the Blue Ridge to Crawley. He left his heavy guns for Early to carry to the valley. He did so, accompanied by a cavalry force under Duncan, and reached the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, July 5, at a point just above Harper's Ferry, threatening Martinsburg. Sigel, in the valley, fell back to Cedar Creek and Sharpsburg. The rebels immediately occupied Martinsburg, and Hunter captured valuable stores there. But the Commissary and Quartermaster department, not forced into the valley, were ordered to Harper's Ferry and thence to Cumberland. The same day a force of rebels occupied the railroad, in which Duncan's Mulligan, covering Sigel's retreat, was driven back to Sharpsburg, where he was joined Sigel, and another engagement occurred. The federal forces being now reinforced, fell back to Maryland Heights. Max Weber, encamping Harper's Ferry, joined Sigel. In the meantime General B. Kelley, protecting the railroad from Baltimore to the Monocacy, prepared for nothing but an order to retire on Sigel. Gen. Wallace joined him on the afternoon of the 3d.

After crossing the Potomac the raiders in detached forces engaged in plunder; but on Saturday, July 9, they dispersed from Hagerstown, Frederick, Westminster, and other points threatened: but this was only for the purpose of concentration. Our forces had evacuated Frederick the previous night, and fallen back to Monocacy Junction. Here a fight took place between Lew Wallace and the combined rebel forces: the result was unfavorable; we were again concentrated and driven back on Washington, on the road to Baltimore. General Tyler was taken prisoner. The rebels then appear to have separated again, turning up here and there at unexpected points, and doing considerable injury to private property. On the 13th they cut the telegraph between Philadelphia and Baltimore. At Magnolia, thirteen miles from the city of Florida was less than that distance from Baltimore, a rebel force of 2,000 men, under Colonel Bradley T. Johnson, destroyed train from Baltimore. The 10 o'clock train was also captured. The force of these Major-Generals Franklin was taken prisoner. Gunpowder River Bridge was burned. Brigadier-Generals Lawrence Brailford, Franklin Stark, and General Ould were destroyed.

The rebels had been concentrated at Bladensburg and Beltsville on the railroad seven and twelve miles north of Washington, before capturing all communication with Baltimore. The rebels appeared before Fort Stevens, on the Seventh Street road, but were repulsed. Gallatin on the seven time, with his column, crossed the mountains at York Village, on the Ohio River and reached Parkersburg, where he established communication with Washington. Another column reached Cumberland. General Grant immediately ordered the reinforcements to Washington, and the movements and designs of the rebels, and their escape from the expedition are matters of history.

The Army of the South Corps was sent on from before Petersburg, and a part of the Nineteenth from Fortress Monroe. On Wednesday, July 13, the rebels began to disappear from the Washington fortifications, and their plunder with them. GENERALS TYLER and FRANKLIN both escaped.

CITY CHARLESTON.

An expedition under the command of General Foster, having for its object the seizure of James Island and other operations in the city, was partially successful, the lower end of the island having been captured. Subsequently an expedition under General Gillmore, composed of United and Twenty-seventh New York, fitted out for the purpose of capturing James Island by a night attack, signally failed; a portion of the force, about 192, were landed, but not being supported at the time, were captured by the rebels.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEW CALL.

President LINCOLN, on Monday, July 18, issued his long, expected proclamation calling out 500,000 men for service, with the provisions of the Enrollment Act as heretofore. The quotas of the States are given below, the following: The President may call for the militia for nine months or one, or three years; the volunteers to receive one, two, or three hundred days' pay for those terms respectively; if the quota is not filled by volunteering within fifty days a draft may be made for the deficiency; no men will be taken or recruited from the rebel States; all men hitherto enlisted and now in service, and who have since re-enlisted, are credited to the quota of the district in which they reside; the draft may be made for volunteering under the present call expire September 5.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

The vote of censure on the British Ministry which DISRAELI and his friends have been trying to get in the House Parliament has been passed in the House of Lords by a majority of one, and defeated in the House of Commons by a majority of eighteen. Among the supporters of the Ministry in the House of Commons are Gladstone, and Kinglake stand prominent.

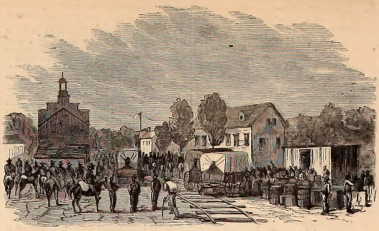
The death of the captain of Alsen are the following: The Germans were prepared, the moment hostilities were declared, to take a position on the island. Half of the Danish force, between one and two o'clock, they threw three bridges across the narrow strait, only 200 yards wide, and soon had on the Alsen side a force of 6,000 men, with cavalry and artillery. The Danes had only about 3000 men on the island. This force was compelled to fall back; it was drawn up in the form of a crab-lamp, to keep in check the overwhelming masses of the enemy; a sharp engagement occurred, with a somewhat heavy loss on both sides. The Danish army endeavored to escape to the Islands, with what success is uncertain.

MEXICO AND PERU.

The Emperor Maximilian has sent invitations to the late President JUAREZ, and other leading liberal chiefs, to come to the city of Mexico, and there consult together on a plan of restoration, guaranteeing them full protection. This invitation was indignantly rejected.

The Peruvian authorities are making great military and naval preparations, as if expecting a war with Spain on the Chincha Islands difficulty.

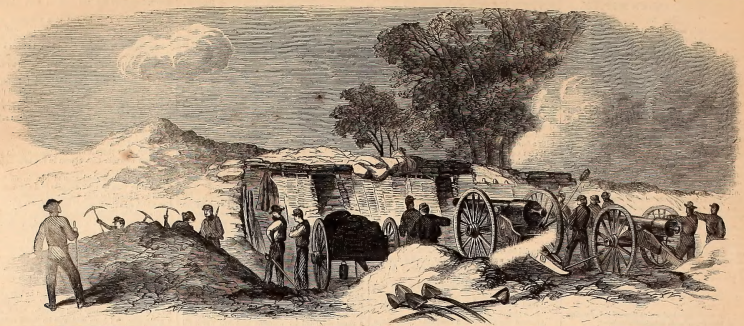
THE REBELS ROBBING THE FLOUR MILLS IN MARYLAND.



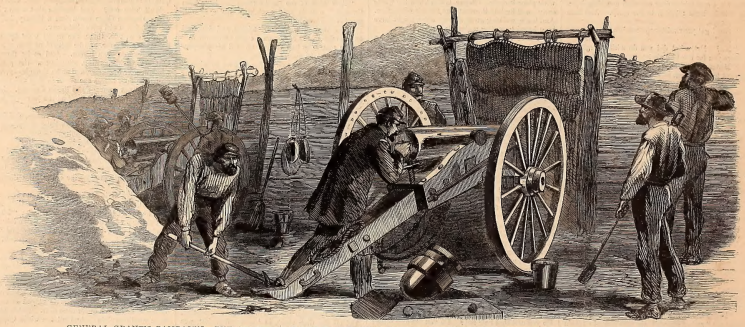
THE REBELS PILLAGING AT THE HAGERSTOWN DEPOT.

THE REBELS RETREATING WITH THEIR PLUNDER ACROSS THE POTOMAC RIVER.

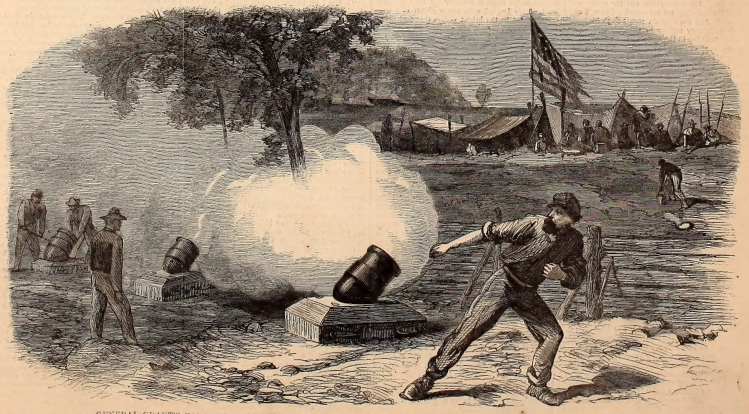
THE REBELS DESTROYING THE CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—CAPTAIN ASHBY'S NEW YORK BATTERY IN THE TRENCHES BEFORE PETERSBURG.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—THE GUNNERS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CORPS PROTECTED BY MANTELETS.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—SHELLING THE ENEMY FROM THE COHORNS.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

CAPTAIN GAGE'S MITTEN.

THE Captain reined in his horse at sight of his friend, Major Owen, with a cry.

"I say, Owen, will you do me a little favor? I've got to go down to Silsbee's to see about that case of Smith's, and can't stop to attend to my own affairs. There's a box from the 'Sanitary' just in, and I want a pair of gloves, mittens, or something. Lost my last pair yesterday riding back from that confounded creek."

Owen assented to the "little favor," and the Captain went along to attend to that case of Smith's, confident that his own wants would be faithfully attended to by the indefatigable Owen.

It was night when he returned—a cold, dark November night, with a drizzling rain driving from the east. Wet and chilled, his ungloved hands numbed with the exposure, his temper a little sore from his unsatisfactory mission about that case of Smith's, you may be sure he was in no very hilarious state of mind by the time he reached his tent. Tired, wet, hungry, and disappointed, he sat down before the little fire, which that lazy scamp, Pat Larkin, had assured him would soon "turn up like gowst," and while the same "gowst-like" was making preparations for his supper, he let his mood have full sway, not in outward expression, but in murky downhearted speculations on the past, present, and future of his life. And at this juncture in looks Owen, the indefatigable Owen, with his broad, good-humored face.

"Hullo! look at last, eh?"

"At last—yes."

"You must have had a nice time of it," glancing at the heavy top-boots splashed with mud.

"Well, I haven't been through Paradise, it's true," answered the Captain, shrugging his shoulders. Then followed a talk about that case of Smith's, a case which does not need unfolding here, as it bears little relation to the story. And then Owen says,

"Oh, I got your mittens—seen 'em?"

"No."

"No? Pat, what did you do with the mittens I gave you for the Captain?"

"Mittens? Sure I put thim away in the chist beyant to kape them safe."

"Well, won't you have the goodness to bring them forth from the 'chist beyant,' Sergeant Larkin," suggested Owen, laughing.

But before this could be accomplished Owen was called off.

"They're the best I could get, Tom. No great things, I guess, but there was a skirmish for mittens above every thing," was Owen's words as he went out.

"By George, there goes a good fellow!" ejaculated Gage, with his friend's exit. "He'll do any thing for a fellow, from a pair of mittens to risking his life for him. Lucky boy to! Sweetmind which he has bread falls, it will come up right. No, I don't care for the mittens now, Pat; put them there any where on the table, and give me my coffee."

And after the coffee and accompanying solids, his mood a little lighter, he lighted his pipe, and, lighting his pipe, turned lazily to the mittens, thinking not so much about them as that perplexing case of Smith's.

No great things, as Owen had said, were these mittens. They were of dark cloth with flannel lining, stitched neatly in red, but otherwise old and thin sewed mittens are.

"I dare say the thumbs are too small—they always are," rather grumblingly commented Captain Gage as he contemplated them. Drawing one on, he found he had reckoned too soon. It was a fit—a perfection. However, there was the other, and "Half the time they are not mated. There, I told you so!" And the Captain threw down the mitten to his imaginary auditor in triumphant disgust. And the finish lay in the thumb. Not that it was too small or size; it was filled up with some thing. He drew the "something" forth.

A little gold thimble; it looked like a child's thimble, and was well worn. Perching it upon his smallest finger Tom Gage regarded it with a smile of amazed amusement. Gradually this combined his observation, the expression of the smile changed. Into it stole a wistful softness, a yearning homelook, which told the story of his thoughts. He fancied the far-away scene, the wide, bright room filled with women young and fair and old, and turning away with pretty enthusiasm, though the day was hot or cold, over their "Sanitary" garments. He fancied how he had labored among them, some hunting vainly for her thimble at the last, and wondering where she could have lost it. Women young and old, and all this little lady, who, he had lost her pretty thimble in her work, perhaps, had put in all these days and evenings a great many kind and gentle thoughts for the possible wearer of her work. He pleased himself fancying still further what these thoughts might have been. How she might have imagined the manner of man this wearer would be—how she might have wondered, as she thinked away, what dreary moors they might go, and perhaps dropped a sigh of pity out of her little tender heart. Were such thou the thoughts of girls about soldiers? He fancied he from the many and many simple, eager questions he had found there a happy and manly one, and the tearful dark eyes that had looked up to him at some little recital of battle.

"Ah, women, young and fair and kind, or any women, young or old"—they were all fair, all kind, it seemed to him now—"when shall I live once more in your gentle, refining presence?" he sighed.

And sighing, his eyes light upon the little thimble—the tiny enchanter that has so suddenly summoned up far-away scenes. A glint of the candle sending up a feather flame falls upon the gold, and he spies what had escaped him before—a name engraved just above the delicate chasing. He bends eagerly forward; no school-boy could have been more excited than the "fire-eating Captain," as he was called. But consider the rare change of such excitements to a soldier living ankle-deep in Virginia's "sacred soil," and allow him his eagerness even over a lady's little gold thimble. He bends eagerly forward; perhaps there was half a hope that he might see some familiar name. No; though certainly not an uncommon name, it was not familiar, this brief name of Sue Browne, so deftly engrave etters amidst the twining leaves, and tendrils, and bunches of grapes. And not a romantic name, certainly, but it set Captain Gage off on another "fancying," a journey upon which we will not follow him. But when he returned from it he found his pipe was long since out, and the fire that had justified Sergeant Larkin's assertion, that it would "burn up illigant," was now but dying out. Captain Gage threw up to it, but with a faint laugh.

"Tom Gage," he said, reprovingly, shaking his head, "what an ass you are! Go to bed, Tom; go to bed and sleep off your folly."

But before he followed this sage advice he dropped the little thimble for safe-keeping into his watch-pocket, saying, gravely,

"Sue Browne, Miss Susan Browne. You have tapped on Tom Gage's hard skull with that fairy thimble of yours till I think you have cracked it."

II.

And did he sleep off his folly? That depends on what his folly was. If it was any thing connected with Miss Susan Browne's gold thimble I do not think he did.

The next day that indefatigable Owen met him with the question,

"Well, how about the mittens? Did they fit?"

"To a charm."

And that was all. Not a word did Captain Gage say of what he found inside the mittens. But he and-by, quite accidentally, you know, he asked about "Sanitary" boxes, and how they were got up, and what place it came. Oh yes, Owen knew the whole story; and he told it, greatly to Gage's edification. And Gage, making away with Owen's cigar, might have been heard to mutter under his breath,

"I dare say that girl has got red hair, and a squint to her eyes, and an awful temper."

What girl could he have meant but Miss Susan Browne, in his connection with the "Sanitary" box? And what right-minded person would say that she had red hair, a squint to her eyes, and an awful temper?

Captain Gage, I am afraid you prophesied truly of yourself when you said that a certain small thimble had overturned all the "sense" in you.

But leaving him here, let us slip back to where that "Sanitary" box came from, and see if Miss Susan has got the red hair, the squint in her eye, and the awful temper he endows her with.

There is a large, wide, bright room, as he had fancied, and there are certainly many young and fair; and older women, matrons and mothers, whose hearts are warm with sympathy for the "boys" in all of the fair workers. Clip, clip go the scissors; stitch, stitch click the needles; and there is a deep, sweet, murmuring sound of voices. Every now and then by a laugh that tinkles through the busy hum like a little chain of bells. Here are Mariana, and Matilda, and Miss Caroline. You hear their names called out occasionally; and presently comes the call, "Sue! Sue!" and, you look over that pile of flannel, and there, next to the window, she sits—Miss Susan Browne. And what do you think of Captain Gage's idea of her now? Do you call that hair red? Do you see any squint to those brown eyes? And is there any indication of an awful temper in the quick way that lifts up to view as her name is spoken? A little compact head, darkly tressed, with a gleam of wavy auburn here and there—bright threads that flashes out between a puff. Eyes straightforward and lucid as the skies, and within them the soul that such tokens a temperament where no sudden fires burst into storms. But there is plenty of spirit there, and lively vivacity, as nobody who knows Miss Susan Browne will deny—

"And she sits there and blesses Captain Gage's mittens!"

Not a very dashing flower, not one to make Musket, or Kate's, or Caroline's eyes ache with envy, but a sweet, pleasant flower all the same, with such delicate pinks that make little show in garden clusters, perhaps, but are sweet to the senses when one comes nervades every corner. And as "she sits there and blesses," she sits there and sews, on a mitten of dark cloth, that same little thimble. Click, click, goes the needle as the red silk stitches form, into lines; but I am afraid her lively expressions of face and eyes do not indicate that she is to Captain Gage's somewhat pathetic fancy. "Dear, dear, she must have had needle work enough, I'm sure! these horrid mittens! I believe I shall mar my fingers to the bone with them!" And she puts up the little stained forefinger that pretty well proves her belief.

"I'll change work with you, Sue," says one of the matrons, looking over a girl-voice behind her, with gracious amiability at this plaint of the little carnation-pinks.

"Oh, no, thank you, I'll finish what I have begun. I hope though the wearer won't look at the stitches."

"I wonder who the wearer will be, Sue."

"Some great clumsy fellow, I dare say."

There was a Roland for a Susan Browne, Captain Gage.

And then followed a vivo talk about the relative merits of "seam, and gusset, and band," and what they liked best-to do, and "weren't these thumbs horrid to make?" "and how that cloth smutted the hands!"

"But after all," concluded Miss Susan, brightly and decisively, "I don't suppose much is necessary for soldiers, poor fellows!"

"So would I," and "so would I," chorused all the rest, ruffling Captain Gage's fancy at last.

And then, perhaps, these queen-bees, and roses, and pinks, clustering their lovely heads together, talked over some special soldiers, young officers, and it may be, privates, whom they knew. And I dare say their words went hither and thither with their thoughts; at this party, or that festival, where they met Captain A, or Lieutenant B, or C; and it is quite likely that they criticised Mary's gown, or Anne's hair, or Fanny's manners, as they went on; but I am quite certain they were sweet-natured and well-bred about it, quite certain that they were womanly, instead of womanish, in which two words there lies a vast difference of meaning, you know.

And taking up his pipe was late autumn day darkened toward its close, and they rose up to make preparations for going home.

Then it was that Susy exclaimed: "Why, I can't find my thimble any where!"

They all joined in the search. And, "What did you work on last, Sue?" asked one.

"On those mittens, and I had it on my finger when I was packing them away in Miss Deane's box."

"Oh well, I dare say it fell into the box. I'll run in and ask Miss Deane to look out for it before the box is sent with the rest; the Deanes live in our block, you know."

And that settled the thimble question for them; but, as we all know, Miss Deane did not find the thimble.

III.

THERE was great rejoicing that day in some hearts, and there were not a few, for the—ah—had arrived. The mail-bag, the colors waved, and cheers went ringing up as they "came marching down the street." The drummed many eyes at the old flag, stained and riddled, fluttered by, and a shout ascended for welcome that was worth all the rest.

"Think of the battles that flag hasbeen through!" a man said to another on the sidewalk.

"And think of the battles those men have been through!" a little lady exclaimed, her eyes wet, and her lip quivering.

The little lady was our friend Sue, and she stood on the edge of the curb-stone, eager and excited.

The men were marched and nudged his companion, and said, in an under-tone,

"Guess she's got a sweet-heart along with 'em."

If Sue had heard the words she would have like her to have thought, if she had not said,

"I wish I had—I'm sure I couldn't have braver."

And there she stood in the bright winter sunshine, waving her little white handkerchief, and smiling and smiling her welcome. Though she had no personal acquaintance amidst them, all solitaries were like kin to her, she said. But she knew the names of the officers by this time.

That was Major Owen, that great fellow with the red face and the white hair; Captain Gage, with looked so grave, and was so tall."

Wave, little handkerchief, in the winter wind, and smile, smile, for that is your innocent salute! Though these grave faces may not smile in return, their hearts are warmed by your greeting.

And Captain Gage, passing by, noted with rapid glance one and another; and Sue, with her handkerchief, could not for some escape his notice. But she was almost under his horse's feet—the dear, little dark face, with its tears and its smiles, and the flattering white signal! And Captain Gage, as he caught sight of it, thought just as the man upon the sidewalk had thought, that the girl had a sweet-heart probably among them. And in another moment he was observing somebody else, I suppose, and had quite forgot all about it with the sweet-heart. And all the time there, in his watch-pocket, was that little gold thimble which he had never forgotten.

"When I go home," he had said, "I will find this Miss Susan Browne, and restore her property." And how that Miss Susan Browne was finding out her eyes, and no wonderful prescience told him of it.

To find a Miss Susan Browne in a great city was something like the old proposal of "looking for a needle in a haystack." To be sure he knew that the Sanitary box came from such a department of the city, but there were so many branches. In the first place, Miss Susy, making every body her "dear," if they knew a Miss Susan Browne, and the answer was invariably "Yes," then he investigated further. Perhaps as Susy was not on a committee, nor holding any other office, but was simply a Miss Susan Browne, and a favorite with every one in the world, he failed to get a clew to her here.

And then—but if I should tell you how the fretting Captain Gage, all about this gold thimble, I am afraid you would believe that it had most certainly cracked his hard skull.

One, two, three, four, the weeks sped by! The regiment was rapidly filling up its depleted ranks, and not some of the soldiers were ready for the word to return to duty again. And there was Susan Browne's property yet on his hands; so he kept up the "round of drawing rooms" business, which for a long time threw only dust in his eyes.

Once sauntering down Broadway with Owen, he heard a girl-voice, instead of a girl-voice behind him, and one pronounced the magic name.

"Sue, Sue!"

He whirled Owen round as if he had been a top.

"What, what!" exclaimed the bewildered Owen. But he found out in the direction of Gage's eyes, and did not ask for any further explanation just then.

"I'll meet you at the Sanitary rooms, Sue," was the two girls' parting words in this neighborhood. And there she was, this Susan Browne, and she had red hair, and, ah! yes, almost a squint to her eyes!

"A fright of a girl, and looking as cross as two sticks," was Gage's verdict; and, "I might have known it," for a reflection.

But following on behind her, in a minute or two there steps up to this Susan a dapper little fellow, with a cane in his hand, and mustaches, who, lifting his hat, says with a drawl,

"Ah, good-morning, Miss Gilmore."

So that was the end of that—not Susan Browne, but Susan Gilmore. "What an ass I am!" pronounced perhaps for the fortieth time Captain Gage.

And another time he was at a reception, and somebody was calling, "Sue, Susan!" And he turned and saw a grenadier of a woman, and found out (to his relief) that she was a Mrs. Lawton with six children. And again it was a pretty, pinkcheeked creature with dark eyes, and that he was sure, but she turned out a Miss Susan Long.

And at last he said to himself, "Well, I give it up." And one very night Captain Gage had penetrated him from his pips, and took him to the opera. And he was leaning back, listening to Don Giovanni, when some one in the box next him said, in an audible whisper,

"Why, there's Sue Browne."

"Where?" was asked.

"Why, over there with the Landsmers; in the box next to where that old woman in the horrid gold bonnet sits."

Captain Gage looked around him in dismay. There were twenty pink bonnets and more—how could he discern by that wonderful female perception which was the "horrid" one? But—ah! there on the right is a little dark head nodding, and bright eyes full of recognition turned to his neighbor's box. He heard the name of Don Giovanni, he saw no more the stage and the performers. He leaned back, and took in a different picture. A little lady with a dark head and lucid eyes; but we have seen her before, and we know, though not—she is not—content a beauty, yet she is a very, very fascinating picture, Susy Browne makes.

After this he haunted the opera, and he was pretty sure to see the little lady with the dark head, for Sue was passionately fond of music; but it was a great city, ah! I have said, and he found nobody to introduce him to Miss Susan Browne.

But there was that property to restore; why not say to him at once, "Miss Browne, I have in my thimble of yours which you dropped," etc., etc., etc.

Well, why not? Just because that wasn't his way. Captain Gage could make a battery, but he couldn't face a girl with that story.

And, one, two, three, the weeks went by, and the opera was gone, and he seemed no nearer Miss Susan Browne than before. And so he thought that springing, encamping, standing at the parlor-window after breakfast, and as he thought—and he opens the door across the street in the tall brown house and out comes—Miss Susan Browne. Isn't it just like a story-book? And it's just as true as truth too.

Well, out comes Miss Susan Browne, and Tom Gage no sooner sees her than he goes straight to his sister Bell with the inquiry,

"Bell, who lives in the house opposite?"

"A family of Brownes moved in last May."

"There's a Miss Susan Browne, I believe?"

"Well, I don't know, I'm sure—there's a little dark girl, rather pretty—the eldest Miss Browne, I believe."

"Exactly; it is Miss Browne—Susan Browne; and Bell, I want you to go over and call." And then he proceeded with the greatest ease, "I have something for her that I am bound to give into her hands; and Bell, I want you to go over and take me her, now, and ask her if I may call. I can't explain fully now."

Of course Bell jumped at a conclusion, as he knew she would, and made up a pretty story of separation, and loss, and a ring, or something left behind in Town's keeping. Oh yes, she would and prepare the way. And she went that afternoon; and between them the two girls played at crossquestions, and had a great deal of fun. But Captain Gage would explain. And all the while Captain Gage was thinking:

"Oh, I dare say I have been blundering about after her when she was a stone's-throw from me. What an ass I am! I'll do the usual conventional."

But he got his way. That evening he stood in her presence—quite alone; for he had told his sister, with that severe face of his, to make a melancholy air, that he thought it better to go by himself.

He stood in her presence and drew from his pocket the little thimble.

She turned red and pale, and red again, all in a minute; and "I'm sure I'm very much obliged," she thought: "Why this is the face I saw red and pale and covered with tears on the sidewalk that day we came in from the review, with the sweetheart. I wonder if she really has—"

But his wonder was lost in the gay little smile and the exclamation.

"Where did you—"

"Get your thimble? I'll tell you."

And then they sat down and fell to talking as easily as if they had known each other for years. And the girl-voice laugh sounded more and again as he told how he found the thimble, and Captain Gage thought it was the very sweetest laugh he had ever heard and knew. But there was no right to divulge a lady's secret, only I will say that I don't think she found Captain Gage "a great clumsy fellow" after.

Of course you can foresee the end; you have foreseen it all along, and you have known when and wins the owner of the thimble; for we know that when she stood, red, and white, and tearful, on the sidewalk that morning that she had an unknown, unrecognized sweet-heart, who was blind enough to think her some one's else.

One by one of the queen-roses came to see her.

"And you found Sue's thimble in a mitten!" she said, laughing, to Captain Gage, when they were there.

"Yes; and found something else much more valuable than the thimble," replied the Captain.

"Eh, what?"

He turned and lifted Sue's little hand to his lips for answer.

And that was the way the engagement was announced. Owen, offering his congratulations, sagaciously,

"I think I deserve some credit for this: for I hadn't been for me Tom would never have got his valuable mittens."

And Tom owns it, and owns, too, that he had been half envious of Owen, whose bread always came up on the right side; but now he thought he had the best of it.

But Owen, looking across the room to that fair and stately sister Bell, and meeting the glance of her beautiful eyes, is inclined to doubt this last assertion.

WHEN I WENT AWAY IN THE RANKS.

WHEN I went away in the ranks last year
I carried a heavy heart in my breast,
A heart which was burdened with bitter pain,
And which throbbed with a weight of wild unrest.
For I longed to stand on the battle-field:
"The sword," I said, "is the weapon for men!"
And I prayed to God that he might not shield
The life which he was so fruitful then.

I loved Alice Leigh with a deep, fond love.
One night as we walked in the still moonlight
Together adown the hawthorn lane,
When white-starred blossoms grew thick and white,
I told her how dear she was to my heart,
How much dearer even than life.
"Promise me, Alice, before we part,
That when I come back you will be my wife."

I looked in her eyes as I spoke these words;
Something like diamonds glistened there;
The moon gazed down on us from above,
And the still light shone on her pure gold hair.
Then came that burden of bitter pain
Which I bore away to the wars with me.
There on that night in the hawthorn lane,
When Alice answered, "It must not be."

The sun shone bright on the morn we left,
And the air with the scent of buds was sweet,
Through glint of sunshine and breaths of shade
We marched away; the dear old village green,
Which rang with the loud resounding cheers
That greeted us every step of the way:
And I bravely smiled as I thought of the tears
Each wife and sweet-heart would shed that day.

We passed the house in which Alice lived;
In my ardent eyes I looked another shed,
But I thought of the perch with the trumpet-vine,
And the warm June rose which budded red,
And I felt somehow that Alice was there,
For hovrier grew the heart in my breast,
And I knew that she wore in her pale gold hair
The purple ribbon which I loved best.

Then followed these scenes in a soldier's life:
White camps stretching afar in the sun;
Long weary marches through dust and heat,
And the bivouac when the march was done,
With the brief watch-fires burning sweet;
Casting red gleams of flickering light
On the tired groups lying upon the ground;
And at length the din of the furious fight.

The maple had changed from green to gold,
For the breath of the Autumn had touched its leaves,
And the yellow locks of the ripened corn
Were gathered together in harvest sheaves,
When I came home to my father's door.
Home from the cruel wars again,
No better was I than one of his sons,
And in my heart was the old, old pain.

But before the leaves had begun to fall,
Or yet the robin had southward flown,
I thought how sweet a life to me now,
For I held a small white hand in my own,
And Alice asked me if I knew why
She gave me the promise I asked her to give;
That it would have been harder for me to die,
And thus, oh, how hard for her to live!

HEFFIE'S TROUBLE.

I REMEMBER how late we all sat round the fire that night, Aunt Rachel, Cousin Lucy and I. It was such a cold night, and such a bright one, and was going on out of doors, as made the pleasant cheerful warmth within seem doubly pleasant and cheerful.

My aunt had been left a widow some years since, with two children, a son and a daughter, my cousin Lucy, and Arthur. I had lived with them almost away, knowing no other home than my aunt's pretty cottage at Ashwood, no nearer than I can feel now. My own mother had died, leaving my poor father desolate as strangers land. And now, after twelve years of absence, he had come back to live at Riverbank.

To that sweet spot, my golden June day, he had brought my gentle mother, a pretty baby of seventeen; and there, about a year after, I, their only child, was born. Being so young when I left it, I had of course little or no recollection of the place, nor do I remember having any desire to see it again. I was still this strange and unnatural—perhaps it was, but then our home at Ashwood was very retired indeed, a sunny nook in a quiet corner of this busy world of ours. Beyond the rector and his wife we had very few neighbors. Lucy and I had only each other to play with while Arthur was away at school; and when he returned our lonely holidays were happy indeed.

So possibly the succeeding five narrow, wearless stream of our life flowed on, and we were happy and content; not knowing any other, we cared not to have it widened. I do not think this circumscribed life of ours did any real harm to Lucy; with me it was otherwise. I suffered where she escaped untouched; for we were very differently minded each other.

Here was a frank, sympathetic, trusting nature, that easily attached itself. You could not help loving her if you tried. She would creep into your heart like a little bird, and there make a green little nest for herself, even before you were aware. My disposition, on the contrary, was shy, reserved, and cold; or, rather, my affections were not easily stirred into warmth. I was slow to open my heart, and I opened it only to a few; but for them I had a kind of passionate worship that would have considered no sacrifice too great, no self-renunciation too impossible. But ah! at Ashwood my love had never been put to a severer test than the little daily efforts to please my gentle aunt and cousins. Beyond them I wanted no one else; I never cared to make friends. Even my father's name—that name which above all others should have had a sacred shrine in my heart (I say it now in all the anguish of a sorrowful shame burning at my breast)—had little power to kindle any emotion there. And, so when one day the news had come to us that he was going to marry again (a widow lady, with an only daughter a little older than myself), it did not please or trouble me. It was his affair, and not mine, quite, as something I had little concern in. But when, a little later, a letter came telling of their arrival, and that now he had a home in which he wished to have his child again, I felt as if a heavy blow had fallen upon my heart, and only yielded as to a cruel necessity. Dreading to the last night of leaving my aunt and cousins, of changing my calm, unruffled life at Ashwood for a new existence among strangers, for many weeks all rest was to be strange to me.

And so, as I said before, we three sat round the fire very late that night. We heard the clock in the hall strike the hour of midnight, and still we never moved. I think each of us felt as if we must heart dreaded to be the first to break up that last home conference. Lucy, with an expression of touching earnest in her eyes, sat looking into the fire far more gently and submissively than into my future life; while dear, kind Aunt Rachel would not or could not, but went to her pleasant, hope-assuring word, though I could see that her own eyes were wistfully full of little she spoke. And so at last we said good-night, once more and for the last time; and once more Cousin Lucy and I lay down to sleep, side by side, in the two little French beds with rose-bud curtains, in that same dear room we had called the nursery long ago. Before the sun was up we were awake once more long miles apart. The old life was gone; sunk Aunt Rachel's fond, earnest blessing, and Lucy's tearful embrace, were all that remained to me of the happy home days that would never come back.

Well, I arrived at the station at Riverbank, that house which had been my mother's home for nearly all her married life; yet my heart refused to recognize it as such. I felt as if I were but on the hall and said, "Heffie, you are quite a woman; I am glad, very glad, to have my child again." And my step-mother greeted me also affectionately; and Agnes took my hand and said (with her eyes looking kindly into mine), "Shall we be sisters?"

And so they took me in among them; and day by day they strove, with tender words and loving deeds, to win my wayward, silent heart; but still I remained shut up within itself, closely as ever door was locked and barred.

Day by day I grew more and more unhappy, more and more estranged from them. Their kindness only irritated me. I felt as though I would not strive with myself. The old life was gone—and its dead around and within me; and instead of trying to read calmly the new leaf that lay open before me, I only turned it with my hand, and pored over in my memory, turning again and again the pages I had forever finished. I lived and moved in a kind of dream, wishing that I might awake to see my home of what I saw or heard. I spent hours in my own room, reading over and over again the books Lucy had given to me the night before I left them. Most of them we had read together, she and I, and now I must read them alone. Sometimes I would winter afternoon was growing dark and cold, a sick, dreary feeling would creep over my heart, of miserable loneliness, that seemed almost more than I could very intensity. Ah! had I not brought all my trouble upon myself? No; I was not pretty, like Agnes. I knew that, and knew that I seemed to also and was proud of her, I could see; but not proud of his poor, pale little Heffie. It was always Agnes who went out to ride with him, always ready to walk wherever he liked, who read to him in the evening when he was tired, and I was not. And it was seldom with him, that I never read or sang to him for hours as she did? Because I had a false feeling in my foolish heart that he could not love me, could not care for me. How should he, when I was so little to him and she so much? So days and weeks and months went, and autumn and summer came once more, once more to gladden men and flowers with their sunshine, and I, in those days of golden sunshine, and soft, cool, dewy nights. Yes, summer came once more, and with it came a change in my life, very unlooked for, very sad. One morning I received a letter from my Cousin Arthur, saying that if his uncle and Mrs. Leigh would kindly consent, he would like to spend a few weeks very much like to come and spend his summer holidays at Riverbank. He longed to see me again; it would be like a coming back of the old days.

"Yes, Heffie, certainly," said my father, when I gave him Arthur's message, "let him come by all means. We shall be delighted to see him. It will make a pleasant change, a very pleasant change for us all."

As I rose to leave the room I saw his wife's gentle eyes turned on me with a kind, half-pitying look in them, as though she had not heard her say (when she thought I was out of hearing), "Poor child! I am glad will have this pleasure. It is long to see a little color in those cheeks. It is too young to look so sad."

And Agnes answered, "Yes, it is too young; life should not be difficult at seventeen. Oh, Margaret, I have a great fear haunting me sometimes." And here he lowered his voice to almost a whisper, so that I heard no more; and I hastened up stairs to write my letter. What was this great fear that haunted Agnes's heart? I wondered. I had often remarked lately (as I said before) my step-mother's eyes watching me with an anxious, half-pitying expression; and once or twice I had seen them fill with tears when she thought I was not noticing her. Did this great fear haunt her too?

Three days passed by, and Arthur came—pleasant, cheerful, kind Cousin Arthur. How my heart bounded at the sight of him, at the sound of his fine manly voice, that seemed to me like an echo from the old life—the old life that was gone! All was changed during the few weeks he staid at Riverbank. It was as if some kind fairy had come with her magic wand and touched the hours, and turned them into gold. I felt almost quite happy. Something of my old self seemed to have come back. It was a season of strange, wonderful gladness—a short, happy dreaming, that went too quickly by—and I awoke crying, to find it over, gone.

I knew he and Agnes liked each other from the beginning; nothing was more natural. Many of their tastes and pursuits were the same. And so it happened that day by day there grew up between them a sure yet silent sympathy, so near and silent that for a long time neither was conscious how much the other thought of it, make the same part of life more bright and sunny still. Week after week went by, till we counted six, and then Arthur's holiday-time was drawing to a close—very. The last evening came (how far away it seems now as I look back). I was sitting alone in my own room, not reading or working, but hardly thinking, but listening listlessly to the dull patter of the rain against the window, for it had been pouring all day.

Presently I heard a knock at my door, and Arthur entered, saying he wanted to talk with me. He had hardly said so when he saw me morning.

"Dear Heffie," he said, "I want to tell you something, something that I want you to feel glad for. Can you guess?"

"No. How should I?"

"Well, then, Agnes has promised to-day to be my wife. Say you are glad, Heffie, won't you? You used to be glad years ago when I brought home a new prize from school; but now you do not speak."

"Arthur, I am very glad." I said it with my lips, but not with my heart answered, "Yes, Heffie, you are not glad; you know you are not."

"Why not?"

Because that moment had revealed to my heart a secret it had been keeping from itself, a secret it had been my one object to hide from all the world, out from the dark, silent corner where it had hidden itself away, and, standing out like a giant fierce and strong, it stood before me full-length. It stared me in the face mockingly, cruelly; and I saw that it was an idol I had been bowing down to, a pitiful idol, a false god that I had made; and this idol was crumbling, the pillar was falling, and I, who had leaned too long on that one support, was weak (oh, I was very weak!) and must fall.

Arthur staid with me for a long while that evening, talking and rejoicing—of Agnes and himself, all. He asked me to be kind to her when he was gone, to show her love and sympathy for his sake.

He knew not how I was acting me to do anything. The next day he was gone, and Agnes moved about the house quiet and subdued, as if a little shadow had come over her. I felt very sorry for her; while I, who had no right to grieve, yet grieved most hopelessly. Ever at the slightest sound of merry laughter, I can look back calmly on that time, as on its recollection of a troubled dream, from which the sunshine came (that was when the wedding was to be) were very dreary ones to me. There was a little brief while indeed, in which I thought I should see him and a visit on their way home from Portland; but when that was over I felt even more desolate than ever. My heart was more than ever closed to Agnes. I felt toward her as if she had done me a cruel wrong; as if she had stolen from me something that might have been mine; that I would have valued, oh how priceless!

One afternoon, near the end of November, as I was sitting at the library with my father, he looked up from his newspaper suddenly, and said, "Heffie, my child, I wish I could see you happy, really happy. I can not bear to see that pale face of yours day after day without a smile upon it. Can you not borrow of your step-mother a little cheerfulness?"

I did not answer for a few moments. Then a desperate resolve seemed suddenly to shape itself into words on my lips, and I said, "Yes, dear papa father; let me leave Riverbank. I can never be happy while I stay here. Let me go."

"Go! Leave me! Heffie!" What can you mean? Where do you want to go?"

"Any where, papa father; where! I will be a governess, or a companion. I will do any thing: only let me go away."

"Why, Heffie, I do not know what you are saying. Are you in your senses, child? What makes you so unhappy? Tell me."

"I can not tell you. I can not tell any one. But, oh! I want to go away! I want to go away!" And in the passion of my entreaty I sobbed bitterly.

"Heffie, Heffie," exclaimed half frightened, "what is the matter? Are you ill?"

"No, no, no," I said, and rose. Mrs. Leigh entered the room. She tried to speak to me; but I rushed wildly past her into the hall and up stairs, never pausing till I reached my own room, and there, sinking on the floor beside the sofa, I pressed my head against the pillows and wept as I had not wept for a long time before.

Presently I heard a step in the passage. Some one knocked at my door. I did not answer, or even raise my head; I desired that they should see my tears. Again the knock was repeated; but I never moved. Then the door opened, and I knew, without looking back, that it was my step-mother who stood near me. She laid her hand gently on my shoulder, saying: "Heffie, my poor child, what is the matter? Are you ill, or in trouble, or has any one been unkind to you? Do tell me."

But still I did not answer, but kept my face buried in the sofa pillow.

"Heffie," she said again, and this time there was even a little stormess in her voice, "Heffie, listen to me. I must speak to you; I must know what all this means."

Her manner quieted me in an instant. I let her raise me from the floor, and, seating herself on the sofa, made me sit beside her, put her arm round me, and drew my head to rest on her bosom. She did not try to stop my tears altogether: they were flowing more quietly now; but I was cold and trembling, though my head was burning; and, taking one of my hands, she gently chafed it in her own without speaking a word for some time. At last, as I grew calmer still, she spoke again.

"Heffie, dearest love, why will you not tell me what is troubling this poor little heart so much?"

"Because, because I can not tell any one. I must not tell any one. Nobody could help me if I did."

"Is it so very bad, dear—so incurable? Oh, Heffie! I would be to you in your dear mother's place if you would let me—if you would open your heart to me, and trust me as you would have trusted her. You are too young to bear all this grief alone. Will you not let me share with part of it, at least?"

What right had I to all this tenderness from her, whom wrongly I had kept away? Who, for nearly a whole year, had coldly repulsed the love she would have given me? Did I deserve it now? I knew I did not; but that last appeal was too tenderly, too earnestly made—seemed to touch somewhere in my heart a chord that had never thrilled before. My proud, wayward heart was bowed in a moment, powerless to close itself any longer; for she had found the right key, and used it skillfully. Yet, after a year's hard striving (cold and resisting on my side, patient and gentle on hers), I was conquered at last; and, subdued as I humbled as a penitent child, I lay weeping in her arms, depending on her love. And there, in the shadow of the dark November twilight, I told her all my trouble: no, not all, not quite; but she (with the quick insight of her woman's sympathy) guessed the rest. She did not say many words to comfort me. She only said, "My poor child!" But I could feel her silent sympathy far more than words. I felt it in the closer pressure of her arms round me, in the touch of her hand on my hair as she tenderly stroked it from my forehead, and pressed a constant kiss upon it.

"You are very young, dear," she said at length, "for such a hard battle; but you will gain the victory if you ask for strength."

I knew not how long we remained together that evening. I only remember trying to raise my head to ask her forgiveness for the past, and being hastily able to speak for the burning pain in it. And I remember how kindly she insisted me to bed, and sat by my side for a long while, till she thought I had fallen asleep; but the next few days I can scarcely recall: they are almost a blank in my memory. I know that I was very ill, and for some time in danger of dying. I lay in a half-delirious, half-waking state, having no part in the life that was going on around me. My dreams were restless and distressing. I remember only that one image—the pillar I had leaned on too long for strength. Once I thought my Cousin Arthur and I were walking on the edge of a precipice: it was dark and foggy, and every step I was afraid of falling. At last I felt the arm I leaned on growing weak. Then I thought it was still strong enough to support me. By degrees, however, it seemed to grow very, very feeble, and slipped, for I took was in my eyes, and I felt myself falling. I cried out in my agony of fear, "Oh, Arthur, save me! do not leave me!" And then I felt him in my clasp, and as he was Agnes bending over me, while she bathed my burning forehead.

"What is the matter?" I said. "Where I been ill? Where am I?"

"In your own room, Heffie dear. You have been ill; but you are better now," she answered.

"Oh, yes I am better now. Have you been here ever since?"

"Mamma and I have both been with you. We want to make you well and strong again."

"Do you? I thought you could not love me. Why do you stay with me?"

"Stay with you, Heffie! Why should I leave you? You are very dear to us, and we would you?"

I thought you would hate me. 'I was unkind, cruel to you."

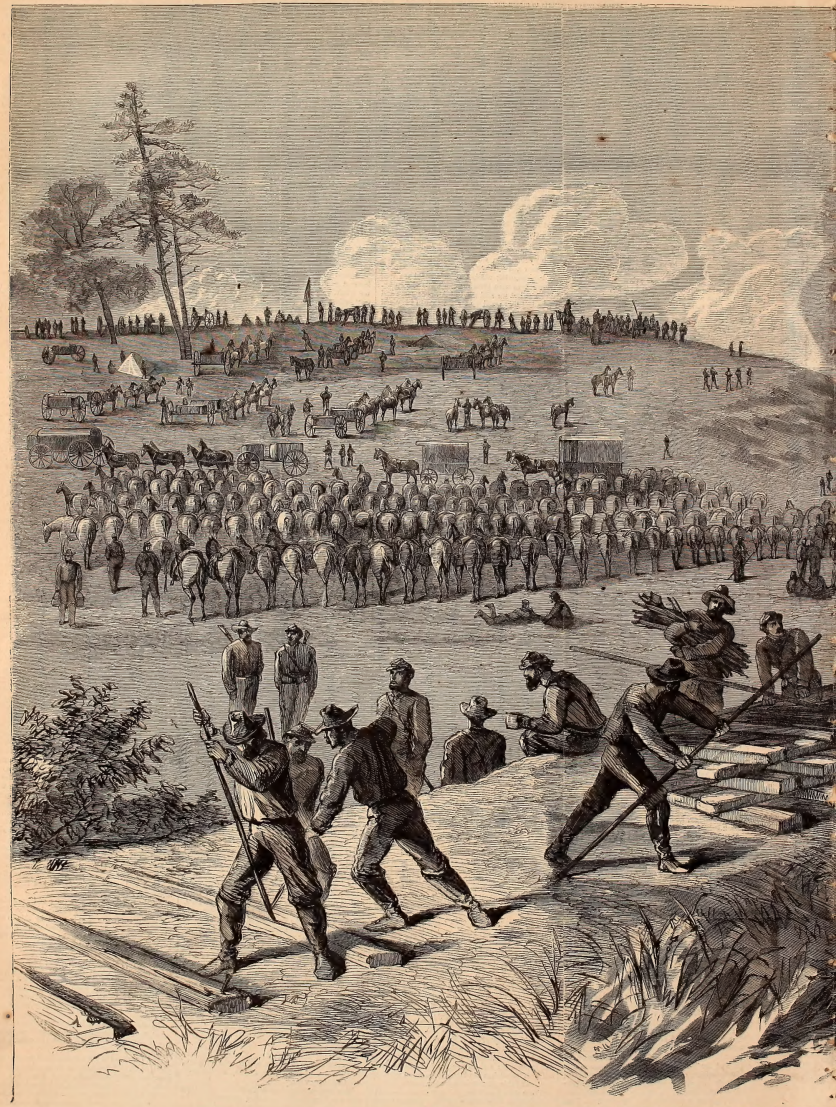
"Hush, Heffie, that is all over now. Let us try to forget it, shall we? But here is Dr. White coming to see you again." And at last entered the doctor opened, and my step-mother and the doctor came in.

I will not dwell on those days of weakness, and the weeks of slow convalescency, that were added. It have said that that time, as I see it now, was a troubled evil dream, from which the waking was pain and trouble and the shadow of a coming pain. Yes, the shining came at last; the battle was won, because the strength that won it was not my own. Still, the joy was very dull, as the sky was cloudy and hers. I saw them kneeling side by side, and heard the words, "I, Arthur, take thee, Agnes, to be my wedded wife." And in my heart I blessed them, him and her. And so they went away, and I tried to fill her place in the house as well as I knew what she had been; and they were very kind and patient with me, and would not let me see how sadly they missed her.

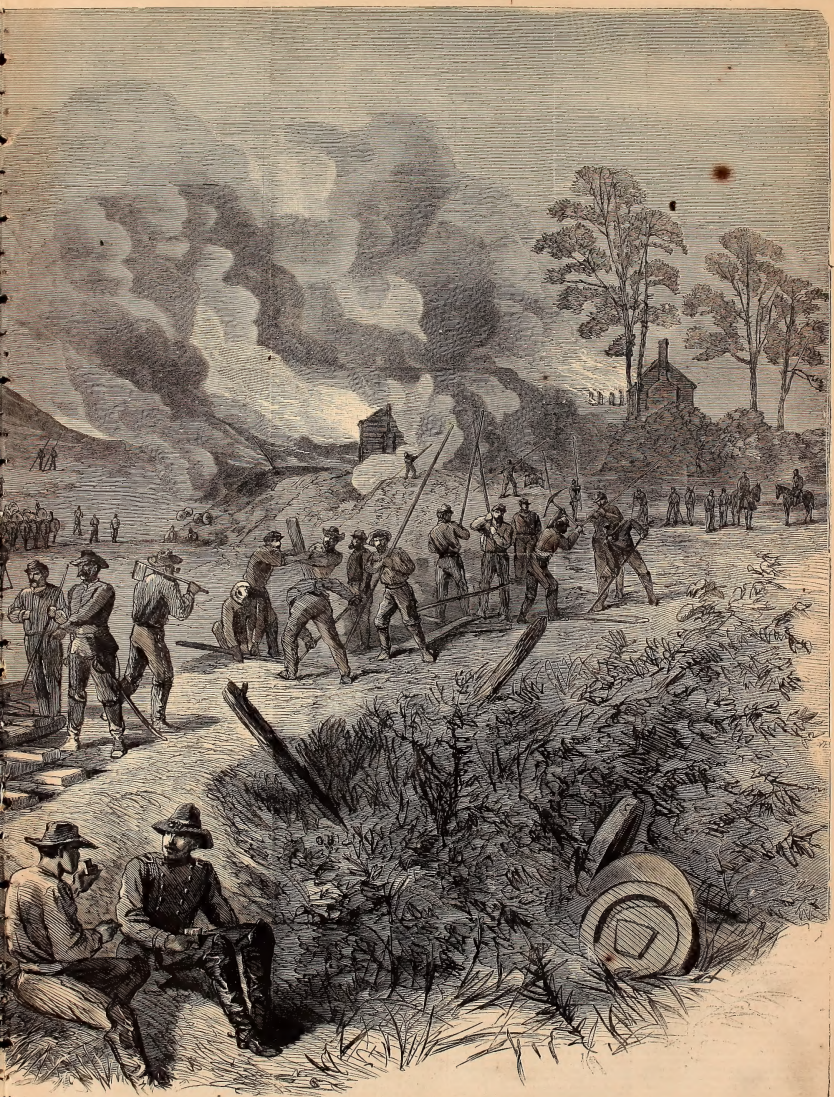
Nearly twenty years have come and gone since then, and many things are changed. I am happy in their own child, whom they have named Heffie. She is now a fair girl of eighteen, with the image of her mother's youth upon her. And as I gaze into the blue depths of those true, earnest eyes, I think, half-mournfully, half-thankfully, of the old days at Riverbank.

Aunt Rachel has left her lonely cottage at Ashwood, for the rector and his wife have begged her to make her home with them, the rector's wife being Cousin Lucy.

And I, reader? My home is a small lodging in a quiet street. I have only two rooms; but they are snug and pleasant enough. And here I live, and write books, and make verses, very thankful if now and then I am allowed to add my little drop of help or comfort to the sea of human charity around me. And I am happy; for though my cup may never be full, it is not empty, till I know it is filled (how much fuller!) than I deserve.



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—DESTRUCTION OF LEE'S COMMUNICA



ATIONS BY GENERAL WILSON.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See First Page.]

THE WHITE SAILS.

As I look out across the sea
The white sails greet my longing sight,
Slow floating widely out from me,
None ling'ring now where ent twas bright.

With many smiles, and many tears,
We watch them fade along the way,
With many hopes, and many fears,
Last we have said "good-by" for aye.

Once more I look upon the waves,
And once again the sails gleam white,
From those who are so true and brave
Dear Love, I'll not be long from thee.

Ah me! the white wings of the sea
May bear me blessings over more;
The face mine eyes have longed to see
Lies hidden on a Southern shore.

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA

BOOK II. WOMANHOOD.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ON THE RIVER BANK.

He who writes these lines was, many years since, dining in a cheap restaurant in the Palais Royal. He liked to dine in rich, but humble, poor, was forced to put up with the second-floor splendor of the great Palace of Gastronomy. The glass is now glittering and the gilding is gaudy in the attic as in the basement of this place, only there is a diminished price correspondent to the accent you make, and, by an odd paradox, you lose caste as you mount. What matters it? If that which they call a poulet à la Marengo on the first floor be, as they assert, a nasty mess hashed up from the scourings and leavings of better cookery, and the poulet down stairs be a triumph of the art which Soyer and Ude excelled, it must come to the same thing in the long-run. Abate a little for difference in flavor—and what is flavor? The whole thing must be minced in a pie, or caviar, or the trail of a woodcock, at first tasting? You will find both dishes equally rich in cullis, nutritious in ingredients, and not sloppy. And both will make you equally bilious the next morning.

I was dining, I write, then, being pinched in purse, dined, not at Véfour's below, but at the humbler Beauvilliers above. He had good wine and health remaining then. He could look upon the wine when it was red, or even when it was the kindly ordinary ever-passing claret without dreading its after effects. He paid his forty sous; had his three courses; fed, and was content.

Now here was a thing which struck him between his first service andalu dessert, on the instant occasion consisting of a pear—there swollen, supine, and sleepy that, being a Reader of things as that period, he likened it to the Elder Brother of the Trinity House. The thing struck him thus. Richard's is very brave and full of gayety. Nay, there are more ribbons on every side of you. Though ever so solitary at a table you need never, if reflection can help it, be dismal. You have the companionship of yourself. Eyes right and eyes left, and then turn voile-face: as you are ambidexter, you can become twins twice over: quins, if I may coin such a word.

The person discovered of, however, was satisfied with using the knife, fork, and plate before him as a plane of perspective, and looked straight before him, without moving his head. In front of him was a very large looking-glass in a very gilt frame. Marriage with Hymen's saw himself. Naturally, also, he saw reflected in the looking-glass which was at the other end of the dining-room another set of the same family. And in equal obedience to the immutable laws of nature, the starting-points of reflection and reflective being once established, were stretched before him an interminable vista of mirrors before and mirrors that were behind, of front-sets and back-sets of dishes, knives, forks, and chandeliers over and over again, to infinity. So, lately, when standing on a high tower upon a rock looking upon the Falls of Niagara, did this same person ask, unthinkingly, and in a fool as he was, of the guide who was his guide, whether the rush of waters were always at that wise: whereon the black man answered him, not according to his folly, but in simple wisdom: "I 'spect, massa, it's always on at that rate and other." Ever and ever. The solemn words brought the scene of the looking-glass back to his mind. They too were on at that rate and ever. Although the dishing lines of the perspective diminished at last to a pin's point, and their continuity was undiscernible to the keenest gaze, they were there stretched on, more and more microscopically delineated, upwards upon myriads more looking-glasses, tables, knives, forks, and dishes. The old schoolmen used to hold disputations on the metaphysical logicse of angels dancing and dance on the point of a needle. The thesis is not so absurd as it seems. Give us but a lens of sufficient magnifying power and we might discover how upon some spicula of matter ten thousand times finer than a "Coventry bradred," not thousands, but millions of God's creatures, having heads, and lungs, and ducts, and bowels, and lives, do dance.

The looking-glasses, then, went on forever and ever. There could not be an end to them, for they had no ends. There could not be a beginning, for there were two beginnings, or rather the beginning was the end, and the end was the beginning; for the foremost mirror did no more and no less in glancing back its fellow than did the hindermost one. It was the old, old story of the serpent with its tail in its mouth.

And while he who had paid forty sous for his dinner was gazing on this, and musing upon it, the deft waiter approached him from behind with the sherry-pear. He saw him in the glass. He was a very white-faced waiter, and his grin was ghastly. His ears, his horns, much gas, and the steam of many dinners, had made him hopelessly pallid. Never too much flesh had he, I wot, and that which he had originally possessed had wasted away beneath the influence of the gasburners and the stew-pans, so that he looked now merely as though a withered Norfolk apparent had been drawn, for decency's sake, over his skull. With his clearly-erected cuticular, whiskerless jaws, gleaming teeth, sunken eyes, hollow cheeks, white cravat, with his monstrous bow and his exposed collar, he was extremely much like a genteel death's-head. Something like a shudder came over the guest as he looked upon this fellow of Mortality, standing in the midst of the vast image of Eternity streaming away from him. As there were more mirrors, so were there more Death's-head waiters; and they encompassed him on every side, and went on for ever and ever. Mortal man, for one moment!

That Life should be so dove-tailed into Death, faster and firmer than the cunningest joiner, with his glue and his mortises, could happen to, but natural, is but the way of the world, is but decreed beyond our comprehension and our conscience. Between us and the grave there is then come, and wait for the end in humble hope, than to continue peering into the looking-glasses till we go mad.

Much the more so, as the yellow forehead of the King of Terrors, with its cadaverous fish eyes, as the worm that never dies has the pretiest painted skin imaginable, as Death is but the reverse side of an old coin, and has a design representing the innocent pastimes of Arcadia, and the lives of gods and goddesses. What did Mr. Wordsworth, of Rydal Mount, down Rydal Mount way, know of death? The church-yard was her playground. Those who slept beneath were not dead, but her brothers and sisters, and they were seven. Death, after all, is of the masculine gender, like love, and sometimes he and he changes hue. Get over the embarrassment of a first acquaintance, and he turns out to be somebody else. He is no longer Death, but Life Eternal.

Now, there was a certain little maiden who had lived all her life on the very brink of the grave; who had been cradled, as it were, in a bier, and whose playthings were, not dolls and playthings were, after a manner, skulls and crossbones, a matock and a spade. Of course I am speaking metaphorically. Those kindly little maiden, pretty little Mademoiselle Amanda, had no bodily acquaintance with the ugly things I mention. She knew of them, indeed, heard them talked about every hour in the day, lived over them and bore their icy neighborhood with great philosophy. Her own parents became less innocent young head about such horrors? She had been for long years accustomed to them; besides, they were her good papa's business, not hers. She was very fond of her good papa. She was very fond of every body. She was now in her sixteen years of age; and at that period of life I have known youngsters who were fond of spiders and monkeys, and even of the rats and the crossest of cats.

Mademoiselle Amanda lived in the left wing of the Edifice, which was but one story high. The Edifice was called (I am afraid) The Morgue. That good papa had his house in the opposite wing, and there he kept his huge vellum-bound and brass-clamped registers, which were quite as fully, and with as much interest, read as the books of a London banking-house. Papa was a public functionary. He held a responsible post in the service of the police of Paris, and lodging, fire, and candles were allowed him gratis.

Mademoiselle Amanda lived with papa over the large room on the ground-floor, once used by the lodgers in the Edifice. The lodgers never thronged her, although there were in all hours, some of them very unseasonable. They were the quietest lodgers in the world. They set no disquiet among their fellows, and, strange to say, they paid nothing for their bed or their board—that could properly be called board which was in reality nothing—for their parlor was quite a grove of singing-birds. She had two canaries, a goldfinch, and a bird in a hanet. She had a blackbird who sang the "Marseillaise" and the "Parisienne"—airs not distantly resembling each other—which he declicately avoided the imputation of being an outand-out Republican. The last kind boy now and then coming up "La Belle Gabrielle" and "Vive Henri Quatre," but who was not, by any means, a Bonapartist in his views. The blackbird could be persuaded to give so much as a bar of "Partant pour la Syrie."

Amanda's walls were hung with pretty lithographs and water-color drawings. On her balcony, overlooking the old houses on the quays, with their high roofs and blind-like dormer-windows, with the narrow bright blue Seine shining between, and the gaudy legions of barges passing, ing all, she had a miniature conservatory. Yes, she had roses and geraniums and forget-me-nots, and the modest sweet-smelling mignonnette. She adored flowers: so seemingly did Blaise, her cat, though ofttimes chastised for lying perdu among the foliage, whence at his ease he could blink with covetous eyes upon the birds in their cages. And so she found out, too, did the accomplished little Amanda, and had not only a pretty cottage-piano made by Fleyel, but absolutely a harp—a harp of her own too, from Erard's factory. Her good papa denied her nothing. Sheets of music lay about—dulcet little barcarolles, and romances, and chansonettes, the which she warbled, accompanying herself meanwhile with such sweetness and such grace as frequently to elicit from her guests twitters of approving criticism. Then she drew—drew very prettily, too. Big classical heads with round chins, vacant eyes, broad foreheads, and tresses like coils of rope. These she finished in Italian chalk on tinted paper, to the delight of her professor, who was a lodger, and went from the Ecole des Beaux Arts. Did she paint? Yes, flowers, and a little landscape. Any thing else? Well, she enjoyed excellent health; was not too fond of mental reading for a girl of her age, choosing even then the demurest of fictions, and utterly eschewing the then existing but perilous MM. Dumas and Paul de Kock. She was very good and pious. She went there regularly to mass, and had sea pauvres—her poor—whom she tended and succored even as though she had been a staid middle-aged person. Yet she had had nothing to do. She had been to a ball but thrice in her life. Men, with the exception of Monsieur Philibert, she spoke to as mere and noble creatures, but still as devouring monsters to be feared and fled from. Ces terribles Messieurs, she called them. Monsieur Philibert she did not fear. He was old and fat, and she had known him long, and he was very good to her.

Little Amanda's mamma was dead. Nobody but herself, her father, and a bonne, lived on the first floor of the Morgue, or top floor of the Edifice. Down stairs there were people who took care of the lodgers, but she never saw them. There was a porter, and he let to go out, at least once a week or so, when business was slack—for the lodgers were very capricious as to the time of their departure, though exceedingly regular as to that of their going—Amanda's papa would take his daughter for a drive, and go to some little boulevard theatre, whence she would come back skipping and clapping her hands, and humming the airs of the vaudevilles and couplets she had heard. The little girl was as good as gold, and as happy as the day was long.

Of the great revolution that Jean Baptiste Constant was entertaining his friends at the Café Anglais, Mademoiselle Amanda, too, had company in the first floor of the Edifice. Lily was there. Now, I am afraid that Madame de Kergsley would have been very angry indeed had she known that her protégée was paying such a visit, or was in such a place. It was, perhaps, the wrong one. What an odd fate for young lady who was being educated in genteel notions to find herself in. But it was all Mademoiselle Amanda's fault. That good woman could see that Lily was unhappy, that she was mourning in secret for her father, and that because of her sorrow. She strove to assuage it by every means in her power, to divert the young girl's mind, and to lead her to the cheerful things of life. Innocentes—these young ones are always the same. They get an idea into their heads, and it takes a hydraulic pump to get it out again. Let us try to amuse her. Let us strive to make her gay. She must be dull sometimes in that old place of hers. She must be in love. Malediction upon love, and yet one can hardly help blessing it at the same time. What an old fool I am! If Ma'mselle Lily is in love, I can not expect her to make a confidante of an old, worn-out, battered creature like me. Let us place her in contact with something young, and fresh, and innocent, to whom she can tell half her secrets, and who will tell us the rest. Did I say young, and fresh, and innocent? Ah, ma foi, they are all that to poor Valentine-la. They can all find out what love is.

will take her to see Amanda. There can be no harm in that.

Amanda was one of Madame Thomas's great cronies. She had known and loved her ever since she was a child. She had an awful reverence for Amanda's papa, whom she called Monsieur le Gardien; she had known his wife, Amanda's mother, a very pretty, with a perpetual cold in her head, which had ultimately got into her stomach, and so carried her off. She loved her. She entertained the profoundest respect for Monsieur Philibert, who, whenever he met her, never failed to raise his hat with his fingers on dits and the choicest snuff. The first floor over the Edifice was, indeed, Madame Thomas's most frequented resort. Whenever she had half an hour to spare she would slip away and revel in chat. Nor did her patronage of the Edifice stop there. Madame Thomas wasn't exactly a ghoul. She wasn't a vampire. She had no cruelty in her composition. She was a kind-hearted old woman, well enough disposed to be jovial on occasion; but she had, in common with a great many other old women, a secret and irresistible penchant for that which some persons are accustomed to call the horrible. Madame Thomas called it the proper name it is useless to dispute. Every body has his taste, his whim, his fancy. Every body. Madame Thomas had hers. She did not carry it to excess, but she was forced to gratify it sometimes. She liked to rest down with it, to the terrination of her gossip on the first floor of the Edifice, and see how the lodgers were getting on. It did her good, she liked it, although on one or very far removed from that period of life when her own might become the property of a lodger herself, a permanent one, although not in the Edifice. Sometimes the lodgers were green, and Madame Thomas would take a great deal of stuff; sometimes they were blue, at which she would take more, and cry "Pouah!" And not unfrequently they would be back green and blue.

Amanda did her best to entertain her guests. She bustled about, putting her birds through the most winning of their ways, and by pleur à barge—the noise of their cages, the rattling them with bits of sugar between her pretty lips, eliciting from them the sweetest of their carols. Of her flowers, too, she made great show, blowing aside their petals, and tinging up their delicate leaves to show her visitors. Then she sat down to the piano, and played some of her liveliest airs; and then—no severer critics being near than a young girl as innocent as herself, and an old woman who knew no more of music than the old of Greek—she sang some arch little French songs—songs that had refrains like the fluttering of birds' wings, or the pattering of mice into their holes—songs which didn't mean much, and were mainly, if you please, nonsensical; but which, at least, didn't mean mischief—at once a rarity and an advantage, I apprehend, in the vocal music of France in the day.

By this it was breakfast-time. The bonne set the table, and laid out the simple summer cates on which the girl usually breakfasted—eggs on the plate, cream cheese, fruit, plenty of bread-and-butter, and, as a little extra for the wine. "If good papa and Monsieur Philibert should come in," quoth Amanda, "their beef-steak and their omelet will be ready for them in five minutes." There was a stronger wine, too, for the use of good papa and his friends. Strange to say, the wine was always kept in a cupboard on a level with the dwelling-rooms of the Edifice. They had a cellar down stairs: why didn't they store their Bordeaux and their eager there? Well, Amanda didn't like the notion. Perhaps she thought the cellar, so near the Seine, was damp; perhaps she feared that those lodgers, usually so well-behaved, might get up some night and abstract bottles out of papa's potables. And the bare notion of one of those lodgers coming about the cellar! Ugh!

Breakfast was a very good one, and with him his ancient and constant friend, Monsieur Philibert. The latter was the pleasantest, cheerfullest-eyed, whitest-toothed, most contented-looking man you could wish to see on a summer's day, or out of the ranks of the most benevolent battalion of the Legion of the Seine, or out of the members of his own peculiar profession, which is also a good deal. Philibert was a National Guardsman, and, as such, naturally wore spectacles, and was slightly inclined to corpulency. He was not quite a martyr warrior, however. That big beardless, three quarters of exactly wooden face, with the round hole in the shone with distinction at several barricades, and had loomed large in the fore-front of the battle, when the Boulevard Montmartre, the Faubourg Saint Antoine, and the Quartier Latin were the scenes of a horrid attempt on the king's life, was swept by troops. Philibert was not quite so angry with the half-civilized people of the world as to have beseemed a loyal man, bourgeois de Paris, and young subaltern of the order of things and the dynasty of Lafy, to have shown cowardice. He spoke of the murderous Italian, pending his trial and condemnation, as "that wild boar." Once he was heard to allude to him as "le pauvre diable." You see that Fieschi, with his infernal machine, although he missed the principal object of his hatred, and blew off, instead, his own fingers, and ultimately his own head, was nothing to him. Philibert had seen Italy, in full uniform, was riding by the side of Louis Philippe. And, as a matter of personal marshal have one of the grandest of funerals ever seen in Paris—triumphal car, winged Victories, gilt wreaths, pall of velvet and cloth of gold, human woods of ostrich plumes, horses draped in black velvet—every luxury, in fact. And was not Philibert dead? Not Philibert in his tarnished and red epaulets of the civic soldier, but Philibert full new gloried, in plaited and rutched linen, in velvet and silk embroidery. Philibert with the cocked-hat known as chapeau bras beneath his left arm, and a shining drawn sword, con tipped with silver in his right hand—Philibert with a dress-sword by his side, a silver chain round his neck, and silver spurs on his heels! For he also was a marshal of France, after a fashion, and had a right to bear a baton.

He was, namely, a member of the ceremonies attached to the Corporation of Undertakers—to the Company of Upholders, as it was formerly called—and conducted some of the most splendid funereal processions of modern times. The undertaking and the undertaker, although the one could not exist without a sympathetic vampire, a ghoul, but Philibert smiled philosophically at their sneers. The plump and rosy man was not one to be ashamed or proud of his profession. "I shall yet live," he would say, "to conduct the imposing ceremonies incidental to the interment of the great Napoleon. Our funereal remains are still detained by his barbarous and perfidious enemies in the Island of Saint Helena, where they slew him. What a funeral that will be! With the aid of the military forces, the paraphernalia of the parishes, and the choristers of the Opera, the Pompes Funèbres shall, please Heaven, far surpass all they have hitherto done. The funerals of Napoleon, Louis the Eighteenth, S. A. R. the Duke of Berry—what those of the Emperor of the Universe shall be thrown into the shade. When we file down the Champs Elysees, on our way to the Invalids, something shall be seen." Monsieur Philibert was an artist. Thus, though he half forgave Fieschi for shooting a marshal of France who could not be interred with honor, he regretted the utmost horror and indignation at the fate of the hundred-mouthed and hundred-throated cries to the indiscriminate massacre caused by the infernal machine. "In not the fosse commune—the common ditch at Montmartre—gorged enough," he would say, "but that we must strive to choke it still more with miserables, coffined in white deal with tin-tacks, and shovelled into the earth at an expense to the good city of Paris of eight francs seven sous. And these emeutes, these riots, which, in my capacity as a member of the civic guard, I have the honor to assist in putting down with the sword in the peu, of what good is it shooting and bayoneting all these deluded artisans and half-starved us paupers? It is nobody's business to bury them decently, and after cumbering your register for a time, good papa, what is there for them but a pit filled with quick-lime? It is inconceivable. Poor people ought not to die. They should go away somehow, or, at least, they should save the administration the trouble of burying them at a tariff which I have no hesitation in affirming to be indecently and absurdly low. Why is there not a Ganges into which the corpses of ces hommes de rien du tout could be thrown, or a funeral pyre whereon their bodies could be incinerated? For such a ceremony, performed en masse, the Pompes Funèbres could, perhaps, display a taste and a luxury from the use of which, in individual cases, it is debarred." This was Monsieur Philibert's grand manner. There was no harm in him, however. He was one of the mildest and most placable of men. He was a widower, and his wife had once kept a baby-linen warehouse: what time, ere he himself had gone into the undertaking business, Philibert had not disdained to hold a senior clerkship in the Bureau de Nourrices: an agency office for wet-nurses.

THE BLOCKADE-RUNNER.

"Now, Lieutenant, the yarn," said I, as I filled my can.

"Yes, Lieutenant, and a tough one," cried Jerry Bloom, the smallest midshipman in the United States service; and a dozen more voices clamored in, impatient for the promised yarn.

A heavy sea was running; night had fallen; we were off watch, and snugly stowed between decks, with our legs under the gun-room table and a thick bottle in our midst, and—jolter still—Lieutenant Bracetant had promised a yarn. A small portion of his own he had gentlemen, and a fertile brain withal. His stories were the delight of the gunroom. His heart was as brave as his wit was his appetite for grog, and every one loved him. He filled another glass, looked mousingly at the occupied bottle, rubbed his hands, and then made a beginning:

"It was not in these days of iron pots, cheese-boxes, and steam-engines, you must know," said he; "but on the dear old frigate Florida—requiescat in pace!—defunct her waste before a stiff breeze, and with more rats in her hold than in a North Sea whaler. We were the flag-ship of the African squadron, and money was scarce, and the days infernally hot; when, just as the day dropped, at the close of September, we were overjoyed to hear tidings of—"

"All hands on deck if you want a share in His prize!" broke in the waiwile from the gun-room-ivory; and we unagreeably tumbled up, snapping Bracetant's yarn without compunction, for we had become greedy for plunder on board the Petrel, and relinquished even our grog for the hope of a prize.

"Where is she?"

"What is she?"

"I don't see her."

"There she is to the sou'west," said the cockswain, pointing with his spy-glass.

"By Jove, a steamer, too!" cried Bracetant, delightedly.

The Green Goatee, stuffed with cotton to her scuppers," suggested Jerry Bloom, commencing a horspipe; and every one else had some surmise to put forth as to the character of the strange craft.

"Bracetant is right," said the Captain, who had been studying her intently with his telescope; "she's a steamer, and a big 'un. But she's not coming out; she's making for the Lights with her best foot forward."

We were glad to hear it; for even cotton could be forgone for the sake of English rifles, hospital stores, and army stuffs. We crushed on more steam, unfurled the ship-pallants, and made all preparations for a short chase. We had been to Philadelphia for coal, and were still fifty knots from our old blockading station on the North Carolina coast to which we were returning. There was a heavy sea from the quarter of the day before; but the sky was cloudless and the moon unusually bright, and our craft was the swiftest in the squadron; so that, with an open ocean, we had little doubt of overhauling the stranger before the coal reach the protecting guns of Fort Macon. We noted at first, the object of our attention grew rapidly bigger as we sped on under the extra head of steam and the straining bellows. She challenged against the sky as big as a whale, and in a few moments we distinguished the column of black smoke which her low chimney vomited against the sky; but we were not to have little canvas stretched. Indeed, the gale was yet so strong that any extensive spread of sail was imprudent.

"See what you make of her, Bracetant," said the Captain, handing the telescope to the veteran midshipman. "I would be sure that she's none of our own."

"Clyde-built all over," mused the Lieutenant, with his eye to the tube. "No one but a cockney could have planned her masts; and her jib has the Bristol cut. She sees you, and is doing her best. I doubt if you catch her."

"The I—ll we won't! Let out the studdin' sails! trim the jib!" roared the commander through his trumpet. "I'll spread every rag if we scrape the sky. More heel if possible, Jones." The order and the engineer went below to see what could be done.

The gale was strong, and her head of steam was already great; but we soon seemed to leap from crest to crest under the stimulus of replenished fires, and the masts fairly bowed beneath their press of canvas. Every body was agog with excitement, and half the seamen were in the rigging with peering eyes and noisy speculation as to the vessel and her character.

"Try her with the big bow-chaser, Cap," suggested the Lieutenant; and the order was immediately given.

Boom! went the huge piece, as we quivered on the summit of a lofty wave, and the rushing bolt struck phosphor from a dozen crests ere its course was lost in the distance.

"No go! it's a good three miles," growled Captain B——, measuring the interval once more with his glass.

"Let me try," said Bracetant, quietly taking his stand behind the gun, which was now being charged anew, and carefully adjusting the screws.

Again the sullen thunder spouted from the port, and we marked the ball by its path of fire.

"Short again!" grumbled the skipper. "We're paying the floor of the sea with— Ha!"

For an instant the messenger had vanished like its predecessor; then, far away to the south, there sprang a fountain of spray—its last dip in the brine —and the Lieutenant had in the strange vessel's stern off at the cross-trees, and dragged a cloud of useless canvas down her shrouds.

"Brave Bracetant!" exclaimed the Captain. "Try again, Lieutenant."

"Try, try again," exclaimed that devil of a middy, Jerry Bloom, throwing his hornpipe to the terror of the cockswain's buntens.

But the topsails of the stranger suddenly grew black with men, the broken spars were cleared away as by magic, another sail puffed out broadly from her foremast to make up for the shattered main-mast, and even as we gazed a strain of bandmusic came floating over the sea, with the "Bonny Blue flag" for the burden.

"She's telling her name," said Bracetant, laughing.

"Yes; but she's going to kick us," cried Jerry, as a long tongue of flame leaped from the stranger's stern; and the rifled shell from her gun came to us almost simultaneously with the ball, which whistled through our tops, letting down a heavy shower on the quarter-deck. Again and again did a dead man, but was only stunned.

It was evident that the stranger was plucky, and not to be taken alive. We had still worked on her with our bow-gun, seldom doing much damage, but at last a lucky shot struck her hull; she kicked off the point of our bowsprit with provoking ease, and burst an ugly hole through our main-topsail.

"By Jingo, she's a fighter, boys," said Captain B——; "Now let me have a shy;" and grasping the piece with a practised hand, he swiftly adjusted it.

"Hurra! I told you so! Clean through her poop!"

Sure enough the shot struck her after-bulwarks, and must have played hob with the chandeliers in the cabin.

"Just wait till we can give her a broadside," added the winger of the bolt, rubbing his hands good-humoredly.

"We mustn't wait too-long, then," said the cool Lieutenant, "for I see the Look-out Lights. In half an hour we shall be under the guns of Fort Macon."

He pointed over the side as he spoke, far down in the western verge, to a faint, hazil glimmering scarcely brighter than the sunset-cloud that surrounded it, but with the hazy lustre which there was no mistaking.

"The rebels are reported to have destroyed the lantern," said I, suggestively.

"Don't you believe it, my boy," replied the old sailor. "They know when to down them and when to light a British skipper to their nest."

The chase was now within range two short three hours, and the fort at Cape Fear could not be more than twelve hours off. In our lee, we were still two miles from the stranger, and the distance was momently lessening of overhauling her in time, unless we should succeed in disabling her entirely. Already our own risk of becoming crippled from her well-directed stern-shots was very great. If the wind had been light the shot in her sails would have done impaired our speed but slightly; but the bracing gale that had us in its teeth lent as half our speed, and a single shot in the rigging would be to us irretrievable.

"There! there! we have it now! Was ever such luck?" cried the Captain, with an oath. And our main-sail came down with a rush as he spoke, every one of the lee-braces and bowlines of the mast, which was severed like a pipe-stem.

We all looked glum enough at this mishap, and began to look about for the best way to repair it. But the captain determined on a last effort, and ordered a broadside fired. Though the distance, a mile and a half at least, made success almost doubtful. The ship rounded to handsomely. The guns were loaded with double charges of grape and canned, and, at the given signal, a long sheet of flame leaped from the side, and the solids frigate seemed to reel under the heavy recoil of the nearly simultaneous death-bolts of her terrific broadside rushed upon the prey. Another instant and a wild hurra swelled upon our crowded decks; for the broadside was a success. The entire rigging of the stranger seemed to have been swept away, trailing in the sea; and we could distinguish another ugly smash in her main-topsail, that very nearly carried her mast overboard. In short, of course the prospect was now far better than before, but still by no means certain, as it was questionable whether we could repair the damage inflicted in the rigging, and the rapidity with which the damaged tops of the stranger were mended and cleared away seemed miraculous, though she now gave over firing, apparently bent on safety only by flight instead. Our own guns were kept up on our own mainmast, and, with a clew or two on the mizzen shrouds, and the use of the after-braces, the ship might yet be kept manageable topsail spars. our mainsail was again shot, with cheering indications that we were gaining fast. In fifteen minutes we had so sensibly diminished the interval between us and our prey that we caused firing, the Captain modestly desiring to take her with sans clothes on, to use his own expression. But our confidence proved overweening. The lanterns of Cape Lookout were now left far away on our starboard quarter, and every forward furlong we made was of much nearer to the formidable fort. Just then a faint flash, like the horizon glimmer of summer lightning, shone above the waters far beyond the ship we were pursuing, and a hardly heard but ominous boom told us that the old sea-dragon, Fort Macon, was not sleeping in the moonlight. We now renewed our pelting of the stranger with further damage to her tops. Whereupon she veered for Shackleford Shoals, with evident intention of beaching herself if unable to get under the fort. Another quarter of an hour was spent in within long range of the heavy coast guns of the fortress, who seemed to understand the state of the case perfectly, for her shells began to drop around us briskly. And now the great breakers of the sandy coast were plainly discernible on the starboard, tossing their white manes like harrying legions high above the beach, with lure and there a bold, bluffy rise from the monotonous flat; and the Devil's Skillet —a dangerous reef—was boiling white a little lower down.

Shackleford Shoals is a low, narrow sand-bank, about twenty miles in length. Its lower extremity comes within three miles, at a rough guess, of the Rhodes Banks, or Shoals, on the easternmost point of which the fort is situated. The bank is every where frequented, but especially at each southern point, where the dangerous shoals are covered with a deceitful appearance of profundity. And now, as we neared our prey by the quarter, she made a bold push for this inlet; but as we dashed in between her and the fort, regardless of the latter's continuous firing, she altered her course, and steered right bow-on for the fatal breakers on her starboard.

"She's aground, by Jove!" said Jerry, who then ran below for his pistols, as the Captain ordered the boats to be manned.

"Has she struck?"

"No—yes—there she goes!"

Sure enough, she had grounded and slightly heeled over, but in nearly deep water that the soft sand of the shoals would not hold her long. Two of our boats were manned, with our second Lieutenant in commander of the expedition, and I in his boat. We pushed off with some difficulty, on account of the heavy sea; but, as we neared the lee coasts of the suicide also lowered, and pulling inside for the inlet. The rats were leaving the crib.

"You can go no further, my boy," said Bracetant. Throw over every thing to lighten her," was the parting injunction of Captain B——, and as we pulled away he heard the ship out of range of the fort. It was rather uncomfortable the way the shells whistled and burst around us, or burst above our heads, but we pulled away for the prize. Our boat was the last to reach the ship—a first-class iron privateer, of great power, and clipper-built. As the crew of the advanced boat climbed up her sides several crashes made us aware that the fort was turning her guns inland, and, indeed, to deprive us of the plunder.

"And hot shot at that. Listen!" said Bracetant to me; when the fizzing sound of the plunging hot shot was plainly distinguishable.

Our boat was the second of the prize when we perceived the men who had already boarded her jumping hastily over the bulwarks, dropping into their boat, and pushing off. If something unusual was to pay. One had been left behind. It was this little muddy, dirty Afrian, who now appeared unconcernedly leaning over the side, and coolly awaiting the Lieutenant's orders.

"What's her cargo?" bellowed Bracetant through his trumpet.

"Powder sang back the shrill tones of the New-World Canadian; and its! ain't we all the plunging red-hot shot; and crash! crash! they went against the floating magazine with frightful precision.

"Jump for your life!" roared the Lieutenant to the ferry——. "Back-water, you lubbers! back, for your lives!"

We saw the midshipman join his palms over his head and leap into the centre of the boat astern. Scarcely had his slender figure cut the brine before a number of sharp reports were heard—then a long, deep, volcanic explosion that swelled into a terrific thunder, deadened our ears; a dozen columns of blood-red flame shot up to the stars; and we beheld the deck and majestic spars of the doomed blockade runner spring aloft in fragments! A huge black mass descended in a fearful splash a yard from our bows—the long stern-chaser going to the bottom—the sides of the powder-ship yawned wide open an instant with fire, then disappeared in the flames dying out. The sea was plowed around to us by the falling timbers of deck and spar, and the glorious steamer was no more!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PERSIC LOSS.—The gentleman who lately took the front air in the Central Park is supposed to restore it.

EAST BOSSETT first wife, the Countess of Ribblesdale, was a widow, and a lady of many proportions; hence his birthday was called by the wits the widow's mite. "Oh!" exclaimed a lady to whom this witticism was related at a dinner party, "I now see how it came to pass that his birthday was called the widow's mite."

CRISPY KNOWLEDGE.—Brimstone. Any stone found on the edge of an artificial pond is Brim-stone.

What kind of gloves are like young niggers?—Black kids.

Why is a swell like a fellow fond of getting tight?—Because he often has a glass in his eye.

When are a man's brains most likely to change color? When the hair begins to grow gray on his head.

Why can a lady never reasonably object to a gentleman putting his arm round her waist to support her?—Because in touching her in a prop-er manner.

When is a Policeman like a Samaritan?—When he comes out of Sores ones.

Which city is made of the lightest materials?—Cork.

Murphy was asked how it was so difficult to waken him in a morning, and answered that it was because of taking your own advice, always to attend to what you hear, or whenever I sleps I pay attention to it."

The reason why sailors so often marry virgins is, that all sails have an affinity for stink.

New explanation of "the golden mean."—To have gold and be too mean to use it.

Many ladies think themselves unable to walk a mile who would gladly dance three times that distance.

"Call that a kind man," said an actor, speaking of an absent acquaintance; "a man who is away from his friends, and never sends them a farthing! Call that kindness?"

"Yes, warmmiting kindness," Jerrold replied.

A learned doctor has given his opinion that light lecture is a public benefit, inasmuch as it kills off all the foolish girls and leaves the wise only to grow into women.

"Why," said a country clergyman to a boy, he clerk, "do you always sleep in your pew when I am in the pulpit?" "Why, sir," replied the boy, "because I'm tired out." "Because, sir," was the reply, "when you preach I'm sure to be tired, but I can't visit a stranger without keeping a good look-out."

A Scotch minister, after a hard day's labor, and while at a "harvest tea," as he called it, kept incessantly making the "hum," and stating that "Mrs. Dunlop at home was so fond of hum that as he was, when the servants kindly offered to send her the present of a hum. "It's sure Sir" y'er, unco kin', but I'll no pit to be the trouble: I'll just tak' it lease on the horse afore me." When he was, like his namesake, and the hum was put into a sack, but some difficulty was experienced in getting it to the parsonage house. His benevolent genius soon ran the gauntlet. "I think, mistress, a cheese in the liber ca' wad be handier to carry hame." So his wife was immediately set on, and, like another John Gilpin, he moved away with his "balance hum."

One asked another why barring was always called a republic. "Forsooth," quoth the other, "because nobody are so poor but they have not a servitude among them."

An Irish fire-eater, previous to a trial in which he was the defendant, was informed by his counsel that if there was a juryman on the list to whom he objected, he could try challenge them. "Faiks, and so I will," replied he; "if they do not setisfy me, I will challenge every man of them."

A country schoolmaster had two pupils, to one of whom he was partial, and to the other severe. One morning it happened that these two boys were late, and were called up to account for it. "I was late because I had to help boys; why did you not come?" "Please, Sir," said the favorite, "I was detained by the boys going by the door, and I thought the school-bell was the schoolmaster-bell." "Very well," said the master, glad of some pretext to excuse his favorite. "And now, Sir," turning to the other, "why were you late?" "Please, Sir," said the puzzled boy, "I—I—was waiting to see Tom off!"

A gentleman dining at a hotel, whose servants were "short," was asked if he preferred a leg or wing of the fowl. After a long time the lad returned, and said, "Please, Sir, the cook and hungry gentleman has it. Are you the lad who took away my plate for this beef?" "Yes, Sir." "Then Sir," resumed the hungry wit, "how you have grown!"

A certain dramatic translator, introducing a well-known comedy to the English public, said: "I have called it 'Used Up,' when it is such a bad as he looks." "True, Ma'am," said the dramatist; "and that is the great difference between me and my friend."

An Irish crier at Ballinasloe being ordered to clear the court, did so in the following announcement: "Now, then, all ye blackguards that isn't lawyers must lave the court."

Lord M—— and a very exalted opinion of his own eleverness. He was lately heard addressing some young men: "Now I happen to say a foolish thing I always burst out a laughing myself." "I envy you your happiness," was the reply. "Charles Townsend," (or you must certainly live the merriest life of any man in Europe)."

"Do come and dine with me," said John to Pat: "you must; though I have only a nice piece of beef and some potatoes." "Oh! my dear fellow," said Pat, "you are the best sporting about the dinner, it's the very same I would have had to-day myself, if I had been at home."

A toping bookseller presented a check at the banking-house of Sir W. Curtis & Co., and upon the cashier putting the usual question, "How will you have it?" replied, "Cold, without sugar."

A tradesman having dunned a customer for a long time, the debtor one day observed his creditor intending to call on him. "My friend," said he to him, "I think you owe me a small account, and I have a great mind to pay you; therefore, I take this opportunity to tell you, that as I shall never pay you a farthing, you need not go down, but mind your business, and don't lose your time by calling here. Now, I suppose, I have given a set of answers to you, so have no affection, and they may waste their time as they please."

Sergeant Whitaker, one of the most eminent lawyers of his day, was an eccentric. A friend, at one of the acting theatres, met him in the lobby, and the sergeant asked him if he had found himself comfortable and warm. "Yes, Sergeant," replied the acquaint; "very much so on the whole. At first I felt a little queer for want of Mrs. Siddons, but when I found that she was engaged to play in the room, I knew it behind my back, and it did every bit as well."

A GENTLE HUMAN BEING.—Sir Boyle Roche said, "Single misfortunes never come alone, and the greatest of all people misfortunes are generally followed by double ones."

In the last illness of George Coleman, the doctor being late in an appointment, apologized to his patient, saying that he had been detained in town on one who had fallen down a well. "Did he kick the bucket, doctor?" groaned the poor patient.

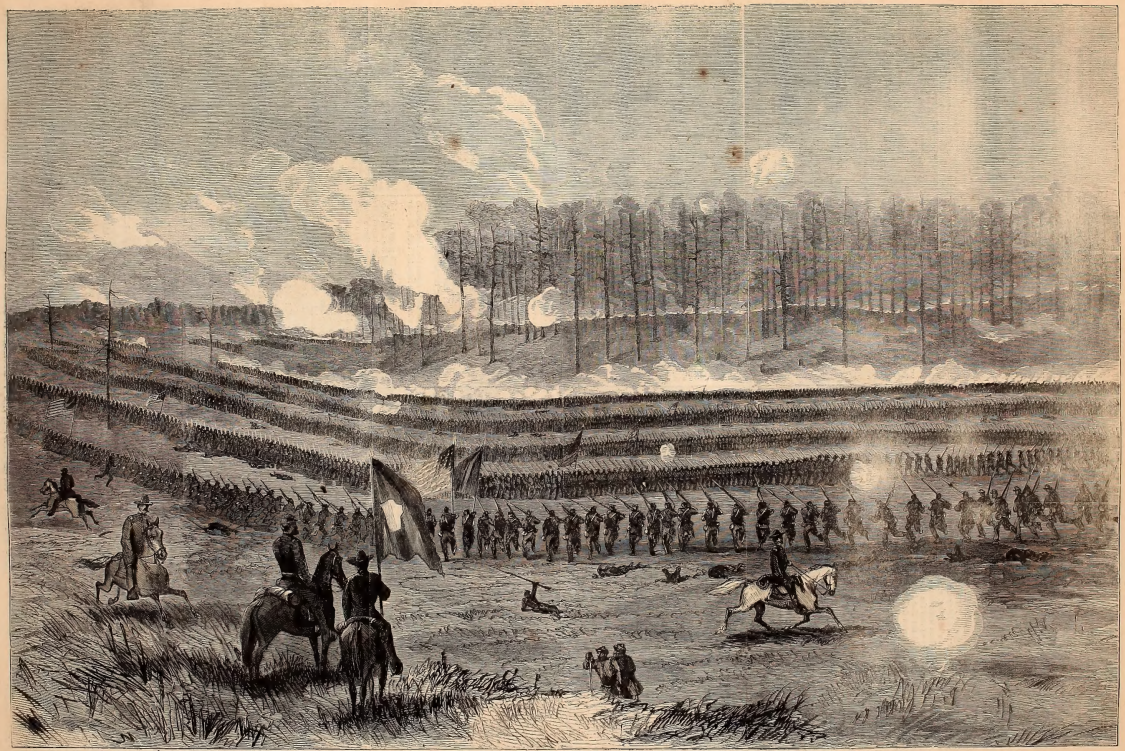
An overbearing barrister, endeavoring to bow-bat a witness, told him he could plainly see a rogue in his face. "Then you have an ill turn," said the witness, "that my face was a looking-glass."

A professor of legerdemain entertained an audience in a village, which was rather poorly supported. Soon after "astonishing the natives" with various tricks, he asked for a small collection. A miser, with a little sixpence, handed out the coin, which the juggler speedily exhibited, with a flourish, between a seven-shilling piece. "Now my brother?" exclaimed the miser, "I'll be hanged if you have not got my brother!" "Indeed, sir," said the juggler, surveyed the piece of silver, and, with a knowing look, and turning it round and round with a peculiar twist of his hand, he returned it to his kindness, and, putting it into his pocket, said, "I'm sure you'll do me a favor to-morrow night."

Two pedestrian travelers had taken up their quarters for the night at a village inn. "Landlord!" exclaimed one, "I often meet morning complained to his friend that he had a very inefficient boy, and asked him how he had style. "Truth, Jem," replied Lemuel, "one vera well either; but I vera much better off than the boys, for do'l one of them closed an e'e the hale night?"

Prejudices are like rats, and a man's mind like a trap; they get in easily, and then perhaps can't get out at all.

A Quaker said to a gunner, "Friend, I counsel no bloodshed; but if it be thy design to hit the little man in the white jacket, pulle closer to the little feller."



GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—ATTACK ON THE ENEMY'S CENTRE, NEAR MARIETTA, GEORGIA.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE GREAT FIRE IN BROOKLYN, JULY 15, 1864.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THE caprices of the Paris fashions are becoming more and more eccentric, and there has been such a succession of cosmopolitan innovations, from English jockey-caps to Russian boots, that the present summer attire is any thing but Parisian. These liberties place elderly ladies in the dilemma of either following fashions not suitable to their years, or of subjecting themselves to ridicule by the opposite course. The bonnet is especially eccentric. The Parisiennes seem to be suited with the slightest covering for the head. In dresses silks of light color, Chambéry gauzes, and double barèges are still in vogue, especially for the costumes of a single color now so much patronized. Bottines are now frequently superseded by boots: the Empress's corduroy manufacturers them either in yellow leather or in soft English leather, black, violet, or green, according to the color of the jupons. It is scarcely necessary to mention that the color of the stockings should match that of the boots.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY, 1864.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Dress for the Sea-side.—Robe of written-colored taffeta, ornamented on the skirt with two passementerie trimmings. The dress is worn over an alpaca jupon, tucked, and alternating with blue and white stripes. The long vest is provided with blue cuffs and lapels, completed by buttons and brandebourgs. White hands and cuffs. N.Y. Tuscan hat, decorated with eagle and ostrich feathers. Lilac fichu-cravat, with high knot.

Fig. 2. Dress for a Young Lady.—Silk robe of white ground with colored stripes. The skirt is trimmed with an enormous ruching placed between two rows of fluted ribbon; and the bosom and sleeves are handsomely finished with a similar ruching. Bonnet of mauve crape, the quiet appearance of which is relieved and enlivened inside and outside by the addition of four white marguerites half buried in the crape.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Dark green silk dress, ornamented with bows of corded silk and tassels; a similar bot maiden bow is attached to the shoulder and falls on the sleeve. The collet is of black guipure, forming, with the rich black and green dress, a very effective but elegant garniture. Black bonnet-bandeau, of velvet, the top of which is composed of rich Magenta velvet mixed with black lace and jet-beads; a narrow jet fringe descends from the edge of the crescent.

IN A NUT-SHELL.

"I SAY, Ross, girls are a nuisance!—aren't they?" said Reginald Dexter, lounging one day among the silken cushions in his sister's boudoir one morning. "I wouldn't give that!"—with a snap of his aristocratic fingers—"for the whole crew, so far as I know any thing about them!"

"When did you see Victoria last?" questioned Rose, with an expressive lighting of her pretty brows.

She was pretty, indeed—a dainty snowy and pink piece of prettiness.

Her brother, Raymond Dexter, was what the ladies called a "love of a man;" effeminately handsome and fashionable, sporting white hands and enamelled locks, yet a full-statured man physically, with a broad white brow that ought to have had intellect under it, and a deep dark eye that ought to have flashed with the language of an energetic and cultivated intelligence.

The flash came transiently as his sister spoke; and he said, with some impatience,

"Victoria Field is the greatest nuisance of them all!"

Victoria Field was the nurse of the latter children of womankind; but Raymond Dexter had had a grand passion for—a plain, dark woman, without even what they called "style." The last woman in the world, one would have thought, for an exquisite like Raymond Dexter to fall in love with. Yet he had declared, more so foolishly as that, as Rose had shrewdly suspected.

Victoria Field was at the bottom of the astounding opinion he had ever expressed concerning girls.

Rose, however, was far from apprehending the extent of the mischief. She would have opened her languid blue eyes to much more than their natural dimensions if she had known that Miss Field—that plain, dark girl—had, in style, and manner, and in no expectations, so far as any body knew—had refused to become the wife of her brother Raymond—positively refused. Nay more, and what shocked in his consciousness still, when he, totally at a loss to understand such perversity toward invincibility like his, asked and politely pressed the reason of her refusal, instead of telling him, as she had a perfect right to do, that her reasons were no concern of his, she rose and asked him, with that outspokenness which was one of her charms for him, if he expected her to give him her hand only reasons, or—. He knew that that pause meant that if she could not give him the true reason she should not give any; indeed, as was natural, he wished for the truth, of course.

She crossed the room then, and took from the window, where it hung, a little crystal flask and brought it to him, put it in his hand, and stood looking at him with a sweet, grave, half-sad wistfulness.

She had beautiful eyes!

She flask was one of those toys with which some curious people amuse themselves. Rose had heard of or seen such, I dare say. An acorn suspended by a thread from the mouth of the flask within half-sealed in that narrow opening, and become an oak—as oak truly, but in miniature, dwarfed, and of course could only live a vegetable, tiny pant, drag on a sickly existence, and die at last in such confined quarters.

Holding it so between his hands—awkwardly enough, too, considering that he was Raymond Dexter—Miss Field could hardly help seeing that her flash had aged home. "What if I should break the flask?" he said, with a sudden abruptness and bravery surprising to himself.

"I wish you would," she said, eagerly, her hand falling lightly upon his arm. He stole a swift glance at the acorn, sweet eyes that seemed watching him almost pleadingly, then, with a very vague consciousness of where, or what, or who he was, he said good-morning, and left her.

The flask, unbroken still, hung in the airiest place in his room, and he made it a principle not to look toward it when he could possibly help it. What did the girl mean by giving him a "potted acorn?" as he called it. If he didn't know what she meant he ought to have asked her—that's all—and, for a man in a state of unconsciousness as to the meaning of the gift he fancied he loved, he had a most singular habit of thrilling and turning scarlet every time he thought of her little hand upon his arm, and her beautiful, wistful eyes upon his face.

II.

IN the deep, wide parlors that night Rose Dexter entertained her "thousand and one" friends, or something less—a gay crowd, with the surge of music and plume and perfume among it, and the flash of bright eyes and scintillant diamonds. Dainty little Rose had shimmers enough to have turned wiser heads than hers; but the worst of it was, that she was inclined decidedly to a preference among them.

There was a pair of eyes hovering always somewhere within view of her that slowly and reluctantly took in that knowledge, and the graying brow above those eyes lent themselves and frowned assiously at the consciousness.

Two only of the dancers in the beauty's train did these eyes see. Leeds Entresol and Frank Brandon. Leeds Entresol, tall, dark, magnificent, with a deep and vibrant as smoothest cafe-rau-rait, and a jetty wealth of whisker and mustache. Rose both sought for glance and shrank from it. The other, Frank Brandon, a slighter, more graceful young fellow, as light as the first was dark—gay, laughing, genial; but without the high nonsensility for any one in the room save pretty, pretty Rose. She blushed often at some things he said to her; but she never blushed as the gallant might have been as much for Entresol as for Brandon, since often the one could not well help hearing what the other said.

Entresol said little, Brandon much; and Brandon was scarcely absent from her side an instant the whole evening, when it was possible to be by her.

Entresol seemed swayed by circumstances, near her or away, as it chanced; but with his eye losing none of her pretty witcheries, the smiling coquettes, which she dispensed about her.

Perhaps he could hear across the room, or else had singular facility in translating the movement of Rose's lingering lip, for, from at the other side of the wide parlor, when, with a furtive glance at his and a low trilling laugh she was whispering to Brandon about the Black Prince, he made his way at once from the parlors, and deputing his farewell expressions to friend, left the house.

Among the throng, but not of them, paced William Dexter, banker and millionaire. It was a habit of his presence in such scenes—even in his own house, that few knew him accustomed to—that no one did his body mostly silent attendance, silent man, watching from under nearly gray brows—watching and commenting with inward discontent. The two conclusions, passing comment of this man's life had been vested in gold and kindred—the getting the one and involving it upon the other.

His wife need not have died, as she did. The one warmth and wildness and softness, ought to have protected it from the barrenness and hardness that she died pondered. And his boy was selfish, but, iron, desert, as a rock in an unfruitful country.

He had always told himself so—sometimes, early and late, that he might surround those two, Raymond and Rose, with this not and this and the, so there it is—that he might do for them as he saw to do it. And the two were as prodigal as might be expected of that of the value of which they had no appreciation, and of the cost of which ignorance.

He had refused them nothing all their lives that it was possible for him to grant them, and the possibility had a wide range. And what was he reward? He was pacing the parlors still when the last guest, Frank Brandon, lingering long, finally departed, with an expressive pressure of little Rose's hand.

William Dexter knew this young man for a scoundrel, notwithstanding his frank face and genial ways, and had forbidden Rose to hold any intercourse with him, which thing was evading.

He had supposed himself obeyed; but this evening's observation had shown him that, for the first time during the case, the two were on surprisingly familiar terms.

Rose?

The girl turned from her light good-night to young Brandon with a little nervous start. She had not been conscious of the full attention of the evening, and she colored some now upon becoming aware of it, and remembering at the same time that he had said to Frank Brandon, Entresol.

Mr. Dexter's anger, under constraint all the evening, burst from now with progressive violence.

Rose shrank palely before it, and at the first lull in the storm escaped to her apartment.

This was not all that was happening.

In earlier portion of it Mr. Dexter had overheard a conversation between some of the guests which had startled him with the force of a blow; forced him to accept, a truth that had long been knocking at the door of his consciousness, but to which he had refused to listen until now. It concerned Raymond—and Raymond entering the room just then from an evening club, he, pacing the floor, accosted him with a quotation from it that struck him suddenly white, between anger and amazement:

"Raymond Dexter has in his originality the material for a man, but a more conceited, brainless coxcomb than he is I don't know in the whole range of my acquaintance."

Raymond caught his breath like a woman. The words expressed so nearly a thousand things vaguely trying to thread the chambers of his brain ever since Victoria Field's refusal to become his wife, that upon that subject under his observation leaped suddenly now into flame, and died as quickly.

"Whose fault is it, father?" he said, low, but bitterly, and left the room and the house.

William Dexter, pacing those magnificent parlors amidst the unquenched blaze of light that showed all treasures of luxury and taste, questioned but found no solution of it.

Whose fault was it? Not his. What could man do more than he had done for his children—for Raymond?

Raymond, pacing his own apartment a while, and finally with an impatient shrug throwing himself dressed as he was upon his bed, found no solution for it either.

Waking in the morning, Victoria Field's crystal toy dangled before him, and dashed taunting gleams in his eyes as the sun struck it. With an impatient movement he swept the curtain between him and it. What did the girl mean by telling him she wished he would break the flask? What would become of her young oak if he did that?

A plague upon the old, strange girl! There were plenty of women—women worth having, too, who would have jumped at the offer she had refused. There was Laura Mason, now the handsomest woman in New York, and the cleverest. She hadn't any fault to find in him, and he wouldn't have been afraid to wager any sum any body pleased that if he had asked her to be his wife she would have said "yes," and "thank you" too. He had half a mind to set up a flirtation with her, just to show Victoria Field how little he was affected by her ambiguities.

III.

A WEEK only had passed, but in the fast life which he lived Raymond Dexter had improved it to the extent of becoming or imagining himself desperately in love with Laura Mason.

One morning, in a careless off-hand manner, very different from that on a similar occasion about ten days before, he asked her the same question he had Victoria Field, and got in substance his "yes, thank you."

Coming home, hiding himself in his own room, the first thing he saw was Miss Field's crystal flask, which Rose had evidently found from its neutral ignominiously, saying grimly as he surveyed the fragments, "You told me to break it." Then seeming to feel the light, which touch upon his acorn, the beautiful eyes upon his face, sudden remorse seized him, and carefully gathering up the mutilated remains of the poor "potted acorn," he took them into the conservatory, and dislodging a superb Adriana lily from its vase, deposited his young oak therein.

That night William Dexter coming home late, and not tottering, but walking with a pause, as the weight of twice his years had suddenly settled upon him, clung to the door-post in the hall and listened to the unusual sounds that came from the dining-room beyond.

Rose and Raymond were both there. No, that was not Raymond's voice, and suddenly throwing wide the door he entered and stood beside Rose. Rose with her head deeply bent, Frank Brandon's, her white eyelids drooping under his ardent gaze. She started away from him with a low cry as she saw her father, and Raymond's hot struggle with Brandon, after an instant's disconcertment, said, with a straightforwardness worthy a good cause, "I have been asking Rose to be my wife. Sir: she will consent if you will."

"And you, Rose?" said the man, strangely. "Will go away now, young man, and if you come back to me to-morrow with the same plea on your lips you may have her."

And when Frank Brandon had gone, and before it had passed the name of William Dexter, bankrupt, was being bandied from lip to lip.

It was not the bankruptcy every thing was given to Frank Brandon, who did not so much as send an apology for his non-appearance at the appointed time.

Rose, reeling under it all, but, strangely enough, retaining much of her old delicate sense, crept after her wretched father into the library just in time to thrust aside, with her frail but frantic hand, the deadly poison he was going to the cruel extremities.

And then she staid by him till Raymond came, very faded, sick little rose, but curiously with courage enough in her for that, and too much pride to treat a servant as one of the family.

Raymond sent her away to her room when he came, but he held her in his arms a moment first. He was a little afraid of his sister met, with a strange new sympathy, in that hour of trial, and he said, as he let her go, "Never mind, sis." He was thinking of Victoria Field's flask.

Watching with the poor old man, to whom an opium had brought sleep, he saw the flask in the conservatory, twisting in his fingers a note that had come to him at nightfall from Laura Mason.

The flask, broken, seemed to present an alternative of the day before, and took the first opportunity of informing him to that effect.

Raymond's hand fell, neither this blow nor the other seemed to have crushed him.

He bent a moment over the poor little "potted acorn:" it was dying, like its living after all, and Raymond turned away from it with a curious light in his eyes.

In the midst of all that chaos of bewilderment and confusion as to what they should do, the old man and all they had to depend upon his losses, Raymond Rose staid with him, scared and sick, but sensible, and Raymond rushed to and fro like a raddelesis body, busy, busy, busy—uncertain.

In the midst of all came a letter from a good old country cousin, inviting them to his home, offering the best at his command—a home to Rose and her father, and the lease of a small farm to Raymond.

Raymond winced, but he had resolved deliberately to accept the first honorable employment that offered, and surely nothing else was to be had.

People knew too well how Raymond Dexter had lived. Nobody had a good enough opinion of him to have him in their counting-house or salesroom. And so, dandy as he was, or had been, he wrote grateful, if reluctant, acceptance of his uncle's offer.

The three left town quietly, making no adieux; only, Raymond left a friendly hand to Victoria Field a small package, which, upon opening, proved to be merely some fragments of broken crystal. But Miss Field understood precisely what she saw them, and some tears from her beautiful eyes glistened among the broken bits.

IV.

UNCLE TOM DEXTER, as every one in that region called Raymond's uncle, stared and shook his head inconsiderately at sight of his tenant.

Raymond colored and laughed, but succeeded in persuading his uncle "to give him a try."

It was what Uncle Tom called "up-hill work."

City exquisites are not transformed into hardworking farmers at a moment's notice. But Raymond had made the one resolve necessary to success in any undertaking, viz., whatever he did, that he would do it well. And he did it well. All the rough and tumble of this new life his hitherto dwarfed energies, physical and mental, seemed to shake off fetters.

He had a man, intellectually and physically, a son, a brother, filling the last days of his old father with peace, a guard to his sister, that no Frank Brandon ever again baffled.

In the fullness of time he brought home to the little farm—now his own, and something to be proud of, for the very reason that he had made it his own —Victoria.

In the soft purple twilight he led her up the walk his wife, stopping a moment by a young sturdy oak of some years' growth, and saying, "God helping me, dear, I mean to grow with it." And so he has.

Rose is a happier and a worth a thousand like Frank Brandon. I am not at all sure that the "crash" did not benefit her as much as Raymond.

BEATEN.

Do you know this peculiar feeling? I speak to men in middle age.

To be tearing up as manfully as you can: putting a good face on things: trying to persuade yourself that you have done your duty in this life: and all of a sudden to feel that merciful self-deception fail you, and just to break down; to run how bitterly beaten and disappointed you are, and what a sad and wretched failure you have made of life?

There is no one in the world we all try so hard to conceal from as ourselves. How we bookkeep that individual, and try to make him look at things through rose-colored spectacles! Like the poor little girl in Mr. Dickens's touching story, we seek to blow very much. But sometimes we are unable to make believe. The illusion goes. The bare, unvarnished truth forces itself upon us: and we see what miserable little wretches we have been poor and petty are our ends in life; and what a dull misery round it all is. You remember the poor old bald-pate Wilkins of whom Charles Lamb tells us? He was not to be disillusioned. He asked you to hand him the silver sugar-tongs in as excellent a tone that though your eyes testified that it was but a teaspoon, and that of Britannia metal, a certain gush was cast over your memory that he had thought that half-starved veteran kept up in this way before people, he would often break down when he was alone. It would suddenly rush upon him what a wretched old humbug he was.

Is it sometimes so with all of us? We are none of us half satisfied with ourselves. We know we are poor creatures, though we try to persuade ourselves that we are tolerably good. There are some of us have any sense, this is so. Yet I greatly envied a man whom I passed in the street yesterday; a stranger, a middle-aged person. His nose was elevated in the air: he had a supercilious demeanor, expressive of superiority to his fellow-creatures, and contempt for them. Perhaps a nice person, and so entitled to look down on ordinary folk. Perhaps he was a humbug. The few minutes I ever seen had nothing of his uplifted aspect. But what a fine thing it would be, to be able always to delude yourself in the belief that you were a great and important person; to be always quite satisfied with yourself, and your position! There are people like, while reading certain words in the Litany, feel as it was a mere form signifying nothing, to say, from all miserable sinners deliver us. There are some who say these words sorrowfully from their very heart, feeling that they express God's truth. They know what wicked, silly, mad beings they are; they know what a poor thing they have made of life, with all their hard work, and all their planning and schemes. In fact, they are miserable, disappointed down. The high hopes with which they started are blighted—were blighted long ago. They think, with a bitter laugh, of their early dreams of eminence, of success, of happiness. And sometimes, after looking for a few days as well as they could, they feel they can do it no longer. Their heart fails them. They sit down and give up altogether. Bread runs and goes before their face. It is a comfort to many a poor fellow to think of Elijah, beaten and sick at heart, sitting down under a scrubby bush at seventeen miles from the place from finding there was no more left, and that he could bear no more. Poor, sad soul that he was—as we all are.

"But he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper tree: and he requested for himself that he might die; and said, It is enough: now, O Lord, take away my life: for I am not better than my fathers."

I thought of Elijah in the wilderness the other night. I saw the great prophet again. For human nature is the same in a great prophet as in a poor little hungry boy.

At nine o'clock on Saturday evening I heard Arthur, indoors and out crying outside. I knew the kind of thing that means some one fairly beaten. Not angry, not bitter: smashed. I opened the front door, and found the little boy, he was sitting on the steps, crying. I asked him what was the matter. I see the thin, white, hungry face of him now. He would have shrunk away if he could; he plainly thought his case beyond all mending. But I brought him in, and sat down with him in the lobby; and he told his story. He had a large bundle of sticks in a ragged sack—firewood. At three o'clock that afternoon he had come to sell them. His mother was a poor washer-woman, in the most wretched part of the city; his father was killed a fortnight ago by falling from a scaffold. He had walked a long way through the streets, about three miles, I think, to sell his wood: afternoon is all his sticks, but had sold only a half-penny-worth. He was lame, poor little man, from a sore leg, but managed to carry his heavy load. But at last, going down some poor area stair in the dark, he fell down a whole flight of steps, and hurt his sore leg so that he could not walk, and also got a great cut on the forehead. He had got just the half-penny for his poor mother: he had been going about with his burden for six hours, with nothing to eat. But he turned his face homeward, carrying his sticks; and struggled on and reached a quarter of a mile from he broke down. He could go no further. In the dark cold night, he sat down and cried. It was not the crying of one who hoped to attract attention; it was the crying of flat despair.

The first thing I did (which did not take a moment) was to thank God that my door-steps had been his juniper tree. Then I remembered that the first thing God did when Elijah broke down was to give him something to eat. Yes, it is a great thing to keep up physical nature. And the little man had had no food since three o'clock till nine. So there was brought by kind hands (for mine), several great slices of bread and butter (jam even was added), and a cup of warm tea. The spirit began to come a little into the child. And he thought he could manage to get home if we would let him leave his sticks till Monday. We asked him what he would have got for his sticks if he had sold them all: ninepence. Under the circumstances, it appeared that a profit of a hundred per cent. was not exorbitant; so he received eighteen pence, which he stowed away somewhere in his rags; and the sack went away, and returned with all the sticks emptied out. Finally, an old gray coat of rough tweed came, and was put upon the little boy, and carefully buttoned: forming a capital great-coat. And forasmuch as his trousers were most unusually ragged, a pair of such appeared, and being wrapped up, were placed in the sack, along with a good deal of bread and butter. How the heart of the child had by this time revived! He thought he could go home nicely. And having very briefly asked the Father of the fatherless to care for him, I betook him the way in the dark. All this is supremely little to talk about. But it is quite a different thing to see. To see all the poor cottages in the fens and the dirty hand like a claw: to think of ten years old: to think of one's own children in their warm beds: to think what all this would have been to one's self as a little child. Oh, if I had a fourleaved shamrock, what a turn-over there should be in this world!

When the little man went away I came back to my work. I shall see my pen and write a page but I could not. I thought I saw many human beings besides Elijah in the case of that child. I tried to enter into the feeling (or was it an easy) of that poor little thing in his utter despair. It was sad enough to carry about the heavy bundle hour after hour, and to sell only the half-penny-worth. But it was dreadful, after tumbling down the stair, to find he was not able to walk; and still to be struggling to carry back his load to his bare home, which was two miles distant from this spot. And at last to look down in misery on the step in the dark night, stunned. He would have been quite happy if he had got nimpence. God help him. When I was a boy, I remember how a certain poor man who embittered my life in those days was wont to say, as though it summed up all the virtues, that such a person was one who looked at both sides of a shilling before spending it. It is such a sight as the little boy on the step that makes one do the like: that helps one to understand the power there is in a shilling. But many human beings, who can give a shilling more than take it, are as really beaten as the little boy. They too have got their bags, filled with no matter what. Perhaps poetry, perhaps metaphysics, perhaps agnosticism, perhaps sermons. They thought they would find a market, and sell them at a great price. But they found none. They have fallen down a stair, and broken their leg and bruised their head. And now, in a moment of misery, they have sat down in the dark on a step; and though not crying, are gazing about them blankly.

Perhaps you are one of them.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.—Mr. A. Morton, the eminent manufacturer of Gold Pens has been compelled, by the continual advance in nominal values caused by the inflation of our Currency, to advance the prices of his goods. His price notice list he can stand on no longer, and must charge enough for his goods to cover their cost.

This is termed an advance in prices, but not quite accurately. Every farmer can buy one, a dozen, or a hundred of Morton's Pens for less Produce, every manufacturer for less Cloth, every workman for less Labor, than in 1861. It is simply a re-adjustment of nominal to actual Values. We hope to hear that his trade is unaffected by it.—Times.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A CARD.—Owing to the enormous advance in the prices not only of the precious metals, but of every other commodity, I find it impossible to continue longer the sale of my Pens at old rates. That I regret exceedingly, as I had hoped to continue without change; but, having to buy gold at the present fabulous prices, this is no longer possible.

My friends and the public will give me credit, however, for having struggled long and hard against the universal pressure in order to anticipate the Government and Money-cry. The advance now made is not enough to cover me, with gold at present rates; should it remain where it is, or go still higher, a further rise in prices must be made. In any case, however, I intend, as heretofore, to sell a better article for less money than it can be bought for elsewhere.

A circular, with engravings of all the sizes, styles, and pressure prices, will be sent on receipt of letter postage. Address A. MORTON,

July 11, 1864. No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

BARNARD'S REVIEW OF McLELLAN'S REPORT,

And its antecedents, as developed by the REPORT OF MAJ.-GEN. GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, and other published documents. By J. G. BARNARD, Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers and Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and Chief-Engineer in the Army of the Potomac from its organization to the close of the Peninsular campaign. 1 vol. 8vo. cloth. Price $1.

Published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Coil and arsenic-free tin samples sent free by mail for 20c. Retails for $2, by E. K. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000,

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and you to have the choice of the article you will have.

Circulars containing full list and particulars; also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
366 Broadway, New York.

"The West, Indian Hair Curler."

Warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, into short ringlets or waving ringlets curls. Sent to any address on receipt of $1.00. Address WAUD GRISWOLD LYON,
Box 5376 New York Post-Office.

Agents Wanted to Sell Accurate Imperial Steel Portraits

Of President Abraham Lincoln. Lieut.-Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, Maj.-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock. Engraved by fotchie from Brady's Photographs. Price $1 00 each.
DERBY & MILLER, Publishers, Buffalo, N. Y.

Soldiers Visiting New York.

Should call at the American Badge Manufactory, 15 John St., to see the New Corps Badges for 4th, 9th, 10th, 18th, 19th, and 20th Army Corps, from $1 to $1.50 each. Every description of Badge constantly on hand. Grant Badges 50 cents each. $40 per gross.
R. KEYTH & CO., 15 John St., N. Y.,
Manufacturers and Dealers in Badges, Jewelry, Gold Pens and Canes, &c.

Howard's "Improved" SWEAT-PROOF

Soldier's Money-Belt.

Every Soldier can have one sent to him by return mail, POST-PAID, by enclosing $1 00 or $2 50, according to the quality desired. Address
HOWARD BELT CO., 493 Broadway, New York.

WANTED—HAIR.

Whiskers and Moustaches.—Dr. Briggs's Golden Odor is the most powerful stimulant in the World. The Golden Odor will force a full set of Whiskers or Moustaches in five weeks, upon any person, at any age, and will cause the hair to the skin. Warranted, or money refunded. Sent, postpaid by mail, with Testimonials and Directions, for $1. Address Dr. C. Briggs, P. O. Drawer 6959, Chicago, Ills.

"Signs of Character,"

PHYSIOGNOMY, ETHNOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND PSYCHOLOGY; Portraits of Remarkable Men; Cast and Bad, High and Low; The Human Voice, male and female; Climate, as affecting character: North and South; Marriage; Union of Opposites; Short Courtships; Coming to One's Self; Dreams; Emotions when Dying; Paper Children; Thieves Photographed; together with much other interesting and instructive matter—illustrated, in the AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents by first post. Nowmen have it.
FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW

A little about the Laws which govern the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

Among the many subjects found in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Piles, Liver, and Philosophy of Digestion, Constipation, Affections of the Throat, Stomach; Diseases of the Female; Diseases of Generation, Barrenness, Impotency, Seminal Weakness, Rupture, Sore Eyes, Deafness, Cancer, Tumors, Diseases of the Heart, Neuralgia, How to Recover the Sight and Throw away Spectacles, Marriage and Sexual Philosophy, the Curious Marriage Customs of the World, Philosophy of Orgasmus, Philosophy of Child-breeding, a Chapter for the Married, and a thousand of value to married and single, never written before, making altogether a volume book for curious people, and a good book for every one; 48 pages; 100 Illustrations. To be had of all News Agents. Contents tables sent free by mail to all applicants, or the book forwarded by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $1 50. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Portable Printing Offices.

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Depots of Type, Cuts, &c., six cents. Address Type Foundry, No. 25 Beekman St., and 25 Lincoln St., Boston.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell my Everlasting Pencils, Orientel Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

The Leaves and most cooling remedy for Diarrhea in the World. Sent by mail for Seven Cents, or free with the Book of Sweet Gum, price Ten Cts. It is lightly scarified, but is perfectly safe for children of all ages. A few leaves should be put in every package sent to soldiers.

Prepared by the Union Medicine Co., 25 Beekman St., New York, and sold by all druggists. Trade Price Current Cards.

The Ridgewood Smoking Case,

For the ARMY, NAVY, TRAVELLERS, and ALL SMOKERS, contains Pipe, Meerschaum Tube, and Pipe-Cleaner. The Pipe is fixed within the case at the finger or waste of Tobacco. Prices, $2 50, $2 75, $3 00, $4 00, and $5 00, the two latter richly silver-plated and engraved. Sent by mail, on receipt of price and 25 cents. Send for circular.
Ridgewood Manufactory Co., 429 Broadway, N. Y.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

S. M. WARD & CO.,

209 Broadway, N.Y.

Soldiers' Charm, $1.

Solid Silver, $1 50.

100,000 Watches, Chains, Lockets, Gold Pens and Pencils, Rings, Pins, &c., to be sold for $1 each, without regard to choice, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get, and not to be kept unless you are perfectly satisfied with your bargain, selling you what you can have will be sent for $1.00; five for $4; eleven for $8; thirty-five for $20. Also Heart and Army Badges. We will send as sample, on the receipt of $1, together with our wholesale illustrated circular, a Solid Silver Shield Badge, with your Name, Regt., and Co. Army Corps Badge, with your Name, Regt., and Co. Initials and Corps Devices, for $1 50; we will send either a New Artillery or Battery Pin, Engineer, Cavalry, Pioneer, or the 6th, 9th, 18th, 14th, 18th, 19th, or 23d Army Corps Pin.

Trinity Collection of Church Music,

Containing the Psalms and Hymn Tunes, Chants, &c., used in Trinity Church, New York, and its Three Chapels. By EDWARD HODGES, of Sidney College, Cambridge, England, with Valuable Additions by the Editor, S. FRANCIS DUTCHER, Organist and Director of Music in St. Paul's Church, Boston. And published by GLUCK INSTITUTION & CO. Price, Cloth, $2; Boards, $2 50, on receipt of which copies will be sent post-paid.

Duryea's Maizena

RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS

From Juries 3 and 4 at the

International Exhibition,

LONDON, 1862;

AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT HAMBURG, JULY, 1863, RECEIVED THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT DELICACY AND ARTICLE OF FOOD.

Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with 50 Receipts, will be furnished on application by letter or directly to

WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and every where else, in this most lucrative business known. Address, with stamp, for particulars, and circular to T. & H. GAUGHAN, 116 Broadway, New York.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1849)

GOLD PENS,

PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & WILSON'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Ag't, No. 52 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Good Pens sent to Exchange.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.

ALL KINDS AT WHOLESALE, 385 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 39x51. Price $2500.
Apply to HALLOCK & CHATFIELD, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Organ will force them to grow upon the smoothest face, without stain or fact) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post paid, to any address, on receipt of order.
R. G. GRAHAM, No. 309 Narrow Street, N. Y.

Shults' Organet, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Attention Company!

Clark's Conquest, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustaches in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Any person using this Organet, and failing it not as represented after informing of the fact, can have their money returned them at any time within 12 months from date of purchase. Price $1 00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of the money.
Address, A. C. CLARK,
P. O. Drawer 113,
Albany, N. Y.

WANTED, in every Town, County, State, Territory, and Province, enterprising Agents to sell popular Books. Liberal terms. Small capital, liberal profits, quick returns. Particulars by return post on receipt of stamp, by FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES' LETTER.

FINE ANATOMICAL ENGRAVINGS.

His letter-paper is now being published.
Sent free, in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.
Address Letter, Box 4586 New York Post-Office.

Manhattan Life Insurance Company,
No. 31 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.
Opposite the Post-Office.

CASH CAPITAL AND ACCUMULATION OVER

$1,600,000.

The triennial distribution of profits of this company has resulted in a bonus or addition to the policy of more than 50 per cent. on the whole premium paid.

The dividends are paid in the life-time of the assured, thus aiding them to pay future premiums.

POLICIES are made incontestible after five years from date, for or on account of errors, omissions, and misstatements in the application, except as to age.

ANNUITIES are granted on favorable terms.

HENRY STOKES, President.
C. V. WHETTEN, Secretary.

J. L. HALSEY, Ass't Sec.
S. N. STEBBINS, Actuary.

Innocent

BUT POTENT.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.—The Never-Failing Remedy, whose fame for purifying the Blood is now extended to every part of the Civilized World, and should be in the possession of every one who values health. One or two doses in the commencement, how many days or weeks of sickness may they not prevent! Four Pills in the beginning is more efficacious than forty doses when the disease is established.

MAN would be happy, compared to what has hitherto been his lot, if, when sick, he at once took BRANDRETH'S PILLS. He would not then be weighed down by long attacks of disease. The weak, the timid, the fearful, the nervous, the delicate, are in a few days strengthened by their operation, and the worst complaints are removed by perseverance. Adapted to all circumstances and constitutions, they are the best medicines for families, or to take to sea—preventing scurvy and costiveness, requiring no change of diet, particular regimen, or care against taking cold.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING, NEW YORK.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

Carrington & Co.'s

General

Purchasing Agency,

In Connection with all the Expresses,

No. 40 Broadway, New York.

(Established 1864.)

Purchases to order ANY article wanted from N. Y. York or from Europe, for ladies' or gentlemen's

Use or Wear, Comfort or Luxury,

From a camera to a cashmere, a sashring to a steam-engine.

Goods purchased at current city prices, and forwarded by Express, or as directed.

Commission, Five per Cent.

Remittances, or orders, can be made by Express if preferred, as all Express Agents will take orders, receipt for and forward funds, and one to return of goods.

Special Circular.

The Adams Express Company, appreciating the need of a capable medium connecting with the various Express Lines, through which personal and other orders for goods from this city, can be satisfactorily supplied on reasonable terms, have made it a GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY as well medium for filling orders for every description of goods wanted from New York, and connected it to the attention of the public, and of our general and local agents, recommending our agents to extend to it all reasonable aid, by facilitating the distribution of its carts and circulars, and making known the advantages of its use.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO., W. B. DINSMORE, Pres't.
NEW YORK, June, 1864.

We cheerfully concur in the above recommendation of the Adams Express Co.

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO., HENRY WELLS, Pres't.
U. S. EXPRESS CO., D. N. BARNEY, Pres't.
WELLS, FARGO & CO.,
NATIONAL EXPRESS CO., J. A. PELLEN.
HARNDEN EXPRESS, L. W. WINCHESTER, Supt.
ADAMS & LIVERMORE'S EXPRESS, Boston, Supt.
HOPE EXPRESS CO., A. D. HOPE, Supt.
BREESE & CO.'S EXPRESS, STEPHEN BREESE, Supt.
N. J. EXPRESS CO., JAMES M. DUNN, Supt.

COCOAINE.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE, for the hair, has had nearly fifty different preparations in imitation, all demonstrating the popularity of the article, and its invulnerability to competition by its increasing sale.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway, N. Y. Orders promptly filled.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published:

THE LADDER OF LIFE. A Heart History. By ANNA B. EVANS, Author of "Barbara's History," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE RELIGIOUS TRAINING OF CHILDREN in the Family, the School, and the Church. By MRS CATHARINE E. BEECHER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For August, 1864, Now Ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year $5 00
And an Extra Copy for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.
Postmasters may remit Subscriptions in Letters, together, one year, $9 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year . . . . . $ 00
One Copy for Two Years . . . . . $ 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

JOHN BULL AMONG HIS FOREIGN RELATIONS.

TO THE WEAK RELATION.

JOHN CHINAMAN. "Please, Sir; it's my ten!"
JOHN BULL. "Blast your Eyes! Do what I say, or ——!"
(See CORDEN'S Speeches.)

TO THE STRONG RELATIONS.

AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA. "Well, Mr. Bull, what have you to say?"
DENMARK. "Oh! COUSIN JOHN! you promised to help me!"
JOHN BULL. "I really can't; it isn't in my line!"

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 36 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.

MEERSCHAUM MANUFACTURERS,
673 Broadway, New 4th St., N. Y.,
Wholesale and Retail. Pipes cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $5 for sample pipe.

Vineland Lands. To all Wanting Farms'

Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, producing large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty, and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address GIDEON K. LANDIS, Vineland Post-Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune: "It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost land position and suitable condition for plasmant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

CHEROKEE MEDICINES.

Every reader of this paper is requested to send their address to us for our 32 page pamphlet, giving interesting and valuable information to both sexes, free of charge. We want it in every family in the country. Address Dr. W. R. MERWIN & CO., 61 Liberty Street, New York.

1864 Presidential Campaign 1864

MEDALS.

Manufactured and for sale by E. N. Foote & Co., 205 Broadway, N. Y. Agents wanted in every town and city.

STAMMERING!

Cured by Bates' Appliance. For descriptive pamphlet address H. C. I. Bates & Co., 217 W. 23d St., N. Y.

U. S. Army Agency,

64 Bleecker Street, N. Y., opposite Pay Department.
All persons having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.
Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid.
SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.
VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Payment prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,

Manufacturers of
GOLD MEDAL
Grand and Square Pianos,
Baltimore, Md.
Certificates of excellence from
Liszt, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.
Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

VERMILYE & CO.,

No. 44 Wall Street, New York,

Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,

converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.

The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

AGENTS WANTED.—$20 per month guaranteed. For terms and specimens, address, with stamp, E. TODD & CO., New York.

BENJAMIN'S RUPTURE CURE TRUSS challenges the world to equal it in retaining and perfectly curing Hernia, or Rupture. Office, 1 Barclay Street, opposite the Astor House.

PRESIDENTIAL

Campaign Medals.

Of every description now ready in Tin and Medal. Trade orders solicited and promptly filled at Factory prices. Wholesale Depot Campaign Medal Co., 438 Broadway, N. Y.

Don't buy your Gaiters

or Shoes without Fogg's

Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Leaders in the manufacture on economical terms. Cents currency, and I will mail a sample by return mail.
FREDERICK W. FOGG,
215 Pearl Street, New York,
and
63 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

GOOD STORIES

always form a part of the contents of the

Atlantic Monthly

They are supplied by such writers as HARRIET PRESCOTT, J. T. TROWBRIDGE, CAROLINE CHESEBRO, BAYARD TAYLOR, ROSE TERRY, and other contributors of eminent ability. Some of THE BEST STORIES in the language have been written for and published in the ATLANTIC MONTHLY. 13th subscriptions may begin with any number.

TERMS, $3 00 a year, 30 cents a number. Clubs at a liberal reduction. Address the publishers,
TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the
SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.
Send for a prospectus as below.

VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOUVERAIN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 65 cts. per bottle. JABONCILLO, FOR THE HAIR, ELEGANT, CERTAIN, but only harmless preparation, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE INDISCOMP, THE DESICCATED OIL, 75 cts. MAGNOLIA BALM, a delightful and healthful beautifier. PULVIS DENTIFRICE, for preserving the teeth, 50 cts. Sold by every druggist in the United States and Canada, or, sent free by mail on receipt of price, by VICTOR E. MAUGER, 175 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WHITEWOODS, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety.
COLORED STONE CHINA Ware.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER

The Cartridge

Is the latest improvement in Fire-Arms, combining great power and effectiveness, with compactness, durability, and convenience, both for operating and carrying. Is the most effective POCKET REVOLVER in the world.

Is loaded, without removing the cylinder, with CENTRAL FIRE WATER-PROOF COPPER SHELL CARTRIDGE. The CARTRIDGE is self-fire, the shell easily ejected after firing. The cylinder never fouls. It will 7 inches extreme length. 44-100th ball six shot, and weighs but 14 ounces. For sale by the trade.
GEO. A. HICKOX, 84 Cliff Street, New York.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, small size, enameled dial, set hands, "English Movements," and correct time-keeper.
A single one sent free by mail in neat case, with a BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $8.
A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.
Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Importers, 38 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

U. S. Gov. Artificial Leg Depots,

458 Broadway, N. Y., Rubinite, N. Y. Chicago, 107 Cincinnati, O., and St. Louis, Mo., where the Government furnishes the U. S. Army and Navy Leg to Soldiers gratis, or its value applied on the Anatomical Ball and Socket-Jointed Leg, which has lateral motion at the ankle like the natural one.
DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.
For instructions address DR. BLY, at nearest Depot.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

DRY AND GROUND IN OIL
in several drab shades.
For English and Gothic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.
ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

WARDS SHIRTS

Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free every where.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE.
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.
Price 75 cts. each, sent by post to any part of the Union on the receipt of 80 cents.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS Wanted in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, 367 Broadway, N. Y.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.

Magnifying small objects 800 times. Mailed free everywhere for 50 CENTS, or THREE FOR $1 00.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

CARPET WARP.

Twines and Paper. H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

All Styles of Steel Collars fifty cents each. Inducements to the Trade. Samples mailed free.
OTTO ERNST, cor. Rooney and Canal Street.

$15 Per Day, $15

Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large Size Stationery and Prize Packages. $25 CAN BE MADE IN A few hours by smart agents. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains large quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Blotters, Ink-stands, Ladies' Paris Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Compendium, Parlor Amusements, Guide for Letter Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, Gents' Pocket Calendars for the Year, Union Designs, Various Services of all kinds, Recipes, Games, Engravings, Gift and Goody Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, &c., &c. Any Agent can realize $15 per day. A splendid Solid Gold or Silver Hunting Case Lever Watch (warranted) presented free to each agent. Send for our great new circulars for 1864 containing full particulars, documents, free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 192 Nassau Street, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y., 31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris. Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums.
Purifies and Sweetens the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.
Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.
HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,
218 Greenwich St., New York.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have Just Published:

BRADE'S SAVAGE AFRICA. Western Africa: being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial, Southwestern, and Northwestern Africa; with Notes on the Habits of the Gorilla; on the Existence of Unicorns and Tailed Men; on the Slave Trade; on the Origin, Character, and Capabilities of the Negro, and of the future Civilization of Western Africa. By W. WINWOOD READE, Fellow of the Geographical and Anthropological Society of London, and Corresponding Member of the Geographical Society of Berlin. With Illustrations and a MAP. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 397.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MOWER IN OHIO.

THE bees in the clover are making honey, and I am making my hay:
The air is fresh, I seem to draw a young man's breath to-day.

The bees and I are alone in the grass: the air is so very still
I hear the dam, so loud, that shines beyond the sullen mill.

Yes, the air is so still that I hear almost the sounds I can not hear
That, when no other sound is plain, ring in my empty ear:

The chime of striking scythes, the fall of the heavy swaths they sweep—
They ring about me, resting, when I waver half asleep;

So still I am not sure if a cloud, low down, unseen there be,
Or if something brings a rumor home of the cannon so far from me—

Far away in Virginia where Joseph and Grant, I know,
Will tell them what I meant when first I had my mowers go.

Joseph he is my eldest one, the only boy of my three
Whose shadow can darken my door again, and lighten my heart for me.

Joseph he is my eldest—how his scythe was striking ahead!
William was better at shorter heath, but Jo in the long-run led.

William he was my youngest; John, between them, I somehow see,
When my eyes are shut, with a little beard at his head in Tennessee.

But William came home one morning early, from Gettysburg, last July
(The mowing was over already, although the only mower was I);

William, my captain, came home for good to his mother; and I'll be bound
We were proud and cried to see the flag that wraps his coffin around;

For a company from the town came up ten miles with music and gun—
It seemed his country claimed him then—as well as his mother her son.

But Joseph is yonder with Grant to-day, a thousand miles or near,
And only the bees are abroad at work with me in the clover here.

Was it a murmur of thunder I heard that hummed again in the air?
Yet, may be, the cannon are sounding now their "Onward to Richmond" there.

But under the beech by the orchard, at noon, I sat an hour it would seem—
It may be I slept a minute, too, or wavered into a dream.

For I saw my boys, across the field, by the flashes as they went,
Tramping a steady tramp as of old with the strength in their arms unspent;

Tramping a steady tramp they moved like soldiers that march to the beat
Of music that seems, a part of themselves, to rise and fall with their feet;

Tramping a steady tramp, they came with flashes of silver that shone,
Every step, from their scythes that rang as if they needed the stone—

(The field is wide and heavy with grass)—and, coming toward me they beamed
With a shine of light in their faces at once, and—surely I must have dreamed!

For I sat alone in the clover-field, the bees were working ahead;
There were three in my vision—remember, old man: and—what if Joseph were dead!

But I hope that he and Grant (the fog above them both, to boot)
Will go into Richmond together, no matter which is ahead or afoot!

Meantime alone at the mowing here—an old man somewhat gray—
I must stay at home as long as I can, making myself the hay.

And so another round—the quail in the orchard whistles blithe—
But first I'll drink at the spring below, and whet again my scythe.

TATTOO.

THE sun has sunk behind the hills,
The moon sails high and wintry clear;
Her pale light-falls in twinkling camps
That lie around me, far and near.

Ah! many a thousand weary men
Are welcoming the restful night,
Glad that a day of toil or watch
Withdraws its labors with its light.
They bar await the evening call
That shall release them from their thrall.

Hark! far away the sound begins—
One only lonely simple strain;
Then fife and drum and bugle-call
In tumult answer back again;
As when one bird at morn awakes
A chorus in the woods and brakes.

And all is still again. The sunks
Have answered to the evening call—
Come, O fair goddess Rest! and smooth
The rough beds of the soldiers all,
And Sleep, with softest fingers, close
The eyes that wake to watch our foes.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1864.

THE PEACE BLONDINS AT NIAGARA.

THE late Peace performance at Niagara Falls was not very mysterious. It was simply a movement of the rebels to help their friends the Copperheads. It was a notification, to whom it might concern, that if the Government of the United States were handed over to the friends of the rebels, then the rebels would lay down their arms. It was a confession that the rebel leaders are sorely pinched, that they foresee disaster, and that they are perfectly willing to have us give them, or vote them the victory which they despair of obtaining by their arms.

The conduct of the President was simple and proper. Intimation that there were political agents from the rebel chiefs who wished to treat of peace, he consented that they should visit Washington. But when they proved that not they had no authority whatever, the President, in order that there should be no apparent justification, even, of the assertion that he had refused to listen to overtures of submission from the rebels, issued a notice, to whom it may concern, that the Government of the United States is always ready to hear and consider any authorized proposition from the rebel leaders involving the restoration of the Union and the abandonment of slavery. To this the Commissioners of self-appointed rebel agents reply in a manifesto intended to represent the President as an autocrat and a despot, etc., and expressing their own resolution never to submit to conquest, etc. It is interesting to learn from this paper that in a region where every man between fifteen and sixty-five is dragged into the ranks, and exempted soldiers are legislated back again to serve as long as they are wanted, there is no military arbitrament; and that, in a section where the most hopeless terrorism universally prevails, social institutions, established constitutions, and priceless hereditary self-government are overthrown, subverted, or bartered away. Mr. CLEMENT CLAY'S letter is but a poor specimen of our own Copperhead orations and editorials. But it is not without value, for it shows to the dullest mind the perfect sympathy in sentiment between Copperhead and rebels.

It is suggested that the Constitution does not authorize the President to make any condition such as the abandonment of slavery. Those who say so honestly are mistaken. There may be a question of policy, which we think the President has rightly resolved; but there is no Constitutional question. The Constitution defines treason, authorizes making of war, appoints the President Commander-in-Chief, and authorizes the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in cases of rebellion and invasion. There is nothing in any of these provisions which deprives the Government of the right of exercising its common sense, or compels it to lay down its arms at the will of rebels or foreign enemies. The Government is the judge when the rebellion war is over or a domestic rebellion quelled. Nor is there in the Constitution or in reason any obligation upon the Government to consult its own destruction. The Government of the United States is bound by every consideration to secure peace; and peace is impossible while the active cause of war remains, whether for its opportunity. The cry that the President can not constitutionally require the destruction of that cause as a condition of peace is but another effort of the enemies of the country to prolong the war indefinitely. When the Government was established the cloud of slavery was as large as a man's hand. Four years ago it was a tempest, blackening the heavens and raining fire. And now we are told that it is proper to put up an umbrella to keep off the wet, but une institutional to erect a lightning-rod to draw the fire harmless to the ground. It is idle to think the vital point of the whole war and its agitate that peace can be made with slavery. To that point the public mind has advanced. If a truce should be called and the question opened for debate, the truce would soon disappear in fresh cannon-smoke. Liberty and slavery are fighting for and against this Government. Is a white man who refuses to think that by omitting the name we can avoid the thing?

In the following article we propose to indicate briefly why Union and Liberty are henceforth identical.

LIBERTY AND UNION.

THE war proves the essential antagonism between Slavery and national peace; but it is no less evident in the nature of things. Without freedom of speech and of the press a free popular government is impossible. The people of the United States, therefore, in their Constitution have forbidden Congress to abridge either of these rights; and what they would not suffer their supreme legislature to do, they will not permit to any local assembly. But nothing is plainer than that if Slavery exists freedom of speech and of the press must be forbidden. In a city built over a powder magazine the smoking of a match must be a capital crime. Nothing is clearer than that if you establish the social and industrial system of South Carolina you must impose ignorance and silence by law. For the system violates human rights, and the human heart and conscience instinctively protest against it. And this, consequently, is done.

The Revised Statutes of Louisiana of 1852 enact that if any white person be convicted of saying or printing any thing with intent to diminish the respect which is commanded by law to free people of color for the whites he shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. The code of Virginia of 1849 provides that if a free person maintain by speaking or writing that any negro has a right of property in slaves he shall be imprisoned or fined. Such laws are perfectly legitimate and necessary wherever Slavery exists; but are they compatible with the Constitution of the United States, and with the necessary conditions of any free popular government whatever? If it were made a penal offense to write a history, lecture to discuss a banking system, or a school fund, or the rate of interest, or a tariff, or internal improvements, or direct taxation, or paper money, or any question whatever which involved the common interest and rights; or if in those States the meddling, expulsion, or imprisonment of citizens who ventured to write or speak upon such subjects were encouraged by the States, although not prohibited by reared over the storm, "is committed to the policy of the rams." MR. LAYARD had thus dextrously made the question of censuring the Ministry a question of war with the United States. DISRAELI and his haughty band were outwitted, and his motion was lost.

The debate was much the most important in Parliament for many years: for a change in the British Ministry at this time would doubtless be the prelude to remarkable events. It is described at length in the English papers, and very graphically in a letter to the Tribune.

"THEIR TERMS OF PEACE."

ALLUDING to the Peace performance at Niagara the Tribune says: "We believe they might have been brought to set forth clear terms of Peace, and that whether these were reasonable or otherwise the national cause would thereby have been sensibly promoted. But we bow to superior wisdom—at least to the wisdom of superiors."

The persons whose terms of peace the Tribune thinks might have served the national cause were Messrs. CLEMENT CLAY, J. P. HOLCOMBE, and GEORGE N. SANDERS, who confessed that they had no authority whatever. Their views, therefore, are just as important as those of any other three rebels, and no more. And how long it is since the Tribune incessantly declared that it would be time enough for the Government to consider terms of peace when the rebels authorized to negotiate should be the fact! The President of the United States has other work in hand than listening to the talk of individual rebels who speak for themselves and for nobody else.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

MR. BRADY, the photographer, has lately returned from the army in Virginia with a series of views of the campaign, which are now on exhibition at his galleries 785 Broadway. The series includes the most interesting scenes of operations at Cold Harbor, the Wilderness, Petersburg, etc., as well as portraits of all the most noted generals. The actuality of the views, the distinct detail, and the inflexible veracity, make them invaluable to every student of the campaign; while all who love the army with their private hearts as well as their public hopes will see with curious satisfaction the tents, the huts, the woods, the fences, the bridges, the camps, and the streams, which are the familiar daily objects to the eyes of their loved soldier boys.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"OUR Campaign around Gettysburg" (A. H. REDE & BROTHER, Brooklyn) is a brief and pleasant record of the marches, camping, and countermarchings of the Twenty-third Regiment New York State National Guard, during LEE's invasion of last summer. It is a faithful and graphic picture of militia life in the actual field, and the story is told with much humor and sincerity which at last a quite peculiar value. It is interesting also for its description of the condition of our Pennsylvanian neighbors when the New Yorkers marched to stand by them; and we can warmly commend it as most sprightly, entertaining, and unique chapter of the great history.

The North American Review for July (CROSBY & NICHOLS, Boston) sustains the reputation which it has acquired, and is sure to maintain under its new editors. Each paper in this number are all thoughtful and timely. Of the eight essays five are devoted to topics of immediate interest—The Navy, The Army, National Currency, The Territory of the Rebellion, and The Constitution and its Decay. The last, by Hon. JOHN JAY, is one of the most accomplished officers in the service, and is full of instruction and sagacious suggestion; the second is a touching and beautiful tribute to the character of the American soldier, as illustrated in several brief memoirs of our young heroes: the third is a vigorous discussion of the vexed question involved; the fourth is an admirable essay upon the writing of history and the fate of the rebellion; and the fifth a forcible assertion of the duty of the American people to take off blinders, and treat the Constitution as made for war and not for the people of the Constitution. The character of the Quarterly Review permits an elaborate treatment of every subject, and every man should see every paper which he wishes to know the tendency of the most advanced and thoughtful upon the great interest of the country and the time.

"Revolution against Free Government not a Right but a Crime," is the title of a discourse by Rev. JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, D.D., delivered before the Union League Club in New York, and published by them. With the noblest fervor it relates the ultimate fate of the rebellion as it is justified by the principles of our Revolution, and destroys with a steady and skilful hand the suppliest that human ingenuity could weave that any one may be justifiable. Its clear, concise, precise statement of the true philosophy of this great question is adorned by the ample preparation and nervous eloquence of the author. As a tract for array circulation it would be most useful to the good cause.

* Precedents of American Neutrality," a reply to the speech of the English Attorney-General, by GEORGE BEMIS (LITTLE, BROWN, & CO., Boston), is a masterly blow at the evasive and unmanly attitude of England upon the privateer question. MR. BEMIS contrasts the uniform, frank, and manly American policy from the beginning of the Republic with that which Great Britain has pursued. It is an irrefutable statement, of which the excellent spirit is not less honorable to the author than the skilful presentation. This pamphlet also is worthy of the widest circulation.

"WATSON'S Manual of Calisthenics (SCHERMERHORN, BANCROFT, & CO., New York and Philadelphia). This is truly a book that every family should have, for it presents a complete system of gymnastic drill without apparatus. It is most simply and intelligibly treated, and the illustrations are so graphic and excellent that no pupil or teacher can go wrong. The book is beautifully printed and neatly bound, and the whole subject of vigorous and thorough bodily exercise is made as attractive as it is important. All the exercises mentioned have been thoroughly tested, and Watson's Manual would, if properly used in the gymnasium and nursery, as well as in the school, supersede in many a case the medical manual which it would render unnecessary.

One of the most charming guide-books for summer travel is "Eastman's White Mountain Guide." (EUSTON C. EASTMAN, Concord, New Hampshire.) It contains the most accurate information concerning the mountain region, with Lake Winnepesaukee and its neighborhood, compiled and arranged by a scholarly artist who loves the hills, and a practical scholar who wishes to pay homage to Mount Kearsarge, to which he was born. Washington, Jefferson, and Adams, put Eastman in his pocket, and ingenuous the shrine by the way of Lake Winnepesaukee—the Smile of the Great Spirit.

"Harper's Hand-book for Europe and the East," by W. FREMAN FERNALD. (HARPER & BROTHERS.) This useful work has now reached its third edition. The whole of the present volume has been revised and corrected up to July, 1864, with a large quantity of entirely new matter. The remarkable success of this publication is a proof that Harper's is the only hand-book of European travel published in the United States, and the only complete work of the kind in the language in the English language. It is, moreover, three years later than any other European guide-book, and is the only one revised entirely up to date. A distinct and clear outline of all the tours through the principal cities of Europe and the United States, and the time occupied by the different routes, the names of the best hotels, a description of the principal "sights" and works of art, etc. Not only is this a book of reference and of work, but those who have been there will experience much pleasure in "reading up" what they have seen.

REBEL POETRY.

MESSRS. ROTTOS,—In your issue of the Weekly of date July 2, I observed an interesting article on Rebel Poetry. But its closing extract, "Our Annie," from the Mobile Tribune, which you commend as "evidently a most touching and tuneful, heartfelt theft. I am not sure, but think the original appeared in the Drawer of Harper's Magazine some years ago: at any rate, here are two verses which I copied at the time:

"My Lilia is gentle and fair:
Lilia is merry and free—
Half dying with love,
I sue at her knee,
And drank my Champagne from her shoe.

"O Lilia! my lady! my love!
Vast and rare are the gifts I bring
Why an angel night blush,
Look pleased, and say 'Hush!'
If I kindly request her to thee."

BALTIMORE, July 26, 1864. T. E. C.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

GENERAL GRANT'S apparent inactivity appears to disturb the rebel army fully as much as it does the loyal. In Richmond Whig says that Grant is surely undermining Petersburg with his vast engineering works, day by day. The false report of Grant's death appears to have afforded them a temporary relief, as Senator Benton, who was lately delegated to Fortress Monroe, has, at the request of the Confederate Government, been refused the pass. Power counsel as Brenada Hundred: at about the same time Bailey' Island, to the relief of the garrison, and the Richmonds was temporarily put in his place. General Birney now commands the Tenth Corps, including the command of Burney's Division.

The size of the Petersburg assumes no new phase worthy of record. The main interest as regards military operations in how centering in the Shenandoah Valley and Alabama. When Sherman made his extensive movement in making Atlanta his base, he was forced to rely on the transfer his supplies from Big Shanty Station to Atlanta by the single railroad, and he knew that the rebel cavalry would be unable to hold the railroad so near to the front. Hood, therefore, has been compelled to send Wheeler from the Army of Tennessee on the 5th took a position on the railroad between Dalton and Resaca, destroying a portion of the track and burning the railroad bridge in front; his force touching the river; still later, Forrest, with his command of 6000, has crossed the Tennessee and the armies confronted each other on opposite sides of the river. The railroad had been destroyed from the river all the way from Kenesaw to the Chattahoochee about 4000 men were found at work.

The successful passage of the Chattahoochee River was effected on Monday last by the Twenty-third, Fourth, Fourteenth, Seventeenth, Twenty-third and Fourth Corps moved on the north side of the river and crossed at the ferry and fords at Roswell, Soaking Hooker and Palmer on the opposite bank, and immediately entrenching their forces. As a proper time Howard moved down to the right, to be in readiness to form a junction with the rest and to protect them while crossing. At noon on the 18th Palmer's and Hooker's commands were fairly on the Atlanta side of the river. Before dark the Twentieth and Fourteenth were across, with their ammunition and pontoon trains. At nine o'clock at night General Sherman's whole force was upon the Atlanta side of the Chattahoochee. General Palmer's corps resting upon the river upon the right, near the mouth of the Peachtree Creek, and in close proximity to where the railroad bridge destroyed by the rebels in falling back crosses the river. Hooker, Howard and Schofield, while M'Pherson's three corps formed the left wing, extended the river some four miles further down the stream. The enemy on the 19th moved to within five miles of Atlanta, and formed in the form of a crescent of the city, with its right on arch, the left under M'Pherson holding Decatur on the railroad connecting Atlanta with the East. On the 18th Hooker's Corps was thrown around still further to the left southwardly, so as to fill up a gap intervening between M'Pherson and the right. These movements compelled Johnston to fall back on Atlanta.

The whole line advanced. M'Pherson on the left, Schofield in the left centre, Howard in the centre, Hooker in the right centre, and Palmer on the right, the whole line remaining fortified.

On the 20th General Hood superseded Johnston in the command of the rebel army; a proclamation differing from that which Johnston had adopted was then issued. On the 20th Hood came out and attacked Sherman's right, making three assaults, which "were bloodily repulsed" by the Federals, with a small fell on Hooker. On the 21st the enemy moved up to within two and a half miles of Atlanta, and on the 22d their corps holding the Macon Railroad.

There are four great lines of railroad which centre in Atlanta. Northeast runs the Western and Atlantic road, along which Sherman has been pushing Johnston across the mountains for three months. On the east is the road to Augusta, leading to Georgia Junction and terminating the trunk of this road was held by M'Pherson at Decatur. On the south is the Macon road, also connecting with Savannah; a short distance south of Atlanta it branches off into the West Point and Montgomery road. With this road in our possession, and our hold on the road at Decatur being strengthened, the last line of retreat would be entirely cut off; Hood, therefore, must fight or stand siege. The engagement on Wednesday, the 20th, was very severe; it is impossible yet to give the minute details. Thursday our lines were pushed up close to the enemy's, and part of Atlanta was in our possession. The next day, the 22d, Hood made another assault. The rebel army was chiefly massed against our right. The struggle ended with the day's defeat, with a loss per rate of about 2000, and on that of the rebels of about 6000. General M'Pherson was shot while passing through the dangerous ground with his staff for a moment, and a rebel sharp-shooter shot him from an ambush. Gen. M'Pherson was a distinguished officer for the burial of the dead and the care of the wounded: the rebels took up the body and bore it into Atlanta, and while kept his heavy artillery playing upon the city.

Hood's defeat was complete; there was an interregnum and Friday was to destroy our forces on the right, after which to move on the rear of the city. But Friday, by no defeat, the remainder of our army. The plan promised to be successful. General Sherman's line was therefore also long, and weak in the centre. But the day before the battle, Hood, through the desertion of some rebels within the opposite divisions resisted the furious charges of Hood's army.

The loss of Gen. McPherson, which were deplored by Sherman's army in its movements on Atlanta, was a severe blow to the Confederacy. In addition to numerous flouring mills, there were large cloth manufactories, pecuniary needy for the rebel cause, and cotton and 25,000 of woollen goods—principally for the army.

GENERAL ROSSEAU'S EXPEDITION.

Directly connected with the operations against Atlanta, General Rousseau's late expedition was an important movement. When Sherman's plans were matured, and the road only through Mississippi, Rousseau projected the destruction of the West Point and Montgomery Railroad. His the plan could not be executed. But on the 20th of June, when Sherman had left Chattanooga for Atlanta, the project was revived. Abundant preparations were made for the destruction of the road—rails, bridges, culverts, water-tanks, depot buildings, locomotives, arsenals, Government stores, and all. The force of 2500 men was selected to destroy the town of Opelika, the point of junction of the rebel railroads with Atlanta, West Point, and Montgomery road.

The force was started from Nashville with a force of 2700 cavalry, consisting of the following regiments which were concentrated at Decatur, in Northern Alabama: 10th Indiana Cavalry, Colonel T. J. Harrison; Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Wolford; Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, Major Lisle; Fourth Tennessee Cavalry and the Ninth Indiana Cavalry. The two composing this force were all veterans, well mounted, and excellently armed. A battery of four guns accompanied the force. At times and inevitable as a cavalry arm, were judiciously distributed among the men. Major Hoban gun were under his immediate command.

On the 17th the expedition started from Decatur, taking the direction of Blountsville, and on a march of eighty miles crossed the Coosa River; thence struck into the road to Jacksonville, and thence to Talladega, which is 50 miles on the Montgomery road. Between Opelika and Montgomery the railroad crosses the Tallapoosa and Chattahoochee rivers; bridges over these streams was the great business of the raid. Before Rousseau's command destroyed the seven bridges and other Government buildings at Opelika, and the bridges between that and Auburn, 12 miles off, they had executed his plans, with a loss altogether amounting to no more than 100 men. They moved up the west side of the Chattahoochee to Marietta, where he arrived on the 25th, and the next day rejoined Sherman's army.

SLOCUM'S MOVEMENTS FROM VICKSBURG.

Simultaneously with the departure of Rousseau's expedition from Nashville, almost from the river Vicksburg, under the command of Brigadier-General E. S. Dennis, consisting of the 16th Army Corps, the Seventeenth Army Corps. The command started at two o'clock A.M. July 1, and camped at Big Black River, a distance of 20 miles. A day was spent in constructing pontoons; on the 3d the army, with pontoons, once reached on the 5th, and there the expedition turned back the next day, meeting a small body of the enemy's cavalry, which was put to a disgraceful cause off—a drawn battle. The command reached Vicksburg on the 8th, its movement had only been a diversion in favor of Rousseau.

In the rear of Sherman's army Rebel cut another expedition, which was reinforced by cavalry sent by General Sherman, under General Smith, left Memphis on July 5th. On the 11th Slocum fell in with a detachment of about 1000 rebels, commanded by Colonel Richardson, who proceeded in repulsing them with great loss. This second expedition had returned on the 20th.

DEFEAT OF FORREST.

July 5, General Washburne sent out a force under General Grierson, from Memphis, to intercept Forrest and defeat the rebel General Forrest. On the 10th the expedition met the rebels at Tupelo, Mississippi, and the battle was fought in three different days with Forrest, Lee, and Walker's divisions. The rebels were defeated with a loss of 1500, the entire rebel force being defeated each day. On the 15th Smith's command was attacked by Forrest's command at Harrisburg, Mississippi. On the 20th the expedition reached Lagrange, with a loss of not more than 500. Rebel accounts estimate the rebel loss to have been at least 4000—captured rebel dispatches placed a loss of 2000. The rebel commander was killed. It was reported that Forrest was wounded in the first day's fight. The rebels under Buckner's Tennessee was captured.

FROM THE SHENANDOAH.

It appears that General Averill, after his successful encounter with Early's cavalry at Moorefield, in Hardy county, then to the mountain beyond Winchester, where Early had gone with his infantry. They have fought every day since Sunday—the rebels having in the mean time been reinforced—General Averill was compelled to fall back to Martinsburg, bringing with him the forces at Hunter's Hill, and covering the retreat of Sigel's army. The rebels do not appear to have pursued him in his retreat, and on Tuesday, the 26th, encamped near Shepherdstown, where they cut the telegraph wires, and commenced again the destruction of the track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

ITEMS.

The lower counties of Missouri have lately been troubled by guerrillas. Thornton has been engaged for seven weeks in recruiting about 1200 rebel sympathizers, in Cooper county, in which number he could, and has since make his way southward to swell the hosts of the rebel army. Price's force is also reported to be in that region, operating against the scattered detachments of Thornton's command. The latter has been great circumstance, and people from the surrounding counties have been crowding into St. Joseph. On the 25th colonel Ford turned Platte City, which had become a resort for the guerrillas. Fords had the towns responsible for the outrages of Thornton's men.

At Blackley Alms-house, in Philadelphia, a great disaster occurred July 30, caused by the walls of the Pennsylvania Asylum being undermined by workmen. Eighteen insane ladies were killed and twenty wounded. There were 220 lunatics in the Asylum.

General Meigs, to whom the Secretary of War assigned the duty of selecting a proper place in which to bury the bodies of those who fell in the defense of Washington during the late rebel invasion, has selected an area of ground in front of Fort Stevens, on the east side of Fort Stevens, and about 80 yards from the Seventeenth Street road, in the immediate vicinity of the spot where the severest fight took place.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

A very pressure is being steadily brought to bear on the British ministry by the Foreign Office of policy in regard to the American war in favor of the Confederates. MR. LINDSAY now notice lately in Parliament that he should next move that England interfere to procure a cessation of hostilities. A deputation from the society for obtaining cessation of hostilities waited on Lord Palmerston on the 15th, but we got off with a non-committal answer. Mission has also had an interview with his lordship. The total cotton loss had reached to 74.

PROSPECT OF A SEA-FIGHT.

The Sarsenaeta left Cherbourg on the 18th inst., set joined the channel off Dover. A number was current Cherbourg that the Federal and Confederate naval officers had arranged a sea-fight within the next ten days between the Sarsenaeta and the Niagara on the one side and the Kearsarge and the Alabama on the Confederate side. It was lately seen in the Straits of Gibraltar, on the 19th inst.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

King Christian has dismissed his Ministers, and is said to have sent his brother to Berlin to propose peace. Austria has refused the condition of Denmark being received as a member of the German Confederation. This was considered a strong step in favor of peace, and it is hoped that the plan will not especially please the Emperor of Austria.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

One of our soldiers sends us a copy of the Universal Magazine for March, 1758, which he found in the house of a prominent Secessionist near Petersburg. On the second page of the first article is this heading: a review of a book by Mr. Carter written by a Gentleman of his Wife while he was on a visit to his friends in the north-ward. The book is entitled "Letters from Virginia," which is called "the first city in wealth and trade in America." The review contains the following statement in regard to Edward Drinker, of Philadelphia, "who our great Benjamin Franklin has made famous in his account of Pennsylvania by the beginning and the end of the British Empire in America." Mr. Drinker had been the subject of many eccentric heads: but when he heard of the many oppressive and unconstitutional acts of power of the British Parliament, and gave them to his great grandsons to make his of, and to defend the liberty and happiness of his country in his widowed arms, and triumphing in the issue of the war, he died in the 86th year of his age, the 16th of November, 1783, aged 86 years.

A correspondent has a thousand song-birds of different sizes, sold yearly in the city of New York. We have a number of them in our office, and on Sunday, the 31st day of August, and buy their stock of medicine, drinks, and food, the Canaries, of the Gold Finches, who raise them for sale. They come back in the spring to breed.

A correspondent has a thousand song-birds of different sizes, sold yearly in the city of New York. We have a number of them in our office, and on Sunday, the 31st day of August, and buy their stock of medicine, drinks, and food, the Canaries, of the Gold Finches, who raise them for sale. They come back in the spring to breed.

A CAPTAIN of a London packet, of most exemplary conduct, was sentenced to transportation seven years with any of the people whose life was not what it should have been. Every one was willing to get rid of him, and as soon as he made his complaint, either to the rector or the bishop. The former, relying upon the evening glass of wine, very elegant a memorial to the bishop, setting forth the advantages of the country. The interesting thing had evidently worth should not be rewarded, and earnestly recommending him to the favorable notice of the bishop. Soon after, the quite unexpectedly became vacant, whereupon the bishop, considering the memorial favorable, and it no doubt appeared to be, presented him to it, informing him of the memorial, and of the favorable regard his people with it, rejoicing that they had taken in good part his freedom of speech, and that they should be so well supplied with a life the curate which had won their approbation.

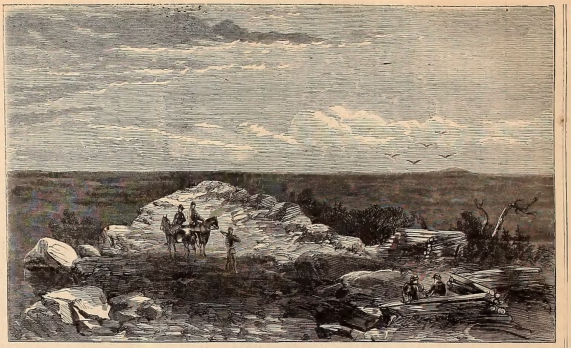
A correspondent of the Times, lately spent some exercises details concerning the mystagon, or night blindness, which appears to be extremely prevalent in the army of the Potomac. This sufferer from this affliction can see perfectly as long as the sun is shining, but become aware of total obscurity from sunset until dawn. No artificial light is of the least service to them, and holding under a flash of lightning enables them to see.

The following singular paragraph appears in a Parisian journal: "The Duke of Aumale was born on August the eighth years. Lord Lyndhurst, born in 1772, was one of his contemporaries. Of this queen, Mrs. Partington, that in owing that manner of playing, namely, when a person's hand is moved from the key, the sound continues to vibrate, and which is used in the performance of Shaddock's Trio, was the first person to invent. Sir John Copley Shipton, the inventor of the services will be forgotten, but his name will survive at the whist-table."

A STATISTICIAN has had the patience to count the number of words contained in the most celebrated books. The works of Cornelius de not contain more than 7000 different words, and those of Racine 5000. Shakspeare, the most fecund and varied of English authors, wrote all his tragedies and comedies with 15,000 words. Voltaire used only employs 10,000; "Paradise Lost" only contains 8000; and the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" of Homer 9000 words each.

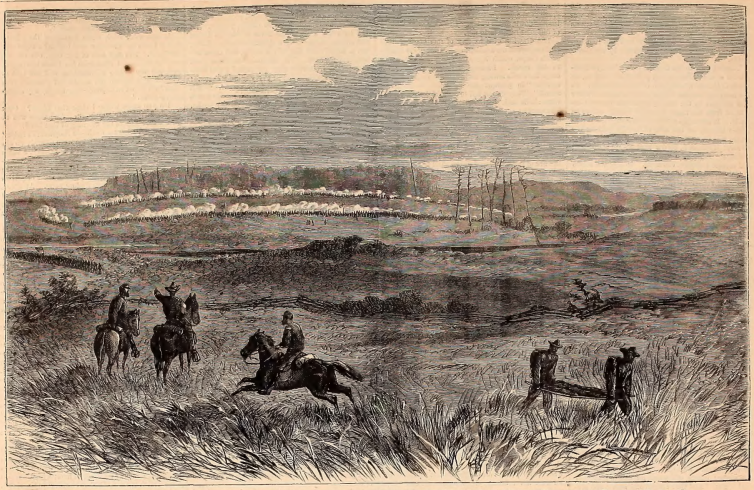
Turnips have been lately some new and interesting discoveries have been made. One of these relates to the evil sodden which are so full of interest and give a living reality to the most commonplace of the rustic's daily toil. The skeleton of a dove was found in a niche overlooking the Forum. It was in the same sentry, who said as it if I watch and rest at the city gate, she had been true to her duty to the last. Her body was found in the niche, the living shower fell around, and beneath her was the eye which contained the tiny bones of her yet unborn young one. Human nature never changes. The Pompeians had their elections, which were soon to come off, when the city was buried under the lava. Placards were found to the streets which rivaled us of these news in New York now and then. Each householder had a favorite candidate, and the walls of the streets of the election by numerous terms, painting his name and qualifications at the side of the door. One of these, "Suadam dignum aedilem," was found on the house of Modestus. "Suadam dignum aedilem commendat." An elector was known as the vote for Suadam, proclaiming that Suadam shall vote for him in future.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—VIEW OF KENESAW MOUNTAIN, FROM LITTLE KENESAW.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—LITTLE KENESAW, JULY 3, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]

GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—VIEW OF THE PUBLIC SQUARE, MARIETTA, GEORGIA.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—GALLANT ACTION OF COLONEL WALCOT'S BRIGADE, JUNE 15, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

GEN. SHERMAN'S ADVANCE.

We give on this and the preceding page five sketches illustrating General SHERMAN'S advance on Atlanta. Most of these—all on page 500—are topographical. We have in a previous number given a view of Kenesaw, as seen from Pine Mountain; SHERMAN'S advance, July 8, flanking the rebels out of that formidable position, enables us now to furnish a nearer view.

Kenesaw is a double mountain, and presents a bold eminence overlooking the hilly ridges around it. One of the peaks rises some distance above the other, and for distinction the lower is called Little Kenesaw. The rebels driven, June 20, from Pine and Lost Mountains, contracted their lines, confining their operations to the defense of Kenesaw, which they maintained for a fortnight.

From Kenesaw to Marietta—the public square of which is represented on the same page—the distance is only three or three miles. The names of the prominent buildings have been taken from the neighboring mountain which we have just described. The town of Marietta, having a population of no more than two thousand souls, yet ranks as the ninth town in Georgia in regard to size. It was settled before Atlanta. Prior to the war Marietta College was one of the two or three prosperous institutions of the South. It exists now only in name. The town is almost entirely deserted by its inhabitants.

Lieutenant Edge. Otterbeux. Hooker. Logan.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S ADVANCE—VIEW OF ATLANTA FROM THE SIGNAL STATION.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

Turning now to the next page, we have an illustration of the gallant action performed, June 15, by General HARROW's division of LOGAN's corps. In the morning General LOGAN received orders to move his division to the left, to divert the enemy's attention from the right, where an assault was to be made. It advanced at about 4 o'clock, with WILCOX's brigade on the left, WALCOT's holding the centre and OLIVER's on the right and in reserve. General HARROW's Sixteenth Corps kept within supporting distance. A position was carried by the division and several prisoners captured. It is the attention of Colonel WALCOT's brigade that the illustration especially refers. He, in the most gallant manner, advanced on the enemy's position, and encountering, with 300 prisoners, Generals LOGAN and HARROW both grasping his hand in congratulation. A story is told of a captain who, rushing past the enemy's rifle-pits, was fired at so closely that the enemy's powder burned his face. This doughty captain, it is said, took several prisoners.

Below, on the same page, is a distant view of Atlanta, as seen from the signal station in front of the position held by the Army of the Tennessee only 7. In the fore-ground, at the right of Lieutenant ERGA, the signal officer, are General LOGAN; and standing, still further to the right are Generals HOOKER and LOGAN.

RETURN OF A RAIDING PARTY.

On page 508 we give an illustration representing the return of KAUTZ's cavalry from the raid against the Weldon and Danville roads. General KAUTZ made among the first of our cavalry officers, and in his in a raid especially that his excellent leadership is illustrated. He was associated with WILSON in the raid to which allusion is here principally made; his accurate knowledge of the country enabled him, however, to check BUTLER's line before Petersburg. Both men and horses returned in a state of great exhaustion; the troops were without coats—blankets had been left behind—and in many cases even hats and caps were absent, their places being supplied by turbans, female head-gear, or whatever came to hand. Some had lost their horses, and ride mules; others, still worse off, had to lead their used beasts. And thus ragged and weary, and presenting the most grotesque appearance, the column straggled in from the great raid.

IN THE TRENCHES.

We continue this week, on pages 504 and 505, our ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE SIEGE of PETERSBURG, of which the artist gives a description as follows:

The army, although no longer marching and fighting day by day, is by no means idle. Its earthworks, of much heavier construction than the temporary rifle-pits thrown up on the march from Cold-Harbor, have the spade and pick for their constant occupation. The enemy's position, in most instances, commands ours, giving them the advantage of a constantly renewed artillery firing along the front—a superior protection for their men from the fire of sharp-shooters.

Take the sketch of MARTIN'S BATTERY; frowning over it, at close range, are the enemy's fortifications, an important salient being prominent, many of which may be seen part of still another line of works, designed to be the first untenable, in spite of the battle and chevaux de frize, we should capture them. At this part of the lines—on the Fifth Corps—although the cannon keep up a desultory firing, by consent among the men on both sides sharp-shooting has been abandoned, and the pickets live peaceably near each other, outside the fortified lines; ours even taking their shelter-tents without the protection against the sun. The line of battle lies from both sides, in the complicated system of trenches called rifle-pits, which generally consist of two main lines of intrenchment, close together—one in front, the other behind the men—and any quantity of traverses, as shelters against cross-fire are added. Across these run the men stretch their tents and blankets, like an awning, in picturesque confusion, keeping as cool as the torrid climate—accurately described in the picture from the white sandy soil—and the rebel mortar shells will permit. Against the latter the traverses afford protection, and the soldiers burrow into the earth places known as gopher holes, into which they dive with astonishing rapidity when a shell is observed by the look-out coming his way. Some of the rifle-pits are covered with boughs, forming a continuous arbor, and being increased protection against the sun.

The officers' quarters, where exposed to danger from the rebel fire, are often made shell-proof, although the Whitworth bolt occasionally penetrates an immense thickness of earth.

After having General WARREN's front there is no longer any security against being hit; the sharpshooters keeping a bright look-out on both sides, using at every one who shows himself, and constantly sending bullets at random. Most often, fake effect upon people unseen by the shooter, these have all sorts of devices to protect themselves from fire, and at the same time make a show about it. All night the firing is kept up with increased vindictiveness, for the purpose of driving in the working parties, who come out in the darkness to dig new works—parallels and other approaches to the rebel lines. The rebels work also in improving and adding to their defenses.

It was hard at one time for the army to get sufficient water, for they have dotted the country with wells, and have now a plentiful supply. Some of these, after reaching a vein of water, are filled again and surrounded by a curb, and left at about up to the surface. This is the best plan, but as barrels are scarce all can not procure them, so others dig out a large excavation, with a flight of steps leading down to the water. In fact there is a scene of different methods in use.

The drawing of a battery of mortars and light twelves represents a salient on the line of the Eighteenth Corps, which is a source of great annoyance to the rebels. Lieutenant JACKSON constantly drops his shells among their men, as he precisely remarks, "to prevent the Johnnies sleeping too sound." They do not fail to return the compliment with shells and the bullets of the sharp-shooters. The mortars are fired without the gunner seeing the object he aims at. With the aid of his frame-work round the piece, marked in divers places with the positions of points upon the rebel line, and a piece of string leading from the muzzle to the hand, he bags on the parapet down to the frame, he directs the line of the piece, and as the shell is visible as it leaves the smoke till it falls into the doomed spot, it is very interesting to watch the practice.

A BOWL OF BREAD AND MILK.

PROSPEROUS! Yes; I have been prosperous. They call me a merchant prince I believe, and you'll hardly find a steamer, or a railway rendezvous, or a wealthier firm than that of Berryl & Ballion. If you'd like to know what prosperity is, I should undertake first book-keeper and so on up to junior partner, and now head of the firm, I'll tell you. A bowl of bread and milk. It's a fact. A bowl of bread and milk and a girl-baby.

I was born in a quaint little country place, in Green county, New York, not far from the Hudson, and where you could see the purple peaks of the Catskills, with snow at the very top nearly all the year round—although, I used to think, they'd better made his habitation there, and kept his favorite temperature—than down in little dusty seasons had their way with the earth below. It was a pretty place, and we had a church, and a school-house, and a town-hall, and one decent store, and were afforded to live in such a healthy place if he had not already made his fortune in New York. Our home was a farm-house three miles away from the village, and lonely enough in the winter time, when bad roads and deep snows kept us sometimes for several consecutive times for weeks together. But it was beautiful in summer, when the golden corn stood in the fields, and the little orchard was bright with fruit and blossoms, and the great grape-vine shaded the white porch; and even at the coldest and loneliest time I was never lonely, for I had my mother all to each other—father and mother, and I and brother Will—and lived a life of our own, partly in books and partly in dreamland, which we knew well enough, no one else would comprehend. We had a library, such as it was, the books ranging from the old covers of calico which mother had sewed on them to hide the disreputable broken leather and tarnished gilding; and they were a queer miscellaneous lot. History of England, a Mythology with long crooked s's, and some books of poetry.

There were Milton and Pope and Porter and Mrs. Radcliffe; novels in nine volumes, which followed a lovely heroine and a true-sweetheart through adventure along a course of true love which certainly ran any thing but smoothly. Separated them apparently forever at least a dozen times, and at the end of the ninth volume always reunited and married them.

"The Horrors of Okendale Castle," "The Chilldren of Old Abbey," "Castle of Family," "The Maiden of Warsaw," and goodness knows what besides. We read them all, and cried over them together, and rejoiced at the happy conclusion of each, and absolutely went to the weddings, so vividly were they described. Will and I have never quite got over that.

We sat up all night once to be made quite sure that Elfrida Rosabell would ultimately discover that the young man of the book was a villain, and not honorable intentions; and neighbor Boggs, of the mill, sent over next morning to inquire whether any one was ill or sick or dead, as a light was seen and a light late as three o'clock a night in the sottish" room was out."

After that we closed the shutters early.

When we were not reading generally around the supper-table we were out of doors, or in the barn, or wherever we could. We spent a good many fortunes in imagination, but the reality was a good way off yet, for both uncles could only afford to make us sweet every year, and there never was a dollar to spare for any thing. Only my mother's indefatigable thread and needle kept us in clothes and boots. On week days we worked on the farm in any thing. Our grandfather was dead, and there was not a great deal of it. Besides, father was not strong, and a farmer, and never had what the neighborhood called luck. Old Farmer Peak used to say that he "guessed he made book-larnin' to grow potatoes," and perhaps he was right. There were men who could just read who made money over it, and father who was like the astonishment of all, "knew Latin," could just feed and clothe his little family. That he did that, and was thankful. I was sixteen before I heard the story of his past life. How ambitious he had been, and how he had failed in every thing he had undertaken above him, and how, at thirty, he had said to my mother, "Alice, I meant to be a great man for your sake, and all of us, but I can't. I'll be a poor farmer now; will you have me as I am?" And she who had loved him for himself, said "Yes." And so for years they had led this peaceful life of daily toil and nightly reading, varied only by church-going on the Sabbath, and occasional visits to quilting-bees or corn-husking, or quilting; and though their boys were grown up they were two lovers still.

But you know the serpent made his way into Eden, and ever since there has always been some evil thing ready to creep in where people are good and happy. Satan came to us in the shape of a middle-aged man, with black whiskers, in diffilities.

He owed some one something, and had probably done some rascally thing or other; for he was very much afraid of a certain Mr. Ball at our house for weeks together during one autumn.

He represented himself as a persecuted angel, and was sheltered and sympathized with, and made much of, as though he were one in reality. At last he asked a particular favor of his old friend and college chum—only a signature—a mere form; but it would start him in life again, and these fellows insisted on it. The signature was given; and six months from that time my father found himself a bankrupt. Almost every thing was gone—the house—the farm—only a little corner where a neglected cabin stood on a little triangular patch of ground—and bits of furniture, and our books, too oft to be of value to others, remained to us. My mother died within the year, and the frame-work round the piece, marked in divers places with the positions of points upon the rebel line, and a piece of string leading from the muzzle to the hand, bags on the parapet down to the frame, he directs the line of the piece, and as the shell is visible as it leaves the smoke till it falls into the doomed spot, it is very interesting to watch the practice.

A BOWL OF BREAD AND MILK.

PROSPEROUS! Yes; I have been prosperous. They call me a merchant prince I believe, and you'll hardly find a steamer, or a railway rendezvous, or a wealthier firm than that of Berryl & Ballion. If you'd like to know what prosperity is, I should undertake first book-keeper and so on up to junior partner, and now head of the firm, I'll tell you. A bowl of bread and milk. It's a fact. A bowl of bread and milk and a girl-baby.

I was born in a quaint little country place, in Green county, New York, not far from the Hudson, and where you could see the purple peaks of the Catskills, with snow at the very top nearly all the year round—although, I used to think, they'd better made his habitation there, and kept his favorite temperature—than down in little dusty seasons had their way with the earth below. It was a pretty place, and we had a church, and a school-house, and a town-hall, and one decent store, and were afforded to live in such a healthy place if he had not already made his fortune in New York. Our home was a farm-house three miles away from the village, and lonely enough in the winter time, when bad roads and deep snows kept us sometimes for several consecutive times for weeks together. But it was beautiful in summer, when the golden corn stood in the fields, and the little orchard was bright with fruit and blossoms, and the great grape-vine shaded the white porch; and even at the coldest and loneliest time I was never lonely, for I had my mother all to each other—father and mother, and I and brother Will—and lived a life of our own, partly in books and partly in dreamland, which we knew well enough, no one else would comprehend. We had a library, such as it was, the books ranging from the old covers of calico which mother had sewed on them to hide the disreputable broken leather and tarnished gilding; and they were a queer miscellaneous lot. History of England, a Mythology with long crooked s's, and some books of poetry.

There were Milton and Pope and Porter and Mrs. Radcliffe; novels in nine volumes, which followed a lovely heroine and a true-sweetheart through adventure along a course of true love which certainly ran any thing but smoothly. Separated them apparently forever at least a dozen times, and at the end of the ninth volume always reunited and married them.

"The Horrors of Okendale Castle," "The Chilldren of Old Abbey," "Castle of Family," "The Maiden of Warsaw," and goodness knows what besides. We read them all, and cried over them together, and rejoiced at the happy conclusion of each, and absolutely went to the weddings, so vividly were they described. Will and I have never quite got over that.

We sat up all night once to be made quite sure that Elfrida Rosabell would ultimately discover that the young man of the book was a villain, and not honorable intentions; and neighbor Boggs, of the mill, sent over next morning to inquire whether any one was ill or sick or dead, as a light was seen and a light late as three o'clock a night in the sottish" room was out."

After that we closed the shutters early.

When we were not reading generally around the supper-table we were out of doors, or in the barn, or wherever we could. We spent a good many fortunes in imagination, but the reality was a good way off yet, for both uncles could only afford to make us sweet every year, and there never was a dollar to spare for any thing. Only my mother's indefatigable thread and needle kept us in clothes and boots. On week days we worked on the farm in any thing. Our grandfather was dead, and there was not a great deal of it. Besides, father was not strong, and a farmer, and never had what the neighborhood called luck. Old Farmer Peak used to say that he "guessed he made book-larnin' to grow potatoes," and perhaps he was right. There were men who could just read who made money over it, and father who "knew Latin," to the astonishment of all, "knew Latin," could just feed and clothe his little family. That he did that, and was thankful. I was sixteen before I heard the story of his past life. How ambitious he had been, and how he had failed in every thing he had undertaken above him, and how, at thirty, he had said to my mother, "Alice, I meant to be a great man for your sake, and all of us, but I can't. I'll be a poor farmer now; will you have me as I am?" And she who had loved him for himself, said "Yes." And so for years they had led this peaceful life of daily toil and nightly reading, varied only by church-going on the Sabbath, occasional visits to quilting-bees or corn-husking, or quilting; and though their boys were grown up they were two lovers still.

But you know the serpent made his way into Eden, and ever since there has always been some evil thing ready to creep in where people are good and happy. Satan came to us in the shape of a middle-aged man, with black whiskers, in diffilities.

He owed some one something, and had probably done some rascally thing or other; for he was very much afraid of a certain Mr. Ball at our house for weeks together during one autumn.

To the country youth of seventeen the city seemed so wide and cruel. That great Broadway was to me "a stony-hearted step-mother."

It was after dark when I reached the place I called home for the time, and told my story to my landlady. She had sons of her own, but she had no room for me, and I went from her house that night, and left my brown portmanteau as it the bits of clothes in it behind me, until her curiosity rose that "She'd not be cheated—not she—by any tramp, ed-up story."

Do you know where I slept that night? On a bench in the City Hall Park. And there was no breakfast ready in the morning at that hotel.

All day I looked for work—or employment, as helper, any where where strong arms were needed; no one wanted me. Then, at last, stunned and weary, a baker brushing by me with his basket of warm loaves almost made me faint. But I went on still asking at stores and factories, even at the doors of private dwellings, for work, and finding none. At seven, so anxious was I for food, that, seeing a load of wood at the door of a plain house, I asked for the job of sawing and splitting it. The woman shook her head.

"I'll do it for my supper," I said, pleadingly.

"A great, healthy young man like you ought'n to need supper as bad as that," she said, and closed the door in my face. Then I heard her call within,

"Biddy, watch the cellar-door, there's a straggler outside." A daughter of my mother and of home came over me. What would she have said could she have seen me then? How would her face have looked? I was very glad she could not know all I endured. Poor though we had been, I had never guessed what cold hearts and starvation could be.

I left the door before which I had been standing and wandered on, wondering whether I could bring myself to beg for food. Dinner would have been preferable, but mother and Will—I had no right to think even if God would let me stay. On either hand were stores and dwellings, brightly lighted. Windows where dainty pastry, and jellies, and confectionery were piled. Others still, where heaps of gold, and silver, and crisp bank-notes were spread on green baize; still others, through the white curtains of which I could see family groups gathered around bright fires or cozy tea-tables. All seemed happy save myself. It is always so when we are hungry.

On I went—I could stop at none of these bright places—and at last I turned down a side-street full of handsome old-fashioned houses, with low doorsteps and windows on the first floor, which were on a level with the pave of a much narrower side-walk. This street was darker than the busy one from which I had turned. I walked on counting the doors, resolved to stop at the third or five that I could bear to beg—failing to keep the promise I made myself every time. At last I came to a house standing larger than the rest. From the low window a light shone out, sending a warm gleam upon the front pavement. The curtain was not drawn, and I could see the room within. A great dining-table covered with white damask, and at one end of it a young girl with her head bent down, and weeping to her waist, and what looked like a bowl of bread and milk. Near her stood a servant-woman. It was a picture of home. I thought I had never seen so lovely a child or such a pleasant room.

Listen—I turned and heard the servant say to her,

"Miss Rose, your pa and ma won't be home for ever so long, and they said you were to eat your supper and go to bed. What is the matter?"

"I want some jam," said the child, "and dolly! Dolly will be half-starved."

"Then you shall have to get hungry, Miss Rose," said the girl.

"Miss does," said the child, "and sleepy. Please bring her night-gown and cap, so that I can undress her where it is warm."

"What a pretty child you are!" said the girl.

"Well, I'll get the jam and your doll, and then you will go to bed, Miss Rose."

I heard the child sob, and the girl left her.

Then I perceived that a crack of the window had been left open—perhaps by accident—and perhaps because the room was overheated. I longed for a little of that pleasant warmth. I raised the sash before from the ledge, standing on a projecting stone ornament below. As I did so the frame made a creaking sound, and the child looked around, not frightened, but with a bright, look in her face that was not easily alarmed by trifles. Then a thought came into my head. I would ask her if she would not be so bitter a humiliation. I thrust my head through the aperture and called to her by the name the servant had used.

"Miss Rose."

The child saw my face now, she heard my voice, and came to the window, her high seat. Half-way she paused, putting back her hair with her little hand, and looking at me wonderingly with her blue eyes.

"I don't know you," she said. "Who are you? What do you want?"

"I am some one who is hungry," I said. "I want something to eat."

"Hungry?" she said. "You must have some thing to eat right away;" and then turned on her little toes and pattered to the table, whence she lifted the great china bowl of bread and milk with both baby hands. She set it upon the sill, and perching on a chair, to my utter astonishment, and with an air of command, "Now open your mouth and I'll feed you."

She had been used to feeding and putting the kitten into the window to eat the cream, and so in the same way. I understood that at once; but obeyed. I opened my mouth; and I outside of the window, with elbows on the sill, she within, perched on the seat of a chair, that baby fed me with bread and milk. I amused her. She laughed merrily. Now and then she patted me on the head. For my own part I hardly knew whether I wondered most at myself or her.

The bowl was emptied not slowly; and then I caught the baby hands in mine and kissed them.

"I shall never forget you," I said. "I shall never cease to pray for you—never—"

But the words died on my lips, for a strong hand touched my shoulder, and a voice, in which merriment and anger mingled, uttered in my ear, "Hullo—come down, and let me see who you are?"

Who I was! The next moment I did not know myself, for I had fallen insensible to the ground.

"A Talk of novels!" said the senior partner, breaking off. "Real life is stranger." The man who spoke to me was little Rose's father. That, of course, you guess; but you can not guess—for it never entered into my head—how he was also my dear, dead father's dearest friend, come back from a far-off State, where he had been long a-living, and a prosperous merchant in the city.

They found me out by letters in my pocket; for, you see, they thought I was dead—and I was pretty near it.

So when I came to myself there were friends around me; and they told me to have no fear, but to trust in them to help me, and I did.

Why I went to mother I told her that I had not become a successful author, but that I was a promising book-keeper in the firm of Bullion & Co. A year after, she and Will came to live with me to live. Thank God, they are both living still!

As for myself, you know dear little Rose was my first friend; and I could not forget the night when she fed me with her little hands, and saved me from starving to death, I believe.

I loved her dearly; and I watched her grow up from a bright bud to a sweet blossom, loving her more and more every day.

In ten years she was seventeen and I twenty-seven, and the junior partner of our firm. One day—one evening rather—I went to her, to the old house—the one through whose open window I heard their evening—and there, by that same open window, I asked her a question, and she said "Yes."

What the question was you can easily guess, for she is my wife now, and has been for thirty years, so that our little grand-daughter is exactly what Rose was when she fed me with bread and milk.

The senior partner now, and this house is the one she lived in then. I promised the old gentleman we'd live here, and we have done so. As for my novel. Did I tell you that the MS. was gone that night, and I never knew what became of it? But the other night Sam, my butler, had been down cellar hunting up some old wine, that was years ago, and he found something lying among the rubbish in one end, and brought it to me. Upon my word I could have wept when I saw the dingy parcel. It was my old novel—"Angelica; or, Parted and Reunited."

The rats had spared it for a wonder, and though it was mouldy and dirty I managed to read it.

My dear friend, it was the most disjointed trash that ever disgraced paper, and if a boy in my office were to spell so badly I'd dismiss him.

I never let any one see it except one another.

"It's a pity," she said, "that you could not have been an author. Will you never write another story?"

"Perhaps," I said; "and if I do, it will be a story of a Bowl of Bread and Milk.

THE DIAMOND NECKLACE.

I AM married, and long out of business now, but some fifteen years ago I was an assistant-matron in a prison for female convicts. I am not inclined to give its particular name, because I have a delicate and a fair share of promotion in the establishment, and left it with the character of an efficient officer; for the story I am about to tell might appear somewhat compromising in the eyes of strict lady-superintendents if it ever came across their path.

Well, I had been about a year in the service, and got fully acquainted with its duties, when a Jewess named Jemima Jacobs was brought to my ward. She was young—not over twenty, I should say—but not at all handsome, being coarse-featured, squat, and of a dirty-brown complexion, as most of the prison-dress did not improve, as you may imagine. Her trial had taken place at the Old Bailey, and on a charge of stealing plate and jewelry to a large amount from a wealthy Jewish family in which she had been Nursemaid. The evidence was all made against her, the family being the chief witnesses. Jacobs was convicted and sentenced to one year's penal servitude—a lenient sentence, as the jury thought, for her offense. But the family, while they appreciated her merciful intentions, were on the subject of her previous good-conduct, and showed a laudable anxiety to mitigate her punishment by all the means in their power.

After her arrival within our penal walls no visiting-day elapsed without some of them coming to see and converse with their unfortunate protégée. As my readers are (as I hope) without experience of prison-discipline, I may remark that such interviews take place through two opposite grates—the convict standing at the inner, her friends at the outer one, and a prison-officer sees that no one shall come to see that nothing is said or done contrary to regulations. I frequently occupied that post, and thus had an opportunity of seeing the whole family, for they came in turn by ones and by twos. Let me say that their name was Josephs, and their place of business a notable one in the City, with a jeweler's shop in front, and a pawnbroker's office round the corner. Thus, almost every day, I'd ever know, of a father and a son, a mother and two daughters. The father, a tall, thin, stooping man was always rather shabbily dressed. The son was exactly like him, only some inches shorter; to me he did not look many years younger, though, of course, he must have been; and I can not say how I found out that his name was Samuel. Probably it was from hearing his mother call him by it as he came with her on the first day. She was an enormous woman, dressed in expensive but half-soiled finery. Her two daughters were handsome dashing girls, with full faces, an abundance of jewelry, and very fashionable bonnets. They mostly came in their carriage to the top of the road in which the prison was situated; there it waited for them till the interview was over, and father, mother, son, or daughters never said more than five minutes. The sight of Jacobs and the exchange of a very few words with her seemed to satisfy them, but one and all accosted her with the same sorrowful kindness, as if deeply grieved by her unfortunate position. There was a brief inquiry after her health, an admonition to submit implicitly to the prison regulations, and another comfort that all for her good, and a declaration that they would take her back again to their services at the expiration of her sentence if she behaved well. And these suitable responses had very humble acknowledgments; but one thing struck me as remarkable, as it was never omitted in one of their visits—they never went without asking if she had come to a proper repentance of her great sin yet, and Jacobs as invariably answered, "I'm afraid I have not." This was so regularly done that I at last concluded it must have some religious signification known only to the Jews. The conduct of the Josephs toward their convicted kitchen-maid was certainly more remarkable than Gentiles generally show in such circumstances. But we matrons and assistants soon began to think that the case might be found in Jacobs herself. A more civil or submissive creature no prison-officer could desire to have in charge. In fact, Jacobs required little care; she made no trouble, complaints, made the rough bags, was locked up at night, and even attended the chapel with the same unmurmuring behavior. Jacobs grew popular. We have body-servants, accustomed to look after female convicts will have as idea of what a rare jewel she was when she appeared in our eyes, and what a contrast she presented to the other women of the ward.

I am not going to dwell on the woes of an assistant-matron, but the unexampled good-behavior of my new prisoner, while it spared my nerves and temper, could not help but tell on my health. Positively liked Jacobs before she had been a fortnight under my charge, and the poor Jewess seemed to return my partiality. There was no trouble she wouldn't have taken, no haste she wouldn't have made to serve me; and when I was called, called—and carried without being bidden; and when allowed to clean my room, as a reward for good conduct, because of my official dignified liability, she made every thing look as bright and polished as if it had been new. I was pleased, of course; but chance soon occurred to astonish me to Jacobs's hobby—an uncommon one for a Jewess—and still more to excite my admiration of our wards. All the time she could spare from prison-work was devoted to sweeping, scrubbing, and polishing up her cell—the walls, window, floor, and even the ceiling got the benefit of her exertions; she reached them with an agility which nobody would suppose her capable of. Almost the entire ward was indebted to her in this way, which brings us to the only objectionable circumstance about my charge. There was no such thing as getting her to rest or remain in a cell more than one or two weeks; except for the above cause, and there was nothing more for Jacobs to clean, not a speck of dust left on its bare walls or in its four corners, she became uneasy, restless, always beginning leave to change with her next neighbor. Prison-rules do not recognize such humors; but as in the working of every system, rules will be relaxed and modified according to character and circumstances, so in female prisons the matron-in-chief, the good-will of officers, the consideration of directors, and sometimes the general desire for as much of a quiet life as can be had in such places, make a host of small matters and allowances beyond the strict regulations. Jacobs seemed to understand the fact, and took her measures accordingly. Not only request she ever made to directors, lady-superintendent, or chaplain—and she made many—was allowed from me, in return for her spontaneous services—the only approach to intimacy with her fellow-prisoners she ever tried to make—but to change her cell. There was a report among us—I know not how it originated—to the effect that the Josephs had made interest with the directors for a prison authorities. Whether the influence brought to bear on the case was really powerful or not, the simple request was always granted; she got leave to exchange. I could not be more obdurate than the Josephs were, my conscience would have no such zeal; and as for her fellow-prisoners, though by no means inclined to assist or gratify each other generally, they were unanimous in their praises to pedagogue Jacobs. In short, before half the time of her sentence elapsed, she had made the round of the entire ward; and as last requested, from her usual unobtrusive humility, an immediate transfer to No. 49, which she had cell at the western end of the corridor, and the only one she had not tried.

No. 49 was indeed a sort of forgotten or unused cell, partly because it was the last on the ward, partly because there was a dark tradition attached to it. I must tell you that my ward formed part of what was called the old prison, consisting of the building much more ancient than the rest, which, in former times, had been appropriated to debtors, convicts, and a noted burglar who said to have escaped public execution by hanging himself in that very cell. Such stories never get out of prison, particularly in prisons; but it was hushed up as far as possible, to save the officers trouble in case the cell should be wanted. That did not happen, to any great satisfaction, and No. 49 was left in its ominous solitude. Jacobs was the only person I ever knew who had heard the tale or not I had no certainty; it was very likely that some old inhabitant of the prison would soon acquaint her aware of it. I advised the Jewess against her meditated exchange, told her she could not expect to have another, after going round the ward as she had done, warned her that No. 49 was the most solitary, and probably, from its large size and proximity to all the cells, but my advices and warnings were alike in vain. Hum by obstinate as ever, in Jacobs would go, and in she went. I determined that she should not, and should not make shifting in a hurry, whatever recollections of the burglar might arise. But to my agreeable surprise Jacobs appeared to think nothing about him; she scrubbed and cleaned and polished No. 49 with as much energy as she had shown in her former apartments—if possible, I thought rather more. The ward-women were unanimous that she knew all about the burglar, but in the cell Jacobs remained, as if perfectly satisfied at last, and when nearly a month had passed away I congratulated myself on the prospect of no more removals.

In the mean time the Josephs kept on coming to see her at the grate, chiefly the mother and daughters; indeed, I observed that the gentlemen of the family, having doubtless more business on their hands, were but rare visitors, particularly the son Samuel. The younger ones always left me conscience-stricken with the accustomed inquiry regarding her repentance, which Jacobs continued to answer in the negative; and it appeared to me that the Josephs heard that reply with increased sorrow every time. Their solicitude seemed did not seem to lessen their grief; she made the accustomed response humbly and calmly, as if certain that the requisite amount of contrition could be found in a genuine Jew. I could not help thinking it a sort of Jewish penance which made her take to the scrubbing and sweeping of her cell-of-the-very cell more resolutely after every visit.

Things had been going on in that fashion for some time. The Josephs came, and, besides their usually cold, a season of peculiar concern to us matrons and assistants, for however less had to do with female convict establishments will be aware that, in the dark December, or rather the Christmas and New-Year holidays, it always is plentiful time for small riots among the inhabitants of the cells. Whether it arises from the remembrance of former festivities, perhaps with the unconscious effect of on-life, or to some occult influence of the season acting on the spirits and tempers of those difficult subjects, I can not say; but this I am, from woeful experience, that more windows are then broken, more blankets torn, more bread and more fierce battles fought, and more women carried off screaming to the dark cells, than at any other period of the years. We've had nothing of the kind as yet, and were hoping to get over the troublesome time in comparative quiet; but increased watchfulness was nevertheless recommended necessary, and while we did the night-duty were enjoined to make the rounds of the corridors frequently through the night. A dreary business it was for the assistant-matrons to whom the work generally fell to pass about all the long winter nights with those glaring dark-lanterns in our hands, wrapped in a cloak, and with lantern in hand, listening for every sound, looking in at the inspection-hole every now and then, and occasionally wishing for the six o'clock bell, which would relieve us from our duty.

I was on that duty one night about the middle of December. I had made the stipulated rounds, and, finding all quiet, had, when it occurred to me, about three o'clock in the morning, the weariest hour in the whole watch, that all night long I had not looked into No. 49 to see how Jacobs did. The cell, as I have said, was out of the way; there was a sort of bend or angle in the passage which led to it, and I might have been suited its ancient use—namely, the condemned cell of the old prison. Jacobs had never given any trouble, and was certainly not a breaking-out subject. I felt it no neglect of duty to leave her alone from hour to hour, while all the rest of the wards were daily inspected; but, for regulations' sake, I felt that I ought to see the door of No. 49, as this was almost my last round. Had it been in a direct line, and let me remark that I had on a pair of list-slippers, which made walking noiseless, I should, as matron on the night-watch for their noiselessness; but judge of my amazement and confusion when, on softly approaching the door, I found it open, and Jacobs in a low rasping sound, as if something were being done with a file or chisel. There was a faint light, too; I should have seen it had I looked through the inspection-hole. The gas was burning very low, and crouched in the corner, with her face close to the door, the working of both hands, and a small bit of brown iron, as if to widen a crevice she had made between the door and the wall, I saw the quiet and most manageable Jacobs. She had not heard, and couldn't see me; and, great as my surprise was, my conduct was what no one could think about, or intend by making that crevice, was still greater. I stood for a minute or two watching her progress, and soon perceived that the object was to get her fingers in or to get something out. The effort seemed almost beyond her strength—great and bleeding in many places by coming in contact with the sharp edges of the stone and the broken bit of iron; but at last she succeeded in getting two fingers into the crevice, and out with them came a string of beads so brilliant that they flashed like so many drops of light in the dim gaslight.

"What on earth are you doing, Jacobs?" said I, in astonishment; and the prisoner, as if struck, turned round with a fat and amazed look than mine must have been.

"You don't caught me, miss," she said, in her customary low and humble tone. "I knew you would; but you won't be hurt on me; you are a merciful lady: the Josephs will make you any present out you like; and maybe you would be good enough to take this," she continued, coming close to the door, and speaking low to me, through the inspection-hole, a small but very brilliant pin.

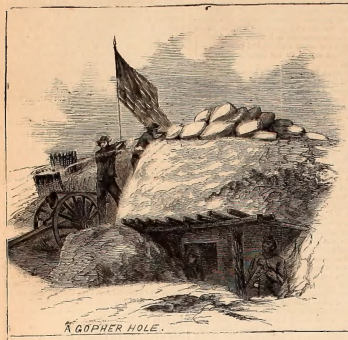
"I'll take no bribe, Jacobs," I said, turning before from you, and I want nothing from the Josephs; but I want to know what you have been doing up at this hour in your cell, and what you have got and took out of the crevice between the wall and the floor."

"I'll tell you all, miss, and leave my case to your charity," said Jacobs: "thank my stars, the women are too far off to hear a word." I knew that was correct, and it made me stand at the inspection-hole to hear her tell, in the dead silence of the night, one of the most singular tales of device and endurance that I ever heard.

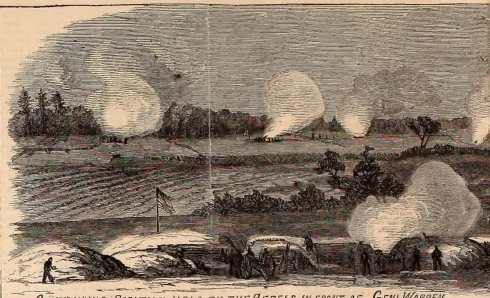
The string of brilliant beads was an old-fashioned diamond necklace, valued at I forget how many thousands. It had been sold or pawned—Jacobs would not decidedly say which, but I believe the latter—to a grand-uncle of the Josephs. Some intimation of the diamonds and their value somehow reached a noted gang of burglars, for they made an attack on his premises one night, and carried off, among other spoils of less value, the precious necklace. The grand-uncle had pursued them with all the force of law, and with all the power of richness. Many of the gang were taken, and among them the leader, in whose possession the diamonds were believed to remain. But no trifle, no promise that the Jewish aldermen could make for the money could offer, would induce him to give the smallest information regarding the fate of the valuable ornament. The man was a strange and desperate character, and owed the firm a grudge on account of a brother in the same trade, which had long been instrumental in bringing to justice for an unsuccessful endeavor after those very diamonds. He stood out stoutly against every persecution. The jury could not get so knowledge out of him; he would make no confession: he would not be accounted as the burglar kept his word in the manner already mentioned, leaving his cell invested with traditional terrors for all future prisoners. But the Josephs's attorney, in the course of his frequent conferences with him and his associates, made one discovery, or rather guess. From his intimate knowledge grasped, and looks involuntarily cast, he took a suspicion that in spite of prison-customs and other apparent impossibilities, the diamonds had been smuggled in with the chief of the robbers, and hidden in some crevice of his comfortable cell. In a private interview with Israel, the attorney had kept that surmise for his own future benefit; but years passed, and no opportunity for making it good had come to reach. He grew old, infirm, and ready to retire from business, in which it appeared he had realized much money; and then it occurred to him, as a cheerful and profitable course, to sell his suspicion for a respectable sum to the surviving Josephs of the immediate-loser. According to Jacobs the bargain had been a stiff one, though, owing to the lapse of time, the failure of the memory, and the confusion made in the old prison, it was impossible for the attorney to say what cell the burglar had occupied. Many judicious inquiries, however, the Josephs found out that such a cell still existed, marked and made memorable by the circumstance of the hanging-man-maid, Jemima, being of pure Jewish race, and a distant relation, volunteered to recover the family treasure by any means, her scrubbing and sweeping propensities, and, I sincerely believe, her humble services to me. How she contrived to bribe the women in those exciting times with small articles of jewelry brought to the prison, and retained in spite of hair-cutting and changes of clothes, Jacobs frankly confessed, for the sake of those who had done so much for them. But the most curious part of the business, to my thinking, was the Josephs's regular application concerning her repentance, which was nothing less than an agreed-on signal, and meant, "Have you found them yet?" and Jacobs made a negative with her breast —there was nobody within possible ear-shot—and when she had told me all the poor Jewess concluded with this bit of natural simple appeal: "I can't give up to your charity, miss."

Perhaps it was weakness, perhaps it was something worse, as assistant-matron; but, notwithstanding the gravity of that title and office, I was not a young woman at the time mentioned, and in keeping company on my Sundays out with Mr. John Adams, my present lord and master. We were engaged in visiting my self to a new and better life in a certain city office, and could begin housekeeping with respectable prospects. My own little romance was to me very engrossing, and my connection with what I ought to have done, according to strict regulations. I presume, on the spot never to report, never to reveal her secret.

When the Josephs came next visiting-day there was a vacation-look in the diabolical. I confidentially assured them of her complete repentance, and the undesigned joy which sparkled in their Jewish eyes would have put to shame any spy who could pick the secret an immense opinion of their moral principles. After that no more visits were paid, and Jacobs requested to abridge the time of Jemima's penal servitude. Every official from the Home Secretary downward, was favorable to the commutation of sentences, and what influence they brought to bear on the superior authorities was never made known to me; but Jacobs got her sentence shortened, and was released from my ward and custody within one month, reckoned from that memorable night. She went her way exactly as she came. There was nothing remarkable in the departure of the Jewish maid but an unusual amount of bowing and scraping acknowledgments to all the prison-matrons, especially myself. The next night I got of her was on the top of my Sunday's dress, when Joseph's carriage passed me, and there was my model prisoner seated beside the large mother, and quite as well overlaid with finery. If Mrs. Samuel recognized me she did not appear to do so. Our ways were different, and we never came in the slightest contact. But two years after, when Mr. Adams and I were thinking of going to church together, a very handsome wedding-dress was sent home to me, and there was a brilliant stock in the one corner of it, and I knew the gift came from Jemima Jacobs.



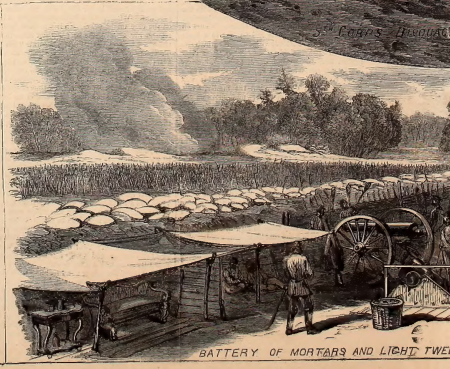
K GOPHER HOLE.



COMMANDING POSITION HELD BY THE REBELS IN FRONT OF GEN'L WARREN.
6TH MASS BATTERY IN THE FOREGROUND. CAP. MARTIN.

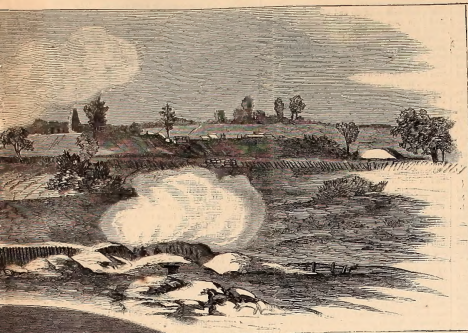
SHARPSHOOTERS 18TH CORPS.

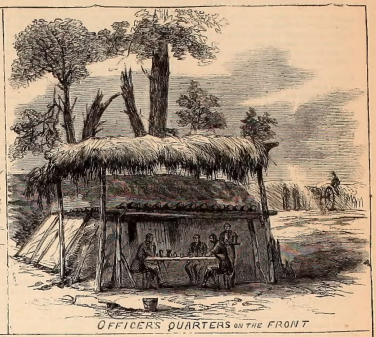
SOLDIERS WELLS.



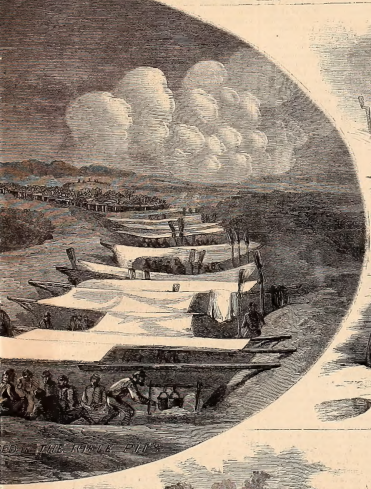
BATTERY OF MORTARS AND LIGHT TWE

GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—IN THE TRENCHES BE

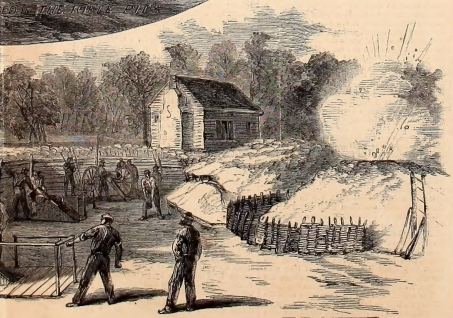




OFFICERS QUARTERS ON THE FRONT



AIMING A MORTAR, IN JACKSONS CT BATTERY.



LVES 1st Ct HEAVY ARTILLERY. Lt JACKSON, 18th CORPS.

MAKING PARALLELS.

FORE PETERSBURG.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 502.]

THE PRISONER OF WAR.

He lay upon the barren ground
Beneath the evening sky,
While the haggard prisoners gathered round
To see their comrade die,
For the damp of death was on his brow,
Its fever in his eye.

Famine, and cold, and cruelty
Had done their work of ill;
But they could not bind his spirit free,
Or shake his iron will;
The stamp of a high, heroic soul
Was on features still.

"Let me not sleep in the tainted clay,"
He said, "of this prison isle;
The river will bear me ere the day
On its boson many a mile;
I shall float past the hated traitor holds
Death-free, with a scornful smile.

"I shall flee' till through my dreams shall go
The thrill of the chainless sea.
The comrades I left are down below;
They shall find and carry me
To a soil more dear in my native town
By the banks of the Genesee."

Then one by one the sacred grip
To his bony hand they gave,
With such a token on every lip
As fits a spirit brave,
Whose promise reaches darkly through
The blunders of the grave.

There was talk of home and loved ones there,
And messages left for each,
And the words of the half-remembered prayer
A mother alone can teach,
Till the awful, changeless stillness came,
The broken links of speech.

They marked his name, and State, and town,
Upon a light canteen,
And bound it, when the moon was down,
His wrist with hands between;
And tenderly in the river laid
His death-cold form unseen.

Silently as a wreath of foam
Down the current it was borne,
Perhaps too deep in a dream of home
For the promised smile of scorn;
Perhaps too swift, for the frowning bluffs
Lay far behind at morn.

It drifted to a sentinel's feet
Who stood by the lower shore,
And he read the name with a quick heart-beat
He had known so well before;
And the prisoner now by the Genesee
Is at rest for evermore!

QUITE ALONE.

By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

EXIT FRANCIS BLUNT, ESQUIRE.

Good pays—it is useless to trouble you with his surname; you would forget it; you have so many names to think of; he appears but for a moment on the stage, and it is sufficient, surely, that he was little Amanda's father, and the guardian of the Edifice on the banks of the Seine—good papa, who was lank and slim, quite of the old school, and whose scanty hair was not innocent of a slight suspicion of powder, sat down with Monsieur Philibert to breakfast. The mightiest deal-table, the most succulent cutlets, the stronger red wine, were placed before them. They were helped bountifully, and they ate plentifully. Particularly enjoyed the papa the things of this life with a gusto which, to the spectator, was absolutely ravishing. The meat and drink seemed to do him as much good as a vampire! He a ghoul! He a croque mort! He seemed a lively-legged and abdominous cherub rather, the spotless linen and a massive watch-chain, forming no ambrosia, which, as corpulent children eat, had been sufficient for his especial use and benefit. He was a cheering man, and talked as charmingly as he refected himself generously.

"Full, good papa?" he asked, when he had made an end of filling and emptying his own mouth.

Empty as the mouth of a cannon at the Invalides when there are no victories to fire salutes for," replied the guardian. "Every thing is as bare, Lubin, as the palm of my hand. The Hôtel des Drégoires is not had a lodger for three days.

"Hôtel des Trépassés—good, very good," murmured Philibert. "You have a pleasant wit, good papa, a right pleasant wit. A little more flannel, if you please. Thank you. It makes one quite chirrup, that little red wine. But business is usually slack at this time of the year; is it not, papa? In the Spring, the month of June your heart-broken grisette does not think of committing suicide, the spirit of a brazier; it is so warm. And then your bankrupt banker, your discontented Faust. He is not quite so real! you cannot cope with the great problems the schools are about breaking up, and he is going home for the holidays."

"Ma foi! I'm sure I don't know. The seasons don't make so very much difference to us. Bon an, mal an, we have always a fair average of lodgers, winter and summer. It is only the English who make of November a special month for the settlement of their little accounts with Fate."

"Ah! those English. A strange, perverse, intractable race. Hopelessly eccentric are those sons of Albion. They tell me there is no Administration of the Pompes Funèbres in that bramous country, and that their proud and phlegmatic aristocracy, carrying their hereditary spleen even beyond the tomb, have lately taken it into their heads to be buried without the slightest state or ceremony. Of course ignorances! Still, do I hear that Monsieur Thiers is making Milord Palmerston listen to reason as to the grand affair—the rendition of the sacred ashes of the Emperor."

"You are growing cracked with your emperor and his sacred ashes, mon gros," the guardian, with good-humored petulance, observed. "You ask me one question, and fly off at a tangent to that eternal St. Helena. It is disrespectful to the Order of Things. It is flying in the face of the Genius of July."

"Pardon, good papa. Patriotism is, I trust not incompatible with veneration for the great deeds of times past, and for him the natural hero. But you were saying—"

"I was saying that between November and June no very great disparity in the number of my lodgers was perceptible. With commendable regularity they continue to patronize the hôtel pretty well all the year round. Our present emptiness, for example, is almost unprecedented. People must be very busy or the world very peaceable, or the Chapter of Accidents well-nigh exhausted, to account for it."

"It is certainly curious."

"It is more than curious—it is vexatious," good papa, rubbing his ear with some irritation, resumed. "Our usual sources of supply seem to have failed us lately. It is June, certainly, but then don't people go down to St. Cloud, spend their employers' money in reckless dissipation, and cut their throats through remorse next morning? Don't women lose their heads at Asnières in a state of inebriety, capsize their embarkations in a tipsy attempt to row, and get drowned? Are there no lovers' quarrels at Fontenay-aux-Roses, resulting in the customary laudanum, or the usual sack and pistol practice of a tree? Where is our midsummer harvest from the Bois de Vincennes? Where are our returns from the Forêt de Fontainebleau? Is not the Palais Royal, and Frascati's—what has become of them? Have half the world been bewitching on the black, and the other half on the red, and have both red and black turned up alternately, so that both have won? It is humanly irrepressible. And the assassinations? Is the Cité pulled down? Are there no more bastile in the Rue des Fèves, on more licensed convicts on the Quai de Billy, no more night prowlers at the outer barriers? And misery! misery that always exists, that always begins a quota of lodgers to the hôtel. Ma parole d'honneur je n'y vois goutte."

And so the gossips went on. The women-folk had withdrawn to a window, and, softly chatting among themselves, were enjoying the ever-changing panorama on the river shores beneath. Philibert was telling the guardian of a grand funeral which took place in the reign of Louis the Eighteenth—a funeral on a raw, cold, November day—a day so cold, so raw, that three personages, eminent in French history, standing round the open grave, caught cold, and caught fevers, and died; for they all expired in less than three months afterwards.

"Let me see," prattled Philibert, counting on his fingers; "there was Napoleon Bonaparte, the whom Bérenger—what a funeral the great poet will have!—consigned so mercilessly dans les nuages, ever old love of mine! There was that distinguished ornament to the bar, Monsieur Robert de Saint-Vincent. And, finally, there was Baud-Savarin—Savarin the tax unequaled, the incomparable, the illustrious gastronomical benefactor of humanity."

"A-a-h!" Lily gave a little scream and ran back, trembling like a frightened fawn, from the window. Amanda heard the cry because her hand to calm her. Amanda was disturbed by her friend's agitation, but she was not terrified. She had looked from the window often and too long. Madame Thomas remained immovable. She was quiet, accordingly, to the point.

"What is it, my child?" cried the guardian, starting up in some alarm.

"What is it, Madame Amanda?" the mas ter of the ceremonies echoed. "Perhaps," he continued, mentally, "my eloquence has touched the sensibility of a petite fille. Parbleu! they are very sentimental, these charming misses. Would that I had not named the humble Philibert may have made upon her would excite so much grief as that of Amanda. Oh! my Amanda, my Amanda!" Monsieur Philibert, in a pretty, amiable, well-to-do partner, able to conduct during his absence on official business a genteel commercial establishment, a mansion in the air in the Boulevard des Capucines; this was his dream of bliss.

"It is nothing, it is nothing, papa," Amanda hastened to reply to her father's query; "or, rather, it is a mere trifle, a bagatelle; but Ma'mselle Lily is not used to such sights, and it her frightened her. It is your affair. Cest un enfant qui pert son père. Ah! mon Dieu! he is coming, my papa."

Lily had sunk into a chair, and had covered her face with her hands, and was sobbing without tears. The poor little thing was too frightened to cry.

"Is it gone?" she asked, as Amanda bent over her to soothe her.

"You silly little soul, there is nothing to be alarmed at. I live in the midst of such things, and they never trouble me. Papa takes care of all that sort of thing."

Madame Thomas, with her nose to the pane, gave a low prolonged sound like "hough."

Madame Thomas was keen-scented; she sniffed the lodger from afar off.

The two men went up and stood beside her. And then they looked, beneath them, that of which Lily had caught but a distant glimpse.

First, there was a crowd. Two soldiers, recently carrying arms, who had just joined the garrison of Paris, with gaby faces, ill-cut hair, forage-caps vet void of the military manner of setting on, and an inch of shirt visible between the shems of their jackets and the waistbands of their pantaloons. One was munching an apple, and the other was smoking a half-penny cigar, of course. To them followed a water-carrier, and a cook with a basket full of provisions, who had just partaken of a morning sip with the Aquarius aforesaid; a flock of ragged boys in blouses, escaped from a primary school, who were swinging their satchels, and shrilly interchanging criticisms upon Somebody's appearance, and more especially upon his odor; half a dozen workmen with pipes in their mouths, and an old gentleman with a strawhat, spectacles, and a little gunghan umbrella, who may have been a member of the Institute, a retired banker, a spy of the police, or a hanging-letter writer taking an airing, but who, with his hat, his spectacles, and his umbrella, had assumed the mingled portion of similar crowds any time these fifty years: at the Federal Pact ceremonial in the Champ de Mars, at the Feast of the Goddess of Reason, at the whipping of Théroigne de Mircourt, at the execution of Robespierre, at the coronation of the Infant Bonbonnière, at the exposition of the first Infernal Machine, at the Coronation of Napoleon, at the entry of the Allied Kings into Fontainebleau, at the Champ de Mai in 'fifteen, at the removal of the Horses of St. Mark from the Arch of the Carrousel, at the assassination of the Duke of Berry, at the barricades of July, at the Hôtel de Ville when Jacques Lafayette shewed the Duke of Orleans the mode of "the best of republics," at the riots during the cholera year 'thirty-three, at the funeral of General Lamarque, and the bloody conflict in the Rue de la Tixeranderie, at the raising of the Obelisk of the Luxor, and the interment of the martyrs of July beneath the Column of the Place de la Bastile. He had made one in all these famous crowds, this trusty old dog, this gaby saw-hat, and he always had a book under his arm just purchased for seventy-five centimes at the Quai Voltaire. He had seemingly never changed save in the article of a pigtail, which he wore during the Republic and the Empire, and had cut off soon after the Second Restoration.

This was the crowd. Stay: the gentleman who shewed the way, who attended to cats on the Pont Neuf, had left his stall in the care of an old woman, and run up just to see what was going on. His temperament was different from any he perhaps exhaustive of that "Va en ville" which, in the Quartier Latin, was the nucleus of the throng, and had drawn it together. Finally, in the rear of the procession—for it was a mobile crowd, and in perky-mien and voice might have been called a cortège—there followed leisurely three well-dressed men, who were evidently returning from morning, and, taking a walk afterward for recreation, had fallen in with something of the nature of a spectacle above, and were determined to follow it to the end.

That end was now near. It was the door of the Edifice. Some one had run up the window, and could look right down upon the Something that was being borne along in the midst of the gazers and the idlers and the boys. Four men of the water-side order—an order which differs very slightly from any other of the world to the other —were carrying, by means of straps yoked over their brawny shoulders, a kind of stretcher or bier. It was a long something about six feet high. It was entirely covered with some coarse sacking, from which, as it swayed along, water dripped pretty freely on the dusty June pavement. A moment's glance at this Something beneath the sacking was sufficient to tell you that what lay there had been human and was dead.

"A lodger at last," quoth the guardian, quietly. "I knew it was not safe to see to his toilet. Will you be one of us, mon gros? Amanda, my angel, thou wilt amuse Ma'mselle Lily until I return."

Several persons indeed have dimly tried to join the party bound for the basement, but lacking an invitation, were forced to content herself with looking in the consolation of Lily.

The task was not a very difficult one. The gift soon found that the only object whose support she had by intuition guessed. Then Amanda played and sang to her again; and, what with the wicked tune of the one and the lively prattle of her companions, she soon grew comparatively cheerful.

Not so cheerful, perhaps, as those below who were making the lodger's toilet, and whistling in their task.

It was a paradoxical toilet, for, in order to dress him, they undressed him, and left him naked. Naked as a worm, and lately a great deal more water than was good for him—the excess of fluid had indeed been a proximate cause of his demise—he was no sooner gotten into an to his bed of rest than they set more water to trickle over him. It is true that to keep the sweet they mingled some chlorid of lime with the water. He had need to be kept sweet, this lodger, for he was drowned as well as dead.

The crowd, who had been excluded from the Edifice for half an hour after the admission of the lodger with his bearers, and who had grown as impatient as any other crowd—say that waiting for admittance to the pit of a theatre—was, under similar circumstances; the crowd had at last ingress allowed it. The sight-seers poured in and saw the show. They came straggling out by twos and threes soon afterward. Their criticisms on the spectacle were various. The cook said that he must have been a fine-looking man—bel homme; the school-boys were of course delighted. One of the soldiers when he came out was sick. He said that it was the cigar which made him feel unwell. The audience were in the main correct that the dead man had been found in the Seine many hours; that he had been legitimately drowned and not murdered—moreover, standing an ugly gash on his right shoulder, which the connoisseurs averred had been done with the boat-hook with which he had been fished up; and that he was a foreigner.

Of the three well-dressed men who had followed the crowd at their leisure only one had at first entered the Edifice. It was Jean Baptiste Coconnet.

Rataplan had flatly refused to go in. He had no taste for such horrors, he said.

Franz Schirm promised to enter, on receiving a report from Constant as to the appearance of the dead. "I likes a anson gorge," said the German. "It is schrecklich schön, mit grausen; but ven he is vets and vounds, and smells bad, he makes mine stomach to vel qveer."

So J. B. Constant went in alone.

He rushed out a minute afterward with a livid face.

"Come in, both of you!" he cried. "As I live, I have found him—my old master—the child's father—M. Blunt!"

Francis Blunt, Esquire, stiff and stark, his soaked and shrivelled clothes hanging on a peg behind him, lay, indeed, on a bed of death in the Morgue of Paris.

So there is death in life, and life in death; and the daughter was alive above, while the father was dead below; and both should reck nothing of their meeting or their parting till all meet to part no more.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

LILY RUNS AWAY.

There was no other way out of it. She loved, wholly and heartily, Amanda, but there was hopeless. She felt that she must either die or go. She was too young, too pure to think of suicide. Of hard and bitter trials the poor child had surely had enough in her short and troublous career, and over and over again she had found that she was quite tired of life, and would be glad to be quit of it, for good and all, and at once. But there is a hope called hope, the which, although we pretend or imagine ourselves to be sunk in irremediable despair, is still latent in the human breast. Although the bed of the stream may be dry in the parched and arid season the mountain springs are never choked, and in time the channel is filled, and runs, and the river will rise and reach the ocean. Although she suffered the deepest woe that humanity can bear still that elasticity and rebounding power which, under heaven, might give her strength to endure anguish more than any she had yet known she had yet felt. Hope is never dead until the mind is utterly unable to suggest an alternative. Then you go mad and slay yourself.

Her passion, it became sadly evident, was known to, or at least vehemently suspected by, Madame de Kergolay. By degrees the affectionate kindness with which the good old lady was wont to her protégée changed and lowered down to a cold and ceremonious tolerance of her presence. She was addressed as "Mademoiselle," and as "you," instead of "little darling." "Is she angel," and a hundred other terms of endearment, and "thou." If she were absent for an hour or two no inquiries were made where she had been. Soon she was allowed to remain in her chamber for half a day together, untended for and unnoticed. Complete and contemptuous indifference on the part of her patroness seemed to set in. She was asked to perform no little tasks, to remove no cushions, to give her opinion on no needle-work. Her own growing proficiency in the accomplishments which had been taught her elicited no admiration from her for whose pains it had kindly looked, and, until lately, had looked alone.

One day—it was the first for a very long time —she did not see her for two hours. And when querulous tones gave her that which women, among themselves, call "a good talking to," that which lasts for half a reprimand, half an attempt to extort a confession. Madame de Kergolay made no direct accusation against Lily; but her double-edged innuendoes, denunciations of an implied ingratitude, heartlessness, and hypocrisy, were a thousand times more painful to the girl than if she had brought a specific indictment against her, and charged her with the commission of the most odious crime. She told her how mortifying it was for the aged to find their efforts on behalf of the young received by treachery and deceit. She delivered cutting apophthegms on the ease with which young persons thought they could delude and humiliate their elders; she delivered sardonic apologues as to certain vipers which had been warmed in compassionate bosoms, and how much sharper than a serpent's tooth it was to have a thankless child, even when it happened that no child in question was adopted one. And a good deal more did she expatiate on the reverence and duty due from the young to the aged, and how those who, although they might have been deprived by Providence in its wisdom of their worldly possessions, were still immeasurably and irrevocably above them.

A donjon dame during this harangue was Lily on the point of casting herself at the old lady's feet, of clinging to her dress, of embracing her, of avowing her love, of submitting to all; was rash, mad, wicked, unreciprocated, of adjuring her by the memory of all the loving-kindness she had hitherto experienced, to forgive her and to bless her, and to permit her to retire from her presence and her house, to pray for her benefactress, no longer petted and fondled by her, but still unreproved and undiscarded. This was not to be. So soon as words of admission began to quiver on Lily's lips the old lady would tell her, with freezing dignity, that she had no wish to pry into her secrets, that she doubtless knew her own affairs best, that she must be the best judge under the circumstances as to what was due to society, to those who had befriended her, and to herself; that she would not presume to offer any counsel to so high and mighty a personage as Mademoiselle, whom she had then the honor to address: and that, after all, she must know a great deal more about the world and its customs than those who were dead four times her age. "You belong to a rising and precocious generation, Mademoiselle," the ancient added, crushingly, with bitter and condescending irony; "it is a generation which has made up its mind to outrage and to insult all that persons of mature age deem worthy of preservation and respect; to a generation which has cast away tradition as trash, gratitude as a calamity, and modesty modesty to the four winds of heaven. Alles! I am not deceived. I am only a little disappointed. I have only lost another of the few and most fondly cherished illusions which remained between me and my grave."

Lily saw that in her present temper it was useless to argue with one who, rightly or wrongly, had evidently a preconceived prejudice against her, and that one of the strongest nature. In very humble and submissive accents she asked, as the very last favor, that Madame Gerolt would mention the intentions toward her as regarded the future. "I don't know much," added Lily, pitifully, "but if madame has formed a strong enough, I am ready to go out as a governess. Indeed, I am indulged in a vague reminiscence of the Pension Marcassin, and of the mission to which, according to Miss Marygold, all young girls who had the misfortune to be educated and poor were doomed.

"Ma foi," responded Madame de Kergolay, shrugging her shoulders, half in indifference, half in embarrassment, "I scarcely know. I suppose I must speak to cet abbé malencontreux that incongruous ecclesiastic who brought you here. Yes; I must speak to him; et puis on verra. As for counseling the propriety of governess at your immature age—ne vous en déplaise pas le mot—and with the crude and imperfect, if not serious, education you have already acquired, the idea strikes me as being utterly preposterous and absurd. Nor, although I do not doubt your great quickness and aptitude for learning any thing to which you choose to apply your mind, do I think you at all qualified with your previous irregular training, to instill sentiments of piety and morality into the young."

Every thing every body was conspiring against our unhappy Lily. "What, then, do you wish me to do, madame?" she continued, in a subdued tone.

"I repeat, we shall see. Something may turn up. We must think of a different career for your mind differently constituted, it might be expedient for a young and destitute person for whom generous individuals were willing to make a small dotation, to take the vows and seek the retirement of a convent; the dames of St. Vincent de Paul would be happy to receive you on any of my recommendation for a sum of three thousand francs once paid. But, to say truth, I don't should hesitate to consign to a cloister a young lady possessing so very sprightly a disposition."

"I can not be a servant," urged poor Lily, dolorously.

"Et faire la cuisine par-dessus le marché, et faire danser les dames du panier," Madame de Kergolay, with grim sarcasm, went on. "O, I have very little doubt of the variety of your talents, even for domestic service. You would make an admirable soubrette in one of M. de Marcassin's comedies—one of those subtle and bermaids who are the life and soul of an intrigue, and are not indisposed occasionally to a little flirtation with the M. Marquis."

Poor Lily began to sob as though her heart would break. She felt, in all honesty, the contempt and dislike expressed in these words, and felt that she was being treated with cruelty and injustice, but had not the courage indignantly to justify herself.

Madame de Kergolay seemed more wearied than touched by the girl's grief: "There, there," she said, waving her hand as Lily's sobs grew more passionate, "we can dispense with these misdemeanors. Mr. de Bohlen has told us all about your odies and their tears. I am too nervous, and too used to be invalided, to abide such scenes and endeavoring, but in vain, to suppress her sobs, Lily obeyed the command, and turned to go.

"You will see, if you please, nobody me again," continued the inexorable old lady, "until you are fitted for. Your presence, in spite of recent events, is productive of any thing but pleasurable sensations. M. l'Abbe and I will confer as to your future, and in the mean time will be made acquainted with our decision. Your room will be served to you in your own chamber. Justice and consideration—more than you have been willing to extend to others—will be dealt out to you. Affection and indulgence you can no longer expect. Go, misguided child!"

Lily's trembling hand was on the lock of the door, her foot was on the threshold to depart, when she heard once more the old lady's voice.

"One moment. Let me give you a word of counsel. Any little arrangements you may have made for carrying on a most culpable intrigue will have been frustrated. M. Edgar Greyfaunt has left for England."

It was the first time, in all her reproachful speeches, that she had mentioned her grandnephew's name. It was the first time that she had directly made allusion to any connection between Edgar and the cause of her anger. The hint was quite enough for Lily.

She went forth from the presence of the kind heart which had melted for her, a poor, destitute, friendless stranger, and which now seemed turned to marble. What had she done? Ah! in her heart her too deeply loved, with strong precision. She had dared to love. She had presumed to look up from her lowly station to the Parisian incarnation of her benefactress. She ought may look at the sun, but not the worm. Her up, turned gaze had been met by a withering frown. She had been stricken down and trampled under foot. It was all over now. She was discovered, detected, degraded. Madame de Kergolay regarded her as a monster of ingratitude. The abbé would but reflect his patroness's opinion. The very servants would look askance upon her. Is one proscribed and in disgrace. And Edgar? Edgar, ah misery! was gone.

There was nothing left for her but to go too. Whither she knew not. She had but a few francs in her pocket; she dared not take with her any considerable portion of her wardrobe; besides, it was supplied to her by Madame de Kergolay, and was not hers to carry off. She had no friends—none, at least, to whom she would dare to appeal in her extremity. Amanda at the Bourgeois was lost to her irrevocably. She dared not go to that dreadful place again. There was, it was true, the Pension Marcassin. She could also go there, and crave to be received. She were to be heard of no more by those who once loved her but now looked upon her with averand disfavor. She was alone, friendless, Alone.

If she could only find the Maygold! But where was she to seek for her, and what assistance could she expect from her even if she found her? No, she would go to England, she thought. It would not cost much to reach England. But no sooner was Southampton, Dover, and endeavor to find out the Bunnycastles. She would seek St. Patrick's Co.; nay, why not? Lily was in the thought that she might meet the tall gentleman who had met her at the Greenwich dinner party, and who would have been kind to her.

But what if she should fall into the hands of the strange and imperious lady who had brought her from beyond the sea? Lily had a horror of that before, and might bear it again. It could scarcely be worse than the misery she was now enduring.

To England, then. But how? She was an utterly destitute of means to defray the cost. She was to be reached as any child of five years old could be, nor did she venture to ask any one to spend her information. She knew enough of the formalities requisite to procure a passport even for inland traveling, or how much more for the coast, or get on board ship. She would ask, she thought, when she had taken to flight, and was beyond pursuit. She herself, however, did not deem it worth his while to pursue so forlorn and deserted a little maiden as she was? At all events, she would seek out Mr. Bohlen, her solitary, bey, it. Perhaps it would end in her dying of hunger and cold like the Children in the Wood; and where was the Robin Redbreast who would cover her with leaves?

Nineteen years of existence sometimes that was the sum total of her resources: the residue of Madame de Kergolay's last gift of pocketmoney. During the week she had spent she had bought those little lawn cuffs and kerchief at "Le Chat qui pelote" in the Rue St. Denis! and she was happy—happy! Oh, what a mockery! oh—ah! so cruelly—and did not dream of running away. Who her companions were in the Rue Sixteenth. She would be obliged to sell that if her money were gone. Perhaps it might have been; but never, surely, to use as a basis for running away. Well, God forgive her her naughtiness, she thought desperately. But she must sell the locket.

And why in England, since she knew that Edgar Greyfaunt had gone thither? Should not prudence, pride, that "maidenly modesty," her want of which the cruel Madame de Kergolay had taunted her with, deter her from following to a strange land the man she loved, but who could not care for her? Again sophistry came to her aid. She was not following him. England was a very large place. There was surely room enough there for two. Besides, had she not a right in England? Was she not of English birth? Had she not passed a portion of her childhood there? Might she not find Maygold in England? Friends! A fresh burst of sobs broke from her as she remembered how utterly friendless and alone she was.

All this and much more she thought of on her way to the Bunnycastles—more she had once been so happy. She had scarcely the heart to enter it again, or to open the casement and look out upon the old courtyard, and see the blue smoke wreathing upward, and listen to the jangling piano, and the voice of Jules quarreling with Seraphine's wife. She had nothing more to do with Paris. Its sights and sounds were to be henceforth estranged from her. For an hour or more she sat on the stairs outside her door, her face in her hands, her tears mingling with her thoughts, her sense of thorough loneliness and misery with both. And then she went into her chamber and cast herself on the bed, and lay there, sobbing and sobbing-till it was dark.

They brought her up some dinner in due season, but the ancient servitor, acting probably under instructions, only knocked at the door, without daring to enter, and said that her repast was served, left it there on a tray and retired. He came up again in an hour's time, found that the food had not been touched, and took the tray away again without a word.

"Let her starve herself if she chooses," the unbenevolent Jules said, in a whisper, which the ancient servant, whose heart was bleeding somewhat for Lily, misrepresented these facts to his mistress. "It is a voluntary act on her part. She is not locked in. The food was placed at her disposal, and she was duly informed of its being there."

"But suppose mademoiselle becomes ill—falls sick—has a fainting syncope, in a word—madame would be very sorry."

"Madame would be acting whatever of the kind," Jules, very retorted, sharply. "Hold your tongue. You presume upon my indulgence and the privilege of long service. Are you, too, about to turn on me—ungrateful?"

"Heaven forbid, madame."

"It would be well so. As for her starving herself, or falling ill, there is no danger of that. I tell you that it is only her temper. Mere sullenness and obstinacy. This is the way with girls of the present generation. When I was at the convent of the Visitation, the good sisters would have given me the discipline. There, let me hear no more of this ungrateful and designing serpent. She will be hungry enough tomorrow morning, I will warrant."

What dreadful crime had Lily committed that she could be called a rancorous severity a nature which she had hitherto found soft, and yielding, and tender? Alas, her sin was unpardonable: it was the sin against pride and haughtiness. Madame de Kergolay could have excused her misconduct, but she could not forgive her for being human.

Lily scarcely slept a wink that night—the last she was ever to pass in the place which had been a home, and a happy home to her. She did not undress, but lay on the bed, tossing and tumbling restlessly. She rose, so soon as it was daylight, almost in a fever. She was full of pains. Her head throbbed, her brain burned, her eyes, her ears, her wrists, her very gums, and the root of her hot tongue. She drank a cup of cold water, and bathed her face, which only seemed to render her more thirsty, and laved her hands and face in the fluid which still failed to cool her. Something floated in the glass: she was terrified to see how swollen and inflamed her eyes looked, how red were her cheeks, with a hectic spot on each bone. She wanted rest, consolation, nourishment, or bleeding, it might be, or cooling medicine. She could not. A hundred clanging voices kept shouting out to her that there was no other way but this, and that she must run away.

The wretched little woman had made up her mind to fly. With her childhood, her girlhood, her youth, she had done forever. She was a grown-up Pariah and outcast now—an adult vagabond, with desperation on the face of the earth. God help her; but there was no one else to render a hand of succor to her. She was alone in the world, and had no chance of, more or even so much as an additional shawl. She went forth in her usual walking-dress and simple morning-hat, trimmed with a few bows of ribbon her innocence—for though she was constrained to sell that locket she was innocent—to cover her.

But before she went away she knelt down and prayed fervently to God and tearfully to bless the woman—her and her household—who had had mercy upon her, a solitary and helpless child, and had provided for the good clergyman who had brought her hither, at once the cause of her great misfortune and her greater escape. And finally, she prayed to be forgiven the deed she was about to do.

Then she rose up and hastily thrust beneath the wings of her bonnet the masses of soft brown hair she had been wont to arrange each morning with such dainty neatness. Then, sitting down at the little table where, with joy and contentment, she had been used to study, she penned a few hasty lines to Madame de Kergolay. She said that she would return no more, and that it was useless to seek for her; that she was not so wicked as to meditate suicide, and that she trusted in God to watch over and protect her. She confessed that she had been foolish, that she had been ungrateful, that she had been mad, in daring to love a certain person, but with passionate disclaimers she denied having been treacherous or hypocritical. And, finally, she implored Madame de Kergolay to forgive her, and to think of her not as she was, but as she had been.

It was a gloomy summer morning, and the sun was literally pouring into the room, drenching every object with gold. Lily thought of that sunny morning she had sat on the counter at Rhododendron House, and said "I won't," to Miss Barbara Bunnycastle. Ah! how long ago that was. She was now a little child dead, though so unhappy. And now she was a woman, and unhappier than ever.

Brighter shone the sun, promising a glorious day. It was the twenty-seventh of July.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ORNITHOLOGY.—The noisy Rooks in a Rookery never perish a Sole, but are perpetually living in a Cawcus.

FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS.—In Latin it is carious that To regenerate (l.

"John," said a doting parent to her commanding son, "do you really think you can cut the whole of that building with impunity?" "I don't know, ma," replied young hopeful; "think I can with a spoon."

"JEDDY OF THE MILL."—Well, we suppose she's a spinning-jenny.

SILENCE A NEGATIVE.—Do you know why high living is recommended for the rheumatism? Because you—don't—it isn't—because you—wrong again—because—now for it—because you don't live high, if you have the rum-attic and sky-attic—eh?

A gentleman late one evening met his servant. "Hallo! where are you going at this time of night?" for no good, I'll warrant!" "I was going for you, Sir."

CONFESSORY ASSURANCE.—The Maine Law is defined by its advocates, "Liberty without License."

DEFINITION.—An Elevated Taste may be defined to be Liking for Lofty Notions.

"Why do you set your cap of coffee on the chair, Mr. Jones?" said a worthy landlady one morning at breakfast. "It is very wrong, ma'am, I thought, to put coffee on a chair."

MOTTO FOR SEMMES'S PRESENTATION SWORD.

A fluting gift to one whose merit lay
In cutting down the Cape Cod Canal.

A physician once boasted to Sir Henry Halford, saying, "I was the first to discover the Asiatic cholera, and communicate it to the public."

DEFINITION.—Stern Duty.—The Post of Helmsman.

The dark ages were a long night, with many theives and no police protection.

LIFE IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

Five days of the year we have fasting and prayer,
For the rest of the time we fight, drink and swear.

"You can't do that again," said the pig to the boy who cut off his tail.

"I'm attached to you, and yet I vith myself away," as the contented negro said to the sheriff.

It is funny to hear how the whole household and its visitors talk to the baby. A king in former times kept one fool; every baby has a dozen.

Philosophers say that shutting the eyes makes the sense of hearing more acute. Perhaps this accounts for the habit some people have of always closing their eyes in church during sermon.

Which is the most inactive plant?—The sloe.

Ink is the Black Sea on which thoughts ride at anchor.

Why is a Red Indian like a waterman?—Because he loathes his native shore.

Memory has been defined as a bundle of dried time.

"I come to steal," as the rat observed to the trap. "And I spring to embrace you," as the trap replied to the rat.

A witness, being interrogated as to his knowledge of the character of the prisoner, said he knew him intimately—"he had supped with him, sailed with him, and horsewhipped him."

"Rap! rap! rap!" "Come in," said the country woman. A rather rough-looking man appeared and crossed the door-sill. "Are you the lady of the house?" said he. "No, Sir; he'll be home in a short time though. Take a chair," said Mrs. Snow. The man selected the best chair in the house, shouldered it, and went off as a rapid rate.

If you wish to recollect a man's name go security for him. For keeping your memory fresh there is nothing like it.

"I wonder where those clouds are going?" sighed Flora, pensively, as she looked out upon the fleet, delicate finger to the heavy fleecers masses that floated lazily in the sky. "Head-quarters, I dare say, going to disband her brother, Sir."

A GENERAL ORDER.—The following was posted in his house, a few days since, by a Poughkeepsie business man: "Hereafter, when I want any thing for breakfast, I will—Love—Julia: Until the price falls, no more butter will be used in our family. Mr. Love." Mr. Love's breakfast that morning—honey, when a special messenger handed him this—"Answer: Butter is reduced. Julia." No more tobacco will be used in this house. JULIA, Chief of Staff." It is said to be excellent.

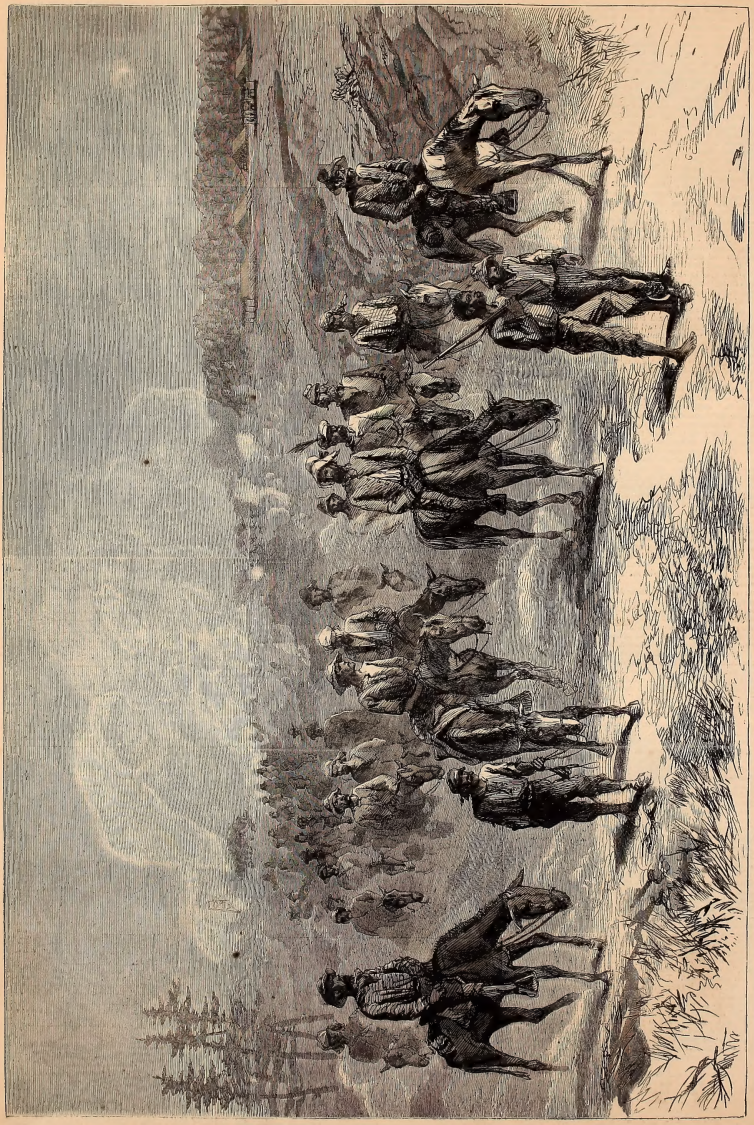
An enterprising quack has contrived to extract from sausage a powerful tonic, which he says contains the whole strength of the original hog; he calls it the "Soothing Syrup of sausage!" He anticipates a great popularity for it.

Smith asked Jones what the high price of butter was owing to. "I can't conclude any other way than that it is rich," said Jones, "for it is two months since I have paid mine."

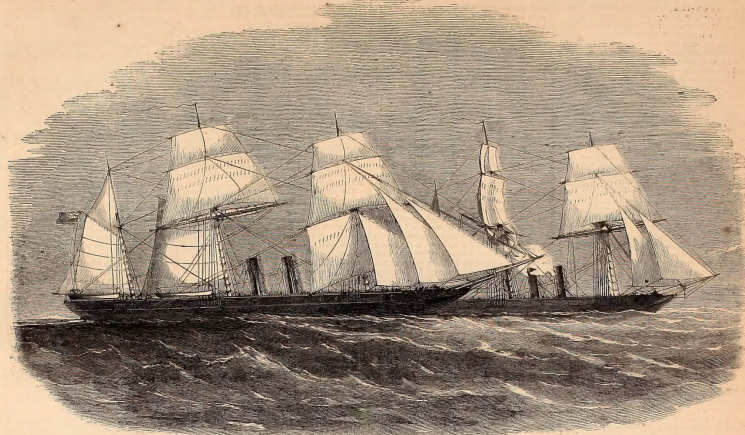
A debating society has under consideration the question —"Is it wrong to cheat a lawyer?" The result it expected to be—"No; but impartible."

How brightly do even little joys beam upon a soul darkened by the clouds of sorrow—as stars come forth from the empty sky, when we look up to them from a deep well or from colors!

A gentleman was applied to by a crossing-sweeper for charity. The gentleman replied, "I will attend you when I return." "Please your Honor," says the man, "I'm ruined by the credit I give in that way."



GENERAL GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—RETURN OF KAUTZ'S CAVALRY EXPEDITION FROM ITS RAID IN VIRGINIA.—Sketched by William Ward.—[See Page 502.]



Florida. Rappahannock.

THE ANGLO-REBEL PIRATES—THE "FLORIDA" AND "RAPPAHANNOCK."

REBEL PRIVATEERS.

THE illustrations of the Florida and the Rappahannock, which we give on this page, have now a peculiar interest from the fact that these vessels are, now that the Alabama is sunk, the only cruisers of any importance left to the Confederacy.

The Florida, which so lately made its presence off our coast known in rather a disagreeable manner, viz., by the capture of half a dozen American vessels, is a British vessel, built by LAIRD, and was launched in the spring of 1862 under the name of the Oreto. LAIRD made affidavit that the vessel was intended for the King of Sardinia. She was suspected and detained at Nassau, but being released reached Mobile. In the spring of 1863 we find her out on the seas again, capturing and burning our merchantmen. Her first and most valuable prize was the Jacob Bell, carrying 9000 chests of tea, and valued at one and a half million of dollars.

The Rappahannock is also a British ship, originally her Majesty's vessel Victor. The Admiralty permitted her after she was sold to undergo some repairs under the superintendence of the dock-yard officials. It was stated that she was intended for the China trade, and she was ostensibly fitted with that view, while her name was changed to the Scylla, of London. Several suspicious circumstances, however, occurred, and the dock-yard officials made a report to the Admiralty. The result was the receipt of an order at Sheerness directing her to be stopped. The order, however, arrived a few hours too late. Those in charge of the vessel evidently suspected the intentions of the Government, and had her taken out of the harbor. She immediately afterward hoisted the Confederate flag, and she now sails under the name of the Rappahannock. On leaving the NORE the Rappahannock sailed direct for Calais Harbor, which she entered as a Confederate privateer. She went into Calais without armament, at which port she still remains; fitting out, it may be, for a cruise.

We also give a portrait of Captain MORRIS, commanding the Florida. Her former commander was Captain MAFFIT. The portrait is from a photograph taken at Brest, for which we are indebted to a gentleman lately captured by the Florida.

THE LATE CONFEDERATE GENERAL J. E. B. STUART.

As a sequel to our portraits of General LEE and General LONGSTREET, published in recent numbers of this journal, we give on this page that of the late General J. E. B. STUART, who received his mortal wound in a cavalry skirmish with the detachment under General SHERIDAN at Ashland, in the neighborhood of Richmond, on the 11th May. This distinguished cavalry officer was born in Patrick County, Virginia, in 1835. He was educated at West Point Military Academy, where he graduated in 1854. He first entered the Mounted Rifles as Brevet Second Lieutenant, and was shortly afterward made Second Lieutenant in the First Cavalry; eight months later he was promoted to be First Lieutenant; he distinguished himself in a fight with the Cheyennes, June 29, 1857, and received a severe wound: he became a Captain in 1860, and resigned three years ago, when the civil war broke out. He then entered the Virginia State service as a Colonel of cavalry, and had the command of that arm at the first battle of Bull Run. The next month he was made a Brigadier-General in the Confederate service, and was soon promoted to be Major-General. His next performance of consequence was an excursion within the Federal lines on the Pamunky River, during M'CLELLAN'S campaign of 1862, at the head of 1000 horse and two guns. His greatest achievement was during the month of October of that year,

THE REBEL CAPTAIN C. M. MORRIS, OF THE "FLORIDA."

THE LATE REBEL GENERAL J. E. B. STUART.

when, with 1800 cavalry and four cannon, he passed from the south of the Potomac, traversed Maryland, and passing Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, at noon, entered Chambersburg after dark of the same day. The town surrendered without resistance. The troopers remained until next day, took all the spoil they desired, destroyed a great amount of property, and retreated across the Potomac on the left of General M'Clellan's army without serious loss. General STUART had headed the cavalry of the Confederate army from the outset through all its battles. After the fight at Ashland the wounded General was carried into Richmond, where he died at eight o'clock in the evening of the next day, in the house of his relative, Dr. BREWER.

The following relating to his body hours is from the Richmond Examiner: "At last, after all, it was evident to the physicians that death was setting its clammy seal upon the brave, open brow of the dying hero, and he told him so, adding if he had any last message to give. The General, with a mind perfectly clear and possessed, then made disposition of his staff and personal effects. To Mrs. LEE, the wife of General LEE, he directed that his golden spurs be given, as a dying memento of the love and esteem for her husband. To his staff officers he gave his horses. So particular was he in small things, even in the dying hour, that he said to one of his staff, who was a heavy-built man, 'You had better take the larger horse; he will carry you the best.' To his young son he left his glorious sword. His worldly matters closed, the eternal interests of his soul engaged his mind. Turning to the Rev. Mr. PETTERIS, a minister of the Episcopal Church, of which General STUART was a member, he asked him to step to prayer, and joined in it with all the voice his strength would permit. He then joined in prayer with the minister. To his family he again said, 'I am going fast now. I am resigned. God's will be done.' Thus died General J. E. B. STUART."

SPECIAL SERVICE.

"Boys, do any of you feel like volunteering on a special service of considerable risk?"

"What is it, Captain?" inquired Jackson.

"Don't know any more about it than that the General intends to send a detachment of volunteers, under the command of Lieutenant Bradford, to Tennesseean, whom you must all know pretty well by this time, on some particular mission. Bradford says he wants no man to be chartered who is prepared to face hot work. You all know what kind of a fighter he is, and what you need expect if you go with him," answered the Captain.

"I'm his man, for one!" exclaimed Jackson, jumping up with great alacrity.

Jackson was a very specimen of the genus Hoosier, and measured nearly six feet without his armyboots.

"And I'm another!" "Count me in!" "I don't want to be left out in that deal!" "Nor I won't be excited!" were some of the exclamations of the men as they sprang to their feet.

"There! hold on! The whole company can't go! He has three regiments to choose a man from," said the Captain. "Let the first ten that offered fall in and march to head-quarters."

With a similar spirit evinced throughout the regiments, Bradford had no trouble in securing more than double the number called for, and the great difficulty was, who should go and who should remain behind. Leaving him to settle this vexed question, we turn to other characters who figure in this brief drama of real life.

Dr. C——'s residence stood a few miles from Greenville, in East Tennessee. The Doctor was a native of the South, but had been educated at the North. At the time that Governor HARRIS and his co-laborers in treason endeavored to fasten Tennessee to the tail of the Secession kite, Dr. C—— was absent traveling in Asia, and was still detained abroad by sickness, and it was not publicly known which side his sympathies inclined. His neighbors, his claimed him as their own. In his absence his household was under the charge of a widowed sister and her daughter, a girl verging upon womanhood. She was a native of Tennessee, but had also been educated at the North and had brought back with her many New England ideas.

Though not a beauty, Emma H—— was a very prepossessing girl, and among her admirers and aspirants for her hand were Joseph Bradford and Richard Wharton. The latter had spent a number of years in Georgia, in the mining line, and had accumulated a few thousand dollars by his industry at the mines or at the gaming-table—probably at both. He was vain of his handsome face, and delighted in flashy parades of it in the way of dress. Among his other notions, he had a black waxed vest, adorned with buttons made of gold quartz-eagles, and a blue dress-coat with gold half-eagles for buttons, and a massive fob-chain of gold nuggets. Some persons were kind enough to attribute this to eccentricity, but in fact it was the design of a vulgar, semi-bravado mind. Wharton thought, and he considered that when arrayed in this dress, and wearing a number of rings and other trinkets, that he must strike the "poor white trash" with awe, if it did not let others know that he was a man of "distinguished consideration." He was somewhere between twenty-eight and thirty years of age, and hailed from Mississippi. He frequently made long visits to the native who lived near Dr. C——'s residence, and it was there he had met Emma. She at once struck his fancy, and hearing that she would fall heir to Dr. C——'s estate, he resolved that he would take her for a wife, but was greatly taken aback when he found that Emma would hardly treat him with ordinary politeness. This piqued him and threw him upon his mettle. He thought that he was got up fine enough to suit any girl, and all that he had to do was to ask and the girls would jump at the chance of getting so fine a fellow.

Wharton was not long in discovering that he had a rival in the person of young Bradford, who, he learned, was a favorite with Emma, and would likely carry her off some day unless he prevented it. His first idea was to pick a quarrel and then a fight with Bradford; but he soon ascertained that that would be extremely dangerous business, for Bradford had the reputation of being an extremely quiet, modest man, who endeavored as much as possible to avoid altercations, but that when pressed he was a very dangerous antagonist. This kind of a man did not suit Wharton to quarrel with. The weapon odds when he fought. If Bradford had been of a meek, yielding disposition, lacking the pluck to fight, Wharton would have picked a quarrel with him. He therefore determined that he would accomplish his purpose in some other way than by a personal quarrel.

This matters stood when the rebellion broke out, and it was with feelings of pleasure that Wharton heard that young Bradford adhered to the cause of the Union. He soon left for Mississippi, where, by dint of his money and energy, he succeeded in placing himself at the head of as villainous a set of desperadoes as ever went unhung, by holding out special promises of pay. He called them Partisan Rangers, organized to defend the altars of Southern homes from the polluting tread of Yankee feet. When this band was performing the dirty work of the Secession magnates in Mississippi it was at once offered to the service of any who would join the ranks to meet his Northern enemy in battle-array revolted—Wharton started for Tennessee to carry out his same programme of extermination: to all who refused to join the rebel cause.

When Wharton reached East Tennessee he determined to establish a character in this same night reach Emma before he called to renew his addresses. But upon the old call she received him with contempt. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered my vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by Wharton's desperadoes.

The mission which Bradford had sought was to destroy this ruffian band, and succor refugees in the special mission of which the men to join the Union lines. He escorted those whom he had found to a point where the women and children would be cared for—the men accepted the privilege of joining his command. From them he gained much needed information, and matured his plans accordingly.

It would be needless, for the purpose of this sketch, to trace Wharton and his partisans in all their outrageous career upon almost defenseless people. He took care, in the regions which he passed through, to avoid a conflict with Union troops, if possible, unless he could secretly equal with his own—he still wanted odds in his favor when he fought. His mission was to seek out and kill all the rebel bands within reach. This so stirred up the devil within him that when he left Dr. C——'s residence he repaired to the camp of his band, and gave the order for a demonstration upon the Bradford farm, and for his men to help themselves.

It was toward dusk when his gang reached the Bradford homestead, and one of the desperadoes ruthlessly fired and killed Mrs. Bradford as he was sitting on the porch. Others seized an elder brother of Joseph Bradford, and, despite the entreaties of his mother and children, hung him up to a tree in front of the house—a tree that his father had planted on the day of his birth.

"They were enemies of his country, and deserved all they got!" was the brutal reply of Wharton to the entreaties of the mother to cut down her son before he had become strangled.

The men having a carte blanche to plunder, spread themselves about the premises. The women and children fled in terror to escape enormities which they had reason to suppose would be inflicted if they remained. When the men had appeased their thirst for plunder, the incendiary torch was applied to finish the job.

The next morning Joseph Bradford returned home, after a short absence, to behold the old homestead in ashes, smoking ruins, over some which was the charred remains of a much-loved father, while not for distant was the inanimate body of a fond beloved brother suspended from a tree.

For a while his feelings utterly overcame him, and he was aroused from a sort of half stupor by a neighbor who had, with several others, cautiously approached to inter the bodies. They approached cautiously, for they well knew that if any of Wharton's gang discovered them they would soon share the same fate. Among the number was a venerable clergyman, who had been a prominent divine in the South because it was known that his son had gone off to join the Union army, and he had sought refuge in this locality in the mountains. He had at once read the burial-service in a feeble voice, and then offered up a simple but touching prayer, and the remains were consigned to the earth with all due rites.

After this sacred rite was performed Bradford sought his mother. He found her, with the other members of the family, at Dr. C——'s, and Emma and her mother endeavoring to console them. His interview with them was brief, and their parting trying.

"Mother, I can not stay! I have registered a vow in Heaven, often and often, to avenge my father and brother, that I would never rest so long as traitor's foot polluted the soil of Tennessee! Emma, I can not thank you now—sometime I will. Be kind to them. Farewell!"

With which he mounted his horse and rode off.

Reader, were you ever in the mountains at night? Not on a clear, balmy night, when the air is fragrant with the choicest incense ever offered up, but a night when the flood-gates of heaven are open, and the thunder leaps from peak to peak, with the wind howling and whistling as it sweeps down the fierce, striking terror to all living things, driving man as well as beast to seek shelter from the fury of the elements: when the Great Bear above follows the example of the lesser bears below, and seeks shelter in a friendly cloud, or does not care to venture to the North Star are visible? Were you ever in the mountains on such a night?—a night when darkness was upon the face of Heaven, and each cloud hovering over your footsteps was enshrouding those whom you had met in the most dangerous pass for safety, depending upon your strong right arm and valiant heart to shield them from human hellhounds, who had thirsted for their blood before, and were on their track thirsting for your blood because you would not hunt under the same leash? Then you have not! Then you have not yet to be a Unionist of East Tennessee, nor the price those men have paid for refusing to bow down to Gesler's cap stuck upon a pole in the market-place. Talk not to those men of compromise, or "peace at any price," with the besotted wretches who have wantonly driven them from happy homes—thrust the torch of the incendiary under the roof-tree of the old homestead, and left their helpless families to the mercy of the elements, until justice has been measured out to the guilty by the hand of God.

It was on such wild night as this that a group of men, women, and children were cowering beneath a cleft in the rocks to shield themselves, as much as possible, from the fury of the storm, which they had chosen to encounter rather than intrust themselves to the mercy of their own race.

When the storm had spent its fury, some leaves and brush were gathered from a nook that had protected them from the water, and a fire was kindled to dry the garments of the women and children.

The fire had not been burning much over an hour before they were surrounded by a body of soldiers. The smoke had betrayed their hiding-place.

The poor hunted fugitives now gave themselves up for lost; their number was too small to think of offering any resistance, which, if offered, would only aggravate the cruelty that would be practiced toward the women and children. However, their fears were groundless. In fact, instead of enemies, the soldiers proved to be friends, under the command of Bradford, who recognized among them two of the neighbors who had assisted at his father's burial. They had been driven from their homes by W

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A CARD.—Owing to the enormous advance in the prices not only of the precious metals, but of every other commodity, I find it impossible to continue longer the sale of my Pens at old rates. This I regret exceedingly, as I had hoped to continue without change to all having to buy gold at the present fabulous prices, this is no longer possible.

My friends and the public will give me credit, however, for having struggled long and hard against the universal pressure to depreciate the Government credit and currency. The advance made is not extravagant, as pens sold with gold at present rates; should it remain where it is, or go still higher, a further rise in prices must be made. In any case, however, I intend, as heretofore, to sell a better article for less money than it can be bought for elsewhere.

A Circular, with engravings of all the sizes, styles, and present prices, will be sent on receipt of letter postage.

Address A. MORTON,
July 11, 1864. No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

Two Dollars made from twenty cts. Call and ex., inquire, or ten samples sent free by mail for 25c. Retails for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 19 Chambers, N. Y.

SEWING MACHINE AND HAND NEEDLES.
ALL KINDS at BARTLETT'S, 462 Broadway, N. Y.

Fancy Pigeons
for sale.
All of the choicest varieties, imported from best origin strains. Send for list to
W. C. ASBURY,
Post Office Box 6258,
New York City.

DR. R. GOODALE'S CATARRH REMEDY.
THE ACME OF PERFECTION.
IT CURES CATARRH in all its TYPES and STAGES with absolute certainty. Pamphlet with Testimonials, &c., sent free. GOODALE & CO., Sole Agents, 75 Bleecker Street, one door W. of Broadway, N. Y. Sold by Druggists.

LADIES' LETTER.
[FIVE ADDITIONAL ENGRAVINGS.
The literature never before published.
Sent free, in a sealed envelope for 10 cents.
Address Box 4652. New York Post-Office.

Printing-Press for Sale.
One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 29x21. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Shults' Ongrent. warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Attention Company!
Clark's Conguest, a powerful stimulant. Each packet warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustaches in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without injury to the skin. Any person using this Conguest and finding it not as represented, after a fair trial of six weeks, can have their money refunded them in all cases within a month from day of purchase, Price $1.00. Sent sealed and post-paid, to any address, on receipt of P. O. order.
Address A. C. CLARK,
P. O. Box 117,
Albany, N. Y.

WANTED, IN EVERY TOWN, COUNTY, STATE, TERRITORY, AND PROVINCE, Subscription Agents to sell popular Books, Light Works. Small capital, liberal profits, quick returns. Particulars by return post on receipt of stamp. D. W. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Ballance, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS? If so, send 25 cents (stamps will serve them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) with full directions, or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Duryea's Maizena
RECEIVED TWO PRIZE MEDALS
(From Juries 2 and 3 of the
International Exhibition,
LONDON, 1862,
AT THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION
AT HAMBURG, JUNE, 1863, BROUGHT THE HIGHEST PRIZE MEDAL FOR ITS GREAT
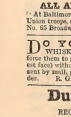
DELICACY AS AN ARTICLE OF FOOD.
Can be served up in an infinite variety of delicious dishes. Sold by all Grocers, with directions. Pamphlet, with receipts, will be furnished on application by mail or otherwise, to
WM. DURYEA, Agent, 166 Fulton St., N. Y.

$100 per Month.—Active and reliable Agents in the Army, and everywhere else, in this most lucrative business known. Honorable and no risk. Address or apply to T. & H. GAUGHAN, 176 Broadway, New York.

BARD & BROTHER'S (Established 1845)
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES. Also Manufacturer of BARD & BURDETT'S PATENT ANGULAR NIB GOLD PENS. JAS. D. BARD, Act'g., No. 22 Maiden Lane, N. Y. Gold Pens Repaired or Exchanged.



LEAF OF THE SWEET GUM.
THE SAFEST and most certain remedy for COUGHS, COLDS, SORE THROAT, and BRONCHIAL DISEASES, is the Juice of the Sweet Gum Tree. It is highly recommended, but to prevent fraud, buy an ounce of all agts. A few bottles should be in every package sent to the Army.
Prepared by the Union Medicine Co., New York. For sale by druggists, and by all druggists. FACE FREE Cards.

J. H. Winslow & Co.
THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED
TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GEM'S PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,
Worth $500,000,
To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get.
Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars; also terms to Agents, which are liberal. Address Exchange and Town in the Country.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

50,000 Agents Wanted.
S. M. WARD & CO.,
208 Broadway, N. Y.
100,000 Watches, Chains, Lockets, Gold Pens and Pencils, Rings, Pins, &c., to be sold for $1 each, without regard to choice, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get, and not to be kept unless you are perfectly satisfied. One certificate, telling you what you can have will be sent for 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; and one for $5. Also Head-Quarters for Army Badges. We will send as sample, on the receipt of $1, together with the above, a beautiful enamel, circular, gilt edge, Shield (spare coin), or the 1st, 2d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, or 9th Army Corps Badge, with pin, and Lieut. Col., Major, or C., handsomely engraved thereon; or for $2 25, we will send either a New Artillery or Battery Pin, Engineer, Cavalry, Pontonier, or the 4th, 9th, 10th, 14th, 18th, 19th, or 24d Army Corps Pin.

DYSPEPSIA
and Costiveness Cured.
D. J. VENN'S CASE.—New York Mentor, January 14, 1860.—Whether the Brandreth Pill is ever convertible into boats, or not we know not. Certain it is that we have at this time to give a statement of a gentleman who says he has taken one of the Brandreth Pills, for at least fourteen months, daily, or about 300 days in succession, and who says that at the end of that time he considered himself cured of Dyspepsia, attended by a constant costive state of the bowels, which had troubled him for a long time.

This gentleman, Mr. Daniel J. Venny, resides at the Astor House, in this city, and has been in the enjoyment of excellent health ever since he made use of the Brandreth Pill. He is an intelligent man, and there is no doubt of the truth of his statement. This proves, at least, that the many so-called Pills proposed by Dr. Brandreth can be taken for nearly 300 days in succession without harm, and at the end of that time a dyspeptic and costive habit of body may be perfectly cured. This could not be said of any of the catharties in use by those who style themselves the Regular Faculty.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See also B. BRANDRETH in white letters.
PRINCIPAL OFFICE, BRANDRETH BUILDING,
294 Canal Street, N. Y.
For sale by all respectable dealers in medicines.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW
A little of every thing relating to the human system, diet, air, marriage, &c., &c., read revised and enlarged edition of
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.
Among the many subjects treated in this work are the following: Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Scrofula, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Piles, Liver, and Philosophy of Digestion, Constipation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, Diseases of the Female Organs of Generation, Impotence, Impediments to Marriage, Nervousness, Sore Throat, Cancer, Paralysis, Diseases of the Head, Neuralgia, Hints to Bearers of Children, and Nurse Keeping, Marriage and Social Philosophy, the Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment of Abortion, and of Elopements, Management of Children, a Chapter for Every Woman, and thousand of wives married and single, more than 300 pages, making altogether a large book for curious people, and a good book for every one; 100 pages. 100 Illustrations. To be had of all News Agents. Contents tables sent free by mail to all applicants, or the book, enveloped in wrapper, will be sent, on receipt of $1 50. Address R. B. FOOTE, M.D., 130 Broadway, New York.

Portable Printing Offices.
For this Army and Navy Hospitals, Steamboats, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Send stamp for Specimens of Type, Cuts, Press, &c., to ADAMS PRESS CO., No. 98 Beekman, N. Y., and 85 Lincoln St., Boston.

$60 A MONTH! I want Agents at $60 a month, and expenses paid, to sell my Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 12 other new articles. Particulars sent free. Address JOHN F. LORD, Biddeford, Maine.

Companion Medals of Lincoln and Fremont. Price 25 cts. Sent by mail, free of postage. Agents wanted. Address Fowler & Co., Box 19, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

* * * THE * * *
PRESCRIPTION, which was employed with such signal success at the Vencuelan Mission Hospital for the medical treatment of Consumption (in any of its stages), Asthma, Bronchitis and Catarrh, distinguishes it as the Nervous System and diseases of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, will be sent to Physicians, Clergymen, and Invalids, with full directions for preparation and use. Free of Cost. Address, with stamp,
REV. CHARLES E. KING,
Station D, Bible House, N. Y.
The mild seasons are most favorable for treatment.

CRISTADORO'S

Caution
FROM
The American Watch Company.
In having come to our knowledge this imitations of the American Watch have been put upon the market in great numbers, calculated, by their utter worthlessness, to injure the reputation of our genuine products—to protect our own interests and the public from imposition, we again publish the trade-marks by which our Watches may invariably be known.
We manufacture four styles of Watches:
The FIRST has the name
"AMERICAN WATCH CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.
The SECOND has the same
"APLETON, TRACY & CO., Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.
The THIRD has the name,
"P. S. BARTLETT, Waltham, Mass.," engraved on the inside plate.
All the above styles have the name "American Watch Co., painted on the dial, and are warranted in every respect.
The FOURTH has the name
"WM. ELLERY, Waltham, Mass." engraved on the inside plate, and is not named on the dial.
All the above described watches are made of various sizes, and are sold in gold or silver cases, as may be required.
It is hardly possible for us to accurately describe the numerous imitations by which we have been defied. They are usually inscribed with names so nearly approaching our own as to escape the observation of the unaccustomed buyer. Some are represented as made by the "UNION WATCH Co., of Boston, Mass."—no such company existing. Some are named the "SOLDIER'S WATCH;" others are named the "APPLETON WATCH CO." others the "P. S. BARTLEY," instead of our P. S. BARTLETT. Another imitation is made in quite a manner as to convey the idea that they are the verticale productions of the American Watch Company.
We caution buyers from the part of buyers will protect them from gross imposition.
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents for the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N.Y.

Carrington & Co.'s
General
Purchasing Agency,
In Connection with all the Expresses,
No. 40 Broadway, New York.
(Established 1854.)
Purchases to order ANY article wanted from New York (or from Europe), for ladies' or gentlemen's
Use or Wear, Comfort or Luxury,
From a cameo to a cashmere, a sealing to a steam-engine.
Goods purchased at current city prices, and forwarded by Express, on sight draft.
Commission, Five per Cent.
Remittances, with orders, can be made by Express if preferred, as all Express Agents will take orders, receipt for and forward funds, and see to return of goods.

Special Circular.
The Adams Express Company, appreciating the need of a capable medium connecting with the various Express Lines, Cotton Agents, Bankers, and other parties far away from the city, can be satisfactorily supplied do recognize CARRINGTON & CO.'S GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY as such medium for filling orders for every description of goods wanted in New York, and consigned it to the attention of the public, and of our general and local agents, recommending our agents to extend to it due reasonable aid, by facilitating the distribution of its cards and circulars, and otherwise favoring the advancement it affords.
ADAMS EXPRESS CO., W. B. DINSMORE, Pres't.
NEW YORK, June, 1864.

We cheerfully concur in the above recommendation of the Adams Express Co.
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO., HENRY WELLS, Pres't.
U. S. EXPRESS CO., D. N. BARNEY, Pres't.
WELLS, FARGO & CO.,
NATIONAL EXPRESS CO., J. A. PETLEN.
HARNDEN EXPRESS CO., W. WINCHESTER, Supt.
KINSLEY & CO.'S EXPRESS, E. LEFFINGWELL, Supt.
HOPE EXPRESS CO., A. D. HOPE, Supt.
BREESE & CO.'S EXPRESS, BREESE BREESE, Supt.
N. J. EXPRESS CO., GEORGE E. DENN, Supt.

BARNARD'S REVIEW OF McCLELLAN'S REPORT,
And its endorsement as developed by the REPORT OF MAJ.-GEN. GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, and other published documents. By J. G. BARNARD, Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers and Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and Chief Engineer of the Army of the Potomac from its organization to the close of the Peninsular campaign. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. Price $2.
Published by D. VAN NOSTRAND,
No. 192 Broadway.
Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

"Signs of Character,"
PHYSIOGNOMY, ETHNOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND PSYCHOLOGY; Portraits of Remarkable Men; Good and Bad, High and Low; The Human Voice, male and female; Climate, as affecting character; North and South; Marriage; Union of Opposites; Short Courtships; Coming to One's Self; Dreams; Sensation when Dying; Phiper Children; Thieves Photographed; together with much other interesting and instructive matter.—Illustrated in the AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents by first post. Newsmen have it.
FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

The Improved Ridgewood Smoking-Case.
For the Army, Navy, Travellers, and all Smokers.
PRICES.
$2 00, $3 00, $3 50, $3 75, $4 00, $5 00.
The two latter, richly silver-plated and engraved, sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price and 25 cents.
Send for circular.
Ridgewood Manufacturing Company, 409 Broadway, New York.

The Graefenberg Company's
IUTERINE CATHOLICON (Marshall's),
An infallible remedy for Female Weakness, and all Uterine complaints of women.
Price $2, or per bottle. Five bottles for $10 Guaranteed.
Also, the GRAEFENBERG VEGETABLE PILLS.
The best pill combination ever offered to family use, and for all Bilious and Liver complaints. Price 25 cts. per box.
Address all orders to the GRAEFENBERG AGENCY,
No. 139 William Street, near Fulton, New York.
☞ INQUIRE OF DEALERS EVERYWHERE. ☜

A Nice Cologne.
LADIES should try Burnett's: it is said to be the no plus ultra. One test is sufficient.

The New Books of the Season,
Published by
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ Sent by Mail, Postage prepaid, on receipt of Price.

1.
READE'S SAVAGE AFRICA. Western Africa: being the Narrative of a Tour in Soudanee, Southwards, and Northwestern Africa; with Notes on the Habits of the Gorilla, on the Existence of Unicorns, on Twins and Men; on the Slave Trade; on the Origin, Character, and Capabilities of the Negro, and of the future Civilization of Western Africa. By W. WINWOOD READE. With Illustrations and a Map. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

2.
MAURICE DERING; or, The Quadrilateral. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.
THE RELIGIOUS TRAINING OF CHILDREN in the Family, the School, and the Church. By CATHARINE E. BEECHER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

4.
CAPTAIN BRAND, OF THE "CENTIPEDE." A Pirate of Eminence in the West Indies: his Loves and Exploits, together with some Account of the singular Manner by which he departed this Life. By HENRY GREENE GAYLE. 8vo, Cloth, $1 25. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

5.
HISTORY OF FREDERICH II., called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE. Vol. IV., with Portrait, Maps, Plans, &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

6.
THE LADDER OF LIFE. A Heart History. By ANELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; or, Sabbath Readings. A Series of Discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By Rev. CHARLES OSGOOD, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in the City of New York. Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

8.
DENIS DUVAL. A Novel. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "Virginians," "Four Georges," "Roundabout Papers," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.
GUIDE-BOOK OF THE CENTRAL RAILROAD OF NEW JERSEY, and its Connections with the Coal Fields of Pennsylvania. 12mo, Flexible Cloth, 75 cents.

10.
COUSIN PHILLIS. A Tale. By MRS. GASKELL. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

11.
NINETEEN BEAUTIFUL YEARS; OR, SKETCHES OF A GIRL'S LIFE. Written for Young Ladies. With an Introduction by REV. R. S. FOSTER, D.D. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

12.
BARBARA'S HISTORY. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "The Ladder of Life," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

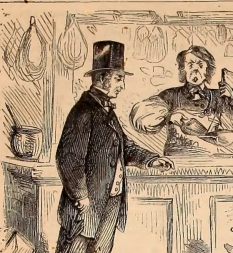
13.
SPEKE'S AFRICA. JOURNAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE. By Captain JOHN HANNING SPEKE. With Maps and Portraits, and numerous Illustrations, chiefly from Drawings by Captain GRANT. 8vo, Cloth, uniform with LIVINGSTONE. BARTH, BURTON, &c. Price $4 00.

14.
THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Rachel Ray," "Doctor Thorne," "Castle Richmond," "Orley Farmhouse," "The Three Clerks," "Barchester Towers," "The Warden," "Framley Parsonage," "Lewis Arundel," "The Struggles of Brown, Jones, and Robinson," &c. Illustrated by MILLAIS. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For August, 1864, Now Ready.
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TWO SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Four Months 1 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed to every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20 00.
Terms to Advertisers.—One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for outside Advertisements each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.



THE REASON WHY.

CUSTOMER. "Your Papa says he hain't no Pennies to make change with. You seem to have lots of 'em."

GROCER'S SON. "Guess! I have; and Pop's got six barrels full down cellar. He's waitin' for 'em to rise."—(You should have seen the EXPRESSION of POP'S FACE.)

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

625 Broadway, New 425 Bleecker St., N.Y.

Wholesale and Retail. Piper cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular, or $5 for sample pair.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome St.

IMPORTERS OF FINE CHINA, WEDGEWOOD, PARIAN, &c., &c. ENGRAVED GLASS to order in great variety. COLORED BRIDE CAKES DURING MARCH.

The Exquisite Toilet Articles of the

SOCIETE HYGIENIQUE OF N. Y.

Send for a prospectus as below.

VINAIGRE DE TOILETTE, SOUVERAIN COSMETIC, Restorative and Sanitary, $1 25 and 65 cts. per bottle. JAVOLINE, FOR THE HAIR, ELEGANT, CHEMICAL, but not a hair restorative, $1 and 50 cts. per bottle. HUILE PHILOCOME, THE DELIGHTFUL OIL TO-DU. MOLLIS PHILOCOME, THE EXQUISITE POMADE, 75 cts. One stick will fill up the dozen. If your druggist has not these articles, take no other, but remit with your order to VICTOR E. MAUGER, 15 Chambers St., N. Y., sole agent for the Society, and you will receive carefully packed.

GOOD STORIES

always form a part of the contents of the

Atlantic Monthly

They are supplied by such writers as Harriet Prescott, J. T. Trowbridge, Caroline Chesebro, Bayard Taylor, Rose Terry, and other contributors of eminent ability. Some of THE BEST STORIES in the language have been written for and published in the ATLANTIC MONTHLY. ☞ Subscriptions may begin with any number. ☜

TERMS. $3 00 a year, 30 cents a number. Clubs at a liberal reduction. Address the publishers,

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

Don't buy your Gaiters

or Shoes without Fogg's

Patent Lever Buckle.

They are self-adjusting, and require no holes punched in the strap. Dealers or manufacturers can enclose Ten Cents Currency, and we will mail sample of two patterns.

FREDERICK SPRING,

215 Pearl Street, New York,

and

63 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.

Vineland Lands. To all Wanting Farms.

Large and farming settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, producing large crops, which can now be sold at a big. Tea, tweety, and fifty acre tracts at from $20 to $35 per acre payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most promising place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters advanced. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From the Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune: "It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

CARPET WARP.

Twines and Paper. M. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

A SWEET AND

PERFUMED BREATH

What lady or gentleman would remain under the curse of a disagreeable breath, when, by using the

BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS,

it would be cured? How many lovers it has separated!!! How many friends forever parted! THE SPEAKER is so DELIGHTFUL your honest friend will not mention it; and you are yourself ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the Balm as a tooth-wash night and morning.

For bathing suffering infants, a few drops poured into a basin of water will dispel all fever, fetter, &c.

When used for washing night and morning, it eradicates all Tan, Pimples, and Freckles, rendering the skin soft and white, and free from blemish.

Price 75 Cents. For sale by all Druggists.

Kendall's Amboline

For the Hair.

Will surely prevent hair pulling out. The best Hair Dressing in the market. For sale by all Druggists.

Prepared only by

WARING & CO.,

59 Dey Street, New York.

A FRIEND, writing from the Glen House says: As soon as our party arrived, I went to engage horses for the recent next morning. Every horse fit for duty was engaged. Two of their best had just been shod 10, unless, and the other assured me that it would be impossible to bring out one of the sick ones fit for duty next morning. After taking a look at them, I went to my trunk and brought out my big bottle of Perry's Balm, gave the ostler a few and directions for drenching and rubbing, and the next day we rode both the animals—three of the six horses all in condition to do duty next day. So much for the PAIN KILLER.

Good News for the Army.

Therefore we will send, post-paid, any of our PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS received by soldiers for themselves or friends, giving an Album of the full value of the money.

Our Albums have the reputation of being superior to all others in beauty and durability, and range in prices from 50 cts. to $50.

Our catalogue of

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS

now embraces about 5000 officers, army and navy, statesmen, actors, copies of works of art, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.

Our assortment of these is very extensive, including a great variety of views of the present war.

Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 Broadway, New York.

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials.

Kerosene Glue Pot.

We are glad to present the public with a new MONEY-SAVING article,

Simple in Construction,

as easily managed as an ordinary lamp used for lighting purposes. In fact, so simply a common lamp chimney can supply the principle of heating over and around the flame as secured to us by letters Patents, issued by the United States, and known as

FISH'S PATENT.

With this simple apparatus, Glue may be kept hot all day, and not consume

5 Cents Worth of Oil.

To mechanics and artisans who are compelled to use alcohol at present high prices, this article will save its cost in ONE WEEK. Also Fish's Patent Cooking Lamp and Nursery, or Night Lamp.

Send for a circular and pamphlet to the Kerosene Lamp Heater Co., 204 Pearl Street, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $7

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cut, Jewelled Movement, stem wind, and hands, "English Movements," and correct time-keeper.

A single one sent for $7, or half in hand cash, WITH A BEAUTIFUL CHAIN, for only $8.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, for only $7.

Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Importers, 88 & 40 Ann Street, New York.

VERMILYE & CO.,

No. 44 Wall Street, New York.

Bankers and Dealers in all kinds of Government Stocks.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes,

converted into 6 per cent. Bonds of 1881.

The Bonds of New 10-40 Loan on hand for immediate delivery.

PRESIDENTIAL

Campaign Medals.

Of every description now ready in Tin and Metal. Trade orders solicited and promptly filled at Factory prices. Wholesale Dept Campaign Medal Co., 416 Broadway, N.Y.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Weight only Four Pounds.

A fit guaranteed. It makes no noise. It does not get out of order. The measure can be sent, and the leg returned by express. If you are not satisfied after six months' trial, I will return the Money and make no charge.

Price $75 to $100. Send for a circular.

Office and Manufactory, 91 Broadway, New York.

J. W. WESTON.

E. WESTON, 91 West 4th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

AGENTS WANTED —$50 per month guaranteed. A For terms and specimens, address, with stamp, L. L. TODD & CO., New York.

A Word to our Fair Readers.—Health the basis of Beauty.—Pimples, blotches, and all skin diseases.—A clear complexion is not only essential to female loveliness, but it is equally an external evidence of health—while unhealthiness, and all cutaneous eruptions are indicative of a disturbed condition of the stomach and liver. Upon these organs the famous aperient and tonic known as Holloway's Pills, act with a directness, precision, and rapidity unparalleled in Medical Science, while the Ointment purges the vesicles of the skin, and imparts a brilliancy and roseate tint to that delicate envelope. All who value health and beauty should beware of tampering with medicine, as they are not only pernicious but highly dangerous to health.

* * Sold at the manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York.

Wm. Knabe & Co.,

Manufacturers of

GOLD MEDAL

Grand and Square Pianos,

Baltimore, Md.

Certificates of excellence from

Thalberg, Gottschalk, Strakosch, G. Satter, and other leading artists.

Every Instrument warranted for FIVE YEARS.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion, N. Y.

BRIDGEWATER PAINT

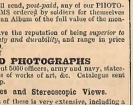
DRY AND GROUND IN OIL

in several flesh shades.

For English and Rustic Cottages, Outbuildings, &c.

ROBERT REYNOLDS, Agent, No. 74 Maiden Lane.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER



Ex Cartridge.

Is the latest improvement in Fire-Arms, combining great power and effectiveness, with compactness, durability, and convenience, both for operating and carrying. Is the most effective PUCKET REVOLVER in the world.

Is loaded, without removing the cylinder, with CENTRAL FIRE WATER PROOF COPPER RIM-FIRE CARTRIDGES the same as the small cavalry pistol rifle firing. The cylinder never fails. Is but 7 inches in extreme length. 32-100th ball, six shot, and weighs but 14 ounces. For sale by the trade.

GEO. A. HICKOX, 64 Cliff Street, New York.

U. S. Army Agency,

64 Bleecker Street, N. Y., opposite Pay Department.

All persons having claims against the Government should present them at this office for adjustment and payment.

Bounty of $100 00, in the following cases are now being paid.

SOLDIERS DISCHARGED on account of wounds received in battle.

VOLUNTEERS or REGULARS DISCHARGED after having served 2 years. Bounty prompt. Discharge can be sent by mail.

$15 Per Day, $15

Made easy by every Agent who sells our Great New and Wonderful Extra Large Size Stationery and Prize Packages. 925 CASH IN HAND in a few hours by smart agents. Greatest money-making business of the age. Each Package contains large quantities of fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencils, Blotters, Emblems, Ladies' Paris Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Bouquets, Household Companions, Parlor Ornaments, Gems for Album Writers, Many Ways to Get Rich, Gentlemen's Pocket Calendars for the Year, Union Designs, Language of Flowers, Games, Riddles, Recipes, Engravings, Rich and Costly Presents, and Embroidery, Jewelry, etc., etc., etc. Agents guaranteed $15 per day. A Handsome Gold Hunting or Silver Hunting Case WATCH (warranted) presented free to each Agent. Send for a great new circular for 1864 containing extra premium inducements, free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 162 Nassau Street, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS,

Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet. Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.

31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris.

Sands St., Birmingham, Eng.

WARDS SHIRTS

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars sent free everywhere.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travellers they are invaluable.

Price 75 cts. each; sent by post to any part of the Union on receipt of 80 cents.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.

Magnifying small objects 500 times. Sent free everywhere for 50 CENTS, OR THREE FOR $1 00.

Address C. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

1864 Presidential 1864

Campaign

MEDALS.

Manufactured and for sale by E. N. Foote & Co., 205 Broadway, N. Y. Agents wanted in every town and city.

STAMMERING

Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address H. C. G. BATES & CO., 377 W. 23d St., N. Y.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT

Hardens and invigorates the Gums.

Purifies and Sweetens the breath. Cleanses, Beautifies, and Preserves the Teeth.

Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Price 75 cents per bottle.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors,

218 Greenwich St., New York.

U. S. Gov. Electricity Lab Depots,

659 Broadway, N. Y., Rochester, N. Y., Chicago, Ill., DOWLING, O. and St. Louis, Mo., where the Government furnishes the U. S. Army and Navy Log in Soldiers pattern, at a value applied on the Anatomical Boil and Socket-Jointed Leg, which has been adopted by and like the natural one. BOYD.

DETAILS SAY, M.D., U. S. Commissioner.

For instructions address Dr. Day, at above Depot.

Gray's Patent Molded Collars

The only collars shaped to fit the neck with a perfect curve, free from angles or breaks. The turn-over style is now only COMING into wear having the pointed space for the cravat, rendering the necktie neat and set perfectly smooth and free from wrinkles. Every collar is cut or turn—down collars as chafe and irritate the neck. Every COLLAR is stamped "GRAY'S PATENT MOLDED COLLAR." Sold by all retail dealers in men's furnishing goods. The trade supplied by

HATCH, JOHNSON & CO., 91 Devonshire St. Boston.

J. S. Lovey & Co., 57 Warren St., New York: Van Deusen, Dockner & Co., 637 Chestnut St., Phila.; Hodges Bros., 33 Hanover St., Baltimore; Wm. Hall & Son, 203 Pennsylvania Av., Washn.; Leavitt & Berth, 65 Main St., Cincinnati; Hawkins, Dodd & Co., 164 Main St., Louisville; Frankforter & Bro., 64 Main St., St. Louis; Bradford Bros., Milwaukee; Wood, Whittier & Co., 7 to 15 Tehoupitoulas St., N. O.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VIII.—No. 398.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1864. [$1.00 FOR FOUR MONTHS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GENERAL HOOKER RIDING ALONG HIS LINES ON THE MORNING OF JULY 21, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 525.]

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL JAMES B. M'PHERSON.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.—[SEE PAGE 517.]

MAJOR-GENERAL OLIVER O. HOWARD.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.—[SEE PAGE 513.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1864.

THE ARCH REBEL.

THE most specious argument of the enemies of American nationality and progress is, that as Slavery is a State institution the nation has no right to meddle with it; or as one of them lately expresses it: "If they [the Slave States] abolished Slavery, well; if not, the right of secession [by which phrase the Constitution of the United States is described] did not make us any more responsible in the eye of Heaven for Slavery in Virginia than our commercial treaties with Brazil do for its existence there."

This view of the Union as a Confederacy, and of the Constitution as a treaty, we do not here discuss. But the entire and willful fallacy of the implication concerning national interference with Slavery is very easily exposed. The whole truth lies in this nutshell, that when Slavery found it could not be nationalized it tried to destroy the nation. It was always grafting, as its lackeys are now, that it was a State institution. But it was constantly appealing to Congress for protection and countenance, and when the people of the country said to it: "Stay at home, then, where you say you belong," it hissed defiance and sprang to arms. For it would not and could not stay at home. Slavery as a mere State institution was doomed, and therefore it insisted upon nationality. These facts can be readily recalled, and in recalling them it will appear that it was not until the State system of Slavery destroyed the peace and struck at the life of the Union as shown by the people of the country determined, as they unquestionably have, that Slavery shall die the death.

We say that it was not content to be a State institution. If it had been it would have been untouched by all but moral influences. But it would pash into the common territories without the national permission, as in Kansas for which purpose the Missouri Compromise was repealed upon the motion of a Northern man, indeed, but to secure Southern support. It would rob the national mails, as it was authorized to do by ANDREW JACKSON, the political sponsor of General M'CLELLAN. It would shape the national policy, as Mr. CALHOUN confessed at the time of annexing Texas; and as became evident in the Ostend Manifesto, in which Messrs. BUCHANAN, SOULE, and MASON announced that we would steal what we could not buy. It would control the national rights of citizens of the United States, imprisoning, shooting, hanging, and burning them, because of their color or for the exercise of privileges secured by the national Constitution, as when Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, a venerable and eminent lawyer, went down by official appointment to Charleston to discuss in the courts the question whether one State could arbitrarily, without crime alleged, and without legal process, imprison and sell the citizens of another; for which he and his daughter who accompanied him were mobbed out of that city, with the connivance of the authorities. While thus it was refusing to remain a State institution, Slavery was steadily threatening to dissolve the Union if its national demands were not granted. The fame, the honor, the consistency, the character, not of the States but of the nation, were constantly crumbling before its treason audacity, until this State institution deliberately declared by the mouths of senators and representatives and stump orators and newspapers, that its Presidential candidate, the only candidate for Governor of State—were defeated, it would try to destroy the Government. That candidate was defeated, and it kept its word.

Now if Slavery, of whose national aggressions we have mentioned two or three instances, had been content to be what it claimed to be—a State system—it would have been tolerated, even with all the vital crimes committed by it within the State against the Nation. The moral sympathy of the prosperous people of the free States for a race held in slavery in other States, whose suffering they never saw, and with whose condition they were taught that they were constitutionally forbidden to interfere, would have protected, but not finally maintained it. Slavery, however, the State system spurned State limitations, and, by seeking to nationalize itself, threatened the political rights and the material prosperity of the free States, as it did by claiming that the owner of twenty blacksmiths should enter the common territory as the rival of twenty blacksmiths who owned themselves and their wives. This attempt was accompanied by the threat of national ruin if it were resisted—then the longslumbering humanitarian sense of the American people accepted the struggle, for four years has gloriously maintained it, and will end it and its author together.

Thus the war is the direct armed aggression of Slavery upon the Government, because it had learned that it could not subvert it peacefully. That the Government had ever passed an oppressive law, such as might justify revolution, was never pretended. The complaint of Personal Liberty bills as an act of the most bad faith is long since abandoned. For what were those bills? They were laws to secure the liberty of the people of certain States. Could such laws be properly offensive to any well-disposed citizen? If the law enforcing slavery upon part of the people of Virginia were a State right not to be lawfully changed from without, was a law maintaining the freedom of all the innocent people of Wisconsin less a State right not to be externally molested? If South Carolina were to have the right to come into Boston and seize a man as a slave, was Vermont not to have the right to take care that none of her citizens were seized under false pretenses? Senator HAMMOND, of Georgia, and the chief rebel leaders at the South, made no such feeble plea as that. They left that to a class of people at the North properly called doughfaces. The leaders said, frankly, It is not your personal liberty bills, it is not the forcible rescue of fugitive slaves; it is the public opinion of the North which is the difficulty.

Moreover, neither President LINCOLN nor the party which elected him ever had the remotest intention of touching Slavery in the States. Believing it to be ultimately fatal to any State, and consequently to the Nation, they were sure that if it could be made what it forever claimed to be, a State concern, the good sense of the slave States, as Jackson said at once in the Constitutional Convention of '87, would finally extinguish it. They said only—and upon that saying the people brought them into power—"We oppose the nationalization of Slavery." "Then I will fight," said Slavery. "We hope not," said the President; "we beg you to pause and reflect." "I will fight," said the State institution, which, within its State lines, was entirely unmenaced, except by the universal heart of man and the universal conscience of civilization. It fired the shot at the Star of the West and at Fort Sumter. Slavery attacked the nation with the sword, and for three years it has shed the blood of the noblest and the most precious in the land. The sword has revealed both the essential character and the political purpose of Slavery. By God's grace, that sword shall not be sheathed except in its heart.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT LOAN.

THE Secretary of the Treasury—or rather the People of the United States acting through Mr. FESSENDEN—will borrow, by the 15th of August, Millions of Dollars upon these terms: The Government, that is the People, gives its notes for three years with interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent., payable half-yearly. These notes are drawn for amounts varying from fifty to five hundred dollars, and one hundred fifty dollars to invest can lend it to the People of the United States at a rate of interest higher than he can receive from any other safe investment.

The Security is absolute. Every dime of the wealth of the People, worth in gold at this moment not less than twenty thousand millions of dollars, and in spite of the waste of war constantly increasing, is pledged for its payment. The man who holds the notes, therefore, of a thousand dollars in these notes, holds a first mortgage upon every dollar of the whole wealth of the People.

This loan is the most convertable investment possible. If one needs money upon bond and mortgage, as farmers, for instance, often do, manufacturing, or mining stock, he can never be sure that at the moment he wishes to realize he can find a purchaser. The value of such investments changes from day to day. Now the Bulls have it, then the Bears. Between them the investor is likely to get only one shell of the oyster, the meat of which has been eaten out by Wall Street operators. But notes really drawn and indorsed by the People of the United States must always have a permanent and nearly uniform value. The holder of one can know almost to a dollar how much it will bring in the market. The loan, therefore, offers a choice of making his investment temporary or permanent. At the end of three years he can, if he prefers, receive back his loan, interest duly paid, or can exchange it for a Government bond payable in from five to twenty years. This loan is thus the best Savings Bank.

The Interest is higher than can be gained from any other safe investment. Savings Banks pay two per cent. Money can hardly be safely placed on bond and mortgage at more than six. The People in this loan offer almost seven and a half.

The Interest is easily collectable. The lender has not to hunt about for his debtor. To each note, great or small, are attached "coupons," or interest tickets. These, when due every six months, may be cut off and presented for payment at any Government Agency. They will be the best money, for any merchant or banker will be glad to receive them. The value of interest is not arbitrarily fixed. It amounts to exactly two cents a day for every hundred dollars loaned. Thus the man who lends the People a thousand dollars receives every day from them twenty cents, or $73 a year. If he deposited the same money in a Savings Bank he would receive $50 a year, with precisely the same security, since these institutions must invest their deposits in the best manner possible; and no investment is so safe as a loan to the People.

In every point of view this Government loan —even apart from the patriotic motive of maintaining the cause to which every man not a traitor has pledged his means, life, and honor—is the best and safest investment possible.

THE CALL FOR MEN.

IT seems to us a great error to represent the call for five hundred thousand men as chilling the national heart; and equally erroneous to regret that it was not rhetorically made, or to suppose that a word from General GRANT or SHERMAN would fill the ranks which the President's word might fail to recruit.

Upon the subject of an increase of the army nothing is juster than the position taken by the Evening Post, that now is the very time when we can not have too many men—a position directly antagonistic to the idea that the call for these men, whether for one, two, or three years, would chill the national ardor. But to summon them for a month or a hundred days is idle. Let them be called for one, two, or three years, and if they are not needed more than twenty days so much the better.

As for the "last" or the call, it is surely much more dignified that a summons of the President should be calm, brief, and direct. Nothing is gained by what is called rhetoric in State papers; no excitement the President might make of the situation could deepen the general feeling in regard to it; and no impassioned appeal could be more persuasive than the simple call.

But the suggestion that if SHERMAN and GRANT were there they should call directly upon the nation is more serious. SHERMAN and GRANT are Lieutenants of the Commander-in-Chief. When he calls, they call. The nation must have a strange conception of public affairs who imagines that the call for men is made without concert with GRANT and SHERMAN. He must have a still stranger conception of the duty of Generals to their Chief who supposes that the summons of the subordinates would be more persuasive. Such a proposition would, in its severity, be, if it responded to, a call from General SHERMAN which it disregarded from the President! Either the President and the General are in perfect accord, or they are not. If they are, General SHERMAN already calls for more men. If they are not, and we are likely to deny his call when it comes, meanwhile neglecting the President, then General SHERMAN is in the most dangerous position possible for the country. In that case he has that hold upon the popular heart to the exclusion of the President, which fits the false friends of M'CLELLAN tried to create for him, with the intention, under certain circumstances, of enabling him to do what some of his newspaper supporters openly called upon him, and afterward upon General GRANT to do, namely, to overthrow the Government and install himself as dictator.

There could be no surer sign of approaching anarchy than a call for more men proceeding directly from any General in the service. The men in the field are citizen-soldiers, and the President is their Commander-in-Chief. Through him, with the knowledge and approbation of their Generals, the summons ought to come, as it has come, both legitimately or doubtfully, but gravely, calmly, and confidently.

THE NATION NOT A CONFEDERACY.

THE attentive observer of the times will not fail to remark that the phrases and arguments of the opponents of the war plainly illustrate their position. They plant themselves upon State Rights, upon State Sovereignty. They reproduce CALHOUN'S elaborate sophism as the true theory of our Government, and assert that condition still to exist which ALEXANDER HAMILTON and James Madison, in the Federalist, declared that the Union was expressly formed to destroy. In a late speech of Governor SEYMOUR he declares the Union as a Confederacy. That has been often done by the most faithful citizens before the war. But since the war began the word Confederacy has had no peculiar significance but as the name of a people who claim bond of intimate fusion in whose fervent heat all State sovereignty was melted—is called "the bond of Federation," and its obligations are compared to those of a commercial treaty with Brazil.

The rebel position is now, as that of nullification was formerly, that the Constitution is a treaty or compact between States, not an instrument establishing a Government adopted by the people. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. But among the powers which the people have conferred upon the National Government are all the great attributes of sovereignty. That is exactly what the rebels deny. The Copperheads virtually support them in their denial. When Governor SEYMOUR says that the United States has the power to coerce a State he showed exactly in what school he had been trained. From that moment it was clear that he could never heartily support the war.

But even if the Constitution were solely the compact or treaty that the rebels and Copperheads claim it to be, it is plain that every party to a compact or treaty repudiates it when peril South Carolina has no right to destroy the interests and safety of IOWA or Michigan in seeking her own. The argument is as old as the sophism. WEBSTER exposed it in his reply to HAYNE. But WEBSTER wrought his statue in marble quarried from the Federalist. The people of this country will never forget that they are as primarily citizens of the Union or nation as of any State. In one sense, indeed, they are more so. For in almost every one of the large, active, controlling States a multitude of the citizens were born elsewhere. In the great Northwestern States this is true of much of the adult population. If a conflicting interState question should arise they would be distracted between the State of birth and that of residence. But a national question finds them every where equally at home. The States are the fields, from one to another of which they pass at will. But in every field they are still upon the old family estate.

No man so early saw the necessity of this National Union and State subordination as ALEXANDER HAMILTON; and no one more trenchantly exposed the subterfuge of State Sovereignty and the true nature of the Union. In the twenty-second number of the Federalist he says: "It has not a little contributed to the infirmities of the existing federal system [that of Confederation] that it never had a ratification by the people. Resting on no better foundation than the consent of the several Legislatures, it has been exposed to frequent and intricate questions concerning the validity of its powers, and has sometimes been on the point of a formidable doctrine of a right of legislative appeal. Owing its ratification to the law of a State, it has been contended that the same authority might repeal the law by which it was ratified. However gross a heresy it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of our National Government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. The fabric of American empire ought to rest on the solid basis of the consent of the people. The streams of national power ought to flow immediately from that pure original fountain of all legitimate authority."

When the empire ought to rest on the consent and the jealousy of national power which could not prevent the formation of the Union is not clear. But surely it now has the indispensability for individual welfare and the general prosperity has been revealed to every citizen. When HENRY CLAY said in the Senate in 1850 is the simple expression of the thought of every loyal American: "If Kentucky to-morrow unfurls the banner of revolution I never will fight under that banner. I owe a paramount allegiance to the whole Union—a subordinate one to my own State."

A PLEASANT PROGRAMME.

THE coincidence of the presence of rebel agents upon the frontier and the invasion of Maryland, during the last month, is not without significance. Like desperate gamblers, those gentlemen would try, as occasion served, either to sweep all the stakes into their hungry pockets, or, as actually happened, beg pitifully for a penny. When Washington was cut off from communication with the North, the reader may remember the published denial of reports that the President was in the hands of the rebels; if the same reader had any Copperhead sources of information, he knew what the report meant, and from whom apparently.

Washington was to be taken. The President and Cabinet would escape to Canada; and thereupon a Peace Convention would assemble to the people of the States that all the Confederacy wanted was the independence which it had shown its ability to maintain, and a treaty with equity. In the vacuum of the Chief Magistracy a Dictator would be inevitable. He would command the armies. There might be some demur—yes, some possibly—but then the rebel would break out every where, and its horrors would compel negotiation and peace, and secure the triumph of the rebellion.

Here was a pretty dish to set before a nation! Yet it was supposed by many to be very nearly palatable. There are men in the city of New York, for instance, who sneer at the idea of "conquering the South," but who seriously suppose that "the North" is to be conquered, and they believed that this programme was to be carried out! Doubtless there are many who would like to see it fulfilled, and who would help to fulfill it. But they should reflect that war, which was so inexpressibly awful a word to the people of this country four years ago, has become sadly familiar. They should not forget that we have now the habit of anticipating that insecurity which civil war produces. They should always remember that the cause for which "the North" has given so much of every kind, and in every way, is a deep, earnest, permanent conviction of the vital necessity of Union; and that while their friends defend it in Southern fields they would not shrink from the defense in Northern streets. They should bear in mind that "conservatism" showed its hand in the bloody riots of last year, and that its solemn assevernations of regard for government, and of the fundamental guarantees of civil liberty, are fully illustrated by the light of burning asylums, and in the roaring streets where human beings guilty of dark skins were hunted and massacred, and that these asseverations are valued as their recent work.

With this experience of "Conservatism," he would be a dull student of history and human nature who was not constantly conscious of the perils and probabilities of a political contest of which "Conservatism" of the New York type is one of the parties—a "Conservatism" which devotes its energies to exciting the jealousy of the State against the nation and the hatred of the most ignorant class of the population, which, in the midst of a civil war involving national existence, declares that the friends of the Government are really responsible for the rebellion, and relying upon the most sordid passions closes its eyes to the permanent welfare to be secured, and points out with speechless horror the vast expenses to be encountered. A "Conservatism" like this, which includes and flatters the most degraded and dangerous population, will put no citizen off his guard. Its existence makes every good citizen a sentinel. Whether it fail or take the shadowy form of a northwestern conspiracy or appear in the bloody reality of a New York riot, it will not be unanticipated. The masks are stripped off. The friends and the enemies of the rebellion are known. The friends may do or use to dare and to prevent the election of Mr. Lincoln, and to secure the triumph of the conspiracy, and the final shame and ruin of the Union and Constitution. But if they are desperate, good citizens are firm. The loyal men of the North are not to be bullied either by threats of battle or by bugbears. They have clearly made up their minds to fight the war through, and they will do so wherever the exigency may demand. How can any sensible Copperhead suppose that a people with his line about what "the North" has, during the last three years, is so utterly and ludicrously pusillanimous as to yield at the moment of the most serious issue which it disputes in Virginia and Georgia?

AN IMPORTANT BEGINNING.

The University Convocation of New York is an annual meeting of the Regents of the University, and of the Presidents, heads, and teachers of the various colleges and schools of the State subject to the visitation of the Regents, for the purpose of improving by the comparison of experience, by essays and discussions, the standard and methods of education. The Convocation of this year was but the second. Yet it is clear that it is full of promise, if the interest manifested shall annually increase as it extended, as it is likely to do. A union of the Regents and of all the collegiate and academic experts of the State makes a force which, for its proper purposes, is irresistible. In the legislature or before the people it would not easily be withstood by the utmost adroitness of the Lobby or the grandest audacity of misrepresentation. Such a body, well organized, ought to secure and maintain the noblest system of public instruction possible.

This year the Convocation approached a subject of the greatest general interest and importance. One of the most prominent topics of education was the value of competitive examinations in preparation for public employment, both military and civil. Mr. Henry Barnard, of Hartford, the experienced and accomplished editor of the American Journal of Education, made a stirring and vigorous appeal to the Convocation to take some steps toward the accomplishment of so great an object. President Anderson, of the Rochester University, who has recently returned from a collegiate tour in Europe, supported Mr. Barnard with great force. The practical application of their remarks was to the appointment at West Point and Annapolis Academy; and the necessity of some such examination, if we would have those academies of the future that is apparent from the last year's report of the Board of Visitors to West Point.

The facts are that the appointments are made by the Representatives in Congress. They are determined by purely personal or political considerations, and regard to the disposition or fitness of the boy. The entering examination is a farce. Every boy of ten years should be able to pass it. He is flogged, said Mr. Anderson. Yet, of those who are presented, a large proportion fail in this preliminary examination. Of all who enter not a half graduate, although the intellectual training is not severe than in an excellent female academy, such as Mrs. Willard's, in Troy; and of those who fail, three-fifths break down in the studies of the first year, which are elementary.

Now what should the rule be? Evidently that the boy in every district of the most equal aptitude and of the highest scholarly merit should be appointed. And this could be done if the representative would consent to make his nomination dependent upon the result of an open examination of all such candidates. General Sickles, when in Congress, four years ago, tried the experiment. He gave his appointment to the boy who stood best at the Free Academy, and this year that boy graduated at the head of his class at West Point.

The discussion was most interesting, and resulted in the passage of numerous recommending such a course, and instructing the Board of Regents to inform our representatives of the sense of the Convocation. Of course some more practicable plan to be submitted to them. The Board, in pursuance of the request, appointed a committee which will not put the matter to sleep. If the Convocation can thus influence one representative in one State, it will have begun a reform of incalculable advantage to the country. And when it becomes the practice of one State it must inevitably extend to all. The principle once illustrated in the military and naval service of Mr. Sickles's Canadian Pupil bill provides for the civil, and we shall have fairly begun the movement which can alone save the Government from the silly confidences and incapacity which will engulf the most righteous theories and the truest principles.

CUNNING OUTWITTED

Is alluding to the peace performance at Niagara Falls Mr. Greeley has said, and it has been repeated by others, that it would have been wiser for the President to have "asked the Confederates to perfect and verify their credentials and then make their application." The object of his doing so would have been to allow the rebels to show that they wished nothing short of recognition, or some other equally inadmissible condition.

But Mr. Greeley must surely see that there would be no end to this business. Every time Messrs. N. Agency Cleary or Jacob Thompson chose to announce that a couple of rebels wish to talk about peace, to the President to say that they have only to get authorized and he will hear them? The President has left no doubt of his position. Whenever an authorized proposition is ready to be made the Government is, and always has been, ready to consider it. Mr. Clay, and Mr. Holcombe, and Mr. Greeley knew that perfectly well, and it is idle to say that the Government hindered their getting authority. If they had really wanted to treat, or had honestly expected any result, does Mr. Greeley suppose they would have come without authority?

The President's reply thwarted their plan. It exposed their trick. It showed that they did not seek authority to treat for the restoration of the Union and the abandonment of slavery. That is just as evident now as it would have been if they had gone to Washington and proposed a separation and a commercial treaty. The President's honesty, as usual, utterly outwitted diplomacy.

THE APPEAL TO COWARDICE.

The appeal of the Copperheads to cowardice, in order to delay and embarrass recruiting, is natural. Their creed is a gospel of fear, hate, and the intelligence of Americans. Thus we read in a late newspaper an extract from a letter of a soldier in the Ninth Corps to show how great the loss had been, and a little sub-editorial remark to the effect that "fine openings for young men is now defined—Graves on the north bank of the Rappahannock."

There is something ludicrous and pitiful in telling Americans who are fighting for every thing that is precious to them that losses and liberties secure that they may get hurt. The rebels, it seems, were told the same thing, and a clerical friend of mine, who has published since a pamphlet to show how small a chance there is that any individual soldier will be killed. If the argument were so general that it was really necessary for such a statement to be made, the condition of the rebel value would be most promising for the Union cause. And if the Copperhead appeals to cowardice were really likely to prevail, it would be only because we deserved the loss of the liberties which we did not dare to defend.

DEATH OF MRS. GENERAL BARLOW.

In speaking of General Barlow, whose portrait we published a few weeks since, we said that the man of his division would never forgive his biographer who should attempt to conceal the severity of his service in the hospitals and among the wounded and dying soldiers after the beginning of the war to this day, of his faithful and devoted wife, and that for no woman in the land did more earnest prayers ascend from suffering lips and grateful hearts than for Mrs. General Barlow. Those prayers no longer avail. On the 27th of July Mrs. Barlow died in Washington of typhus fever contracted in the military hospital. On the same day her brave husband was driving the rebels from their intrenchments and recapturing some of the guns taken from us last spring. Thus each at the post of duty, the wife dies and the husband makes his life still more illustrious.

Amiable, accomplished, admired, beloved, Mrs. Barlow from the first has been among the most eminent of the many heroines in this war whose names are not publicly mentioned. Her memory will be forever fresh in the grateful heart of their friends and country.

NO MILITARY AUTOCRAT.

Governor Brown, of Georgia, has ordered into active military service all the reserve militia between the ages of sixteen and seventeen, and fifty and fifty-five; also all from seventeen to fifty who are exempt from "Confederate conscription;" and, in fine, all who are able to bear arms; and all who are liable to be drafted are to seize and carry off as deserters all who do not. Those who resist, of course, will be shot.

How pleasing, in view of this order, to learn from Mr. Clement C. Clay that if "there be any military autocrat in the North" who can do what the Georgia Governor does, "there is none in the South;" and that "those who control our armies are the servants of the people, not their masters." That will probably be the opinion of any unfortunate Georgian, who, not wishing to see his family starve, is slain for not obeying his servant, Governor Brown.

"THE STONINGTON LINE."

We know by pleasant experience that there are no more agreeable steamers upon the Sound than those of the "Stonington Line," as it is still called, although within a few years the dangerous and difficult harbor of Stonington has been closed, and the steamers stop at Groton, opposite New London, whence the railroad skirts the Sound and Narragansett Bay to Providence and Boston. The boats are strong, spacious, well-appointed, and clean. The family accommodations are admirable, especially in regard to the commanding state-rooms and private supper-tables. The route winding through the islands to the Sound, and among its pleasantest part to the Thames River, is delightful, and as little exposed as possible. You cross the bottom of Narragansett Bay in the night. Fall is the time for the best trips, when the weather is not too hot, and there are few passengers. The table is abundant and excellent, and the servants need a rapid multiplication table to count the number of persons they are to serve. Those who have not tried this route have a delightful experience before them. The President has left no doubt of his position. Whenever an authorized proposition is ready to be made the Government is, and always has been, ready to consider it. Mr. Clay, and Mr. Holcombe, and Mr. Greeley knew that perfectly well, and it is idle to say that the Government hindered their getting authority. If they had really wanted to treat, or had honestly expected any result, does Mr. Greeley suppose they would have come without authority?

The President's reply thwarted their plan. It exposed their trick. It showed that they did not seek authority to treat for the restoration of the Union and the abandonment of slavery. That is just as evident now as it would have been if they had gone to Washington and proposed a separation and a commercial treaty. The President's honesty, as usual, utterly outwitted diplomacy.

THE APPEAL TO COWARDICE.

The appeal of the Copperheads to cowardice, in order to delay and embarrass recruiting, is natural. Their creed is a gospel of fear, hate, and the intelligence of Americans. Thus we read in a late newspaper an extract from a letter of a soldier in the Ninth Corps to show how great the loss had been, and a little sub-editorial remark to the effect that "fine openings for young men is now defined—Graves on the north bank of the Rappahannock."

There is something ludicrous and pitiful in telling Americans who are fighting for every thing that is precious to them that losses and liberties secure that they may get hurt. The rebels, it seems, were told the same thing, and a clerical friend of mine, who has published since a pamphlet to show how small a chance there is that any individual soldier will be killed. If the argument were so general that it was really necessary for such a statement to be made, the condition of the rebel value would be most promising for the Union cause. And if the Copperhead appeals to cowardice were really likely to prevail, it would be only because we deserved the loss of the liberties which we did not dare to defend.

DEATH OF MRS. GENERAL BARLOW.

In speaking of General Barlow, whose portrait we published a few weeks since, we said that the man of his division would never forgive his biographer who should attempt to conceal the severity of his service in the hospitals and among the wounded and dying soldiers after the beginning of the war to this day, of his faithful and devoted wife, and that for no woman in the land did more earnest prayers ascend from suffering lips and grateful hearts than for Mrs. General Barlow. Those prayers no longer avail. On the 27th of July Mrs. Barlow died in Washington of typhus fever contracted in the military hospital. On the same day her brave husband was driving the rebels from their intrenchments and recapturing some of the guns taken from us last spring. Thus each at the post of duty, the wife dies and the husband makes his life still more illustrious.

NEWS ITEMS.

The battle of the 28th was an assault in force on the Fifteenth Corps, and appears to have resulted in a complete a defeat of the rebels as that of the 22d. Six thousand and forty-two dead rebels were buried by our forces after that battle.

FROM THE SHENANDOAH.

Early finding that Crook was disturbing his progress of harvests in the Shenandoah, turned back upon him on the 23d, and fought him a short distance beyond Winchester, which drove the rebels from entrenched lines, with a loss to Crook of 300. Crook was defeated, losing nearly 1000 guns. Colonel Thoburn was killed. After that Early struck Martinsburg. Since the capture of this place nothing has occurred of any importance, except the raid of a few hundred cavalry to Chambersburg. This party burned the latter place on the 30th of the town, destroying over a hundred dwellings. Averell at the latest advices was pursuing these wicked fellows.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

In Egypt, when a death occurred in a family, "the right thing to do" was to send for the doctor. The medical gentleman of the day had not only the privilege of doing and scorching people when alive; but even when dead "the noble blood" had another ordeal to undergo at their hands.

When the doctor came he had to show his skill, not to bring back the dead man or woman to life again, but to adopt every precaution to prevent the dead body or thing; or, if he or she did, he or she should be of very little use; and the operator first took a strong hook through the nostrils with a curved probe, to make the head and shoulders disengage from the head and to allow the brain to be extracted in circular drops. An instrument being made in the side of the nose, the operator then threw down, on a stone table, vessels and covered the powdered aromatics. Sometimes they were restored to the belly and sometimes dropped in vases and laid in the entombment. The body itself was filled with powdered myrrh, cassia, and liquid substances, and sewn up. This being done, it was kept in natron for seventy days; then washed and prepared in linen, of which a hundred ells were occasionally used. Then prepared it was removed to the embalming house, and delivered to those in the case of a wife or husband, retained at home until the time of burial. The mode of the pair to undergo the same process, and then both were deposited together in a vault. A delectable history, this, to read on a hot summer's day, more than 3000.

Among the ancient peoples of Asia and Europe, in ancient times, exhibit the most curious peculiarities as regards the treatment of the dead. Thus the Persians, as we read in dogs are the sepulchers. Here the most complimentary thing you can do to the body in peace and giving them to be eaten by the dogs. The poor have as their only sepulchers the stomachs of dogs and the wild beasts; but the more distinguished dishes are treated with great reverence, and the Lamentors of the Tower of Silence are kept, and within them the rich Thibetans are buried. Remarkable fact—the man dragged to his death is the dog.

Among the many eccentricities which have been displayed in all making the two following instances are noteworthy. In Sweden, well known as an active critic on the banking system, left a large sum of money to be distributed after his death, in the manner he recommended to himself; secondly, in the circulation of his works; and, thirdly, to the purchase of his books, presented by his nearest acquaintances. Another English gentleman, Mr. Thomas Hollis, of the Hartley Institute of Southampton, directed in his will that a room in that building should be fitted and closed up for ever for the preservation of his mother's wardrobe and furniture. And there are to be no alterations in the articles used in English merchant's wife of a century ago—bonnets, dresses, shoes, stockings, fans, gloves, handkerchiefs, and everything else either a most singular collection.

The love of dress is not confined to the ancients; five hundred years ago whales abounded in every sea. The great monsters of the deep were not only hunted for oil, but much such destruction of whales that they are disappearing from the northern parts of the ocean, and are now numerous in the Mediterranean, but are now no longer so. They live on small animalcules in which the sea at times abounds, which must have increased enormously, owing to the destruction of whales. It is to the presence of these small organisms that the phosphorescence of the Mediterranean Sea is attributed.

The late King of Wurtemberg astonished in his will the world by a most curious codicil. In this he directs that his cremains and etiquette, and that he does not wish to be buried with them after the fashion. He therefore begged that his body might not be laid out in state and that no one should accompany "those who are willing to" find this natural, and the curious must pardon me for having left them in the lurch, as I have no time for curiosity nonsense." He desired that his body might leave the palace at night, that the attendants who had served the Reformation by the time being or choose that the procession should not have more than 12 coaches of the state.

The mass of the Russian population is clothed at a very cheap rate. A woman's trowsers and long high boots of half-dressed leather, a cotton shirt, and a sheepskin coat, covered with either red or blue cloth, with ornaments of the white outward mass of the mouth, when entire, and the sheepskin, about ten rubles (fifteen dollars), the sheepskin being the most expensive article. Trowsers and boots are the most expensive articles. Trowsers of a certain (or long petticoat), held by straps when the wearer is walking, a chemise with long sleeves nearly to the elbow, a kerchief over the head, a pair of boots and stockings, and a cloak of a thick woolly stuff or cotton or linen cloth wrapped round the leg and foot. Sometimes a woman is clothed under a man's coat, and when circumstances will permit, a calope or long cloak in the form of a petticoat.

In Lower Saxony the young girls gather sprigs of holly, which they wear on the 4th of St. John, and expect them on the wake of their chambers, with certain mysterious ceremonies, and if they are found in the following morning indicate their future lot. If fresh and unfaded, they are to have a prosperous marriage; if withered and dying, the reverse. The plant is influenced by the condition of the girl. It is plucked with the left hand inside and the more likely to have prosperous marriages than those who pluck it with the right or by their dress.

In Paris there are said to be sixty thousand persons who take in their washing, and the number that they will have any thing to eat during the day.

The summer visitors to Northern England prevent the loss of heat when their tea is brewing by putting over it a kind of tea-cosy, made of flannel, and lined with wadding. The use of this, especially where, as at Ilarrat water places, the tea is long and fine to brew, is very beneficial. The tea is thus kept twenty degrees warmer.

